Introduction

Many times I have been reading a verse in some version of the Bible and asked myself, “Why did they translate it that way?” The vast majority of the time, there is no way to know. Generally speaking, translators of the Bible are recognized scholars, and they translate without giving explanations for what their translation says. That is not our intention in the REV. There are different types of commentaries, but this commentary has two purposes: to give an explanation of why we translated as we did in the REV, and to explain biblical passages so the reader can better understand them.

Our multi-year goal is to produce a commentary that will be very helpful in Bible Study both from a text-critical standpoint (the transmission and meaning of the Greek text) and from an exegetical standpoint (setting forth major points of meaning in the biblical text). Our general pattern of commentary is that if our translation can be documented easily by logic or by looking at standard resources such as interlinear Bibles or Greek or Hebrew lexicons, then we do not take the time to comment on the verse. We comment when we feel that the translation would not be understood, or the understanding of a verse can be significantly clarified by commentary about it. If we feel that something has been adequately explained in another source, we often simply refer the reader to that source. I have found that when one understands the Bible, it becomes more fun to read and is easier to live by, and becomes a much more integral part of the person’s relationship with God.

John W. Schoenheit (August 15, 2009)

General Notes on the Translation Theory of the REV

1. We started by using the ASV (American Standard Version of 1901) as a base text, so that we would have a version for Christians to read as the REV develops. This is different from the developmental process for most translations, which are generally not available to the public until they are finished. We are modifying the ASV when we feel we have logical, grammatical, lexical, or textual reasons to do so. As the REV translation develops, we will rely more completely on our own translation of the Greek and Hebrew texts.

2. We intend to produce a version that is more literal, such as the KJV or NASB, and not produce a “dynamic equivalent” version, paraphrased version, etc. There will be times when a literal translation of the Greek, Hebrew, or Aramaic will not make sense, and we will do our best to represent the meaning of the original in our translation.

3. We are willing to use multi-word phrases if we feel they are needed to carry the accurate sense of a word in the Greek or Hebrew text. For example, we translate the Greek word musterion as “sacred secret.”
4. We will ordinarily use the 27th edition of Novum Testamentum Graece edited by Nestle and Aland, and Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia as the Greek and Hebrew texts underlying our translation. However, we believe there are times when those works do not read as the original autograph did. A good example is John 1:18, where we believe that the Western text family, which reads, “only begotten son,” is original, not “only begotten God,” as the Alexandrian text family and Novum Testamentum Graece read.

5. Our mode of operation is to translate the text first, and as we translate to build a general lexical base that will influence other verses having the same vocabulary as the one we are working in. We do not build the lexical base first, but will build that base as we translate. We fully expect there to be some “back and forth” correction, i.e., as we translate verses through the years there will no doubt be a modification of some verses we have already translated.

6. We represent the same Greek (or Hebrew) words by the same English words whenever that makes the best sense. However, we recognize the existence of semantic range, homonymic usage, and linguistic sense, as well as the fact that case, gender, etc., often influences the meaning of the word. We do not intend to produce an awkward English version just to maintain an artificial relation to the Greek or Hebrew text. There will be cases when the same Greek or Hebrew word is translated different ways, and there will be cases where different Greek and Hebrew words will be translated by the same English word.

7. It is our philosophy that God wrote the original in a way that pleased Him, and we do best if we stick as close as possible to that. There are many versions of the Bible available on the market today, and each serves a purpose. The Version of the New Testament that we of Spirit & Truth Fellowship International are producing is a more literal version of the New Testament. The Bible is easy to understand in some parts (i.e., “do not steal;” Rom. 13:9), while other parts are much more complicated and require a broader knowledge of language, customs, history, etc. While many translators work to translate difficult material out of their versions to make them easier for beginning Christians, we intend to produce a more literal version and allowing the student to learn customs, culture, etc., directly from the text. That is also why we desire to produce this commentary. The commentary provides an explanation of the meaning of difficult verses.

• Many modern versions paraphrase the biblical text. We will do our best to avoid paraphrasing, fully realizing that the reader will have to be more educated in biblical language, figures of speech and customs to read and understand our version, but also realizing that same knowledge would be required to read the original text.

• Many modern versions simplify the vocabulary for easier reading. Our intention is to attempt to bring out the richness of the original, even if that means using a vocabulary that challenges some people. Understanding the Bible means growing in knowledge of many things, and vocabulary is one of them.

• Many modern versions make the Bible gender-neutralized. The Bible reflects the culture of the biblical times, which was much more male centered than our modern culture. Gender neutralizing removes the “feel” of the Biblical culture from the biblical text. It is our belief that this eventually leads to a loss of understanding of the Bible itself. We intend to represent the gender that is in the original text, believing that, because it is God-breathed, there is value in translating the text as it was written.

- Yahweh, the name of God, has been translated “LORD” in many modern versions. We correct this back to Yahweh. There are many words that can be, and are, legitimately translated “lord.” To us, something is lost when the personal name of God is replaced with a title. Historically, God is always trying to get close to people, and people are always trying to push him away or distance themselves from him. Many examples of this exist in the Bible, from Moses being afraid at the burning bush, to the Israelites telling Moses that they did not want God speaking with them, to Peter telling Jesus to depart from him. The idea that Yahweh is too holy to speak is not from God, but from men, and it originated late in the history of Israel. In the end, it adds further distance between us and God. We intend to restore Yahweh to the text.

- There are some words in the Hebrew and Greek that have no English equivalent, and we believe that it best serves the interests of the Bible student to simply transliterate them from the Hebrew or Greek itself. An example is “Tartarus” in 2 Peter 2:4. Tartarus, a word taken from Greek mythology, was a prison for gods who displeased greater gods. As such, Tartarus is a fitting word to describe where God put the demons who sinned against Him at the time of the Flood. Translating it “hell” (KJV, NIV, NASB, ESV, etc.) misses the point, because many Christians believe that demons rule hell, they are not prisoners in it, and they come and go from it as they please. We say “Tartarus” and let the reader become educated, giving a wonderful look at the Bible and God’s truth.

8. We put in bold print the quotations of the Old Testament that appear in the New Testament, as the Companion Bible does. Commentators do not always agree on exactly what is a quotation from the Old Testament and what is not. And there are times when some commentators, E. W. Bullinger being one, call something a quotation when it is actually only a reference to the OT. We tried to be conservative, and call something a quotation only if we could reasonably document it as such.

9. We put in italics words that are not in the Greek text, as do the KJV, NASB, and original ASV. In the Greek language, certain omitted words are understood. For example, in a simple sentence the verb “is” is sometimes omitted, being understood by Greek speakers. We often put that verb in without putting it in italics. Similarly, Greek includes the gender in the noun, so we may say “he” or “she” in our version without a stand-alone pronoun in the Greek, drawing the gender clue from the context.

10. We put in brackets words or verses that were probably not in the original text, but the evidence about them is not completely conclusive at this time.

11. Prepositions: It is very difficult to maintain any consistency when translating prepositions due to their extremely flexible use. This is true in English also. For example, it is common for someone at a fast-food, drive-through restaurant such as McDonald’s to hear the teller say, “Drive up to the next window.” Of course, cars do not drive “up,” and the next window is “forward,” not “up.” However, “forward” has become one of the uses of “up” in English. This is also true in Greek, and not recognizing the flexible nature of prepositions results in actually mistranslating and misunderstanding the text. The difficulty of maintaining constancy is exemplified by the word “wherefore” in the ASV, which is the translation of many Greek words; including tis, hopos, hothen, hoste, diate, dioper, dia touto, charin tinos, etc.
Matthew

Chapter 1

1:1. “a scroll.” For why there are four Gospels, see commentary on Mark 1:1, “gospel.”
1:6. The parenthesis is the figure of speech epitrechon, a form of parenthesis where the statement is not itself a complete thought (Bullinger, Figures of Speech).
1:16. “father.” The Greek is anēr (#435 ἀνήρ), and means “an adult human male.” Anēr is generally assumed to mean “husband” in this verse, but that cannot be the case. For one thing, the list of the three sets of 14 generations that go from Abraham to Christ (vs. 2-16), makes this impossible. If Joseph is the husband of Mary, there would only be 13 generations in the last list of “14 generations.” Also, the Aramaic text reads differently in this verse than it does in verse 19, and in verse 19 Joseph is unmistakably referred to as the “husband” of Mary. The difference in the vocabulary indicates a difference in the relationship.

The Gospel of Matthew contains the genealogy from David to Jesus via his mother Mary. In contrast, the Gospel of Luke contains the genealogy from David to Jesus via his adopted father, Joseph. There has been a lot of controversy about the genealogy of Jesus because at first reading, both Matthew 1:16 and Luke 3:23 seem to indicate a genealogy that comes through Joseph, which is confusing. For one thing, Joseph ends up with two different fathers, “Jacob” (Matt. 1:16) and “Heli” (Luke 3:23), and Mary, who is the blood link between David and Jesus, ends up having no genealogy in the Bible.

Different scholars have tried to explain how both genealogies can be Joseph’s. For example, some say that Joseph himself was adopted as a child, and thus had both a “natural” genealogy and an “adopted” genealogy. Others say that both genealogies are Joseph’s, but the contradictions between them are simply a matter of poor record keeping in those days. Other scholars assert that both genealogies are about Joseph, but the people in them had multiple names, so that the two genealogies actually refer to the same people. All these theories, and more, have been set forth to explain why Joseph seems to have two genealogies in the Bible, but they all have serious problems, which is why there are so many different theories and why none of them have been widely accepted.

As we study the genealogies, it becomes clear that Luke contains that of Joseph. Luke’s genealogy shows the ancestry of Jesus coming through King David via his son Nathan (Luke 3:31). Nathan, who is not as well known as Solomon, was one of the four children that David fathered by Bathsheba (1 Chron. 3:5). Nothing is known about Nathan’s life except that he did have children and descendants who then multiplied in Israel, and so he is mentioned in Zechariah 12:12 as having a clan. The genealogy in Luke reads in a straightforward manner from God through Adam to Joseph the supposed father of Jesus, ending with Jesus. More evidence that Luke contains Joseph’s genealogy is that Mary is never mentioned, but the name “Joseph” appears in it three times. It often happened in the biblical culture (and modern cultures as well) that children were named after an ancestor (which was why Zachariah’s relatives wanted to name his child after him; Luke 1:59), so the fact that two ancestors in Luke’s genealogy have the name “Joseph,” but none do in the genealogy in Matthew is good support for Luke containing Joseph’s genealogy.
In spite of the fact that Luke seems to give the genealogy of Joseph in a very clear and straightforward manner, some scholars assert that the genealogy in Luke is Mary’s, not Joseph’s. The main reason they say Luke has Mary’s genealogy is that they believe, and rightly so, that Mary should have a genealogy in the Bible. They then assert that because Luke says that Joseph “was thought” to be the father of Jesus (Luke 3:23), Mary is in the genealogy in Luke even though she is never named in it. But the fact is that Mary is not named in Luke, and arbitrarily trying to make Luke contain Mary’s genealogy just so Mary will have a genealogy in the Bible is not the way to solve a biblical problem. Scholars recognize this, which is why that “solution” to the genealogical problem is not widely accepted. It seems clear that if Luke did have Mary’s genealogy, as many believe, that Luke would mention Mary and not have a cryptic statement that Joseph was the supposed father of Jesus. We believe that the Gospel of Luke can be taken at face value, and that it records the genealogy of Jesus through Joseph.

Mary does have a genealogy in the Bible, and it is in the Gospel of Matthew. However, it can seem like Matthew records the genealogy of Joseph. However, if Matthew’s genealogy is about Joseph, then there are some significant problems in the biblical text. One is that Joseph would then have two contradictory genealogies in the Bible while Mary had no genealogy. An even larger problem, however, would a mathematical one. If Joseph is counted as the “husband” of Mary (Matt. 1:16), there are only 13 generations from the carrying away to Babylon to Christ, and not 14 generations, as Matthew 1:17 says there are: “So all the generations from Abraham to David are fourteen generations, and from David to the carrying away to Babylon are fourteen generations, and from the carrying away to Babylon to the Christ are fourteen generations.”

The first set of 14 generations, from Abraham to David, are: 1) Abraham, 2) Isaac, 3) Jacob, 4) Judah, 5) Perez, 6) Hezron, 7) Ram, 8) Amminadab, 9) Nahshon, 10) Salmon, 11) Boaz, 12) Obed, 13) Jesse, 14) David.

The second set of 14 generations, from David to the carrying away to Babylon, are:

When it come to the last list of 14 generations, however, if we count the generations as they are translated in most Bibles, there are only 13 generations although Scripture says there are 14 generations. 1) Shealtiel, 2) Zerubbabel, 3) Abiud, 4) Eliakim, 5) Azor, 6) Zadok, 7) Akim, 8) Eliud, 9) Eleazar, 10) Mattan, 11) Jacob, 12) Joseph (the husband of Mary), 13) Jesus.

The problem with the list is obvious and has been pointed out by many commentators: it has only 13 generations, not 14 like Scripture says. Some scholars have tried to solve the problem by doing such things as counting names twice, but that hardly does justice to the text.

It was very important that Matthew portray a pattern of three sets of 14 generations. We know that because if we count the actual generations, there were more than just 42 people (3 times 14) from Abraham to Christ. To make the pattern fit, some people had to be left out of the Matthew’s list. When the genealogy in Matthew is compared with the other genealogies in the Bible, it is clear that there are people missing from Matthew’s genealogy. For example, in Matthew 1:8, between Jehoram and Uzziah, there are actually three unmentioned generations. Jehoram begat Ahaziah (2 Kings 8:25), who begat Joash (also called Jehoash; 2 Kings 11:2, 21), who begat Amaziah (2 Kings 12:21). These three names do not appear in Matthew, and there are some other unmentioned names as well.

Although there are some names missing from Matthew’s list, it was not essential to give every name in a biblical genealogy of kings. Many genealogical lists in the Bible have names missing for various reasons. What was important to Matthew is that he set forth the genealogy of Jesus in a pattern of three sets of fourteen generations from Abraham to Christ. Therefore, to have only 13 names in the last set of 14 tells us something is very wrong. But if we closely examine the list, we see that it does have 14 names, and thus 14 generations if each name represents a generation.

Mary is not usually counted in the list of 14 because she and Joseph are usually thought of as husband and wife and thus in the same generation. However, there is good evidence that “Joseph” is not only the name of Mary’s husband, but also the name of her father as well. That would not be unusual in the biblical culture, because Joseph was a common name. For example, in the Roman Catholic Bible, which includes the Apocrypha, there are 16 different people named Joseph, not counting Mary’s father, who would make 17.

If the “Joseph” in Matthew 1:16 was the father of Mary, not her husband, then there would be 14 generations from Babylon to Christ, just like Scripture says there is: 1) Shealtiel, 2) Zerubbabel, 3) Abiud, 4) Eliakim, 5) Azor, 6) Zadok, 7) Akim, 8) Eliud, 9) Eleazar, 10) Mattan, 11) Jacob, 12) Joseph (the father of Mary), 13) Mary, 14) Jesus.

That Matthew contains Mary’s genealogy and Luke contains Joseph’s genealogy makes sense because Mary’s genealogy in Matthew does not mention Joseph, her husband, who was not part of her genealogy anyway, nor does Joseph’s genealogy in Luke mention Mary, who had nothing to do with his genealogy. In Mary’s genealogy in Matthew, four other women are mentioned, Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, and “Uriah’s wife,” emphasizing the role that women play in a genealogy. Joseph’s genealogy in Luke does not include any women, but does include two of his ancestors who were also named Joseph.

There is still one important thing to resolve. Most versions translate Matthew 1:16 to say that Joseph was the “husband” of Mary, not the “father” of Mary. However, we believe that “husband” is a mistranslation. The Greek word translated “husband” is aner, and means an adult male. Usually when aner is used with the phrase “of [a woman’s name], such as in “Joseph, the aner of Mary,” it refers to the woman’s husband. But there is good evidence that in this verse aner should be translated “father.” First, translating it “husband” creates a contradiction in the Word of God because then there are not 14 generations from Babylon to Christ. Second, it creates a confusing situation in the Word because both Matthew and Luke then refer to Joseph’s genealogy, such that Joseph ends up with two different fathers.

Thankfully, the Aramaic text of Matthew has good evidence that Matthew 1:16 should read “father.” In the Greek text, both Matthew 1:16 and 1:19 use the word aner (“man” or “husband”). Matthew 1:19 clearly refers to Joseph as the “husband” of Mary because it speaks of Joseph thinking of divorcing her. However, the Aramaic text of Matthew does not use the same word in Matthew 1:16 and 1:19, but has two different words, and thus makes a distinction between the two men. In Matthew 1:16, the Aramaic word is gavra, which means “mighty man,” “father,” or “husband,” while in Matthew Matthew 1:19 the word is bala, which is “man” or “husband.” Thus the Aramaic text preserves the truth that there is a difference between the “Joseph” of verse 16, the “mighty man” of Mary, and the “Joseph” of verse 19, the “husband” of Mary.

Once we realize that “Joseph” is the name of both the father and the husband of Mary, the Word of God fits together perfectly. Both the genealogies of Mary and Joseph are in the Bible so that everyone could see they were both descendants of David and thus Jesus was indeed, “the Son of David.” Scripture also shows in other places that both Joseph and Mary are from David (Joseph: Matt. 1:20; Luke 1:27; 2:4. Mary: Acts 2:30; Rom. 1:3). Luke contains the genealogy of Jesus via his adopted father, Joseph, and never mentions Mary, who was not part of Joseph’s genealogy. Matthew contains the genealogy of Jesus through his mother Mary, and never mentions her husband Joseph. Joseph has two ancestors also named Joseph in his genealogy, while four other women are included in Mary’s genealogy. Last but not least, the three sets of fourteen generations mentioned in Matthew are all complete when we realize Joseph in Matthew 1:16 is Mary’s father.

In closing, it should be mentioned that each of the Four Gospels emphasizes a different aspect of Christ’s life. Matthew portrays Jesus as the King, Mark as the Servant, Luke as the Man, and John as the Son of God. Thus it perfectly fits that Matthew traces Jesus’ royal bloodline and emphasizes Abraham who was promised the land and David the king, continuing the royal line down through David’s son Solomon. Luke, on the other hand, emphasizes the human side of Jesus, including being adopted by Joseph, and records his genealogy all the way back to Adam, the first human being.

“Mary.” The first time her name occurs in the NT. Here she is said to be of royal birth, and her father’s (and thus her) line is traced from none other than King David himself. Yet there is another, unspoken truth that needs to be weighed. Her “relative” was Elizabeth, who was a daughter of Aaron, the Priest (Luke 1:5). Elizabeth had to be related to Mary through Mary’s mother, who may have even been the sister of Elizabeth’s father (Edersheim, Life and Times, book II, p. 149). Thus, in Mary we see the meeting of the King and the Priest, Jesus himself being the ultimate fulfillment of those offices.

1:18. “birth.” The Greek noun is genesis (#1078 γένεσις), and strictly speaking it means “origin, source, or beginning” (Liddell and Scott Greek-English Lexicon). It is from the verb, ginomai (#1096 γίνομαι; pronounced gin’-o-may), which means to become, to come into existence, begin to be. We get our English word “genesis” from genesis. Genesis also became used for that which flows from what is begun, hence it was used to express the concept of “nature,” or “natural” (cp. James 1:23; 3:6). Since we usually think of the birth of a person as his or her “beginning,” genesis was used by the Greeks of birth. However, there is a much more accurate Greek verb for “birth,” and that is gennaō (#1080 γεννάω; pronounced ghenn-ah’-o), and the nouns associated with it are gennētos (#1084 γεννητός; pronounced ghenn-nay-tos’, meaning “born”) and gennēsis (#1083 γέννησις; pronounced ghenn’-nay-sis; meaning, “a birth”). The two words, genesis and gennēsis, are very similar, which has led to some confusion in Matthew 1:18, because although the earliest and best Greek texts have genēsis, origin, some later manuscripts, have gennēsis, birth.

Textual scholars have concluded that the most original reading of the Greek text of Matthew 1:18 is genesis, meaning, origin or birth. Bruce Metzger writes:
“Both γένεσις [genesis] and γέννησις [gennēsis] mean “birth,” but the former also means “creation,” “generation,” and “genealogy” (compare 1.1), whereas the latter means more strictly “engendering”… In the present passage not only do the earlier representatives of several text-types support γένεσις [genesis], but the tendency of copyists would have been to substitute a word of more specialized meaning for one that had been used in a different sense in verse 1, particularly since γέννησις [gennēsis] corresponds more nearly with the verb γεννᾶν [gennan] used so frequently in the previous genealogy.” (A Textual Commentary on the Greek New Testament).

Although the substitution of gennēsis for genesis in some Greek texts (which led to genesis being the Greek word in the text from which the King James Version was translated) may have been completely accidental, it might also have been purposeful. Trinitarian scribes may have been uncomfortable with the idea that Jesus’ “origin” was when God impregnated Mary, and so might have substituted what was to them a much clearer word, gennēsis, which would then clearly make only Jesus’ birth, not his real “beginning,” be the subject of Matthew 1:18. The word genesis points to the fact that God impregnating Mary not only led to Jesus’ birth, but was in fact his “origin” or “beginning” in the flesh. He had been in the mind of God from before the foundation of the world, but did not exist except as part of God’s plan. When God impregnated Mary, Jesus “began” in reality, not just in the mind of God.

“by the Holy Spirit.” The Greek reads literally, “of Holy Spirit,” which in this context is the genitive of origin, thus the translation “by.” Mary was impregnated “by” or “from” God. “The Holy Spirit” is the name for God that emphasizes His power in operation. God is called “the Holy Spirit” in a number of verses in the NT, including Matthew 1:20; 12:32; and Hebrews 9:8.

The Bible has many names that refer to our One God, who is the Father of the Lord Jesus Christ. Some of the Hebrew names for God are: Yahweh, Elohim, El, Elyon, Adonai, and Shaddai. In the New Testament He is referred to as Theos (God). Furthermore, the attributes that are used as names for God include: “the Almighty” (2 Cor. 6:18; Rev 1:8. Greek is pantokrator); “the Ancient of Days” (Dan. 7:9, 13, 22); “the Blessed” (Mark 14:61); “Father” (Ps. 68:5; Eph. 1:2); “Judge” (Judg. 11:27); “King” (Ps. 5:2; 47:6; 1 Tim. 1:17); “Lord of hosts” (1 Sam. 1:11; 17:45); “the Mighty One” (Gen. 49:24; Ps. 132:2; Isa. 1:24); and “the Rock” (Deut. 32:18; Isa. 30:29; Hab. 1:12). Moreover, God is holy (Isa. 6:3; John 17:11), so He was also known as “the Holy,” which is usually translated in English Bibles as “the Holy One” (2 Kings 19:22; Job 6:10; Ps. 71:22; 78:41; 89:18; Isa. 1:4; 29:23; Luke 1:49; John 17:11). Sometimes “Spirit” is combined with “holy,” and God is called “the Holy Spirit,” pneuma hagion. In fact, holiness and “spirit” are so essential to God that it would be strange if “the Holy Spirit” were not one of His names. Thus, in Acts 5:3, Peter told Ananias, “You have lied to the Holy Spirit,” whom he identified in verse 4 as “God.”

Every name of God emphasizes a different aspect of His character. Calling God “the Ancient of Days” magnifies His age and timelessness; calling him “the Blessed” magnifies the blessings He gives and receives; calling Him “the Rock” magnifies His stability and invulnerability. Similarly, since “spirit” is used of invisible power, when God is called “the Spirit,” or “the Holy Spirit,” it emphasizes His invisible power at work. The Gospels say that Mary was impregnated by “the Holy Spirit,” (Matt. 1:18, 20; Luke 1:35), because that name emphasized God’s power at work. That “the Holy Spirit” is a name for God and not a separate being is why Jesus is always called “the Son of God” and never “the Son of the Holy Spirit.” There is no reason to make “the Holy Spirit” into a separate “Person.” We do not make any of the rest of God’s names into other “Persons,” and the Jews never made “the Spirit” in the Old Testament into another person. There is one God, and He has many names. Every use of “the Holy Spirit” can be explained as being a name for God without once making “the Holy Spirit” into another “Person” [we must, however, differentiate between “the Holy Spirit,” which is another name for God, and “the holy spirit,” which is the gift of God’s nature that He gives to believers; cp. Acts 2:38]. [For more information on the uses of “Holy Spirit”, see Appendix 6: Usages of ‘Spirit’].

Here in Matthew 1:18 there is not a definite article before “Holy Spirit.” The preposition εκ is before the phrase. In Greek, if a preposition precedes a noun, the noun can be definite without specifically adding the definite article; the subject and context are the final arbiter. Daniel Wallace writes in Greek Grammar Beyond the Basics (p. 247): “There is no need for the article to be used to make the object of a preposition definite.” A. T. Robertson writes: “...the article is not the only means of showing that a word is definite. ...The context and history of the phrase in question must decide. ...[As for prepositional phrases], these were also considered definite enough without the article.” Robertson then cites some examples that use εκ (Grammar of the Greek New Testament, pp. 790-792).

1:19. “husband.” The Greek word is ἀνήρ (#435 ἀνήρ), and generally refers to an adult male. It can refer to a man in contrast to a woman (Acts 5:1; 8:12); a man in his role as a husband (Mark 10:12; Luke 2:36; Acts 5:9; thus sometimes the translation “husband” is acceptable); and a man in contrast to a boy (1 Cor. 13:11). Sometimes it was used universally when both men and women were present, “men” being inclusive of men and women because men were more visible in the culture and women were sheltered (Luke 11:31; James 1:20). Similarly, “man” was used in a way equivalent to “someone” or “a person” even if there was no specific need to refer to the sex of the person (Luke 9:38; John 1:30; Rom. 4:8). Matthew 1:19 is a case where culturally “man” (or “husband”) is used because in the conservative Eastern biblical culture to which Joseph and Mary belonged, a betrothal (engagement) was as strong as the marriage, so strong, in fact, that it had to be dissolved by divorce, as this verse makes clear. Thus, in the eyes of the people, Joseph was the “husband” of Mary, even though the two had not yet been through the marriage ceremony. This verse is a case where trying to translate ἀνήρ as “fiancée” or “betrothed” causes problems because then the reader is left wondering why a divorce was necessary to break the engagement. It is better to translate the Greek more literally and then learn the biblical culture, which promotes a better understanding of the entire Bible.

“and yet.” From Joseph’s point of view, his betrothed had unfaithfully slept with another man while still out of wedlock. He is now facing his legal options, out of his just nature desiring to fulfill the Law, and yet also desiring not to shame Mary. His options would be to either institute a lawsuit against Mary or issue her a certificate of divorce, dismissing her quietly. According to the Law, if a husband finds his new wife has had premarital sex, she should be stoned (Deut. 22:20-21). Joseph does not seem to be afraid that Mary will be stoned to death, however, instead he wished to save her from “public disgrace.” The reason for this is that by this time, death by stoning could not be accomplished in court (cp. John 18:31: “It is not lawful for us to put anyone to death”). As Hendriksen explains: “This law had been modified by so many man-made restrictions that this possibility could be safely dismissed, [yet, instituting a lawsuit] would nevertheless have exposed Mary to public disgrace and scorn, the very thing which Joseph wanted by all means to avoid.” The only other option for Joseph is what is described in Deuteronomy 24:1-4. He could quietly issue her a certificate of divorce because he “found indecency” in her, and Mary could leave him and “become another man’s wife” (24:1, 2). Joseph wanted to allow her to go quietly and marry whom he presumed to be the man she had slept with. This would preserve her from public disgrace and, technically, fulfill the righteousness of the law prescribed in Deuteronomy 24:1-4.

1:20. “Look.” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού). The second-person singular aorist middle imperative of eidon (εἶδον; “to see, to look at, to perceive) is ἰδοῦ (note the special accent mark on the “u”). However, when idou has an acute accent (ἰδοῦ) as it does in this verse and many others in the New Testament, it is used as a demonstrative particle to draw our attention to something. To be strictly literal we would stick with translations that retain the meaning of seeing something (“Look!”; “Behold!”; “See!”). But ἰδοῦ was used more idiomatically than literally, and thus would be heard by anyone listening as an attention grabber appropriate to the context, not a command to actually look at something. We do the same thing in English. If someone is being accused of being somewhere he was not supposed to be, he may well say, “Look, I told you I was home, and I was.” In this case, the man does not expect us to see anything just because he said “Look.” In the same way, idou should be translated in ways that are appropriate to the context. Thus it is best translated “Look” if the context is visual, “Listen” if the context is audible, “Pay attention,” etc. It often introduces something new or unusual, or something that requires special attention. In that light, there are contexts in which “consider” would be an appropriate translation (cp. Matt. 10:16).

As with any exclamation meant to get people’s attention, the force and meaning of the exclamation idou would be expressed by the tone and volume of the way it was spoken. Thus there are times such as here in Matthew 1:20 when “Look!” is clearly meant to forcefully grab our attention—an angel just showed up with a message about the birth of the forerunner to the Messiah, and we had better pay attention. On the other hand there are times when the context dictates that it would have been used with less force but still deep meaning. For example, in Matthew 19:27, Peter is reminding the Lord that he and the other apostles have left everything to follow him. It is a gentle reminder, so a harsh attention grabber such as “Pay attention!” would not be an appropriate translation in that context, but perhaps “consider,” or even “remember” (cp. Matt. 28:20). Often the punctuation associated with idou can help express the meaning, there being a difference in force between, “Look,...” and “Look!”

Many translations of the English Bible (cp. NIV, NRSV, HCSB) omit the word, usually on the logic that it is based on an underlying Semitic expression and does not bring meaning to the subject. We disagree, and note that BDAG says that it is “frequently omitted in translation, but with some loss of meaning.” In fact, we agree with Bullinger (Figures of Speech Used in the Bible) that it is the figure asterisms (“indicating;” related to “asterisk”), and calls attention to the subject. This can be seen by simply noting that it is not used in every speech or before every interesting or important event, but is carefully placed and when it does occur it always is appropriate.

“favorably accept.” At this point Joseph would naturally have presumed his wife had been unfaithful. Since Joseph was “just” (v. 19), he would be obligated to put her away and not take her to himself after she had been “defiled” (Deut. 24:4; see entry on “and yet” Matt. 1:19). In this context the angel appears and tells Joseph not to fear to paralambanō (παραλαμβάνω) his wife. This word is usually translated “take” or “receive,” but can also have the meaning of accept favorably: “Sometimes the emphasis lies not so much on receiving or taking over, as on the fact that the word implies agreement or approval, accept” (BDAG). Hence, the angel is assuring Joseph that he may accept his wife, not fearing any defilement. Additionally, the word would come with the strong connotation of “taking to one’s self” or receiving Mary into his house (as in v. 24).

“the Holy Spirit.” “The Holy Spirit” is the name for God that emphasizes His power in operation. God is called “the Holy Spirit” in a number of verses in the NT, including Matthew 1:20; 12:32; and Hebrews 9:8. In this case, there is not a definite article before “Holy Spirit” due to the preposition ek is before the phrase making the definite article unnecessary. [For more information on the uses of “Holy Spirit”, see Appendix 6: Usages of Spirit]

1:21. “Jesus.” The angel would have spoken to Mary in Aramaic, and thus would have said the Aramaic name of Jesus, “Yehoshua,” which means “Yahweh is salvation.” Thus the angel explains by saying, “for, he will save his people from their sins.”

“it is he.” This is emphatic in the Greek; “he” is put as the very last word in the sentence for emphasis. That would only be confusing in English, so we would have to use capital letters or bold letters. We might say, “Because HE will save his people from their sins.” We place a little more emphasis on it by saying, “it is he,” (cp. NASB).

1:22. “with the result that.” The Greek reads hina plerōthē (ἵνα πληρώθῃ), which is the conjunction hina followed by the verb for “fulfilled” in the subjunctive mood. Although the conjunction hina can have several different meanings, in general it either introduces a purpose clause (“so that,” “in order that”) or a result clause (“with the result that,” “resulting in”). The fact that the hina can be translated either way leaves the door wide open to the theology of the translator. If the translators believe that God is totally in control of what people do and the events of history, then they use “so that” or “in order that.” Thus the BBE (Bible in Basic English) says, “Now all this took place so that the word of the Lord by the prophet might come true.” In other words according to that translation, the events surrounding the birth of Christ happened the way they did “so that,” or for the purpose of, fulfilling the Old Testament prophecy. But we do not believe that is the correct way to think about history and man’s freewill decisions.

To us, God works with our free will and in history such that what we do by our free will fulfills what He foretold. No person is forced to act in such a way that Scripture is fulfilled, rather God is so knowledgeable and skillful that what happens fulfills what He has written, not the opposite. God is so skillful and knowledgeable that what happens results in His Word being fulfilled, not that He writes and then forces events to occur “so that” His Word is fulfilled.

“Yahweh.” “Yahweh” is the personal name of God, and a rabbinic abbreviation for it appears in the Hebrew manuscript of Matthew as well as in the verses of the Old Testament that Matthew quoted. There is evidence that Matthew wrote a Gospel in Hebrew and used the name Yahweh, so we have put it in the REV [See commentary on Matthew 3:3).

1:23. Quoted from Isaiah 7:14. This quotation is closer to the Septuagint than the Hebrew text. The word in the Hebrew text which gets translated “virgin” means “young woman,” not specifically “virgin.” That is why even very spiritual Jews like Joseph and Mary were not expecting a virgin birth. When the angel told Mary that she was going to give birth to the Messiah, she was very surprised that it was going to be a virgin birth. She said to the angel, “How will this be, seeing I am not knowing [not currently having sex with] a man” (Luke 1:34).

When the Hebrew text was translated into Greek about 250 BC, making the version we know as the Septuagint, the translators translated the Hebrew word almah (עַלְמָה #5959), “young woman,” as parthenos (#3933 παρθένος). The Hebrew word almah refers to a “young woman” but not necessarily a virgin. Similarly, there is good evidence in the Greek literature that the word parthenos does not specifically refer to the virginity of the woman or man. Rather it refers more to their age as being young (parthenos with the masculine pronoun refers to a young man). The Liddell & Scott Greek-English Lexicon gives references when parthenos was used of young married women. Also, some scholars say that if strictly “virgin” was meant, then parthenois would have been used instead of parthenos (see note in The Source New Testament by A. Nyland). That the Septuagint read parthenos in Isaiah 7:14, but the Jewish people did not think their Messiah would be born of a virgin, is quite conclusive evidence that the word parthenos did not have to refer to a virgin, even though it could refer to one.

Mary was certainly a young woman, thus an almah and a parthenos, and she was also a virgin. We know she was a virgin, not from the meaning of the word parthenos, but from the clear statements in both Matthew and Luke, and Mary is referred to as a parthenos in both Matthew and Luke.

Many commentators have written about Isaiah 7:14 and how the vocabulary and the context are not about a virgin birth but about a birth that would occur in Isaiah’s time, and that is true. Easily available commentaries include J. P. Lange’s Commentary and the commentary on the Old Testament by Keil and Delitzsch. English versions such as the Revised Standard Version read “young woman” instead of “virgin” in Isaiah 7:14, and that is the proper way to translate the Hebrew text (other versions that read “young woman” include: The Complete Bible: An American Translation; the Complete Jewish Bible; the Moffatt Bible; NEB; and NET).

We can tell from Matthew that the prophecy in Isaiah, which referred to a young woman, had a second fulfillment in Jesus Christ. We must remember that it is God who prophetically tells the future, and God can shape His prophecies so that they fit multiple situations, even if unbelievers or over-zealous Christians deny a double fulfillment. Interestingly, unbelievers usually agree that the prophecy was fulfilled in Isaiah’s time and deny the fulfillment in Matthew, while over-zealous Christians deny the fulfillment in Isaiah’s time and invent reasons why the only fulfillment is with the birth of Christ.

When it comes to Isaiah 7:14, it is like Hosea 11:1 in that it involved two fulfillments. What we should be aware of when it comes to prophecies that are fulfilled twice, is that once it is fulfilled the first time, the only way people can see a second fulfillment is if God tells them about it, like He does with Isaiah 7:14 or Hosea 11:1. A

It fits perfectly within the scope and purpose of the Book of Isaiah that the prophecy in Isaiah 7:14 would have a second fulfillment in the birth of Jesus Christ, because Isaiah and his children are specifically said to be “signs” (Isa. 8:18). Just as the prophet Isaiah foretold the birth of a son who would be born in his own time and be associated with the deliverance of Judah, so the prophecy also was fulfilled by a son who would be born centuries later who was associated with the ultimate deliverance of Judah.

As the New Testament makes clear in Matthew and Luke, Mary was impregnated by God. In fact, the very reason Isaiah is quoted in this context is because it is the second and ultimate fulfillment of the prophecy in Isaiah. That is why Matthew 1:22 opens with, “Now all this happened to fulfill” the words of Isaiah. If Mary’s having a son did not fulfill Isaiah, then it would not have been appropriate to quote it as Matthew quoted it. Matthew 1:22 shows that Mary’s being impregnated by God fulfilled the prophecy in Isaiah 7:14.

“Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδοὺ), and it is used to get our attention. Although the literal meaning of idou relates to visual perception (seeing), it was used idiomatically, and thus should be translated in ways appropriate to the context, such as “look,” “listen,” “pay attention,” “consider,” “remember,” etc. Many translations of the English Bible (cp. NIV, NRSV, HCSB) do not translate idou, but in doing so miss the meaning that it is bringing to the context. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 ("Look!).

“Immanuel.” One of the names of Jesus Christ is “Immanuel,” which can be translated as, “God with us” or “God is with us.” We know that God was with us in Jesus Christ, and Jesus himself said that if one had seen him, he had seen the Father. Names are often symbolic, the meaning of the name importing some characteristic that God wants us to know. When Jesus is called the Lion of Judah, the Lamb, or the tent peg (Zech. 10:4), God is importing characteristics about Jesus that He wants us to know. When it comes to Immanuel, God wants us to know that through Jesus Christ, God was with us. Not with us literally, but acting powerfully through His Son, just as 2 Corinthians 5:19 indicates: “That God was in Christ, reconciling the world to Himself.” It is important to read exactly what was written: God was in Christ, not God was Christ.

Symbolism in names can be seen throughout the Bible, it is not something that is unique to Jesus Christ. Many people were given names that would cause great problems if they were believed literally. Are we to believe that Elijah was “God Jehovah,” or that Bithiah, a daughter of Pharaoh, was the sister of Jesus because her name is “daughter of Jehovah”? Are we to believe that Dibri, not Jesus, was the “Promise of Jehovah,” or that Eliab was the real Messiah since his name means “My God [is my] father?” Of course not. It would be a great mistake to claim that the meaning of a name proves a literal truth. We know that Jesus’ name is very significant—it communicates the truth that, as the Son of God and as the image of God, God is with us in Jesus, but the name does not make Jesus God. For more on this point, see Graezer, Lynn, and Schoenheit, One God & One Lord, and the website: BiblicalUnitarian.com. Also, A. Buzzard and C. Hunting, The Doctrine of the Trinity; Patrick Navas, Divine Truth or Human Tradition; D. Snedeker, Our Heavenly Father Has No Equals.
(which translated, means, “God with us”). The parenthesis is the figure of speech epitrechon, a form of parenthesis where the statement is not itself a complete thought (Bullinger, Figures of Speech).

1:24. “took to himself.” The word is paralambanō (#3880 παραλαμβάνω), and here the emphasis is on Joseph receiving Mary into his home, taking her as his wife. However, see also the entry on “favorably accept” in Matthew 1:20. The phrase, “and took to himself his wife” does not mean that Joseph married Mary that very morning. It simply means that he immediately started the process by which he would be married.

2:1. “Now after Jesus was born.” This phrase should have done away with any thought that the magi belong in any manger scene, or are associated with the night of the birth of Christ in any way. The Magi did not even arrive in Jerusalem, much less Bethlehem, until after Jesus was born. They were not present with Joseph, Mary, and the shepherds the night of Jesus’ birth. The verb “born” is gennaō (#1080 γεννάω) and it is an aorist participle in the Greek text, meaning, “having been born,” which is how Young’s Literal Translation of the Bible translates it. In English we would usually not say, “Jesus, having been born,” but would more likely say, “after Jesus was born” as does the HCSB, ESV, NASB, NET, NIV, NKJ, and NRSV. We learn from history and Herod’s killing the children up to 2 years old that the “after” is likely close to a year and a half after.

“Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. Although the literal meaning of idou relates to visual perception (seeing), it was used idiomatically, and thus should be translated in ways appropriate to the context, such as “look,” “listen,” “pay attention,” “take notice,” “consider,” “remember,” etc. Many translations of the English Bible (cp. NIV, NRSV, HCSB) do not translate idou, but in doing so miss the meaning that it is bringing to the context. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

“Magi.” The Greek word magoi, correctly translated as “Magi,” (Matt. 2:1, NIV) is a plural proper noun referring to people of a specific religious group that existed in the Ancient Near East, most specifically the area of ancient Media and Persia. By the time of Christ, that area was the country of Parthia, which is north and east of Israel. Much has been written in encyclopedias and Bible dictionaries about their origin, history, and beliefs, so that need not be repeated here, however, it is important to know that at least some Magi were looking for a Messiah who would conquer darkness and restore justice in the world.

The NASB and NIV are two modern versions that say “Magi,” while other modern versions retain the designation “Wise Men” (KJV, ESV, NRSV), came from the East to see Jesus after he was born. Magi, especially their leaders and priests, were considered to be wise and even to have occult powers, so the translation “Wise Men” might at first seem to be a fitting translation, but it is far too broad a term to communicate the meaning of the word “magoi.” After all, there were many wise men in the ancient world, just as there are today, whereas the Magi were a specific group. A good comparison might be if Catholic Cardinals from Rome came to visit Jesus but we only knew them as, “Good Men from the West.” The designation might be true, but it would not give us important and accurate information about them. The title “Wise Men” does not tell us who the Magi were, but their proper title does. Similarly, calling them “kings,” as in the song verse, “We three kings from orient are…,” only confuses the record. They were not kings.

Perhaps the most important reason to refer to these men by the name “Magi” is so we can see their relation to the religious group that was at one time led and instructed by Daniel. In the late 500’s BC (Jerusalem was conquered by Nebuchadnezzar in 586 BC, and Daniel was made ruler shortly after that) Daniel was made ruler over the Magi, although this is not as clear as it could be because the Book of Daniel says “Magicians,” and Daniel is referred to as “chief of the Magicians” (Dan. 4:9; 5:11; cp. 2:48; NIV). Although there is no proof for it outside the Bible, it seems certain that Daniel instructed the leaders of the Magi about the Jewish origin of the true Messiah.

As the centuries passed after the birth of Christ, the true knowledge about the Magi was replaced by superstition and tradition, and this has persisted in spite of the fact that it contradicts what is clearly written in Scripture. For example, the Magi did not follow a star to Bethlehem. No super-bright, westward traveling celestial phenomena appeared in the sky and went from Parthia to Bethlehem. The “star” they saw was not an unusual celestial object, but a unique occurrence of planetary conjunctions and appearances that, viewed by themselves and considered individually, would not have grabbed anyone’s attention—which explains why only the Magi, diligent observers of the heavens, showed up in Judea asking where the new king had been born. We have to keep in mind that in a culture in which a substantial part of the population lived in tents or spent a lot of time out of doors, any unusual event in the heavens got a lot of attention. The fact that there was no such attention at the time of Christ is good evidence that to an untrained observer, the heavenly events were normal.

These Magi were astronomers, and it seems quite certain that the “star” they saw was a series of celestial events, including stars, planets, and conjunctions, especially involving the “king planet” Jupiter (cp. The Star that Astonished the World by Earnest Martin, and Jesus Christ Our Promised Seed by Victor Wierwille). Before telescopes were invented, planets, stars, novas, and comets were all called “stars,” and before the invention of modern devices for measuring their movement, ancient astronomers tracked the timing and position of the stars by when they were first visible over the horizon. We know the Magi used this technique because it was a usual procedure, and also by what they said when they reached Jerusalem: “For we saw his star when it rose and have come to worship him” (Matt. 2:2 ESV). The ESV does a superb job of translating the phrase “when it rose.” The Magi were watching the stars and noting their relation to points on the horizon, to each other, and to the constellations in which they appeared. Eventually they saw patterns that convinced them the Messiah had been born (see, “in its rising” below).

It is almost certain that the Magi traveled to Jerusalem by joining a trading caravan that was heading in that direction. It was unsafe to travel in small groups, especially carrying valuables across the international border between the enemy countries of Rome and Parthia. We do not know how long the journey took, but it would have taken at least a month and maybe several (Parthia itself is hundreds of miles across, and we do not know exactly where they started their journey).
Also, the Bible does not say how many Magi came to see Jesus. Tradition says three, but that idea comes from the three kinds of gifts: gold, frankincense, and myrrh. These gifts were all fitting for a king, and each could easily be sold or bartered, so they would greatly help Joseph and his new family. It is not likely that each Magi individually brought “a gift,” like we would bring “a gift” to a birthday party. The three gifts would have been presented as a collective offering from the Magi who made the journey and from the people they represented back in Parthia, who put together the gift. There were almost certainly many more than three Magi who made the trip. For one thing, the purpose of the trip was to pay homage to the long-awaited Messiah, and many devout people would have wanted to be part of that event. Furthermore, the trip was long and dangerous, and it was standard procedure in those days to travel with a large number of people for protection.

Another good reason to believe there were more than three Magi is that when they arrived in Jerusalem, King Herod and “all Jerusalem” were disturbed at their coming (Matt. 2:3). To fully appreciate this, we need to remember that Herod and Jerusalem were not disturbed when, about a year and a half earlier, shepherds announced that they had seen angels and that the Messiah had been born (the chronology of the year and a half is explained in the books by Martin and Wierwille mentioned earlier, and is why Herod killed all the babies two years old and under). When, however, a group of Magi arrived from Parthia and wanted to know where the Messiah was born, that got the attention of Herod and Jerusalem, and upset them greatly.

When the Magi arrived in Jerusalem, neither they nor King Herod knew where to find the young Messiah. However, Micah 5:2 foretold that the Messiah would be born in Bethlehem, so that is where King Herod sent them (Matt. 2:4-8). Bethlehem is seven miles (11.2 km) south of Jerusalem, and the Magi did not travel there the day they got an audience with King Herod. Even at two miles per hour, the journey would have only taken three and a half hours, and we can conclude from the biblical record that they returned to where they were staying and prepared to make the journey the next day. It was usual for caravans to get started very early in the morning, while it is still dark, and that is what they did.

When the Magi headed out for Bethlehem, the “star” they had observed back in Parthia “went before them” (Matt. 2:9; KJV, ESV). It is important to remember that these Magi did not follow the star to Bethlehem, they were already going there. Thus the “star” did not lead them to Bethlehem. They rejoiced at seeing it because it seemed a confirmation of the godly purpose of their journey, to meet and pay homage to the new king. The evidence is that the star that seemed to go in front of them was the planet Jupiter, which at that time was in the southern sky (The Star that Astonished the World). As it rose in the sky, it became more and more directly south, the very direction they were heading, and thus appeared to be “going before them.” Finally, as it reached its zenith (high point) in the sky south of them, it “stood” directly over Bethlehem, which was also south of them (by the way, astronomers still use the same language today, saying stars “rise,” “stand” and “set”).

Seeing Jupiter going before them caused great joy among the group. Although they certainly would have known Jupiter was visible in the sky, they did not know where the Messiah was to be born, or where Bethlehem was, and thus would not have known the star would also seem to go before them. To the untrained eye, there was nothing in the sky that morning that would have been a cause for rejoicing, which accounts for the fact that there were not large crowds of people traveling south along with the Magi.

Bethlehem was a small village, and houses in such villages of the Ancient Near East were all crowded together, so nothing in the sky could point out an individual house. This is more evidence that the star did not lead the Magi to the Messiah. Nevertheless, the Messiah would be easy to locate in Bethlehem, thanks to the shepherds, who had not only told the whole town about him, but all the surrounding area as well. All the Magi had to do was ask, and everyone would remember the baby who the shepherds had announced so joyfully was the promised Messiah and whose parents were both of the line of David.

Upon finding the “child” (Jesus was not a “baby” anymore; Matt. 2:11), the Magi paid homage to him and presented their gifts. The Magi were not stupid, and Herod had a reputation for killing potential rivals, so they asked God for guidance as to what to do after they found the Messiah. This fact is not clearly stated in most English Bibles, but the Greek word translated “warned” in most of them was usually used of a divine instruction or warning that came to people who asked for guidance from an oracle. The Magi asked God what to do, and He warned them not to go back to Herod, so they went home by another route (Matt. 2:12).

Likely right after the Magi left, Joseph was also warned by God to flee the area, which he did, going down to Egypt (Matt. 2:13, 14). This is another piece of evidence that shows the Magi were not present at the birth of Jesus, but long after. Herod and the powers in Jerusalem had ignored the shepherds, and after the birth of Jesus, Joseph and Mary stayed in the area and completed the forty days of cleaning and the sacrifice required by the Law of Moses (Luke 2:22-24; Lev. 12:1-8). However, after the Magi left Judea, Herod was furious and would have moved very quickly to do away with this new potential rival for his throne. There is no way that Joseph and Mary could have then stayed around for forty days without Herod finding and killing both them and Jesus. This accounts for the urgency in the angel’s message to Joseph: “Get up…take the child and…escape to Egypt.” “Take” and “escape” are in the imperative mood; they are firm commands, and Joseph acted on them immediately (Matt. 2:13; NIV).

The truth about the Magi teaches us a lot. We see the great patience and faithfulness they had, passing down the information about the Messiah generation after generation, waiting over 500 years for him. That should remind us to pass on our knowledge of God’s Word to the next generation. We see the great risk the Magi were willing to take, carrying valuables hundreds of miles across an international border to pay homage to the Messiah, and the value of the gifts they brought indicates how thankful they were for him. They remind us that living a godly life often involves risk, and also that prayer, Bible study, worship, and financial support of the Church may not be easy or convenient, but the same Lord who was worthy of the sacrifice the Magi made is worthy of our sacrifice of time, money, and energy.

“east.” The Greek is anatolōn (ἀνατολόν), the plural of anatolē (ἀνατολή), which is translated “in its rising” in the next verse, verse 3. Anatolē is one of the words that usually changes its meaning from singular to plural. In the singular, as in verse 3, it usually refers to the “rising,” but when plural it usually refers to the direction, “east.” [For more information, see commentary on “in its rising,” Matthew 2:3].

“arrived.” Using this particular word and employing it in the aorist tense emphasizes the arrival of the Magi. If the text were going to emphasize the travel it would have used... the word for “came” in the imperfect tense. But here we have the word paraginomai (#3854 παραγίνομαι) in the aorist, the word for an arrival or making a public appearance (BDAG). Holman captures the sense of the emphasis and translates it “arrived unexpectedly,” which makes the point, but perhaps too strongly. We felt the translation “arrived” was the best choice.

“of Judea.” The ancient tribal territories of the twelve tribes had given way to the kingdom of Herod, and other kingdoms before that. Nevertheless, Bethlehem was in the tribal territory of Judea, and thus the prophecy that Christ would be from the tribe of Judah was important to emphasize.

2:2. “in its rising.” Most Bible versions say the Magi saw the star, “in the east,” instead of “when it rose.” However, studies have shown that when the Greek reads like it does in the Bible, en tē anatolē (ἐν τῇ ἀνατολῇ) in the singular, it has a special astrological meaning, that is, “when it rose” or “at its rising,” referring to a heliacal rising, that is, when a star appears on the horizon in the early dawn before sunrise. The reason it was important to be able to see a star when it first rose was that the horizon line gave a point of demarcation that made it easier to see where it was in relation to other stars, as well as how far north or south it was when it rose in relation to other times it appeared. When the Greek reads en tē anatolai (in the plural), then it means “in the east,” but in the Bible the phrase is singular, referring to a heliacal rising.

Although “in the east” is not the most accurate translation of the Greek text, it does tell us that most English Bibles give enough information to dispel some of the traditional mythology that has arisen about the Magi. In other words, if we would just read the Bible carefully, many traditions could be dispelled. For example, the Magi did not see the star in the western or southwestern sky—the direction of Jerusalem from where they lived. If they did see the star “in the East” and followed it, they would have traveled to India. Also, there is no verse that says they “followed” the star to get anywhere. The idea that they “followed” the star comes from tradition that was popularized by Christmas music. The Magi saw celestial events that led them to conclude that the Jewish Messiah had been born in Israel. Therefore, they made a decision based upon logic and knowledge, and went to Jerusalem, the capital of Israel, and asked the king where to find this new Messiah. Matthew 2:1 makes it clear they came to “Jerusalem,” not to Bethlehem. There they got an audience with King Herod, who directed them to go to Bethlehem.

“pay homage to him.” This phrase is usually translated “worship him,” and the reason for translating it “pay homage to him” is detailed below. The Greek verb is proskuneō (#4352 προσκυνέω; pronounced prōs-cue-nay’-ō, a compound word built from the preposition pros, “to, toward,” and the verb kuneō, κυνέω, ‘to kiss’). The BDAG Greek-English lexicon has this to say about the verb proskuneō:

It is “frequently used to designate the custom of prostrating oneself before a person or persons and kissing their feet or the hem of their garment, the ground, etc.; the Persians did this in the presence of their deified king, and the Greeks before a divinity or something holy. It is to express in attitude or gesture one’s complete dependence on or submission to an authority figure, (fall down and) worship, do obeisance to, prostrate oneself before, do reverence to, welcome respectfully” (BDAG).
The act of prostrating oneself, or at least bowing low, is very ancient and goes all the way back to Genesis. In the Old Testament the act of prostration or bowing low is often described by the word shachah (שׁחָה), which is often translated by the Greek word proskuneō in the Septuagint. A study of shachah in the Hebrew Old Testament will reveal dozens of times people fell prostrate before God or others.

Jesus understood the custom of falling prostrate before rulers, men of God, and other great people (cp. 1 Sam. 25:24; 2 Kings 4:37; Esther 8:3; Matt. 18:29; Mark 5:22; 7:25; Luke 5:12; 17:16; John 11:32; Acts 10:35; Rev. 1:17; 19:10; 22:8), and he accepted that public display of homage and respect when people fell before him (cp. Mark 5:22; 7:25, Luke 5:12; etc.).

The problem with always translating proskuneō as “worship” is due to the fact that the act and meaning of “worship” has changed through the ages. In the Eastern world in general, falling prostrate was an expected and expected act of honor, respect, and worship. Among the Greeks, as noted above, prostration was much more limited, but was done before gods and things considered holy. Among the Romans, prostration was even more limited than that, but still could occur.

As we can see from the Bible, the words shachah and proskuneō were both used to represent a physical act, the act of kneeling on the ground before someone and placing the forehead on the ground, or falling full length on the ground before someone, or at least bowing low before someone (the Latin and Latin Vulgate would use adoro (cp. “adore”) and veneror (cp. “venerate”) to represent that act. Prostration or kneeling then touching the forehead to the ground was an act of respect and honor, and was supposed to represent an attitude of the heart, but often it was just done because otherwise the ruler would be offended and angry, just as Haman was angry when Mordecai would not get down on his knees and bow before him (Esther 3:5).

In 1611, when the KJV was written, the English word “worship” was used of the worship of deity, but it was still also used of bowing down before men of higher rank, which was an expected act of respect and deference at that time. Kings and nobles expected people to bow before them. Thus, it was expected at the time of Jesus and in the 1600’s as well, that someone would prostrate themselves or bow down before a superior, especially someone such as a king. It should be noted that kneeling and touching the forehead to the ground is still seen among the Moslems when they pray, prostrating themselves before Allah.

The act of bowing before a king or dignitary then led to some rulers being designated as “Your Worship,” taking the act of worship they received and making it into a title. Because the act of bowing to rulers was still common in 1611, translating proskuneō as “worship” worked very well and was not confusing to the average reader, who still connected “worship” with a physical act of some kind (this also fits with the liturgy of the Roman Catholic and Orthodox Church, which considers “worship” to be a form of prescribed action, not “just” a subjective act of the heart). However, in the four centuries since the King James Version, the meaning of “worship” has changed. For one thing, we stopped bowing and prostrating ourselves (worshipping) before those of higher rank. In fact, the idea of “worship” as deeply bowing or falling in prostration before a person of higher status has completely left modern English vocabulary (as per Merriam-Webster’s 11th edition Collegiate Dictionary). Also, today people think of “worship” as an attitude of the heart that can be accompanied by a physical action, but does not have to be. Today “worship,” in many cultures, is basically a mental act, so much so that if someone does something without “meaning it,” it would not be called “worship.” Also, today most people only use the word “worship” when speaking of God, never people with the exception of those few instances when we use it in a hyperbolic and idiomatic sense, such as “He worships that new car,” or, “She worships the ground he walks on.” Even in those cases, however, “worship” it is used as a term of extravagant respect that occurs in the heart, not something that is necessarily connected to a specific action. The shift in meaning of “worship” causes problems for translators, because if we talk about biblical people “worshipping” Jesus, people reading the Bible can be confused as to exactly what that worship entailed, and think it means Jesus is God.

Thus, while it was appropriate to translate proskuneō as “worship” in 1611, if we today translate proskuneō as “worship,” it often makes the verse take on a meaning that is not in the biblical text at all. For example, the Magi did not think of Jesus as God, and did not “worship” him as they would a deity. Rather, they paid homage to him as they would have to another king, understanding, of course, that they realized he was a very special king.

The meaning of “worship” has shifted from being represented by physical act to being a mental act, but that does not mean that proskuneō should never be translated “worship.” For example, the Devil asked Jesus to fall down and “worship” him. The Devil wanted Jesus to prostrate himself before him with the same adoration Jesus would have had for God, and therefore it seems the best way to portray that is to translate proskuneō as “worship.” The Devil wanted Jesus’ full devotion, not just the act of falling prostrate.

The homage and “worship” that the Magi paid to Jesus Christ is still appropriate for us today, although we would not tend to express our homage the same way. The honor we pay to Jesus also fits with Hebrews 1:6, which says that when the Son came into the world God said, “And let all the angels of God worship Him” (Heb. 1:6 NASB). Hebrews 1:4-7 is about angels, but God wants people to worship the Son too. We can see this because Philippians 2:10 and 11 tell of a time when “every” tongue will confess and every knee will bow (i.e., in worship or as an act of submission), willingly or unwillingly, but it seems clear that God would much prefer that everyone bow willingly, and sooner rather than later. The honor we pay to Christ fits the “worship” he accepted when he walked the earth.

We have seen that proskuneō properly means “kiss toward” and the ancient act of worship often involved actually kissing the ground, or feet of the one being honored, or the hem of his garment. Psalm 2:12 is to be understood as a part of the act of worship. It says:

“Kiss his son, or he will be angry and your way will lead to your destruction, for his wrath can flare up in a moment. Blessed are all who take refuge in him” (NIV2011).

The Psalmist is saying that the person who prostrates himself before the Son in respect and homage, including kissing the feet or robe, will be blessed, while those who refuse to honor the Son will be destroyed in their selfishness and rebellion.

2:4. “high priests.” In Old Testament times the High Priest served for life. However, that custom had been changed for political reasons, such that at the time of Herod (and at the time of Christ’s crucifixion) there was more than one High Priest. Furthermore, it seems that members of the High Priest’s family also could be called a high priest (See Lenski).

“the People.” The Greek is ho laos, (ὁ λαὸς). The word “people” can mean different things in the Bible, depending on the context. It can refer to a specific group, and often refers to the Jews, the “people” of God (BDAG). When it is used of the people of Israel, it becomes a specific designation of the Jews and as such can be capitalized. Many Scriptures use “people” as a designation of the Jews (cp. Matt. 2:4; 21:23; 26:3, 47; Mark 14:2; Luke 19:47; 22:66; John 11:50; Acts 3:23; 4:8, 25; 7:17; 26:17, 23; Rom. 15:11; 2 Pet. 2:1). In many cases the REV translation has capitalized “People” to make it clear to readers that the Jews as a specific group are being referred to. However, there are also many scriptures that use “the people” that do not clearly refer to Israel, and when the exact designation is in doubt, we have left “people” in lower case.

2:6. Quoted from Micah 5:2. Some translations read “Bethlehem, in the land of Judah” (e.g., ESV, NIV) and some read, “Bethlehem, land of Judah” (e.g., ASV, NASB). The Greek word for “land,” gē (#1093 γῆ), has the same form for the dative (“in the land”) and vocative (“O land” [direct address]) cases. The dative, “Bethlehem, in the land of Judah,” is correct; for “Bethlehem, land of Judah” does not make sense.

2:7. “exactly.” The word “exactly” is part of the verb “learned.”

“the chronology of the appearing of the star.” Herod wanted to know the timing of the star, in order to ascertain how old the child must be (cp. verse 16). In this verse we find evidence for the view that the star was a prolonged astronomical event(s), rather than a one-time past appearance seen in the east, then miraculously appearing again to lead the Magi in 2:9. The text uses the word chronos (#5550 χρόνος) to describe the timing of the star. This word refers to “an indefinite period of time during which some activity or event takes place, time, period of time” (BDAG). Literally, the verse reads, Herod “determined from them the period of time of the appearing star.” Appearing is in the present tense, indicating a continual action; the star was “continuously shining” (phainō [#5316 φαίνω]) over an indefinite period of time. Hence, the way most translations go, “the time the star had appeared,” captures the sense of what Herod wanted to know (when the star first appeared), but unfortunately misses the fact that the star appeared over a period of time, and was still appearing when Herod spoke to the Magi.

2:8. “as soon as.” Cp. NIV translation. The word epan (#1875 ἐπάν) can mean “when” or “as soon as,” (BDAG). Herod’s eagerness to get rid of the competition to his throne makes us favor “as soon as.”

“pay homage.” See commentary on Matthew 2:2.

2:9. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδοὺ), and it is used to get our attention. Although the literal meaning of idou relates to visual perception (seeing), it was used idiomatically, and thus should be translated in ways appropriate to the context, such as “look,” “listen,” “pay attention,” “take notice,” “consider,” “remember,” etc. Many translations of the English Bible (cp. NIV, NRSV, HCSB) do not translate idou, but in doing so miss the meaning that it is bringing to the context. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

2:10. “rejoiced with great joy.” This is the figure of speech polypototon, the repetition of the same word, appearing in different parts of speech. Here it is “joy” in both verb and noun forms, emphasizing the great joy of the Magi (Bullinger, Figures of Speech). They were excited to see the star. When they had come to Jerusalem, they did not know where the Messiah was born, so they had no preconceived idea they would see the “star” in front of them as they traveled.

2:11. “house.” The Magi were not at the birth of Christ. They came over a year later. Joseph and Mary were in a “house,” but the Scripture does not tell us whether they were staying with someone else or had their own dwelling.

“child.” The Greek is paidion (#3813 παιδίον), which means “young child.” Jesus was no longer a “baby,” which is the Greek brephos (#1025 βρέφος), as he was in Luke 2:12 and 16. Now, at over 1 year old, he is a young boy.

“paid homage.” See commentary on Matthew 2:2.

2:12. “divinely instructed.” This is a fascinating word—chrematizo (#5537 χρηματίζω). Its basic meaning is “to make known a divine revelation from God” (Louw-Nida). The word is usually translated “warn,” yet its full meaning is much richer than this. We have translated the term “divine instruction,” in accordance with the Theological Dictionary of the New Testament: “In the NT the verb denotes divine instruction by revelation.” The translation of the NT done by Nelson Darby also has “divinely instructed.”

Outside the New Testament it is used as a response of those seeking an oracle—it therefore designates the response given one who seeks a divine answer. Thayer defines the word: “to give a response to those consulting an oracle… to give a divine command or admonition, to teach from heaven.” Likewise Bullinger writes in his lexicon, “spoken of a divine response, to give response, to speak as an oracle, speak or warn from God.” The only example of the noun form in the New Testament follows this definition. In Romans 11:2-4, Elijah makes intercession to God about Israel (Rom. 11:2) and God gives back a “divine answer” (Rom. 11:4); it is not meant as a warning, but an answer from God to Elijah’s appeal.

The word is used nine times in scripture: four times to indicate the divine instruction given in response to an implied seeking of God (Matt. 2:12; 2:22; Luke 2:26; Acts 10:22), three times to indicate the message from God with emphasis on warning (Heb. 8:5; 11:7; 12:25), and twice it is used in its second definition, “to be called, designated as” (Acts 11:26; Rom. 7:3).

When applied here in Matthew 2:12, this word shows the Magi asked God what to do, and God instructed them to leave for home by another route and not to go back to Jerusalem and speak with Herod. These men were godly and smart. They did not need to be “warned” that Herod was corrupt and evil—that was well known. The absurdity of Herod’s claim that he would come and worship the Christ would have been very apparent to them. Would Herod, who was so paranoid about losing his throne that he killed his own son, really prostrate himself before a would-be usurper of his throne? Never. The Magi did not need a warning; what they needed was divine instruction as to what to do about their situation, and that prompted them to seek advice from God. Concerning this verse Meier writes in his commentary, “the question that preceded [the dream] is presupposed” (Meyer’s Commentary on the New Testament; Matt. p. 63). Similarly, Vincent writes, “The verb means to give a response to one who asks or consults… [it] therefore implies that the wise men had sought counsel of God” (Word Studies, p. 21).

This same reasoning can be applied in Matthew 2:22. Joseph already heard of Archelaus and was afraid to go to Judea, so to translate the verb “he was warned” does not fit the situation, but “divinely instructed” does. Joseph, along with the Magi (2:12), Simeon (2:26), and Cornelius (Acts 10:22), were spiritually discerning and seeking council from God, and thus were divinely instructed in what path to take.

2:13. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

“Yahweh.” “Yahweh” is the personal name of God, and a rabbinic abbreviation for it appears in the Hebrew manuscript of Matthew as well as in the verses of the Old Testament that Matthew quoted. There is evidence that Matthew wrote a Gospel in Hebrew and used the name Yahweh, so we have put it in the REV (see commentary on Matthew 3:3).

“get up... take the child and his mother... stay.” These exact words are used to describe what Joseph did in response to the command from the angel of the Lord. The angel says “get up,” so Joseph “got up” (v. 14); the angel says, “take the child and his mother,” so Joseph “took the child and his mother” (v. 14); the angel says “stay there until,” so Joseph “stays there until” (v. 15). This parallelism highlights Joseph’s obedience to the word of the Lord, by describing what Joseph did with the same words the angel used in his command. The same parallelism occurs in verses 20 and 21.

“stay.” For the word stay, the angel uses the verb “to be,” eimi (#1510 εἰμί), with the sense of “remain” or “stay;” Joseph is told to “be there” in Egypt until the angel tells him differently. Then in verse 15 we are told that Joseph “was there”—using the same verb and word for “there.”

2:15. Quoted from Hosea 11:1.

“resulting in...what was spoken being fulfilled.” In English there are several ways to communicate purpose or intention, just as there are several ways to indicate the results of an action. To communicate purpose we might say, “I read the Bible to grow closer to God,” using the word “to” to show our intention of growing closer to God by reading scripture. To communicate our emphasis on results we might use a participle, as the word “falling,” in the phrase, “he tripped, falling into the mud.”

There are also several ways Greek grammar communicates purpose and result clauses, and one such way is with the particle hina (#2443 ἵνα) occurring in conjunction with a verb in the subjunctive mood. When hina, usually translated, “that,” “so that,” or “in order that,” is used with a verb in the subjunctive mood, it can express either purpose, result, or purpose and result simultaneously. Furthermore, hina with a verb in the subjunctive mood can be used in command clauses (as well as substantival, epexegetical, and complementary clauses, which we will not cover here [Wallace, Greek Grammar, p. 471]). Since the Greek construction is the same for all these kinds of clauses, it is up to the translator or interpreter to discover the meaning of the phrase from the context and scope of Scripture. In what follows we will give examples showing how hina with a verb in the subjunctive mood can form a purpose clause, result clause, or purpose-result clause. After some discussion we will also consider command clauses.

These first three clauses all consist of a main verb, the particle hina, and a verb in the subjunctive. The explanations have the main verb underlined, the hina translation in italics, and the subjunctive verb in bold.

(1) A purpose clause expresses the intention of the main verb, so in these cases hina should be translated in order that, with the purpose that.
• (Matt. 19:13). “Then little children were being brought to him in order that he might lay his hands on them and pray…. The children were brought (main verb) with the purpose that (hina) Jesus might lay (subjunctive verb) his hands on them and pray.

• (Luke 9:12). “Send the multitude away, in order that they may go into the villages and surrounding countryside, and lodge and get provisions.” The apostles plead with Jesus to send the people away for the purpose of finding lodging and getting provisions. (Here the verbs in the subjunctive mood are “lodge” and “get provisions,” not “go”).

• (Rom. 1:11). “I long to see you, in order that I may impart to you some spiritual gift to strengthen you.” Paul is expressing his purpose for seeing the Romans; he purposed to impart to them a spiritual gift of strengthening.

(2) A result clause expresses the resulting consequences of the main verb when the result is not intended to be the consequence of the main verb. In other words, this expresses when a person does something, or an event occurs, resulting in consequences that were not intended. The hina should be translated so that; with the result that.

• (John 9:2). “And his disciples asked him, ‘Rabbi, who sinned, this man or his parents, with the result that he was born blind?’” The disciples assumed someone’s sin unintentionally resulted in this man’s blindness (cp. NET translation: “Rabbi, who committed the sin that caused him to be born blind?”).

• (Rom. 5:20). “The law came in with the result that the trespass increased.” God did not introduce the law with the intention of increasing sin. Nevertheless, this was the result of the law.

• (Gal. 5:17). “For [the spirit and the flesh] are opposed to each other, with the result that you are not doing what you want.” It is not the spirit’s intention in opposing the flesh to prohibit you from doing what you want, but is simply the result of the internal battle between our spirit and flesh.

(3) A Purpose-result clause expresses that the subjunctive verb is both the intention and result of the main verb. The hina should be translated, so that.

• (John 3:16). “He gave his only begotten Son, so that everyone who believes in him will not perish but have eternal life.” God gave his Son with the intention of saving believers from perishing and having eternal life; simultaneously, the giving of the son resulted in those who believe not perishing and having eternal life.

• (Rom. 3:19, ESV). “Now we know that whatever the law says it speaks to those who are under the law, so that every mouth may be stopped, and the whole world may be held accountable to God.” The hina with a verb in the subjunctive clause shows us that the law speaks with the purpose of stopping every mouth and making the world accountable to God; and furthermore, when it speaks, it results in this purpose being accomplished.

• (Matt. 1:22-23, NET). “This all happened so that what was spoken by the Lord through the prophet would be fulfilled: ‘Look! The virgin will conceive and bear a son....” God’s bringing about the virgin birth intentionally resulted in the fulfillment of what was spoken by the prophet.

In the REV we have attempted to remain as consistent as possible in the translation of the hina in these clauses. For purpose clauses we say, “in order that”; for result clauses, “with the result that”; and for purpose-result clauses, “so that.” The English translation “in order that” clearly indicates purpose; likewise, for result clauses, what could be more clear than, “with the result that?” “So that,” on the other hand is the best translation for a purpose-result clause precisely because it is ambiguous; it can be read to indicate either purpose or result. For example, the phrase, “he fell back into the snow so that an imprint was left,” could be read to mean he fell “so that” (purpose) he could make an imprint of himself, or it could be read to mean he just happened to fall “so that” (result) an imprint was left on the ground. The context would have to determine whether the “so that” speaks of purpose, result, or purpose-result. When we felt the biblical context demands a purpose-result clause we have rendered the hina “so that.”

That having been said, when reading the REV one must be careful not to assume every instance of “so that,” “in order that,” or “with the result that” is a hina with a verb in the subjunctive clause. For there are also uses of hina by itself that warrant the “so that” translation; likewise there are several other ways Greek can indicate purpose, hence, “in order that” could be due to another of these forms. The same can be said of the phrase, “with the result that,” which is often just a translation of eis (#1519 εἰς) or hoste (#5620 ὥστε) (Dana and Mantey, Grammar, pp. 282-86). The reader must consult the Greek text, or the commentary to ensure the translation represents the hina with a verb in the subjunctive construction.

Identifying these clauses correctly is of fundamental importance for properly understanding and translating the Bible. Thankfully, in a majority of instances the type of clause is abundantly clear from the context or the scope of scripture. Nevertheless, the danger of misidentification is always present, because the Greek form of each construction is precisely the same. This means that in the hina with a verb in the subjunctive form, a purpose, result, and purpose-result clause looks exactly the same in the Greek. If one calls a “purpose” or “purpose-result clause” what is actually a result clause, he attributes intention when God only meant to speak of what resulted, not what was purposed to happen. On the other hand, if one categorizes a passage as a “result clause,” when it is really a purpose clause, then he has missed the intention that is underlying the action.

For example, the first part of Romans 5:20 is often translated as though it were a purpose clause: “The Law came in so that the transgression would increase” (NASB). This translation ascribes the intention of increasing man’s transgression to the introduction of the law. But surely this is misguided. Can it really be that God introduced the law for the purpose of increasing sin? Why would God want sin to increase? This seems to go against Galatians 3:19-24 which indicates that the law came in precisely because there were already many transgressions (See also Rom. 3:19-20). Hence, this verse seems much better suited as a result clause: “But law came in, with the result that the trespass multiplied” (NRSV). In other words, God gave the Law to help mankind, but people disobeyed with the result that sin increased.
1 John 2:19 is another example of how translating a result clause as though purpose were intended can cause confusion. Speaking of the exodus of false believers from the Church, versions such as the HCSB and NASB translate the verse, “They went out so that it might be made clear that none of them belongs to us.” It seems clear that false believers did not leave the Christian fellowship “so that” it would be clear they were not true to the Faith. In contrast, seeing the hina clause as a result clause makes sense of the passage: “Their going showed that none of them belonged to us” (NIV).

Lastly, we must also consider how hina with the subjunctive can form a command clause. It is vital to properly distinguish purpose clauses from command clauses. A purpose clause indicates why something happened, it shows the intention behind the action: e.g., “Children were being brought to him in order that he might lay [Greek=hina with a verb in the subjunctive] his hands on them and pray” (Matt. 19:13). A command clause, on the other hand, issues an order or command: e.g., “Come and lay [Greek=hina with a verb in the subjunctive] your hands on her, so that she may be made well and live” (Mark 5:23).

Because the same Greek form of hina with the subjunctive can be a purpose, result, or command clause, people sometimes disagree as to which is meant. This disagreement shows up in the varying translations of Mark 5:12 for instance, when the demons plead to go into the herd of swine. Some versions translate the second part of their plea as purpose, “Send us into the pigs so that we may enter them” (cp. NASB; HCSB; KJV; ASV), while most modern versions translate it as a command: “Send us into the pigs. Let us enter them” (cp. ESV; NIV; NRSV; NET; NAB; NJB). Interestingly, we see precisely the same split between the translations with regard to Titus 3:13, “see that they lack nothing” (command: ESV; NIV; NRSV; NET; NAB; NJB) as opposed to “so that they lack nothing (purpose-result: NASB; HCSB; KJV; ASV). (See also Revelation 14:13 for similar disagreement between translations).

Understanding how the hina construction can indicate a command becomes important for passages such as John 9:3, about the man born blind. Because this verse has hina with the subjunctive, we must ask whether it is meant to be a purpose or command clause. It is rendered as a purpose clause in most translations, “He was born blind so that God’s works might be revealed in him” (NRSV); however, this translation has serious consequences to the meaning of the text. It means that the man’s blindness was intentional, so that he could not see for the better part of his life—simply for the purpose of being healed this day—that “God’s works” may be manifest by his healing. Such an interpretation goes against the teaching of scripture, that God is love (1 John 4:16), has plans not to harm us (Jer. 29:11), and that it is Satan who is our enemy, the god of this world (2 Cor. 4:4) who has the power of death (Heb. 2:14). Jesus came to destroy the works of the Devil (1 John 3:8), his ministry was to heal those oppressed by Satan (Acts 10:38). The Gospels nowhere portray Jesus going around healing people oppressed by God (See Boyd, God at War, pp. 231-34).

In this way, the Greek in Matthew 2:15 is understood just like Ephesians 5:33, which has the same construction: “let [Greek=hina with a verb in the subjunctive] the wife see that she respects her husband.” [For more on hina with a verb in the subjunctive mood command clauses wrongly identified as purpose clauses, see commentary on John 9:3 and 13:18].

2:16. “Made a fool of.” From empaizo (#1702 ἐμπαίζω), “To trick someone so as to make a fool of the person” (BDAG); Lenski. It was more than just being “tricked” by the Magi. Herod reigned by fear and control, so having someone disobey a direct command, from his perspective, was to make a mockery of his reign. He would have expected the Magi back the next day, two at the most. He felt they made a fool of him by slipping away, and was furious.

“killed.” This was standard operating procedure for Herod. His reign was so filled with violent acts that this particular killing is not even noticed in the secular histories.

2:18. Quoted from Jeremiah 31:15.

“a sound was heard in Ramah.” Most translations read, “a voice was heard.” However, the Greek word phone (#5456 φωνή) can be used to mean just a sound (e.g., John 3:8; 1 Cor. 14:7; Rev. 8:5; 8:13 [“blasts”]). Though the sound would have been coming from a human voice, it would have been the sound of sobbing.

“sobbing.” Traditionally, this has been translated “weeping.” But we do not feel that “weeping” best captures the sense of the Greek word klauthmos (#2805 κλαυθμός). In English, weeping conjures up pictures of a weak and quiet, teary sadness. Klauthmos is more of a loud crying with obvious physical manifestations: “not merely with tears, but with every outward expression of grief” (Bullinger, Critical Lexicon, p. 862). Hence, we have rendered the word here “sobbing,” which gives a better sense of physical wailing than does the term “weeping;” after all, these mother’s babies had just been murdered. This is the noun form of the verb klaio (#2799 κλαίω) translated as “crying” in this verse.

“crying.” The Greek verb is klaiō (#2799 κλαίω). We have translated it as “crying” rather than “weeping.” Kliaio is the verb form of klauthmos; see commentary on “sobbing” in this verse.

2:19. “after.” The phrase “after Herod died” is a Greek construction known as genitive absolute. Although there are no specific time words, a genitive absolute has a temporal sense, usually translated “while,” “when,” or “after.” Did the dream come “while,” “when,” or “after” Herod died? To say “after Herod died” is the most ambiguous translation (the dream could have come right after Herod died, or some time later). To say “while” or “when” would mean the dream occurred simultaneously with Herod’s death, which most likely would not have been the case. Political and social tension always accompanied regime change in ancient times; would there be a peaceful transfer of power, or a coup d’état? We have translated the genitive absolute with “after,” to allow for the possibility of some time elapsing for Archelaus—who had already begun reigning when Joseph arrived in Israel (v. 22)—to stabilize control and for things to settle down after the transfer of power.

“had come to the end of his life.” The Greek is teleutaō (#5053 τελευτάω), which is related to the word telos (#5056 τέλος), “end,” and means to finish, bring to an end, come to an end, close. It was used by the Greeks as a euphemism for death. God could have used a common word for death here, such as apothneskō (#599 ἀποθνῄσκω), so the fact that he did not, but used the euphemism, should catch our attention. All of us will eventually, “come to the end,” so it behooves us to take our lives seriously, because after our end will come Judgment Day.

“Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδοὺ), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

“saying.” The verse division of the Nestle-Aland text includes this word at the beginning of verse 20. However, many translations put it here at the end of verse 19 (cp. NASB; NRSV; RSV; ASV). We felt the cleaner division was to include it in verse 19.

2:20. “Get up...take the child and his mother.” For the significance of the parallelism between the angel’s command and Joseph’s response see commentary on Matthew 2:13.

2:23. “he will be called a Nazarene.” This phrase is not meant to be a quotation of any scripture, for the saying is not found in any of the biblical writings. So what does Matthew mean here? There are two possibilities. First, these words could be a prophecy that was “spoken” (rheō, #4483 ῥέω), but not written. Unlike any other such reference in Matthew, this was said to be spoken by the “prophets” (plural), rather than by the “prophet.” The fact the noun is plural tells us Matthew did not intend this to be taken as a reference to a particular prophetic writing, but the words of the “prophets.” Hence, there were some things God told his prophets regarding the Messiah that were spoken and preserved in oral tradition but never inspired as holy writ—that the Messiah would be called a Nazarene was one such orally preserved prophecy. In this case it is the figure of speech hysteresis, when an author gives added information not known in the historical narrative (Cp. Bullinger, Companion Bible).

The other option for understanding this phrase—the path taken by Lenski and Hendriksen, for instance—is that the expression “he will be called a Nazarene” is meant as a summary statement of what the prophets spoke about the messiah, that he would be considered lowly and rejected. We recall the words of Nathanael, who showed typical disdain for Nazarenes: “Can anything good come out of Nazareth?” (John 1:46). In this case, Matthew combines the sense of several prophetic writings about the Messiah and describes them under his own heading, “He will be called a Nazarene.” But this view is unlikely. For why would Jesus have to literally move to Nazareth in order to fulfill this saying? If being called a Nazarene does not refer to actually living in Nazareth, then moving there would not fulfill the prophecy.

The Greek word hopōs (#3704 ὧπως), translated “in order to,” denotes purpose, showing that the physical move was intended to fulfill the word. If the phrase was meant as simply a derogative saying, “he’ll be called ‘a Nazarene,’” then there would be no need for the Messiah to literally live there. Therefore, the first interpretation is to be preferred.

Chapter 3

3:3. “The voice of one crying in the desert, ‘Make ready the road of the Lord, make his paths straight.’” This quotation, which comes from Isaiah 40:3-5 (and the quotation in Luke 3:4 and Mark 1:3) is from the Septuagint, the Greek Old Testament. For more on the Septuagint and the original NT texts being in Greek, see commentary on Luke 3:4).

“Yahweh.” “Yahweh” is the personal name of God, and a rabbinic abbreviation for it appears in the Hebrew manuscript of Matthew as well as in the verses of the Old Testament that Matthew quoted. As we will discuss below, there is evidence that Matthew wrote a Gospel in Hebrew and used the name Yahweh, so we have put it in the REV.

In the fourteenth century a complete Hebrew text of Matthew appeared in the body of a Jewish polemical treatise entitled Even Bohan, “The Touchstone.” The manuscript was not all in one place, but when gathered together was the complete book of Matthew. The author of the treatise, and thus the one who copied Matthew into it, was Shem-Tob ben Isaac ben-Shaprut (sometimes called Ibn Shaprut; also, because his name was actually Shem-Tob, sometimes the manuscript is referred to as the Shem-Tov manuscript). The Shem-Tob manuscript is not well known, so it is important to say a few things about it.

The Even Bohan treatise contains the entire book of Matthew in Hebrew, but unfortunately Shem-Tob wrote his notes in Hebrew right into the Hebrew text, which means they have to be lifted out of the text of Matthew for it to be read without them.

For many years the Shem-Tob manuscript was ignored, even though there was historical evidence that Matthew wrote in Hebrew. It was ignored because it had been the opinion of most scholars that the Shem-Tob manuscript was a translation back into Hebrew from the Latin, or perhaps from Greek. However, recently interest in the Hebrew language has caused a reexamination of the text. There are now a number of scholars who, for a number of reasons, think that the Shem-Tob manuscript represents a Hebrew manuscript tradition that goes back to the Hebrew text Matthew wrote. One reason is that there seem to be too many verses that differ from any known Greek or Latin manuscript for the Shem-Tob manuscript to be a translation from either of those manuscript traditions. Another very important reason is that the Shem-Tov manuscript uses a rabbinic abbreviation for Yahweh, the only personal name of God (all His other “names” are actually titles). No Jew in the Middle Ages would have used “Yahweh,” and no scholarly Jew would ever have placed the holy name of God, which they would not even say out loud, into a Christian Bible. A third reason involves some of the commentary Shem-Tob wrote. For example, after Matthew 2:12 and the verse about Jesus being born in Bethlehem, he comments that the Hebrew text is wrong and the error is not in “Jerome’s version” (the Latin). From comments like these we can see that Shem-Tov was copying an earlier Hebrew text. He would not have created a unique, and incorrect, Latin text, and then criticized it.
It is too much to go into all the various reasons for believing that the Ben-Tov manuscript represents a Hebrew manuscript tradition that goes back to an original that Matthew wrote, and there are still many scholars who believe Matthew first wrote in Greek, but more information can be found in the work by George Howard, The Hebrew Gospel of Matthew (Mercer University Press, Macon, GA, 1995).

It is also important to remember that although there are quite a few places that the Ben-Tov manuscript differs from the Greek text, it will take thorough study before adopting any of its readings into the English Bible because the Ben-Tov manuscript was in the hands of Jews, not Christians and also, as with any other manuscript from centuries after Christ, would have been a copied several times before it existed as the Shem-Tob manuscript we have available today. However, when it comes to the name “Yahweh,” the evidence seems certain that it would have had to have been passed down from an original Hebrew text of Matthew, and hence we use it in the REV.

Until recently scholars believed that Hebrew was not spoken in Palestine in the first century, and that when the word “Hebrew” appeared in documents from the first or second century that “Aramaic” was actually meant. However, the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls and other documents from around the time of Christ have revealed that Hebrew was both written and spoken in the first century. Given that, there is reason to believe that when the ancients said “Hebrew” they meant “Hebrew.”

A number of Church fathers said that Matthew wrote his gospel in Hebrew. Unfortunately, some of them are quoted in Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History and we do not have their original surviving statements. Nevertheless it seems highly unlikely that Eusebius would have said they said Matthew wrote in Hebrew if that was not what they said. Eusebius was not trying to build a case that Matthew wrote in Hebrew; he was simply writing a history of the Church. Furthermore, the accuracy of Eusebius’ statements would have been much easier to check in his day than now.

- Papias. The Church Father Papias, who wrote in the first third of the 2nd century was a bishop of the early Church. According to Eusebius, Papias said: “Matthew collected the oracles [literally: “words”] in the Hebrew language, and each interpreted them as best he could.” (Quoted in Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History (Lake Translation, p. 297). The statement, “each interpreted them as best he could” refers to the declining knowledge in Hebrew as the years went on and the Church became more Hellenized.

- Ireneus (pronounced I-ren-ā́–us). In about 170 AD, Ireneus wrote in Against Heresies (3:1): “Matthew also issued a written gospel among the Hebrews in their own dialect.”

- Origen. Origen lived about 210 AD. He was cited by Eusebius in Ecclesiastical History (6:25) saying that Matthew wrote his gospel in Hebrew.

- Jerome. Jerome (347–420 AD) said Matthew originally wrote in Hebrew, and apparently had a Hebrew manuscript of Matthew, because he quotes from it. From Jerome, Commentary on Psalm 135 (de Santos 22): “In the Hebraic gospel according to Matthew it has thus: Our bread for tomorrow give us this day, that is, the bread which you will give in your kingdom give us today.” Jerome also wrote, On Famous Men 3 (de Santos 18): “Matthew, who is also Levi, the ex-publican apostle, first composed in Hebraic letters the gospel of Christ in Judea on account of those who had believed from among the circumcision; [but those] who afterward translated it into Greek is not sufficiently certain. Furthermore, this Hebraic [text] is held even until today in the Caesarean library which Pamphilus the martyr studiously put together. There was an opportunity for me from the Nazaraeans to copy this volume, which is used in Beroea, a city of Syria. In which [gospel] it must be noted that, wherever the evangelist, whether from his own person or from the Lord and savior, makes use of testimonies of the old scriptures, he does not follow the authority of the seventy translators [the Septuagint version], but the Hebrew. From which things two are: From Egypt did I call my son, and: For he shall be called a Nazarene.” (These references are 2.15 and 2.23, respectively).

Jerome said in the Prologue of the Four Gospels: “First of all is Matthew, a publican with the cognomen of Levi, who published a gospel in Judea in the Hebrew speech, especially on account of those who had believed in Jesus from among the Jews, and with the shadow of the law in no way succeeding he served the truth of the gospel.”

3:4. “this John.” In the Greek text, the autos is demonstrative, “this John” (the one being discussed); it is not intensive, “John himself.” Cp. Robertson, Grammar, p. 686, and Lenski).

3:6. “confessing.” The Greek verb is exomologeo (ἐξοµολογέω), and it means to confess or admit openly or publicly. In this instance it is a plural participle, and indicates that the confession was connected with the baptism: they confessed their sin as they were being baptized, i.e., just before going under the water. The form of the verb indicates that they openly confessed their sin, not just whispered it to John. John Peter Lange writes: “The compound ἐξοµολογούµενον denotes public confession” (Lange’s Commentary; cp. Meyer, who points out that public confession is also indicated in Acts 19:18 and James 5:16).

The baptism of John thus showed the seriousness of the people after hearing the message that the Kingdom of Heaven was about to arrive (“the Kingdom of Heaven is near”). The “Kingsom of Heaven” was the kingdom promised in the Old Testament and ruled by Christ where no one was sick, the government was just, there was an abundance of food, and there was no war or crime. [For more on the Messianic Kingdom on earth, see commentary on Matthew 5:5, “inherit the earth”].

People wanted to get into that kingdom, and they set aside their reservations and, out in the water with John, openly confessed their sins. Their being immersed in the waters of the Jordan then symbolized the death of the old ways and rebirth or resurrection into a new life, which they would then have to live out in the flesh day after day. For more on John’s baptism, see the commentary on baptism at Ephesians 4:5.

3:7. “The wrath that is about to come.” This is the wrath associated with the Day of the Lord (see commentary on Revelation 6:17). The wrath did not come quickly, and still has not come. John the Baptist did not know that God would interpose the Administration of the Sacred Secret, which we are in today, between the resurrection of Christ and his coming in Judgment. He thought since the Messiah was on earth, Armageddon would come soon. [For a more complete understanding of the Administration of the Sacred Secret, and an explanation of administrations in the Bible, see Graeser, Lynn, Schoenheit, The Gift of Holy Spirit: The Power to be like Christ, Appendix A “The Administration of the Sacred Secret.” Also, see commentary on Ephesians 3:2.]

3:9. “these stones.” The Jews claimed salvation in large part due to their being descendants of Abraham, and John was repudiating that belief. His sharp rebuke was made even sharper by his reference to “these stones.” If anything is common in Israel it is stones, and the Bible has many, many references to them. Solomon’s wealth was described by saying that he made silver to be in Jerusalem as “stones” (1 Kings 10:27). Dashing one’s foot against a stone was common and painful (Ps. 91:12). When a dignitary would come through the area, the roads would have to be cleared of stones (Isa. 62:10), and to plant one would have to get the stones out of the vineyard (Isa. 5:1, 2).

3:10. “will be cut down.” Although the present tense verb is used, the cutting will be done in the future. This is the idiom some scholars refer to as the “prophetic present,” and it takes an event that is future but certain to happen and coming soon, and treats it as if it is present. [For more on the prophetic present, see commentary on Luke 3:9.]

3:11. “as a symbol of your repentance.” The Greek can be expressed that way, even if it is not the predominant way eis and the accusative is translated. D. A. Carson expresses the situation well:

> The phrase “for repentance” (εἰς μετανοίαν) is difficult: εἰς plus the accusative frequently suggests purpose (“I baptize you in order that you will repent”). Contextually (v. 6), this is unlikely, even in the telic sense suggested by Broadus: “I baptize you with a view to continued repentance.” But causal εἰς, of something very close to it, is not unknown in the NT (cf. Turner, Syntax, pp. 266–67): “I baptize you because of your repentance.” (The Expositor’s Bible Commentary; F. Gaebelein, general editor).

We assert the scope of Scripture shows that John did baptize people because of their repentance, and indeed, it was because of their repentance that the people came to John to be baptized by him. Indeed, Luke 7:29 and 30 make it clear that the sinners came to John to be baptized while the religious leaders rejected God’s purpose for themselves by not allowing themselves to be baptized by John, which would have involved their publicly confessing their sins.

The water baptism was a symbol, an outward demonstration, of the inward repentance that had happened in the heart of the people who came to be baptized. Many scholars and translators recognize this, and Daniel Wallace expresses it well: “Water baptism is not a cause of salvation, but a picture; and as such it serves both as a public acknowledgment (by those present) and a public confession (by the convert).…” (Greek Grammar Beyond the Basics).

Scholars and translators express how water baptism is a symbol or picture of the inner work of God in different ways in their writings. For example, Charles Williams translates the Matthew 1:11: “I am baptizing you in water to picture your repentance” (The NT in the Language of the People). Ann Nyland has: “I baptize you in water to show that you have changed your minds” (The Source NT). J. B. Phillips says: “I baptize you with water as a sign of your repentance” (NT in Modern English). Goodspeed’s New Testament reads: “I am baptizing you in water in token of your repentance.” Davies and Allison, after examining other possible interpretations, conclude: “It is, however, better to endorse a more nuanced position: baptism presupposes and expresses repentance” (International Critical Commentary: Matthew). Robert Mounce (New International Matthew Commentary) writes as if John is speaking in the first person: “My baptism’ he might say, ‘indicates you have repented.”’ See commentary on Mark 1:4.

“in holy spirit.” No articles in the Greek. This is the gift of holy spirit. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: Usages of ‘Spirit’]

3:12. “wheat...chaff.” This is the figure of speech hypocatastasis; the wheat and chaff represent people. For more on hypocatastasis, see commentary on Revelation 20:2, “dragon.”

3:16. “as he stepped away from the water.” The heavens did not open and the holy spirit descend while Jesus was standing in the Jordan River, but as he came “away” (apo) from the river and stepped up onto the bank. This fact becomes especially clear when Matthew is read in harmony with Mark. Here in Matthew 3:16, “away from” is from the Greek preposition apo (away from). The only way to be “away from” the water is to be out of it. Leon Morris (The Gospel According to Matthew) writes:

Matthew does not describe the baptism, but takes up his narrative from the time when it was completed...He uses the preposition apo (which he uses 113 times) whereas Mark uses ek (Mark 1:10). But Matthew has no dislike for ek, for he uses it 82 times, so he is not simply avoiding Mark’s preposition. He may, of course, use apo to indicate “more clearly Jesus’ complete departure from the waters of the Jordan” than does Mark’s ek....

Robert Gundry writes: “[Matthew] makes Jesus go up from the water immediately after the baptism, i.e., clamber up on the riverbank...Matthew’s apo does not negate the thought of emergence contained in Mark’s ek, but it indicates more clearly Jesus’ complete departure from the waters of the Jordan” (Matthew: A Commentary).

Other commentators make note of the fact that by leaving John and stepping out of the Jordan River, Jesus is shown to be starting his own new ministry, not connected with John the Baptist. Davies and Allison (The International Critical Commentary) make that point: “Jesus’ emerging from the water and climbing the bank...connects the heavenly vision and voice not with an action of John but with an action of Jesus.” They further state that it brings to mind at least two strong images that are imbedded in the Jewish mind: the creation of order from watery chaos (Gen. 1:3), and Israel’s new beginning as it came up and out of the Red Sea. Jesus’ coming up out of the Jordan marked the start of something new. [For more on Jesus’ baptism, see commentary on Mark 1:10].

3:17. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

Chapter 4

4:1. “led up.” The Greek is anagō (#321 ἀνάγω) and means, to lead or bring from a lower to a higher point; thus, lead up, bring up. This shows us conclusively that Jesus was led into the desert of Judea immediately after his baptism in Matthew 3. The Jordan River is the low point in that area, being around 900 or so feet below sea level, and the Judean desert was above it to the west, with some mountain summits approaching 1,500 or more, and over 2,000 as one gets close to Jerusalem.

“by the spirit.” The Greek text reads, hupo tou pneumatos (ὑπὸ τοῦ πνεύματος), using the preposition hypo followed by “the spirit,” in the genitive case. Thus here, hupo denotes agency, and tells us that Jesus was led “by” the spirit. It is difficult to decide whether we should say “by the Spirit,” i.e. “by God;” or “by the spirit,” that is, by the gift of God that Jesus had just received 2 verses earlier. The ancient texts were all capital letters, so it was up to the reader to decide what PNEUMATOS (Spirit or spirit) meant. Because English forces the translator to choose between “Spirit” and “spirit,” modern translators have to make a decision for the reader, and hope to educate the reader via commentary.

Actually, in this case, it is likely that both “Spirit” and “spirit” are true, and this is an example of the figure of speech amphibologia, where there are two meanings, both of them true. God, the Spirit, led Jesus into the desert, communicating and leading him “by the spirit,” just as He had done for millennia with Moses, Joshua, David, and the prophets and prophetesses. What actually happened was that Jesus was led “by the Spirit by the spirit.”

“desert.” The Greek is eremos (#2048 ἔρημος), and it means a solitary, lonely, desolate, uninhabited place, a desert, a wilderness, a lonely region. However, the word eremos can refer to an uncultivated region fit for pasturage, even though that area may be right next to fields and houses, thus the title of Gertrude Bell’s book, The Desert and the Sown. Areas in the Middle East were thought of as being good for farming or pasture, and a valley used for farming might butt right up to a hillside used for pasture. This situation always produced the tension that existed between the shepherds and the farmers.

“to be tempted.” Here in Matthew the Greek text uses the infinitive tense of the verb peirazō (#3985 πειράζω), and so “to be tempted,” as the English translations say, is a good translation. The infinite clause expresses purpose. It is God who leads Jesus into the Judean wilderness “to be tempted,” but it is the Devil (Slanderer) who does the tempting. It can be confusing at first to see that God lead Jesus into the desert “to be tempted,” but there are good explanations for it.

For one thing, we must realize that both God and Jesus knew that a showdown between the Devil and Jesus was inevitable. For millennia the Devil had been aggressively trying to prevent the Messiah from even being born. Then, when he was born, he tried to kill him as in infant through his evil servant, Herod the Great. So it was better for Jesus if he met the Devil head on and dealt with him personally at the beginning of his ministry. It accomplished many things.

One thing it accomplished is cemented in Jesus’ mind who the Devil was and what he wanted: to be in God’s place and to be worshipped. The Devil is like the Wizard of Oz. He makes himself look much larger and more powerful than he really is, and controls people by threats, fear, lies, etc. The prophet Isaiah tells us that when the Devil meets his doom and we get to see him for what he really is, we will say, “Is this the man who shook the earth and made kingdoms tremble, the man who made the world a desert, who overthrew its cities and would not let his captives go home?” (Isa. 14:16, 17). When the Devil met Jesus face to face, it gave Jesus a chance for him to see who he was really dealing with. And the Devil, for his part, revealed his crafty and evil nature perfectly for Jesus to see.
Another thing it did was make Jesus stronger in the spiritual battle. It is commonly said that what does not kill us makes us stronger, and successfully enduring temptation does make us stronger. Facing the Devil’s temptations cemented in Jesus’ mind that he did not need the world’s fame, or power, or even food. He could rely on God—on God’s provision and God’s timing. This was a huge lesson to learn. And even though Jesus had certainly learned to rely on God in the first 30 years of his life, talking to God via the gift of holy spirit would have bolstered his confidence, and things such as the angels coming to minister to him after the Devil left would have helped also (v.11).

Another thing it accomplished was to cement for Jesus, and show us, the absolute necessity to know and understand the Word of God, and to use it in our lives to fight the spiritual battle. Jesus resisted each of the temptations by saying, “It is written,” and quoting Scripture. This set the tone for how he would deal with opposition from that time forward, and it sets the tone for how we must act if we are going to be successful in the spiritual fight. Furthermore, it shows us how important it is to use Scripture as a “measuring tool” to determine good from evil. How did Jesus know what was right and what was wrong? Via Scripture, and anything contrary to the proper interpretation of Scripture must be resisted.

Another thing it accomplished, and continues to accomplish, is that it lets everyone know that just as Christ resisted the Devil and overcame his temptations, so we too can have victory in Christ. Believers do not have to be victims of the Devil, we stand against the Devil and win even as Christ did.

Also, although there is no way to know this for sure, Jesus made it clear to the Devil that he was not going to be simply fooled or led astray, and there are no more direct encounters between the Devil and Jesus mentioned in the Gospels. The Devil realized he would have to kill Jesus to get rid of him, and he tried in multiple ways to do that: from inciting mobs such as at Bethlehem, to trying to drown him via storms on the Sea of Galilee. He thought he won when he finally engineered his crucifixion, only to find like Haman in the book of Esther, that he had killed himself via his own stake.

“tempted.” The Greek word peirazō (#3985 πειραζω) can mean several different things depending on its context. It is used for (1) tempting and (2) testing (i.e., trying, examining, proving); its semantic range also includes (3) “attempting to do something,” like when Paul and Timothy tried to go into Bithynia but were prevented (Acts 16:7); and (4) trying to “entrap through a process of inquiry,” such as the Pharisees testing Jesus with questions (BDAG). The differences in meaning are found not in the word itself, but in the circumstance and especially the motive behind the one who is tempting, testing, attempting, etc. The distinction between testing and tempting, then, is this: testing comes from a desire to see the person prove himself true, to pass the test, and to gain confidence from the victory; temptation, on the other hand, is when evil is placed before someone in hope that he or she will fail. Thus God never tempts people (Jam. 1:13) but he does test people (Gen. 22:1; Heb. 11:17). Both temptation and testing are meant to see what is in a person, whether they will obey, but temptation is meant to make someone fall while testing is to raise them up. God always tests in order to reward or bring about good (Deut. 8:16). Hence, Jeremiah 17:10 says, “I the LORD test the mind and search the heart, to give to all according to their ways, according to the fruit of their doings” (ESV).

“by the Slanderer.” The “Slanderer” is “the Devil.” The Greek is diabolos (#1228 διάβολος). The Greek word diabolos means “slanderer,” the one who slanders others, and that is a primary characteristic of the Devil. He has no regard for a person’s reputation or the illicit means he uses to discredit and destroy people. Slander is a primary tactic of the Devil. [For more information on the names of the Devil, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer.”] The literal Greek of this verse is “of the Slanderer,” a genitive of origin, the Slanderer being the source of the temptation, so “by the Slanderer” is a good translation.

4:2. “forty days and forty nights.” Here Jesus is clearly being shown as a new Moses, who had twice spent 40 days and nights on Mount Sinai (First time: Exod. 24:18, which was retold in Deut. 9:9; Second time: Exod. 34:28). Jesus also spent 40 days fasting in the wilderness, and is now the new Lawgiver, superior to Moses. Jesus brings a “better hope” (Heb. 7:19); initiates a “better covenant” (Heb. 7:22; 8:6) that is based on “better promises (Heb. 8:6); and is a “better sacrifice” (Heb. 9:23).

4:3. “If you are.” The Devil did not doubt who Jesus was, and neither did Jesus. The Devil, called “the Tempter” in the verse, is goading Jesus, prodding and poking him in order to get him to act rashly. He was trying to get a reaction from Jesus like, “I am the Son of God, and I’ll prove it to you,” and then do something stupid. This event is historical fact, but we must learn from it because the Devil and those who follow him use the same tactic every day, poking at people until they get angry and do something stupid. We are to be peaceful and controlled and not be victims of the Devil’s tricks.

“the Tempter.” This is a name for the Slanderer (the Devil). The Greek is peirazō (#3985 πειράζω; pronounced, pay-rah’-zō), which means to tempt, to put through an ordeal. It can also be used in a good sense, to test with the idea of the one tested being successful, but that is not its meaning here. The Tempter is an apt name for the Slanderer, because he is constantly at work to set traps and temptations up so that people will fall. The Adversary comes to steal, kill, and destroy (John 10:10), and often he sets the stage with a temptation so that we end up destroying ourselves. [For other names of the Slanderer and their meanings, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”].

4:4. “It is written, Man does not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceeds out of the mouth of God.” Quoted from Deuteronomy. 8:3. Jesus’ quotation of Deuteronomy was not exact, but was very close. He never claimed to make an exact quotation.

4:5. “Slanderer.” The Devil. [For information on the names of the Devil, see commentary on Matthew 4:1.] [For this temptation actually being the last of the three temptations and Luke 4 having the correct order of temptations, see commentary on Matthew 4:8, “showed him all the kingdoms.”]

4:7. Quoted from Deuteronomy. 6:16.

“Yahweh.” “Yahweh” is the personal name of God, and a rabbinic abbreviation for it appears in the Hebrew manuscript of Matthew as well as in the verses of the Old Testament that Matthew quoted. There is evidence that Matthew wrote a Gospel in Hebrew and used the name Yahweh, so we have put it in the REV (see commentary on Matthew 3:3).

4:8. “Slanderer.” The Devil. [For more information on the characteristics inferred by the names and appellations of God’s archenemy, Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”].

“lofty.” The Greek adjective hupselos (#5308 ὑψηλός) has a basic meaning of “high” (as in Matt 17:1, Mk. 9:2, and Rev. 21:10). However, it can also have the connotation of “proud” or “arrogant.” We see this in Romans 12:16 when we are told to “not mind high things” (μὴ τὰ υψηλὰ φρονοῦντες), i.e. not be proud. The LXX uses this sense in Isaiah 2:12-14: “the LORD of hosts has a day against all that is proud and lofty…against all the lofty mountains, and against all the uplifted hills.” It is possible that here in Matthew the adjective has this connotation implied; the Devil tempted Christ to ‘mind high things’ by taking him to a ‘proud’ mountain, showing him all the splendor of ruling the kingdoms of the world. In English the word “lofty” captures both the sense of altitude and arrogance.

“showed him all the kingdoms.” Matthew and Luke both record the 3 temptations that the Adversary tempted Jesus with, but worded slightly differently and in a different order. We believe Luke has the order correct because Luke says he recorded things “in order” (Luke 1:3). However, it makes sense that Matthew, which emphasizes Jesus’ role as the king, would have the temptation about ruling over the world as the last temptation because to a king, the domain and people over whom he rules is of primary importance.

Commentators differ as to whether Matthew or Luke has the order of events as they actually happened. We suggest that another reason that Luke has the correct order is that it makes sense that to the Devil, the most desirable outcome would be to have Jesus worship him, but if he could not accomplish that, to kill Jesus and be done with him. The order of temptations in Luke accomplishes that goal. The second temptation would result in Jesus worshipping the Devil, and if that failed the third temptation would have resulted in Jesus’ death.

4:9. “worship.” The Devil wanted Jesus to reverence him as he reverenced God. Thus “worship” is appropriate here. See commentary on “pay homage” in Matthew 2:2.

4:10. “For it is written, Worship Yahweh your God, and serve him only.” Quoted from Deuteronomy. 6:13. The quotation is not exact. Deuteronomy 6:13 says, “You shall fear Yahweh your God.” Jesus correctly gets the sense of “fear” in that context, and so brings it forward as “worship.” This is not a case where Jesus was quoting the Septuagint and it read “worship,” because both the Hebrew text and LXX read “fear.”

It is sometimes stated that since we are to worship only God, and, because we are also supposed to worship Jesus, therefore he must be God. That argument is not valid and is based on a false understanding of the word “worship.” While it is true that we are to worship God in a special way reserved only for Him, there is no Greek or Hebrew word that represents that fact. It is an issue of the heart and cannot be represented on the written page. The words for “worship” in both the Hebrew Old Testament and the Greek New Testament are used of both people and God. In fact the entire temptation of Christ by the Devil proves that Jesus was not God. God cannot be tempted (James 1:13). Also, if Jesus were God, the Devil would never have asked Jesus to worship him. God is worshipped, but there is no evidence He worships anything else at any time. It was for desiring to be like God (and thus be worshiped like God) that the Devil was thrown out of heaven in the first place (Isa. 14:12-15), and it is unreasonable to think that the Devil would have believed that God could now be persuaded to worship him.

In the biblical culture, the act of worship was not directed only to God. It was very common to worship (i.e., pay homage to) men of a higher status. Sadly, almost always this fact has been obscured by the translators of the Bible, and therefore is impossible to see in the English translations. The translators usually translate Hebrew or Greek words that relate to worship as “worship” when they refer to God or a pagan god, but as some other word, such as “bow before,” or “pay homage to,” when the worship involves men. This double standard of translation does not allow the English reader to see what any person reading the Hebrew or Greek text can see: that “worship” is not just reserved for God. A few examples should make our point.

- Exodus 34:14 NIV84: “Do not worship [#7812 שָׁחָה shachah] any other god, for the LORD, whose name is Jealous, is a jealous God.
- Genesis 19:1 NIV84: When Lot saw the two strangers, he got up to meet them “and bowed down [#7812 shachah] with his face to the ground.”
- Genesis 27:29 NIV84: Isaac said to Jacob: May…peoples bow down [#7812 shachah] to you. Be lord over your brothers, and may the sons of your mother bow down [#7812 shachah] to you.
- Exodus 18:7 NIV84 “So Moses went out to meet his father-in-law and bowed down [#7812 shachah] and kissed him.
- 1 Samuel 1:19 NIV84 Early the next morning they arose and worshiped [#7812 shachah] before the LORD.
- 1 Samuel 2:36 Then everyone left in your family line will come and bow down before him [#7812 shachah] for a piece of silver and a crust of bread.
- 2 Samuel 1:2 On the third day a man arrived from Saul's camp... When he came to David, he fell to the ground to pay him honor [#7812 shachah].

The above list confirms what has already been pointed out—that the translators used the word “worship” when the worship was to God or pagan gods, but never used the word “worship” when people were “worshipping” other people, even though the Hebrew text used the same word for both types of worship. And the above list is only a tiny sampling of the examples that could be given, or of what one will see if he studies the subject for himself. “Worship,” usually expressed by bowing down before someone, was a part of the culture and a way of showing respect or reverence. However, because of the theological position that only God should be worshipped, translators have avoided the English word “worship” when people worship people, in spite of the fact that it is clearly in the original text. We assert that not translating into English what is clearly in the original text has created a false impression in the Christian community and supported the belief that “only God can be worshipped, so if Jesus is worshipped he must be God too.” It is very clear in the biblical text that people “worshipped” other people who deserved that worship, and no person deserved worship more than Jesus Christ.

There is a sense, of course, in which there is a very special worship (homage, allegiance, reverent love and devotion) to be given only to God, but there is no unique word that represents that special worship. Rather, it is a posture of the heart. Scripturally, this must be determined from context. Even words like proskuneō, which are almost always used of God, are occasionally used for showing respect to other men (Acts 10:25). And the word “serve” in Matthew 4:10 is latreuō, which is sometimes translated worship, but used of the worship of other things as well as of the true God (Acts 7:42 - KJV), “worship the host of heaven” and Romans 1:25, “served created things”). Thus, when Christ said, “You shall worship the Lord thy God and Him only shall you worship,” he was speaking of a special worship of God that comes from the heart, not using a special vocabulary word that is reserved for the worship of God only.

Once we understand that in the Bible both God and men are worshipped, we are forced to look, not at the specific word for “worship,” but rather at the heart of the one doing the worship. It explains why God rejects the worship of those whose hearts are really not with Him. It also explains why there are occasions in the Bible when men reject the worship of other men. In Acts 10:26, Peter asks Cornelius to stand up. In Revelation 19:10, an angel stops John from worshipping him. In these cases it is not the “worship,” per se, that was wrong, or it would have been wrong in all the other places throughout the Bible. In the aforementioned accounts, the one about to be worshipped saw that it was inappropriate or felt uncomfortable in the situation. Actually, the example of John in Revelation is another strong proof that men did worship others beside God. If it were forbidden to worship anyone beside God, the great apostle John would never have even started to worship the angel. The fact that he did so actually proves the point that others beside God were worshipped in the biblical culture.

It is clear why people fell down and worshipped Jesus while he walked the earth and performed great miracles: people loved him and respected him greatly. It is also clear why we are to worship him now—he has earned our love and our highest reverence. He died to set us free, and God has honored him by seating him at His own right hand above all other powers and authorities. Just because we worship God and worship Jesus, does that mean they are the same or receive the same worship. No, it does not. We reserve a special place in our hearts for God, for Jesus, and frankly, for those other people who deserve our “worship” in the biblical sense of the word.

“Yahweh.” “Yahweh” is the personal name of God, and a rabbinic abbreviation for it appears in the Hebrew manuscript of Matthew as well as in the verses of the Old Testament that Matthew quoted. There is evidence that Matthew wrote a Gospel in Hebrew and used the name Yahweh, so we have put it in the REV (see commentary on Matthew 3:3).

“Adversary.” The Greek word for Adversary is Satanas (#4567 Σατανᾶς), which has been transliterated into “Satan” in most versions. This causes the meaning of the word, which is important, to be lost. For more information on it, see the note on Mark 1:13. [For information on the names of the Devil, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”.

4:11. “Slanderer.” This is the Devil. See commentary on 4:1.

4:12. “he withdrew into Galilee.” Herod Antipas imprisoned John at his palace fortress of Machaerus, which was in Perea, the area beyond Jordan where John had been baptizing according to John 1:28. When Jesus knew John was imprisoned there, he went north into Galilee.

4:13. “And leaving Nazareth, he went and lived in Capernaum...” Jesus left Nazareth after the people there tried to kill him (Luke 4:28-31). He made Capernaum his home [For more information, see commentary on Mark 2:1].

4:15-16. Quoted from Isaiah 9:1, 2.

“The Road of the Sea.” This major traderoute that went right through Capernaum (there is a Roman mile marker now on display at Capernaum) is most often known by its more modern name that comes from the Latin, the Via Maris. The Via Maris is the ancient trade route linking Egypt with Damascus and all Syria, Anatolia (modern Turkey) and Mesopotamia. Its early name was “Way of the Philistines” (Exod. 13:17) because after leaving Egypt it ran north along the coast of Israel through the territory of the Philistines. The name “Via Maris” is much later and based on the Latin Vulgate translation of Matthew 4:15. It means “the Way of the Sea,” or “the Road of the Sea.” The history of the Via Maris is long and the main road changed at different periods. For example, before the Roman period the Via Maris went from Capernaum north to Hazor and from Hazor it crossed the Jordan River at Jacob’s Ford then went over the Golan Heights to Damascus. This road still existed in the time of Christ, but recent archaeological evidence suggests that in Roman times the road left Capernaum and headed east to Bethsaida-Julius and then northeast to Damascus.

The Via Maris goes from Egypt across Sinai, through the Philistine Plain and the Plain of Sharon through the cities of Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, and Joppa. At Dor it branches into two roads. One continues directly north along the Mediterranean coast, and the other follows an inland route by Megiddo, through the Jezreel Valley, then to Old Testament Beth-shean (which is New Testament Scythopolis, a city of the Decapolis). From there it branched, and one branch ran on the west side of the Sea of Galilee, passing through Tiberias, then continuing north through Migdal and Capernaum. The east branch crossed the Jordan south of the Sea of Galilee and ran along the east coast of the lake until Hyppos (Susita) when it turned northeast and climbed over the Golan and then continued down to Damascus. The fact that the Via Maris passed by Capernaum helps explain why that city had a tollhouse (Matt. 2:14) so revenue could be collected from the passing caravans. That money needed protection, so it was also a Roman outpost and had a centurion and troops (Matt. 8:5). Also, it shows us that when Jesus Christ chose Capernaum to be his home town after he left Nazareth, he chose a cosmopolitan town where there would be plenty of opportunity to share the Word and reach others, as well as opportunity for others to more easily reach him.

4:17. “The Kingdom of Heaven is at hand.” Spoken by both John and Jesus. Neither knew about the Administration of the Sacred Secret. They did not know that the coming of the Kingdom of Heaven would be more than 2,000 years in the future. [For a more complete understanding of the Administration of the Sacred Secret, and an explanation of administrations in the Bible, see Graeser, Lynn, Schoenheit, The Gift of Holy Spirit: The Power to be like Christ, Appendix 1 “The Administration of the Sacred Secret.”]

4:18. “Sea of Galilee.” The “sea” of Galilee is actually quite a small lake, only 7 miles (11.2 km) across and 12 miles (19.3 km) long, and the entire lake can be seen from the escarpments on both the east and west sides. The Greek word thalasso, lake, sea, or ocean, does not really refer to the size of the body of water, and thus has to be translated into the English “lake,” “sea,” or “ocean” by knowing the body of water that is being referred to. Because the body of water is historically known as, and called, “the Sea of Galilee” we leave that name intact when its proper name is mentioned. However, when it is not referred to by name, we refer to it like it actually is—a lake.

4:25. “Decapolis.” The Decapolis was a loosely associated league of ten cities (Deka means ten; polis means city), and is also the name of the area where these cities are located. By 200 B.C. the Greeks had occupied towns like Gadara and Philadelphia, and in 63 B.C. the Roman General Pompey liberated Hippos (Susita), Scythopolis (built on the ancient site of Beth-shean), and Pella from the Jews and gave them municipal freedom, allowing them to answer directly to the governor of Syria. About 1 B.C. they formed a league, even minting their own coins. Although the number of cities was probably ten at an early date, with time the number of cities changed. The Roman historian Pliny named the ten cities as Damascus, Philadelphia (modern Amman, Jordan), Canatha, Pella, Hippos, Gadara, Dion, Raphana, Gerasa (modern Jerash), and Scythopolis (ancient Beth Shean and the only city west of the Jordan River). In the second century A.D., Ptolemy named eighteen cities in the Decapolis, and another source mentions fourteen cities. Hence the number of cities varied from time to time.

The original Decapolis was settled by Greeks who migrated into the area shortly after the conquest of Israel by Alexander the Great. For the most part they either founded a city or moved into a city that did not have a large population and became the dominant influence there. Jesus is never mentioned as going into any specific city of the Decapolis. Nevertheless, he did minister in the area of Tyre, Sidon, and the Decapolis, so he well may have been in a Decapolis city (Mark 7:31), even though primarily ministered to the “lost sheep of the house of Israel” (Matt. 15:24). Also, when word about Jesus and what he was doing reached the cities of the Decapolis, “large crowds from Galilee, the Decapolis, Jerusalem, Judea and the region across the Jordan followed him” (Matt. 4:25). Thus, the teachings and miracles of Jesus clearly caught the attention of the Greeks as well as the Jews.

“the region across the Jordan.” Since the list specifically mentions the Decapolis, the region across the Jordan River refers to Perea, the territory controlled by Herod Antipas, who was the son of Herod the Great by his wife Malthace (Herod had 5 wives in his lifetime). Herod Antipas married Herodias, who divorced his half-brother Herod Philip to marry him, and it was Herod Antipas who imprisoned John the Baptist in his castle at Machaerus when John confronted Herod Antipas and told him it was against the Law of Moses to marry his brother’s wife.

5:3. “Blessed.” This verse is the first of what is called “The Beatitudes.” The word “beatitudes” means “supreme blessedness or happiness, perfect bliss,” so theologians named the first nine verses in the Sermon on the Mount, “The Beatitudes” because they each start with the phrase, “Blessed are.” The Beatitudes primarily refer to the future Kingdom on earth, not this life.

Jesus knew the value of having a true hope, as opposed to a false hope, and he spent the opening part of the Sermon on the Mount, which was his first major teaching recorded in the Word of God, rebuilding the Hope for Israel. Most Christians do not know that everything Jesus said in the Beatitudes, which is the opening of the Sermon on the Mount, relates primarily to the future hope. Most Christians also do not know that what he taught was not “new revelation.” It had already been stated in the Old Testament but had been almost forgotten by his time. What is commonly taught by Christians is that the Beatitudes refer to this life. For example, under “Beatitudes” in the Mercer Dictionary of the Bible, the following definition is provided:

Beatitudes. The term is used to designate the condition of individuals or groups who are faithful or righteous and who may therefore expect to enjoy the favor of God. Such blessings were expected to be realized in this life…” (Watson Mills, ed., Mercer Dictionary of the Bible; Mercer University Press, Macon, GA, 1990, pp. 92–93).

It is a distortion of the text to interpret the Beatitudes as referring to this life. Although there are certain aspects that do apply today, such as a pure-hearted person seeing God more clearly than someone with an impure heart, the primary emphasis is on the future. Students of the Bible must understand the difference between “interpretation” and “application.” “Interpretation” is what the verse is actually saying—what it means. “Application” is how a person can apply the verse or an insinuation from the verse in his own life. Someone may say he is “blessed” by God because he is “poor in spirit” (i.e., humble) and refer to Matthew 5:3. However, that is not the primary meaning of the verse, even though the person applies it to his life. A more accurate application (and interpretation) of his idea would come from his using 1 Peter 5:5.

How can “Blessed are those who mourn, for they will be comforted” be accurately applied to this life when many people who mourn die without ever being comforted? Or, how can “Blessed are the meek, for they will inherit the earth” be applied to this life? Many meek people never own land and most never “inherit” any land at all. These blessings relate to the future, and Christ was simply teaching what the prophets of long ago had taught. He was rebuilding the walls of doctrine that had been torn down by years of unbelief.

Some Christians try to apply the Beatitudes to this life by spiritualizing them, i.e., by making them something other than a strictly literal reading would say. For example, The New International Commentary expounds on the phrase “the meek shall inherit the earth” by saying that greedy, aggressive people are not able to enjoy what they have in this life, but the meek “have the capacity to enjoy in life all those things that provide genuine and lasting satisfaction.” The first and most obvious problem with this interpretation is that it does not deal with what the verse actually says. There is a world of difference between “inheriting the earth” and “enjoying what one has.” It is safe to assume that if Christ had wanted to communicate to his audience that only meek people can enjoy what they have, he would have said just that.

A second problem with the idea that the verse refers to enjoying things now is that such an interpretation does not provide the comfort and hope that many people need. Many of those in Christ’s audience were poor, hungry, sick, had lost children or relatives to premature death, and were terribly oppressed by the Romans and even their fellow Jews who had rulership over them. They owned little and life was very, very difficult. Would it really have comforted them if what Christ said had meant, “Don’t worry, those greedy people cannot really enjoy all the wealth they have, but you can enjoy what you have”? It would not have comforted them any more than it would comfort people who are poor, sick, and oppressed today. But having hope that things in the future will be better than they are now can be very comforting and encouraging. Furthermore, experience teaches that hope in a wonderful future is more important to people who are having difficulties in life than to those who are having an easy life. William Shakespeare, a brilliant writer and keen observer of human life, wrote, “The miserable have no other medicine, but only hope,” and the Beatitudes provide a wonderful hope for the future.

When a person understands that the subject of the Beatitudes is the future life, not this one, they are easy to understand, profound in their meaning, and powerful in their impact. Christ, the master teacher, garnered truth from the Old Testament and taught it, and as long as the Beatitudes are taken literally and applied to his future Kingdom, what is taught is simple and clear. The Beatitudes are recorded in both Matthew and Luke. There are significant differences between the two Gospels, so both should be examined carefully. In Matthew, Jesus was teaching to a crowd (Matt. 5:1), some of whom were his disciples, but many were not. Not everyone in the crowd was a believer. Since he was teaching from a mountainside, the teaching is called, “The Sermon on the Mount.” In Luke, Christ was teaching on a plain (Luke 6:17) and although a crowd was listening, he spoke specifically to his disciples (Luke 6:20). Each of the Beatitudes should be studied in light of the Old Testament verses that teach the same basic truth.

“Poor in spirit.” This is the figure of speech “idiom,” and is an idiomatic way of saying “humble in their attitude.” To fully understand the idiom, we must examine both “poor” and “spirit.” The Greek word “poor” is ptochos (πτοχός), and it means poor in wealth, but can refer to being “poor” in other ways. For example, the people Christ addresses in Revelation 3:17 are technically wealthy in material goods, yet Jesus says: “You say, ‘I am rich; I have acquired wealth and do not need a thing.’ But you do not realize that you are wretched, pitiful, poor, blind and naked.” In this verse, “poor” refers to being poor in godliness and in the treasure that will be bestowed at the Judgment. Similarly, the word “poor” can refer to being poor or humble in one’s attitude. This is reflected in Isaiah 66:2, which mentions the person to whom God will pay attention: “but to this man will I look, even to him that is poor and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at my word.” This verse mentions a “poor and contrite spirit” but many versions correctly understand that the word “poor” refers to “humble,” and translate it that way (ESV; HCSB; NASB, NIV, NRSV). Kenneth Bailey (Jesus Through Middle Eastern Eyes (IVP Academic, 2008, pp. 68, 69, 158, 159) does a good job in showing from the Old Testament, the Qumran texts, and even early Christian sources, that “poor” was used idiomatically for “humble.”

The word “spirit” is translated from the Greek word pneuma (πνεῦμα), which has many meanings. Furthermore, when pneuma is translated “spirit,” it can refer to many different things, including God (John 4:24); Jesus (2 Cor. 3:17); angels (Heb. 1:14); and demons (Matt. 10:1). It can also refer to “attitude,” which it does here. Other places it refers to attitude are Matthew 26:41 and Mark 14:38, when Peter and the other disciples were sleepy and Jesus told them, “The spirit [attitude] is willing, but the body is weak.” It is also “attitude” in Acts 18:25 when Apollos was called, “fervent in the spirit” (KJV), meaning that he had a fervent attitude, which is why the NRSV translates the phrase, “he spoke with burning enthusiasm.” Interestingly, English also uses “spirit” as “attitude.” For example, we speak of a person being “in good spirits,” or a school having good “school spirit.”

The “spirit” in Matthew 5:3 cannot refer to the gift of holy spirit, because before the day of Pentecost, holy spirit was only upon a select few people, not upon the crowds Jesus was speaking to. Also, before the Day of Pentecost God gave His holy spirit to whom He wanted and in the measure He wanted, so there was no way anyone could have been “poor” in holy spirit. [For more about the uses of pneuma (spirit) see Appendix 6, “Usages of ‘Spirit’”, and also Graeser, Lynn, and Schoenheit, The Gift of Holy Spirit: The Power to be like Christ, Appendix B.]

It is important for us to understand that Jesus opened the Sermon on the Mount by teaching that those who were humble in their attitude were blessed. This was not a new teaching, but was an important teaching in the Old Testament as well. Being humble is the door to God’s further blessings. 1 Peter 5:5 says, “God opposes the proud but gives grace to the humble.” When we are humble we hear the voice of God and obey it. When we are not humble we do not get the blessings God would have poured out to us. In the context of Matthew 5:5, which is the coming Kingdom of Heaven, those who are humble will obey God and thus receive everlasting life in the Kingdom, so they are blessed. References in the Old Testament that humble people would be blessed include Psalm 149:4; Isaiah 29:19; 66:2; and Zephaniah 3:12.

5:4. “Blessed are those who mourn, for they will be comforted.” This truth was revealed in the Old Testament in verses such as Isaiah 61:3.

5:5. “Blessed are the meek, for they will inherit the earth.” From Psalm 37: The plain and simple meaning of this verse has been lost due to the traditional teaching that saved people live in heaven forever after they die. Actually, what the Bible teaches is that Jesus Christ will come down from heaven to the earth, fight and win the Battle of Armageddon, and set up his kingdom on earth, which will fill the whole earth (Dan. 2:35, 44; Rev. 19:11-21). He will set up his palace in the newly rebuilt Jerusalem, and for 1,000 years reign over all the earth. Many scholars refer to this 1,000 year kingdom as the “Millennial Kingdom.” It is the “Kingdom” that Jesus spoke about so often. After the 1,000 years are over there will be a great war (Rev. 20:7-10). Then there will be the second resurrection, and after that the Eternal City will come from heaven to earth, in which the saved will live forever (Rev. 21:1-4). [For more information on the future kingdom of earth, see Appendix 3, Christ’s Future Kingdom on Earth].

“earth.” The Greek word ge (#1093 γῆ; pronounced “gay”), means 1. arable land; 2. the ground, the earth; 3. the mainland, opposed to sea or water; 4. the earth as a whole, the world; a. the earth as opposed to the heavens; 5. a country, land enclosed within fixed boundaries, a tract of land, territory, or region, when it is plain from the context what land is meant, as that of the Jews.

5:6. “Blessed are those who hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they will be filled.” Today we live in an evil age, and many people do experience much righteousness. Many are treated unrighteously until the day they die. But one of the great promises of the future kingdom of Christ is that there will be righteousness (Cp. Ps. 37:28, 29; Isa. 1:26; 11:4; Dan. 9:24). We can be spiritually righteous today because of the work of Christ, but Jesus taught this to people before Acts 2 when the holy spirit was poured out from heaven. But even we who are spiritually righteous in the eyes of God long for that promised time when “a king will reign in righteousness and rulers will rule with justice,” (Isa. 32:1) and righteousness is on the earth (2 Pet. 3:13).

5:7. “Blessed are the merciful, for they will obtain mercy.” This is one of the clear verses in the Beatitudes that shows they are about the future hope, not this life. There are many merciful people who never receive mercy in this life, but they will definitely be shown mercy by God at the Judgment and afterwards. In Matthew 25:31-46, Christ said that those who had fed the hungry, given drink to the thirsty, sheltered the outcast, clothed the naked, and visited those who were sick or in prison would be shown mercy at the Judgment and allowed into the Kingdom where they will enjoy everlasting life with Christ, while those who had not shown mercy would be excluded. Old Testament verses that show that people who are merciful will be shown mercy include Hosea 6:6; Micah 6:8; and Zechariah 7:9.

5:8. “Blessed are the pure in heart, for they will see God.” People who are pure in heart believe God, and thus will be saved, which is why Jesus said they would see God. In the future God will indeed live with His people (Rev. 21:3). That the pure in heart would be saved and live forever, and thus get to see God, was a common teaching in the Old Testament.

5:9. “Blessed are the peacemakers, for they will be called sons of God.” This clearly refers to the future because the peacemakers on the earth today are often scoffed at and discounted as cowards and compromisers. This is the case whether the conflicts are inter-family, inter-racial, or international. Nevertheless, the Lord recognizes their efforts and they will be called “the sons of God” in the Kingdom, where they will live forever. That peacemakers would have everlasting life was stated in the Old Testament. Psalm 37:37 (NIV84) says, “there is a future for the man of peace.”

5:10. “Blessed are those who have been persecuted for the sake of righteousness, for theirs is the Kingdom of Heaven.” Many of the people who have been persecuted died in the persecution, but they are promised “the Kingdom of Heaven,” i.e., everlasting life in Christ’s wonderful future kingdom on earth.

5:12. “reward.” The Greek is misthos (#3408 µισθός), and it refers to a payment made for work done; wages. As “wages” or “payment,” it can refer to either a reward (cp. Matt. 5:12; 10:41; Luke 6:35; 1 Cor. 3:14) or a punishment (2 Pet. 2:13), depending on what kind of “payment” is due. In the future Millennial Kingdom, when Jesus Christ rules as king on the earth, people will be repaid for what they have done in this life (see commentary on 2 Cor. 5:10, “good or worthless”). Some people might think they have done very little to support God’s work, but if anyone has helped accomplish God’s work on earth, he will be amply rewarded.

In Matthew 5:12 and some other verses, the reward is said to be “in heaven.” The Bible makes it clear that, with the exception of Christians, who are in the Rapture, believers from Old Testament times get up from the dead and live on the earth. Ezekiel 37:12 (KJV) says, “Thus saith the Lord GOD; Behold, O my people, I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel.” There is no verse in the Old Testament that states that people go to heaven to live forever. The OT states that when people are resurrected they live on earth.

The rewards that people would receive for their works were said to be “in heaven,” meaning, in God’s keeping. God is keeping a record of people’s deeds, and is thus said to be storing up either the reward, or the punishment, that the person deserves and will receive after the Day of Judgment when Jesus is reigning as king on the earth. It is understandable that Matthew 5:12 and other verses like it, which speak of rewards, treasures, or even a home in heaven, can be confusing and may lead one to believe that righteous people go to heaven when they die. These include verses such as Matthew 5:12 (“Great is your reward in heaven”), Matthew 6:20 (“store up for yourselves treasures in heaven”), Colossians 1:5 (“The hope that is stored up for you in heaven”) and 1 Peter 1:4 (“Kept in heaven for you”). However, Jesus was talking to Jews who knew (or should have known from the Old Testament scriptures) that they would inherit the earth when the Messiah sets up his kingdom on earth (see commentary on Matt. 5:5: “the meek will inherit the earth”). Therefore, the Jews understanding of these concepts would not be based on a literal use of the word heaven in the sense that these physical things, namely, rewards, treasures, and homes, were actually in heaven, but rather, that God, who is in heaven, is “storing” them or keeping record of them. The actual receipt of these things will occur in the future on earth.
God is keeping records of the behavior of each person, a fact that is clearly stated in the Old Testament.

- Malachi 3:16: Then those who feared the LORD talked with each other, and the LORD listened and heard. A scroll of remembrance was written in his presence concerning those who feared the LORD and honored his name.
- Ecclesiastes 12:14: For God will bring every deed into judgment, including every hidden thing, whether it is good or evil.

The “record books” of God are also mentioned in the book of Revelation. At the Judgment, “The books were opened” and “The dead were judged according to what they had done as recorded in the books” (Rev. 20:12).

Because the Old Testament said that God in heaven was recording people’s deeds, it was a common (and true!) concept in Judaism that people could add to that treasure by their good deeds.

“The notion of a heavenly treasure, beyond the reach of corruption, was a common eschatological concept in Judaism. The righteous on earth do not yet possess it, for it belongs to the future; nevertheless they can now add to it” (J. Emerton, C. Cranfield, and G. Stanton, The International Critical Commentary: Matthew).

“An important concept in Jewish and Christian theology is the belief that sins and virtues accumulate and are “stored” the way money might be stored in a treasury. The Lord was believed to keep records of every sin and virtue and require the books be balanced from time to time” (George Wesley Buchanan, The Anchor Bible: To the Hebrews; p. xxv).

The Jews in Christ’s audience knew that God was keeping track of their deeds with the intention of rewarding them. They will receive what is rightfully theirs when the Messiah returns and establishes his Kingdom on earth.

5:18. “not…will ever.” This phrase is constructed in the Greek by ou me, an intensified form of “no.” Literally, it is composed of two words for no, “no not.”

Matthew 5:18 is an interesting study in translation. The ESV says, “For truly, I say to you, until heaven and earth pass away, not an iota, not a dot, will pass from the Law until all is accomplished. But what are an “iota” and a “dot.” An “iota,” is the smallest letter in the Greek alphabet, and the “dot” is from the Greek keraia, which means “little horn.” Of course, Jesus was speaking Hebrew or Aramaic to his audience, and the King James Version picked up on that and brought the Greek into Hebrew, using “jot,” which is more properly “yod,” the tenth and smallest letter in the Hebrew alphabet, and titlle, which are the little horns or ornaments on nicely drawn letters in the Hebrew text. Most modern translators do not want to force their readers to know details of Greek or Hebrew, and so translate the phrase something such as, “not the smallest letter, not the least stroke of a pen,” as the NIV does. The point of what Jesus was saying was that nothing would pass from the Law until all was fulfilled.

5:21. Quoted from Exodus 20:13.

5:22. “I myself.” The addition of egō along with the first person singular verb, legeō (I say) is emphatic (BDAG). Jesus not only demonstrated his authority when he taught by doing signs and miracles, he taught with authority, i.e., he taught as one who had the authority to say what he was saying (cp. Matt. 7:29; Mark 1:29).
“Raca.” An insult, probably meaning “empty” with the idea of “empty-head” or “blockhead.”

“Gehenna” is Greek for the “Valley of Hinnom.” Gehenna is the Greek word that comes from the Hebrew words “ge,” meaning “valley,” and “Hinnom,” which was a man’s name. In the Old Testament, the valley is known both as the Valley of Hinnom (Neh. 11:30; some Hebrew texts of Josh. 15:8) and also as the “valley of the sons of Hinnom” (Josh. 18:16; 2 Kings 23:10; Jer. 7:31). It seems that Hinnom’s descendants eventually took over and controlled the valley, and thus “the valley of Hinnom” became “the valley of the sons of Hinnom.” The “Ge Hinnom,” the Valley of Hinnom, is first mentioned in the book of Joshua as part of the northern boundary of the tribal area assigned to Judah (Josh. 15:8). The “Ge Hinnom,” (“Valley of Hinnom”) was the valley immediately south of the city of Jerusalem. This geographical point is very important because the history of the Ge Hinnom is closely tied to Jerusalem.

In Old Testament times, the Valley of Hinnom became associated with pagan sacrifice and even child sacrifice. For example, Ahaz, king of Judah, offered his children as human sacrifices there (2 Chron. 28: 1-3). The prophet Jeremiah spoke out against these evils, and foretold that the Valley of Hinnom would be so full of buried bones that there would finally be no more room to bury anyone else (Jer. 7:31, 32). Although Jeremiah spoke of dead bodies and ashes being thrown there, he also mentioned that it would one day be clean, which will happen in the Millennial Reign of Christ (Jer. 31:40). The bones made the whole area a place to avoid, because if an Israelite touched a human bone, that person would be unclean for seven days (Num. 19:16). This could be a serious hindrance to worship, especially if someone came a long way to Jerusalem to worship but then became unclean and unable to worship for seven days because he or she accidentally touched a bone on the way into the city.

Because it was unclean, the Valley of Hinnom came to be used as the garbage dump by the people of Jerusalem. Of course this was very handy because, as anyone who has to take out the garbage knows, it is always nice if you can carry it downhill and not too far. The inhabitants of Jerusalem would just carry their garbage, including dead animals, bones and other waste, outside the south gate of the city (still to this day called “the dung gate”), down the hill and into the “Valley of Hinnom;” into Ge Hinnom. The waste that was dumped there was then either burned up in the fires that usually burned there, or it rotted away, being eaten by maggots and worms. The fire and maggots that continually consumed the garbage in the Valley of Hinnom is the reason Scripture says that after the Judgment, the fire will not be quenched, nor the worm die (Isa. 66:24; Mark 9:48). By the time of Christ, the Valley of Hinnom had been used for centuries by the inhabitants of Jerusalem as their local garbage dump.

When the Hebrew words, “Ge Hinnom” were translated into Greek in the Septuagint, the Greek translation of the Old Testament, the “Ge Hinnom” became the “pharagx Hennom,” because “pharagx” is the Greek word for “valley.” Then, by the time the New Testament was written, the Greek name for the valley had simply become “Gehenna.” The Greek word for “valley,” pharagx, dropped off and the Hebrew word for valley, “ge,” was brought directly from the Hebrew into the Greek even though it did not have a meaning in Greek. Of course, something got lost when that happened, and what got lost was that Gehenna was a real place and not some otherworldly fiery region.
Christ spoke in Aramaic or Hebrew, so his audience was never confused about the identity of the place he was talking about. Christ’s audience knew the Ge Hinnom very well, and a large percentage of them had probably thrown garbage there. They understood perfectly what Jesus was saying and the seriousness of his words: if someone purposely continues in flagrant sin, then at the judgment he would not be let into the kingdom, but like the garbage, would be thrown out and destroyed. These are hard words, but they are the truth, and Christ taught them.

Christ’s audience knew about the valley of Hinnom where the garbage was burned until it was gone, but they would have known nothing about a place where people are burned alive forever. The Old Testament certainly does not mention such a place. However, when Gehenna is translated “hell,” English readers are led to believe that when Christ spoke of Ge Hinnom he was speaking of a place of eternal torment. He was not. He was speaking of the simple concept that the wicked and unsaved will be destroyed. The wicked will, like the garbage, be totally consumed into nothingness. Their lives will end in every way—they will be annihilated.

The concept of “burning forever in hell” came into Christianity from the Greeks who believed in an “immortal soul.” It is important, however, to realize that the phrase “immortal soul” is not in the Bible. Eternal torment is not the teaching of Scripture. John 3:16, and many other verses, teach the simple truth that each person will either live forever or be destroyed and be totally gone (see commentary on Rev. 20:10).

Although many Christians believe that the unquenchable fire and worms that do not die refer to everlasting torment, that is not the case. No one in Christ’s audience thought the garbage thrown into Gehenna burned forever, they knew that the fire burned and the worms ate until the garbage was gone. The picture of Gehenna is one of the total destruction of the sinner. At the Judgment, sinners will be thrown into the lake of fire (Rev. 20:15), which Christ compared to the Valley of Hinnom (Gehenna). In the lake of fire sinners will burn until they are completely consumed. There will be no repentance accepted, and no restoration to life. The punishment is not for a specific time of repayment, as if the sinners were only in jail, after which they are restored to everlasting life. No, their death will be ultimate and final. The fire will not be “quenched,” it will burn until all the garbage is gone. The worms will not “die” and thus their work be interrupted, in Gehenna they eat until there is no more garbage to consume. Thus, the “punishment” of the sinners (not “punishing,” as if they were still alive) is eternal. The people whose bodies are burned in the Valley of Hinnom never receive eternal life. They die, and that punishment, their death, lasts forever.

5:26. “quadrans.” The Roman quadrans was the smallest Roman coin, and was worth ¼ of an assarion, which was 1/64 of a denarius. A denarius was a day’s wage for a common laborer, so if a laborer makes eight dollars an hour for eight hours, or sixty-four dollars a day, a quadrans was worth one dollar.

5:29. “cause you to fall.” We have gone with “cause you to fall” as a translation of skandalizō (σκανδαλίζω). “Offend you” misses the mark, because many people are not offended by sin, especially their own. You may or may not be offended by your own sin, but that is not the point of the verse. The idea is that if your hand causes you to fall away from obedience, then something has to be done. We felt that “cause you to stumble” was too weak, given that by definition stumble means “almost fall.” Christ is not saying that if your hand almost makes you fall, then cut it off, but rather if your hand causes you to fall into sin and disobedience, do what it takes to stop the situation from happening.

“cut it off.” This is the figure of speech Hyperbole (exaggeration; Cp. Bullinger; Figures of Speech Used in the Bible). The people of the Eastern culture often use hyperbole to make a point, even as we Westerners do. We say, “I’m starved,” when we mean we are hungry, or “I’m freezing” when we are uncomfortably cold. In the same way, people in the biblical culture overstated points to make a point. In this case, Christ was saying that people need to take drastic action to keep from sinning. This is a lesson we all need to learn: many people make peace with their sin rather than deal with it and stop sinning.

“Gehenna.” For information on Gehenna and that people do not burn forever, see commentary note on Matthew 5:22. [For information on annihilation in the lake of fire, see Appendix 5, “Annihilation in the Lake of Fire”.

5:30. “Gehenna.” See commentary on Matthew 5:22. [For information on annihilation in the lake of fire, see Appendix 5, “Annihilation in the Lake of Fire”].

5:32. “Sexual immorality.” The Greek is porneia, (πορνεία,) Porne (4202) is traditionally a female prostitute, while pornos (4205) is the masculine and in the Greek culture, especially early on, referred to a male prostitute. However, especially in the New Testament, the words were used in a more general sense, though they still retained some of the gender overtones.

5:33. Quoted from Leviticus 19:12; Numbers 30:2.

“Yahweh.” “Yahweh” is the personal name of God, and a rabbinic abbreviation for it appears in the Hebrew manuscript of Matthew as well as in the verses of the Old Testament that Matthew quoted. There is evidence that Matthew wrote a Gospel in Hebrew and used the name Yahweh, so we have put it in the REV (see commentary on Matthew 3:3).

5:37. “Wicked One.” The Greek is ponēros, which the BDAG Greek-English Lexicon describes as, “pertaining to being morally or socially worthless; therefore, ‘wicked, evil, bad, base, worthless, vicious, and degenerate.’” Ponēros is an adjective, but it is a substantive (an adjective used as a noun). A good example of a substantive in English is the adjectives in the well-known Clint Eastwood movie, “The Good, The Bad, and The Ugly.” The adjectives “good,” “bad,” and “ugly” refer to people (“good people,” “bad people,” “ugly people”), and thus they function as nouns even though they are adjectives. Similarly, “the wicked” here in Matthew 5:37 is a substantive and means, “the Wicked One,” which is the translation in most modern versions.

Other substantives in the Bible include: 1 John 5:19 where “the evil” also means “the evil one.”; Revelation 1:19, where “the Living” actually is “the Living One.”; Matthew 10:41, where “a righteous” actually refers to “a righteous one” (or someone righteous); Matthew 12:41, where “a greater” means “a greater one.”; Romans 8:28, where “called” refers to “the called ones” (although some versions translate “called” in that sentence as if it was a verb, which it is not); 1 Thessalonians 4:6, where “avenger” is “an avenging one.”

There are translators who do not believe that poneros is a substantive, but is only the word “evil.” However, evil does not just happen. The wording the Bible uses, that sin is “from” evil, points to a source. “Evil” is not just floating around, it comes from somewhere. It seems that if the Lord simply meant to say that swearing oaths by Jerusalem, or by your hair, was evil, he would have simply said, “it is evil,” and not, it “is from the evil.”

The Slanderer is the fount and foundation of wickedness. It was in him that wickedness was first found, when he was lifted up with pride and decided to rebel against God. Ever since that time he has been true to his name, “the Wicked One,” and has been doing and causing wickedness wherever he can, which, since he is “the god of this age,” is a considerable amount of wickedness. [For more names of the Slanderer (the Devil) and their meanings, see Appendix 14, “Names of the Slanderer”].

5:43. Quoted from Leviticus 19:18.
5:44. “Love your enemies and pray.” The word “love” is the verb agapaō (#25 ἀγαπάω; the more familiar noun is agape). In this context, to love one’s enemy does not mean to “feel good” about them, but rather to act toward them in a loving manner. To better understand what God is telling us when He says, “love your enemies,” see the commentary on John 21:15, “I am your friend.”

The phrases, “bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you,” which appears in the KJV, NKJV, and YLT, and partially in Darby’s NT, were not in the original text of Matthew. They were added by scribes who took them from Luke 6:27 and 28. The early manuscript evidence from the Alexandrian, pre-Caesarean, and Western text families as well as evidence from some of the Coptic and Syriac texts, along with the evidence that some manuscripts do not have both phrases, which shows that in some cases the scribe was comfortable adding only one of them, is conclusive evidence that these two phrases were not in the original text of Matthew (see B. Metzger, A Textual Commentary on the Greek New Testament).

6:1. “acts of righteousness.” This is the figure of speech, Metonymy (Cp. Bullinger; Figures of Speech Used in the Bible). The result, righteousness, is put instead of the action that produces it. A more literal rendition of the verse, without the figure, would read, “Take care that you do not do your acts of righteousness before men, to be seen by them...”

“you have.” The Greek is in the present tense, “you have,” and it is making the point that God is storing up rewards now, and will dispense them later.

“no reward laid up with your Father.” This is a very strong warning for people to watch the motives that drive their actions. If a person does good deeds, which normally would be rewarded by God in the future Paradise, but he only does them to impress people, when people are impressed that is his payment. God will not pay us for work we do not do for His glory. Instead of “from your Father,” the more natural meaning of the Greek preposition para, translated “with” in the REV, is “beside,” but that is not as clear as “with” is to the average reader. If we have the translation as “with,” or even more literally, “beside,” combined with the present tense of “having” a reward, then the translation is: “you have no reward laid up beside your Father.” The picture being painted by this verse is very biblical and very oriental: God is in heaven sitting on His throne, and he is watching what people are doing on earth and making up rewards and setting them beside Him so that He can give them out in the future. The biblical picture is that God makes the rewards as the people do the good deeds, He does not manufacture them in the future and distribute them at that time. Of course we learn from other verses, such as 2 John 1:8, that if we are not faithful, we can lose the rewards we have stored up for ourselves.

6:4. “repay you.” The word “openly,” which occurs in versions such as the King James, was added by scribes to some Greek texts, but it is not in the original text (See Metzger, Textual Commentary).

6:6. “inner room.” A room in the interior of the house. Calling it a “closet” misses the point, since most people think of closets as a place to store clothes. Jesus was saying to go into an inner room where no one would see, so your devotions could be private.

“repay you.” The word “openly” occurs in some versions but was added by scribes to some Greek texts. It was not in the original text (See commentary on Matthew 6:4).

6:7. “keep repeating the same phrases.” The Greek word is battologeō (βατταλογέω), and it means, use the same words again and again (BDAG), “to babble” in the sense of trying to achieve success in prayer by heaping up repetitions (Kittel, Theological Dictionary). Williams translates it as “keep on repeating set phrases.” That is what many religions do, repeat set prayers because “they think that they will be heard for their many words.”

6:9. “in the heavens.” Jesus would have been speaking Hebrew (possibly Aramaic), and in Hebrew, “heavens” is always plural. The Greek text accurately reflects Jesus words, and has heavens in the plural. It is always best to represent the idioms of the culture accurately if possible.

“may your name be treated as holy.” This is a reference to the coming kingdom when the people will “keep My name holy” (Isa. 29:23) and Cp. Ezekiel 36:23.

6:13. “Wicked One.” The Greek is poneros (πονηρός), which the BDAG Greek-English Lexicon describes as, “pertaining to being morally or socially worthless; therefore, ‘wicked, evil, bad, base, worthless, vicious, and degenerate.’”

Poneros is an adjective, but it is a substantive (an adjective used as a noun). A good example of a substantive in English is the adjectives in the well-known Clint Eastwood movie, “The Good, The Bad, and The Ugly.” The adjectives “good,” “bad,” and “ugly” refer to people (“good people,” “bad people,” “ugly people”), and thus they function as nouns even though they are adjectives.

The Slanderer is the fount and foundation of wickedness. It was in him that wickedness was first found, when he was lifted up with pride and decided to rebel against God. Ever since that time he has been true to his name, “the Wicked One,” and has been doing and causing wickedness wherever he can, which, since he is “the god of this age,” is a considerable amount of wickedness. [For more on substantives, see the commentary on Matthew 5:37]. [For more on the names of the Slanderer (the Devil) and their meanings, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer.”]

6:18. “openly.” The word “openly” was added by scribes to some Greek texts, but it is clearly not in the original (Cp. Metzger, Textual Commentary).

Matthew 6:22. “single.” The Greek word translated “single” is haplous (#573 ἅπλος), and means “single,” therefore “unmixed.” The key to this saying about the “single” eye and the “evil eye,” in this context of wealth, is to realize they are Semitic idioms. In this context the “single eye” is the generous eye, it is unmixed with worldly desires for wealth and possessions, and is therefore generous towards others. In contrast, the “evil eye,” is used idiomatically in the Semitic languages for a person who is greedy, covetous, and envious. Not content with what he has, he casts his eye upon the things that others have, and desires them. The well-known Semitic scholar John Lightfoot writes that the saying about the single and evil eye is “From a very usual manner of speech of the [Jewish] nation. For a good eye, to the Jews, is the same with a bountiful mind; and an evil eye is the same with a covetous mind.” (Commentary on the New Testament from the Talmud and Hebraica; Vol. 2, p. 156. Emphasis his).

Romans 12:8 says that the person who gives must give with “singleness” (haplotēs), again, idiomatically meaning “generously.” In James 1:5, the related word haplōs (simplicity, openness) is used idiomatically for “generously.”

It is easy to see how the words “good eye,” or “single eye,” became connected with generosity, and was used idiomatically for someone who was generous. The single eye was an eye that was unmixed with ulterior or selfish motives, and so the person was generous.

In Western cultures, the “evil eye” was a look or glance that meant harm and brought harm. Although this use of the “evil eye” may have existed in ancient Judaism, there is no reason to think it is used in Matthew or Luke. The Semitic idiom of the “good” or “single” eye being generous, and the “evil eye” being greedy, covetous, and stingy, holds true throughout the Bible. The “good eye” of Proverbs 22:9 is generous, and the “evil eye” of Deuteronomy 15:9; 28:54; Proverbs 23:6 and 28:22 refers to someone who is greedy and stingy.

Once we understand that the “single eye” is generous, and the “evil eye” is greedy and envious, we can see why Jesus used it in this context. Jesus starts in Matthew 6:19 talking about laying up treasures in heaven, not on earth, and to do that one must have a single eye and be generous, and not have an evil eye and be greedy. Then he explains that no one can have two masters: you cannot try to serve heaven and earth. You cannot effectively love both God and wealth. The dialogue develops from there: if you truly trying to serve God, then you cannot be worried about your earthly possessions. You must let go of your love for them and trust God to meet your needs.

Matthew 6:24. “two lords.” Matthew 6:24 has three difficult phrases, and to properly understand the verse we must understand its vocabulary and customs. Jesus told us plainly about what would happen if a person tried to serve two masters. One was that the person would love one master, and thus serve that one well, and “hate” the other, and thus not serve that one as well. It helps us make sense of the verse when we realize that in the Eastern mindset and vocabulary, “hate,” does not always mean “hate” as we generally use it today, in the sense of extreme hostility or intense dislike. Especially when used in contrast to “love,” in the biblical culture (both Hebrew and Greco-Roman) the word “hate” often means “love less.”

The second difficult phrase in the verse, in typical Eastern fashion of teaching, is an amplification and clarification of the first phrase. Jesus made sure we understood what he meant by saying that a person trying to serve two masters would “hold to the one, and despise the other.” As in the first phrase about love and hate, we must understand the biblical vocabulary to understand this phrase. The first phrase, translated “hold to” in the KJV, is cleared up for us in most modern versions, which read, “be devoted to” (HCSB; ESV; NET; NIV). However, the use of “despise” in both the KJV and many modern versions, is less clear and needs to be properly understood.

It is surprising that many modern versions continue to use the word “despise,” even though it gives most readers the wrong impression. The Greek word translated “despise” is καταφρονέω (Strong’s #2706 καταφρονέω), and it has a range of meaning that encompasses looking down on someone or something with contempt or aversion; considering something not important and thus disregarding it; and not caring about, or ignoring, someone or something. In defense of the modern version’s use of “despise,” it is true that one of the primary meanings of the English word “despise” is to look down on with contempt or to regard as worthless (this is even the first definition in Merriam-Webster’s Dictionary). However, the much more well-known use of “despise” is one of its other definitions: an intense dislike and even loathing.

Jesus was not saying a person would be devoted to one master while intensely disliking or loathing the other master. Jesus was making the simple statement that if a person had two masters, he would often be devoted to one and end up ignoring the other.

There are other uses of the Greek word καταφρονέω that are translated “despise” in many versions, which can give us the wrong impression of what the verse is saying. One is when Paul writes to Timothy and says, “Let no one despise you for your youth” (1 Tim. 4:12 ESV). No one would hate someone who was young; the better way to understand the verse is just like Matthew 6:24 about the two masters; Paul told Timothy not to let anyone ignore him just because he was young. Similarly, in many versions Hebrews 12:2 says that Jesus endured being crucified, “despising the shame.” It was indeed a shameful thing to be crucified, but Jesus did not “hate” it, he ignored it. In doing that he set a wonderful example for us to follow. Many times we will find that if we are to be a true follower of Jesus, we will have to ignore the shame and mistreatment we endure.

“Wealth.” The Greek is μαμμόνας (#3126 μαμμόνας). “Mammon” is an Aramaic term for wealth, property, or anything of value. “Mammon” was the Syrian god of riches. Thus, the idea is that you cannot serve both God and the idol of Wealth. In Luke 16:9, “mammon” is not compared to serving God, so simply “wealth” is a better translation there. Furthermore, “Wealth” is a better translation than “money.” There are Greek words that specifically mean “money,” and that would have been used in the verse if Jesus had meant only “money.” In contrast, “Mammon” refers to total “wealth,” including money, property, and possessions, any or all of which some people serve instead of God.

It should catch our attention that the Greek text does not say “wealth,” but rather retains the Aramaic term that is transliterated in the KJV as “Mammon.” The Young’s Literal Translation of the Bible has the right idea when it translates “Mammon” with a capital “M.” Jesus was speaking of “Mammon” as if it was a god. It was much easier to personify “Wealth” in the Greco-Roman world than it is today because the Greeks and Romans often personified concepts as gods and goddesses. For example, Abundantia was the divine personification of abundance and prosperity, Aequitas (Equity) was the divine personification of fairness, Bonus Eventus was the divine personification of “Good Outcome,” and Mors was the personification of death (the Greek personification of death was Thanatos). Thus, to a person living at the time of Christ, it was clear that Jesus was making a kind of play on words, and saying in a very graphic and clever way, “You cannot serve God and the ‘god of Possessions’” (wealth, things, stuff).

6:25. “life” (2x). The Greek word is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoc-kay'), and psuchē has a large number of meanings, often “soul” or “life.” Here it refers to the physical life of the body, which is why most versions translate it “life,” which is accurate in this context. [For a more complete explanation of psuchē, “soul,” see Appendix 7, “Usages of ‘Soul’”].

6:33. “seek.” The Greek word is zēteō (#2212 ζητέω), and it means to seek, to search for, to crave. It is present tense, active voice, imperative mood, which means it is a command that we should be continually doing. “Be seeking first the Kingdom of God!” Charles Williams’ translation reads, “But as your first duty, keep on looking for….” Sadly, people do not “keep seeking first” the Kingdom, but get distracted. Sinners ignore God, and can appear to be doing better (or having more fun) than those who are obeying God, so God admonishes us: “Let not your heart envy sinners, but continue in the fear of the LORD all the day” (Prov. 23:17 ESV).

7:1. “Do not judge.” The Greek word translated “judge” is krinō (#2919 κρίνω), and basically it means to make a selection, or express an opinion about something. It is used in many contexts, including meaning to separate, to select, to approve, to be of the opinion of, to determine, to judge, to rule, to contend together (of warriors and combatants), to dispute, or in a forensic sense to have a lawsuit with. So whether “judging” is a good thing or a bad thing, or even just a part of life, must be determined from the context in which the word is used. For example, in Romans 14:5, a person “judges” what days he considers special (we, for example, might judge Christmas Day to be a special day, but many people would not).

Here in Matthew 7:1, krinō means to pass an unjust judgment upon someone or something. Not just an unfavorable judgment, but an unjust judgment. There are times when an unfavorable judgment is a righteous judgment. For example, in this verse, “Do not judge so that you are not judged,” the last “judged” is the Final Judgment of God, and His judgment, even if it declares someone unrighteous, is a righteous judgment. God is not unrighteous for judging us, or even condemning the unrighteous.

Krino can also refer to judging that we do that is a righteous judgment. In fact, no one can live wisely without making judgments, and Christians are called to make correct judgments about others. If we do not make judgments about others, the Devil will take advantage of our weakness or indecisiveness and wreak havoc on the Church. In John 7:24, Jesus called upon us to “judge with righteous judgment.”

In 1 Corinthians 5:12, Paul told the Corinthians that it was their responsibility to judge other Christians. The Corinthians in Corinth had been blind and weak, too affected by the culture around them, which was very sexual. Corinth was a center of sexual profligacy in the Roman world, so much so that a common Latin slang term for a prostitute was a “Corinthian girl.” The Corinthians had allowed egregious adultery in their congregation—a man having sex with his father’s wife. Paul told them he had judged that person (1 Cor. 5:3), and they were to throw him out of the Church.

Other uses of “judge” in the NT that show it is something we have to do include: in Luke 7:43, Jesus praised Peter for making a correct judgment about what he was teaching, and in 12:57 he reproved the religious leaders for correctly judging the weather, but not making a correct judgment about the times of the Messiah in which they lived. In Acts 20:16 Paul made a judgment while traveling not to stop at Ephesus. We are to judge the things of this life (1 Cor. 6:3). We are to judge what we hear people say (1 Cor. 10:15).

In the wider context of living life, we can see that it is impossible to live wisely without making judgments. We make judgments about everything we do and everyone we are with all day long. The judgments we make are expressed in words such as “test,” and “determine.” In 2 Corinthians 13:5 we are to test ourselves; in 1 John 4:1 we are to test the spirits, and in 1 Thessalonians 5:21 we are to “test everything. Hold fast to that which is good.”

Considering the wide range of meaning of “judge,” and the fact that Christians are called upon to judge others in the Church to keep the congregation godly, it is amazing that the Adversary has been so effective at using the phrase, “Do not judge, so that you will not be judged,” to keep people from standing against evil. In the first place, the context of this verse is verse 2, that we will be judged by the same standard we use to judge. We should correctly judge others because we want God to correctly (and graciously) judge us. But what if we will not make any judgments against others? Can we “opt out” of judging? No, we cannot. Opting out of judging was what the people of Corinth were trying to do in 1 Corinthians 5. There was evil in their midst, but rather than make a difficult judgment, they allowed the evil. Christians must accept the fact that living wisely means making judgments, and all judgment against evil is difficult and distasteful; no one wants to do it, even though it has to be done. Was it a blessing for the people in Corinth to be able to go before God and say, “Even though there was sin in our church, at least we did not judge anyone.”? No, instead they were reproved by God for their lack of making the kind of difficult judgment that protected the Church—a judgment Paul ended up having to make for them.

When Christ said for us not to judge here in Matthew 7:1 and in Luke 6:37, we can tell from the context that he meant for us not to condemn others unrighteously, like the religious leaders around Jesus were doing when they judged (condemned) him for healing on the Sabbath or telling someone his sins were forgiven. As Christians, we not only have to judge just so we can function in day-to-day life, but God expects us to judge others so our lives, and the Church, are not destroyed by the Devil.

7:4. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἴδον), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

7:6. “dogs…pigs.” In this verse “dogs” and “pigs” represent those things that are most unclean and vile to the Jew. Although in some contexts, “dogs” represent Gentiles, that is not the case here, for even Jesus gave pearls of wisdom to Gentiles (Cp. the Samaritan woman in John 4, for example). Here they refer to those who are unclean and ungodly in their thoughts and lifestyle. Those who reject the pearls of love and blessings that are given to them will not only reject what was said to them, but often use what was said to them against the one who spoke to them. The verse is a lesson in that we have to use wisdom in what we say to whom. Proverbs 1:7 says, “The fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge, but fools despise wisdom and discipline.”

“pearls.” Pearls were very expensive in the ancient world, and very highly valued. [For more on pearls, see commentary on Revelation 18:12].

7:7. “keep asking.” The verb for “ask” in this verse is in the active voice, present tense, and imperative mood. The present tense in this case is what is known as a broadband present, or continuous present (Cp. Wallace, Greek Grammar, pg. 519-25). This form indicates a continual action that takes place over a long time, rather than a one-time-event. We are not to just ask once for the things we seek from God, but to repeatedly ask, as the widow kept asked the unjust judge (Luke 18:1-8). Wallace explains the present tense here in Matthew 7:7 this way: “The force of the present imperatives is ‘ask repeatedly, over and over again…seek repeatedly…knock continuously, over and over again’” (Wallace, Exegetical Syntax, 521). The imperative mood is the mood of command or of exhortation. Jesus is not just making a statement that we should ask, as if he thinks we can take it or leave it. He is making an impassioned plea, an earnest exhortation that believers ask for what they need.

One of the faults that Christians have is that they stop praying for things before they get an answer. Of course there are times when, during prayer, we learn that what we are praying for is not God’s will. In that case, of course we should stop. Also, there are times when we are praying that the circumstances change, such as if we are praying for a sick person to get healed but they die, which occasionally happens. In these cases, too, we should stop praying. But otherwise we need to be like the persistent widow in Luke 18 who keeps coming to the judge time after time. We need to pray and pray and pray. When Daniel wanted an answer from God about the revelation he received from God, he prayed for three weeks (Dan. 10:2) before he got an answer, and we do not know how much longer he would have prayed if an answer had not come to him when it did.

There are even some Christians who teach that is disrespectful of God, or shows a lack of trust (“faith”), if we pray more than one time for something. Their theology is that if you pray one time with trust, that is enough, and then just wait for the prayer to be answered. That sounds good and full of trust, but it is unbiblical. The Bible says keep praying, keep asking, and keep knocking. Cp. Luke 11:9, John 16:24, and commentary on 1 John 3:22.

7:13. “gate.” The Greek word translated “gate” is πύλη, (#4439 πύλη; pronounced poo'-lay), and it means “gate,” and is used just as we use the English word “gate,” usually referring to entering a city, yard, courtyard, or some other type of wide area like a park. In contrast, the Greek word θύρα (#2374 θύρα) is “door,” and usually referred to the door of a more enclosed or defined area, such as a house or a room. Thus Jesus called himself the “door” of the sheepfold (see commentary on John 10:1, “door”). The fact that it is a gate that leads to death and a gate that leads to life helps make the point that those are wide areas and can accommodate many people. Every person who has ever lived will enter either the wide gate to their death or the narrow gate to everlasting life.

In this teaching, the “road” and the “gate” are the figure of speech hypocatastasis (see commentary on Revelation 20:2). They illustrate in a way that is easy to understand that not many people will make the effort to live the lifestyle that will result in everlasting life, while lots of people will live an undisciplined life which results in everlasting death.

7:15. “destructive, greedy.” The Greek is harpax (#727 ἁρπαξ), an adjective, and it means, 1) vicious, ravenous, destructive, like a wild animal (Matt. 7:15) (2) violently greedy (Luke 18:11). When harpax is used substantively [when it is used as a noun], it means robber or swindler (1 Cor. 6:10) (Friberg’s Lexicon). Jesus, speaking of the false prophets, compared them to wolves, and used the adjective harpax, which means both destructive and greedy. Most versions chose one definition or the other so that the one word in the Greek text matches one word in the English translation, but we felt that the greedy and destructive nature of wolves and false prophets needed to be accurately represented in English. The one Greek word, harpax, carries both meanings, but two are necessary in the English translation. False prophets are very destructive, and greedy in that they never seem to be satisfied, pouring out their evil prophecies upon unsuspecting people.

7:21. “will enter into the Kingdom of Heaven.” The Kingdom of Heaven will be the kingdom that Jesus will set up on the earth after he comes down from heaven and fights the Battle of Armageddon [Rev. 19:1ff. See Appendix 3, “Christ’s Future Kingdom on Earth”]. People who get to enter the kingdom live forever, so in this context the phrase means having everlasting life and living in the kingdom, complete with all the kingdom blessings of perfect health, safety, no hunger, etc.

7:23. “Depart from me, you who work lawlessness.” This verse is written about people before the Day of Pentecost who acted as if they are walking with Christ and obeying God but were not. Today a Christian can turn from God and live lawlessly and selfishly without his everlasting life being in jeopardy, but before the Age of Grace that was not possible because there was no New Birth and no guarantee of salvation [For information on the permanence of salvation, see Appendix 1, “The Permanence of Christian Salvation”].

   It is very important that Christians understand this verse in Matthew, even though it was written to people who lived before the Administration of Grace. The general principle is that even if people do some good things or utilize the power of God, if their use of God’s power is outside the will of God such as being for their own aggrandizement or done without love, it is not pleasing to God. The phrase “depart from me” has to be taken in the context of verse 21, which speaks of entering into the Kingdom of Heaven and having everlasting life. Before the Day of Pentecost, those people who were not faithful to God will have to depart from Christ and will not receive everlasting life.

   We should ask the question, “When can we use the power of God and be outside the will of God?” The abilities, talents, and ministries that people have are given to them by God. In contrast to our God-given talents, which we naturally possess, is godly character, which takes a lot of effort to develop. Developing godly qualities such as the fruit of the spirit (Gal. 5:22, 23) or the character that leaders are supposed to have (1 Tim. 3:3-12; Titus 1:6-9) is hard work. In the systems of the world that Satan sets up or oversees, talent is more valuable than character. If a person is a good singer and can pack an auditorium, the fact that he or she is a drunkard, sexually immoral, mean-spirited, etc., gets overlooked by the world. This attitude must never be allowed to leak over into the way believers do things.

   Every believer has God-given talents. There are believers who are great singers, administrators, teachers, businesspeople, etc., but their talent and their success are never as important as whether or not they exhibit the character of Christ. That was the case in this section of Matthew. Jesus teaches us that at the Judgment men and women with ministries and abilities in prophecy, working miracles and discerning of spirits will come forward, proud of their “great accomplishments.” However, if these people did not develop the character of Christ and did not walk in obedience to God, then they “did their own thing,” and thus they are said to “work lawlessness,” i.e., do things in a way that does not follow the ways and laws of God. This is made clear by the last phrase in verse 21, which makes the point that these people did not do the will of God.

We must not be confused by the fact that the people Jesus was referring to here in Matthew had holy spirit and were casting out demons, and think because of that this was a reference to people who were born again, like Christians are today. The New Birth that we Christians have started on the Day of Pentecost, but God had given the gift of holy spirit to many people in the Old Testament. Many leaders of Israel had it (cp. Num. 11:17, 25), the prophets, the judges in the book of Judges, many kings like David and Solomon, and others, had the gift of holy spirit upon them.

“lawlessness.” The Greek word is anomia (#458 ἀνοµία), literally, “a,” without, and “nomos,” law, therefore “lawless, contempt for and violation of, the law (lawlessness can also be due to ignorance of the law). Although some English versions have “iniquity” (KJV), “evildoers” (NIV), or “you people who do wrong” (CEB), those translations are not as accurate as “lawlessness.” Usually casting out demons is a good thing, but these people were doing it “lawlessly,” meaning they were doing it outside the law of God, and therefore for their own purposes and self-aggrandizement, not for the furthering the Kingdom of God. Many people use the power of God to further their own cause, not God's cause. It has been said, “The gifts and talents we have are God's gift to us; the way we use them is our gift to God.” The people in Matthew 7 were not being faithful to God in their use of His power; they were being selfish and unloving. So Christ said he did not know them.

7:24. “will be like.” The Greek is homoioo (#3666 ὁμοιόω). The verb is in the future tense, passive voice, so “will be like” is a good translation. The future tense, “will be like,” is important here, although some English versions ignore it and say “is like.” The context is the future, i.e., Judgment Day (v. 21, 23). Today people who build their lives on “sand” may be rich and powerful, but deny and defy God and His laws. They are building on sand, but do not appear to be doing that as far as the world is concerned. Nevertheless, on Judgment Day, they “will be like” people who built on sand—their life’s work will be demolished and they will be destroyed. In a similar way, many people who are actually “wise” today seem foolish to the world; indeed, many people even lose their lives because of Christ. The true wisdom of these people will not be revealed until the Day of Judgment, when the words that Jesus spoke, that the one who will lose his life for Jesus will find his life (Matt. 10:39), will be seen to be true.

7:25. “beat violently upon.” In this parable Jesus shows the importance of a person building his “house,” his life, on a firm foundation. One of the important changes that is missed in many versions is that the wind did not just “beat upon” both houses (KJV), or “beat against” both houses (NIV). The Greek words are different. The Greek word we translate as “beat violently upon” is prospiptō (#4363 προσπίπτω) and its meaning in this context is to rush against, to move with force against. In contrast, the word “beat upon” in verse 27 is proskoptō (#4350 πρόσκοπτω) and it means to beat on in a violent manner, bruise, cause to stumble. It is clear that the way these two verbs are juxtaposed in this parable that the second one, proskoptō, has less force than the first. Lenski addresses this well: "[Proskoptō] is the weaker verb, “to stumble against,” “to strike the foot against,” while...[prospiptō] means “to fall upon suddenly,” “to strike.” The idea suggested is that the house on the rock withstood all the pounding of the winds and the waters while the house on the sand gave way as soon as the tempest stumbled against its foundation" (Matthew; p. 313).

Chapter 8

8:2. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

“want to.” The Greek is thelō (2309 θέλω), which means to want or to desire, or to have a willingness. However, when it comes to healing and miracles, someone usually has to be more than just “willing,” he must really want it. Similarly, the one doing the miracle must be more than just “willing,” he must want the miracle to occur. The force of Jesus’ energy and desire comes out in the way he says, “Be clean,” which is in the imperative mood in Greek (the mood of command), and which we translate with an exclamation point to alert the reader to that fact.

8:16. “by his word.” For people who have been involved in deliverance ministry, this seems so natural that it can escape our notice. We think, “Of course he cast out demons by his word, how else would he do it?” We have to remember that in the cultures of the biblical world, if there was deliverance from demons at all it usually involved complicated exorcism ceremonies. In stark contrast to those involved ceremonies, all Jesus did was command the demon to go and it left the person.

8:17. Quoted from Isaiah 53:4.

8:22. “leave the dead to bury their own dead.” This seems terribly harsh until we realize how the Eastern people live and understand it in its social context. The man’s father was not dead, and how long he might live—days, weeks, months, or even years—is not part of the context. In ancient Israel, people were buried the same day they died, and if someone was traveling he could easily miss the funeral. This man expressed an interest in following Jesus, but wanted it to be convenient, when all his family affairs were concluded and his responsibility to be at his father’s funeral was over. Jesus, in saying what he did, shows us that following him will not always be tidy and convenient, but that we will have to make sacrifices. Just as Jesus made a choice between his family and his followers (cp. Mark 3:31-34), he asks us to do the same (cp. Luke 14:26). If his father loved this son, he would understand that following Jesus was a call of God and came with the risk of him not being present when the father died.

8:24. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

8:26. “subdued.” The Greek word translated “subdued” is epitimaō (#2008 ἐπιτιμάω). Usually epitimaō means to express strong disapproval of someone: rebuke, reprove, censure; or to speak seriously, and thus warn in order to prevent or end an action. It can also mean “punish” (cp. BDAG Lexicon).
In this context, epitimaō has a technical meaning: it is used in Greek religion of gaining control over a spirit, a demon. Robert Guelich (Word Biblical Commentary: Mark) epitimaō can mean “a commanding word uttered by God or by his spokesman, by which evil powers are brought into submission.” Jesus subdued the storm, which was no doubt caused by a demon, by the power of God that he wielded, which he expressed in words. The power came from God and was used by Jesus. Jesus did not gain control over the storm by some “magic words” or formula that he used. “It is not a magical incantation...it is powerful Word of the Son” (Gerhard Kittle, Theological Dictionary, ἐπιτιµάω Vol. 2, p. 626). This storm on the Sea of Galilee is recorded in Matthew, Mark 4:35-41, and Luke 8:22-25, and in every record, epitimaō is used. [For more on epitimaō, and Jesus’ use of the power of God, see the commentary on Mark 1:25.]

8:29. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

“What do we have in common with you?” The literal Greek is, “What is there to us and to you?” This is a Greek idiom, and its meaning is somewhat flexible, depending on the context in which it is used. Here, the essence is, “What do I have in common with you?” (Wuest, Word Studies; Vincent’s Word Studies). The message is “Leave me alone” (Lenski). However, the phrase is also used when Jesus was speaking to his mother about changing water to wine, and there the essence is more, “What is that to me and to you?” (see commentary note on John 2:4). This phrase is spoken by demons 5 times in the Four Gospels, but two are in the singular, as here, and three are in the plural. This is important and gives us a peek into how demons work. In this record in Matthew, while there are many demons in these men, Matthew has more than one speaking, while Mark and Luke are singular, as if only one demon was speaking. Thus, one is in charge, but others are chiming in.

The Word of God records several incidences of demons speaking to Jesus: In the Synagogue: Mark 1:24, Luke 4:34 (τί ἡμῖν καί σοι [both plural]); from the tombs: Matthew 8:29 (τί ἡμῖν καί σοί [plural]); and Mark 5:7, Luke 8:28 (τί ἐμοὶ καί σοί [singular]).

The slight difference in the Greek words in the record of the tombs shows that in the record of the tombs there was one demon who was the main speaker, but also that the demons spoke as a group. The Greek word hemin (ἡμῖν) is plural, “we,” while emoi (ἐμοί) is singular, “I.”

“before the time.” The Devil and the demons know that there is a time coming when they will be tormented in Gehenna and eventually destroyed. They understand God’s retributive justice, and they understand the meaning of the Flood, which was the destruction of the ungodly (2 Pet. 2:5); and the meaning of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, which was also an example of the destruction of the ungodly (Jude 1:7). They know they will be bound, tormented, then destroyed (Dan. 7:12; Matt. 25:41; Rev. 20:10). They knew, however, that the Messiah was to have his heel bruised before he bruised the head of the Serpent (Gen. 3:15), and so they asked if he had come to torment them before the proper time. There were demons who had caused the Nephilim (Gen. 6:4) during the days of Noah that led to the hardening of the human race and its eventual destruction. Genesis 6:5 describes how great mankind’s wickedness had become in the days of Noah by saying that “every inclination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil all the time.” The demons who caused that hardening were now imprisoned in Tartarus, “gloomy dungeons,” awaiting the Judgment (1 Pet. 3:19, 20; 2 Pet. 2:4). Although not the Gehenna, Tartarus must be very unpleasant, to say the least. These demons thought Jesus might send them to Tartarus too, so they asked if he had come to torment them before “the time,” i.e., their being bound in the Abyss (Rev. 20:1-3) and then eventually thrown into Gehenna (Rev. 20:10).

8:32. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

8:34. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

Chapter 9

9:1. “his own city.” Capernaum. Jesus moved to Capernaum after the people of his hometown, Nazareth, tried to kill him (Luke 4:29-31; cp. Matt. 4:13). Jesus either bought or rented a house in Capernaum, because John 2:12 indicates he even moved his family there (John 2:12). As we see in this verse, Capernaum became known as Jesus’ “own city.” One of the reasons Jesus likely picked to move to Capernaum was that it was on the Via Maris, the Road of the Sea, which was the great trade route from Egypt in the south to Damascus in Syria and on to Mesopotamia (see commentary on Matt. 4:15). [For more about Capernaum being Jesus’ hometown, see commentary on Mark 2:1].

9:3. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

“speaks defaming words.” The religious leaders thought that by forgiving sins, Jesus was harming the reputation of God, who was alone thought to be able to forgive sins [For more on forgiving sins, see commentary on Mark 2:7].

Matthew 9:3 is the first use of the thirty-four uses of Greek verb blasphēmeō (#987 βλασφημέω; pronounced blas-fay-meh'-ō). The noun form of the word is blasphēmia (#988 βλασφημία; pronounced blas-fay-me'-ah), which occurs eighteen times. Both blasphēmeō and blasphēmia are transliterated (not translated) from the Greek into English as “blasphemy.” There is a problem with that, however, because “blasphemy” in English has a different meaning than blasphēmeō and blasphēmia do in Greek. In English, “blasphemy” is only used in reference to God. It is insulting God or a god, insulting something considered sacred (like defacing a cross or statue of Jesus), or claiming to be God or a god in some way. The BDAG Greek-English Lexicon correctly says that the English word blasphemy “has to some extent in English gone its own emotive way semantically and has in effect become a religious technical term, which is not the case with βλασφημέω.”

In Greek, blasphēmeō and blasphēmia did not have to refer to God or a god, but were common words that were used of someone speaking against another. The primary meaning of blasphēmeō and blasphēmia as they were used in the Greek culture was showing disrespect to a person or deity, and/or harming his, her, or its reputation. In the honor/shame society of the biblical world, that was even more heinous an act that we would think of it today, because honor and reputation were at the very core of societal status and were the basis of all social interaction. Perhaps a good comparable analogy is how horrible “losing face” is in the Asian society, which is an honor/shame society.

For the definition of blasphēmia, the Greek-English Lexicon by Louw and Nida says: “to speak against someone in such a way as to harm or injure his or her reputation (occurring in relation to persons as well as to divine beings) — ‘to revile, to defame, to blaspheme, reviling.’” The BDAG Greek-English Lexicon has: “speech that denigrates or defames,” hence “reviling, denigration, disrespect, slander.” Thayer’s Greek-English Lexicon defines blasphēmia as, “speech injurious to another's good name” and lists railing, reviling, and slander, as some of the definitions. Thayer also points out that not only is “blasphemy” a loan word into English, but it is in Latin also, and is “blasphēmia” in the Latin Vulgate.

Blasphēmeō and blasphēmia are used in the Bible of blasphemous speech towards God (e.g., Rom. 2:24; Rev. 13:6), but also it is often used of people; for instance, in Titus 3:2, we are commanded not to speak in this way towards anyone. Other examples of blasphemy against humans can be found in Acts 18:6; Romans 3:8; 1 Peter 4:4; and Revelation 2:9. Besides God and humans, the Bible also refers to “blasphemous” speech towards angelic beings (2 Pet. 2:10-12; Jude 8-10; Rev. 13:6). Lastly, it is also possible to blaspheme against impersonal things, such as the Word of God (Titus 2:5), or the Way of Truth (2 Pet. 2:2).

Given that the essence of blasphēmeō and blasphēmia is speaking words that injure or harm the reputation of another, we felt that “defame” was generally the best definition of those words, although sometimes “insult” seemed to be a better fit, or “injurious speech,” which is not outside the general meaning and semantic range of the Greek word. Many English versions use the word “blasphemy” when the context is about God but then change it to “insult” or “slander” when the context is people, but we felt that did nothing to clarify the fact that the Greeks and Romans used blasphēmeō and blasphēmia of God, people, and things.

9:5. “Which is easier?” Which is easier to say and accomplish, declaring someone’s sins are forgiven, or divine healing? They are equally easy. See commentary on Luke 5:23.

9:8. “authority given to men.” Some of the teachers of the Law could not believe that a man could forgive sins. In a parallel account recorded in Mark they claim, “He is blaspheming! Who can forgive sins but God alone?” [For more on the authority to forgive sin, see commentary on Mark 2:7].

9:10. “the house.” Luke 5:29 makes it clear that it is Matthew’s house (called Levi in Mark 2:13-17, and Luke 5:27-30). Matthew was a tax collector, and so it makes sense that his friends were tax collectors and “sinners,” which is why so many people like that were at the dinner. This is a very good model of how to spread the gospel. Matthew became a follower of Jesus, and instead of starting to spread the Gospel by speaking with strangers, started by inviting his friends to a huge dinner and making sure Jesus was there to speak with them.

9:15. “and then they will fast.” People fasted for different reasons, but often for a disaster or difficult situation, and to get God’s help with it, or to procure the favor of God. Jesus’ presence in and of itself brought “the acceptable year of the Lord” (Luke
4:19), and the grace and favor of his Father was upon him (Luke 2:40, 52; 4:19; John 1:14). This combined with the short duration of Jesus’ ministry on earth (likely just over a year; not the three years many people believe) in which he ate and drank with sinners, made physical fasting not the right choice. His disciples would fast after he left them.

9:16. “no one puts.” This is an expansion of what Jesus had said about fasting in verse 15. What Jesus was doing was so new and different that the “old system” of doing things would no longer be adequate. Jesus spoke of the “new commandment” he brought (John 13:34), but the truth is that he brought new light in many, many ways. Things like his approach to the Law, “you have heard it said…but I say to you” in his Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:21, 22, 27, 28, 31-34, 38, 39, 43, 44), or his way of dealing with sinners by being close to them, or his way of relating to women, were all new. The old way of doing things that was overseen by the likes of the Pharisees and Sadducees could not be just patched, it needed to be newly made.

9:17. “Neither do people put.” This is an expansion of what Jesus taught in verses 15 and 16 (see commentary there). Old wineskins get stiff and inflexible, and so when the new wine ferments and expands, the old skin cannot expand with it like a new wineskin can, and so it bursts. Occasionally the pressure of fermentation is so great that even sometimes our modern glass bottles burst if wine is incorrectly or prematurely bottled. The understanding and way of doing things that Jesus was bringing to Judaism was “new wine” that could not be put in the “old wineskins” of the religious understanding of the Law and Prophets that was held by the religious leaders of his time. They, and the generations before them, had so thoroughly perverted the true meaning of the Law that they had become “blind guides” (Matt. 15:14). Jesus said that if you put the new wine (the new commandments and the new understanding of the Law that Jesus brought) and put it in the “old wineskins,” they would burst. Indeed, that is exactly what happened. His death and resurrection fulfilled the Law in such a way that the Law, if it was alone and apart from the risen Messiah it pointed to, was considered a veil that blinded the eyes of the heart (2 Cor. 3:15-17).

9:18. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

“bowed down before.” The synagogue leader did not think Jesus was God and likely did not even believe he was the Messiah, but rather was paying him homage, as he would to a superior, or to a prophet of God. See commentary on Matthew 2:2.

9:20. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

9:28. “And after he had come into the house…” The blind men cried out to him as he was walking, but he ignored them until he got inside the house he was going to, leaving them to follow him as best they could, given their blind condition. This would be considered very unchristian behavior today, and be called “unloving,” and other such things. Nevertheless, Jesus did it, and it was to crystallize their trust (“faith”). They did not give up on asking him for healing, an act of trust.

9:30. “See here.” The Greek verb is horaō (#3708 ὁράω), and it means to see with the physical eye, or to see with the mental eye. It is a play on words, because Jesus just gave sight to these two blind men, then told them to “see” (“make sure;” “be careful”) that no one knew about them getting their sight. Both the verb horāō, and the verb for “know” are in the imperative mood, and are stern commands, hence the exclamation point at the end of the sentence. Interestingly, in spite of Jesus’ stern command, the men who received their sight spread the news about him. This was likely due to a number of factors. In the honor-shame society of the biblical world, if someone did something great for you, it was socially expected that you would laud the person and thus increase his honor in society. Added to that was their obvious elation about being healed. The two things combined made it impossible for them to hide what had happened, and they freely spoke about it.

9:32. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

9:34. “By the prince of the demons he casts out demons.” Pure spiritual arrogance. They had no evidence except their displeasure.

9:38. “implore.” Implore = deomai (1189 δέομαι). (See R. Trench, Synonymes). Deomai is a specific request, not a general prayer. It is a petition.

10:10. “nor two tunics, nor sandals, nor staff.” This phrase catches our attention because, although it agrees with the Gospel of Luke (Luke 9:3), it seems to contradict what Jesus told his disciples according to the Gospel of Mark (Mark 6:8, 9). A quick reading of Matthew and Luke, makes it seem like in those Gospels Jesus told his disciples to take no staff, while in Mark, Jesus told them to take a staff. Also, in Mark, Jesus told the disciples to “tie on” sandals (Greek text), that is, wear them, but in Matthew, Jesus seemingly says to not take sandals (Luke says nothing about sandals). How do we resolve this problem?

Mark gives the essentials of the record, which make perfect sense in the culture: the disciples were to rely on help from people they met for their food and protection from the elements (hence, no need for money, food, or two tunics, which might be needed if they were going to sleep outdoors). However, they would need sandals if for no other reason than any extended journey that involved walking in unfamiliar territory and in cities would require sandals. But they would not need two pairs of sandals, and in Matthew the word “two” before “tunics,” immediately before “sandals” in the list must also refer to sandals, which is also plural, like “tunics.” Of course, “sandals” is always plural, but since the Gospel of Mark says take “sandals” and Matthew says not to, the most obvious way to explain the situation is that Jesus was saying not to take two pairs of sandals—if anything happened to the one pair, they would be helped to get another pair by people who were caring for them.

Like sandals, a staff was a necessity when traveling. It provided protection and support, so it makes perfect sense that Jesus would say to take the staff along, as the Gospel of Mark says. However, Matthew and Luke seem to say not to take a staff. Two ways to explain the apparent contradiction seem to be the most likely. One is that the word “two” in Matthew also governs the word staff, and that Jesus told the Apostles not to take two staffs, as if they might break or lose one. Although that is possible, it is not... easy to make Luke read that way, and the chances of losing or breaking a staff are slim. Furthermore, if one was lost or broken, a new one could be acquired the same way new sandals could be.

The more likely explanation for the difference Matthew and Luke have with the Gospel of Mark is that the list in Matthew starts with the word “acquire,” (ktoumai; #2932 κτάομαι), which the KJV translates “provide,” the ESV “acquire.” However, there are many versions which open Matthew 10:9 with “take” or “take along,” which clouds the issue and makes the apparent contradiction between Matthew and Mark very difficult indeed. Jesus was telling his disciples not to “acquire” things for their journey (which they would then “take” with them, as Mark and Luke say). One of the things that the Apostles might want to “acquire” would be a walking stick that was more appropriate for someone who traveled a lot than the walking sticks they already owned, but as fishermen or men who mostly stayed in their local area, likely did not use much.

In summary, Jesus told the Apostles not to take with them things that a host family would provide: money, food, and shelter. However, they did need their sandals and walking stick. However, they were to guard against acquiring things they thought they might need, such as a new walking stick. If it turned out on the journey that something was needed, the same people who welcomed them in would no doubt provide it or help them acquire it, and be glad to do so.

10:13. “let your peace come upon it.” This is an idiom. If a person was worthy, the guest would bless the house, and that blessing would involve “shalom,” translated “peace” but really meaning “total well-being.” If the Apostles were well received and well treated, they were to bless the house with shalom. Jesus instructed his disciples to let their shalom fall on those who graciously took care of them.

10:16. “Take notice!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

10:25. “Beelzebul.” The Greek is Beelzeboul (#954 Βεελζεβούλ), which gets put into English as “Beelzebul.” He is called the “prince of demons” in Luke 12:10. “Beelzeboul” is “lord of the dunghill.” This comes from the Hebrew zebul (dung, a dunghill). [For more on the name Beelzebul and other names of the Slanderer (the Devil), see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”].

10:28. “destroy...soul.” The Greek word translated “destroy” is apollumi (#622 ἀπόλλυμι). Apollumi means “to cause or experience destruction” (BDAG). The concept of “burning forever in hell” came into Christianity from the Greeks (and Jews like the Pharisees who were influenced by Greek teaching going back to the time of Alexander the Great who conquered Palestine in 333 BC). The Greeks believed in an “immortal soul.” The phrase “immortal soul” is not in the Bible. Once we understand the soul is not eternal, it does not have to “go” to heaven or hell when a person dies. Eternal torment is not the teaching of Scripture, John 3:16, and many other verses, teach the simple truth that each person will either live forever or be destroyed, annihilated. [For information on “Gehenna” see commentary on Matthew 5:22. For information on annihilation in the lake of fire, see Appendix 5, “Annihilation in the Lake of Fire.” For more information on the soul, see Appendix 7: “Usesages of ‘Soul’”).

10:29. “assarion.” The Roman as or the Greek assarion (#787 ἀσσάριον). It was worth 1/16 of a denarius (or drachma), which was a day’s wage for a day laborer or soldier. If a day laborer makes $8 per hour, or $64 per day, then an assarion would be worth about $4.

“apart from your father.” This phrase means “apart from your Father’s knowledge and care.” The phrase contains the figure of speech ellipsis (Cp. Bullinger; Figures of Speech Used in the Bible); it is constructed in the Greek by the preposition aneu (#427 ἄνευ), which means “without” or “apart from,” and then the words for “your father” (patros humôn) functioning as the genitive of possession—the object of the father’s possession is elided. Literally, it would read, “apart from of your father,” with the involvement on God’s part omitted for emphasis. We have left the figure of speech in the translation, rather than supply the omitted word.

Many commentators who are zealous to bolster the position of divine sovereignty (that God is in control of everything that happens), have interpreted this verse to mean God has a specific will for the death of even every sparrow (cp. NIV, NET), and also that no sparrow can fall without God’s will and consent (cp. HCSB, CJB). But this is importing meaning into the text, because it goes beyond what the text says. The Greek simply reads “without your Father” (“without” is the Greek word aneu, #427 ἄνευ), which leaves open exactly how the Father is connected with the sparrow. Without His will (NET)? Without His consent (HCSB)? Without His knowledge (NAB, NLT)? Without His care (TNIV)? The text does not precisely tell us “without what,” which is why there are so many variations between the translations. The Greek text simply leaves the impression that the Father is present and caring in his relation to the bird.

To understand this passage properly we must interpret it in light of clear meaning that is given to us from other scriptures. As Louw and Nida (Greek-English Lexicon) write, “The particular manner or mode of involvement by God must depend upon the broader context and not upon the meaning of ἄνευ.” In this case we have a parallel account in Luke 12:6 that helps us understand what Jesus meant. In the account in Luke, Jesus does fill out the meaning for us, saying, “not one of them [sparrows] is forgotten before God.” The Greek word translated “forgotten” is epilanthanomai (#1950 ἐπιλανθάνομαι), which can have the meaning of “neglect,” “overlook,” or “care nothing about” (BDAG). More evidence that this verse is about care and concern rather than “God’s will” is supplied by the next verse in Matthew, which declares that, “the hairs of your head have been counted,” i.e. God knows how many there are. The verse about our hair is not about the will of God, as if it was somehow God’s will every time a hair of our head fell out, but rather it is about God’s love and concern for us.

Matthew 10:29 is not speaking of divine sovereignty, but rather divine benevolence and care. From reading Matthew in the greater context of the parallel account, then, we see that this passage teaches that God knows and cares even about sparrows. He has not forgotten about the sparrow, and its fall is not something overlooked or uncared for.

What a comfort this is, that God would have such care even for sparrows, and emphasizes how much He must care for us! What a greater comfort this biblical teaching is than the idea that no sparrow falls without God’s specific will and consent. If not even one sparrow can die without the will and consent of God, how are we to understand a cat torturing and killing a sparrow? Is that the will of a loving God? And if God wills that, does He really care if we are hurting? On the other hand, if the fallen state of the world is due to Adam and Eve’s freewill decision and sin, and if the world is now under the control of Satan (1 John 5:19), and God is fighting for us in all situations (Rom. 8:28 REV; NIV), then it is a comfort to know that even though God cannot simply stop pain and problems, He knows and cares what is going on and is willing to bless and help as He can, without overstepping things such as people’s freewill decisions.

We conclude along with Robertson (Word Pictures in the New Testament), “There is comfort in this thought for us all. Our father who knows about the sparrows knows and cares about us.”

10:32. “will confess.” The verb is in the future tense and the context is people who testify of Jesus will be dragged before the authorities and interrogated and beaten (cp. 10:16-20). Those will be difficult times. People who continue to confess Christ as Lord will be tortured, imprisoned, and even killed. There will be great temptation to simply deny the Lord to be set free, but Jesus warns us to continue to confess him in those difficult times, and if we do, he will confess us before the Father.

10:37. “is attached to.” The Greek is phileō (#5368 φιλέω). (See commentary on John 21:15).

10:39. “life” (2x). The Greek word is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoo-kay’), and psuchē has a large number of meanings, often “soul” or “life.” Here it refers to the physical life of the body, which is why most versions translate it “life,” which is accurate in this context. [For a more complete explanation of psuchē, “soul,” see Appendix 7, “Usages of ‘Soul’”].

10:41. “a righteous person.” The Greek word dikaios (#1342 δίκαιος) is an adjective, and in this case is a substantive, an adjective used as a noun, “a righteous” referring to a “righteous person.” Using the substantive instead of just supplying the noun and saying “righteous person,” places the emphasis on “righteous.” If we want the reward of the righteous, we must receive “the righteous.”

“reward.” The Greek is misthos (#3408 μισθός), and it refers to a payment made for work done; wages. As “wages” or “payment,” it can refer to either a reward (cp. Matt. 5:12; 10:41; Luke 6:35; 1 Cor. 3:14) or a punishment (2 Pet. 2:13), depending on the context and what kind of payment is due. In the future Millennial Kingdom, when Jesus Christ rules as king on the earth, people will be repaid for what they have done (see commentary on 2 Cor. 5:10, “good or worthless”). Some people might think they have done very little to support God’s work, but if anyone has helped accomplish God’s work on earth, he will be amply rewarded.

11:3. “should we be looking for a different one.” John the Baptist sent his disciples to Christ with the question, “Are you the Coming One, or should we be looking for a different one?” (Matthew 3:11; Luke 7:19). The question is problematic because John was the one who identified Christ with the words: “Look, the lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world,” and “I have seen and I testify that this is the Son of God” (John 1:29, 34). Had John developed doubts that Jesus was the Messiah? Considering that a number of people close to Jesus, including his mother Mary and Peter, misunderstood him, that is possible, but we think not as likely as the other two possibilities stated below. Another reason for John’s question is given by Joseph Good in his book, Rosh HaShanah and the Messianic Kingdom to Come (Hatikva Ministries, P.O. Box 3125, Port Arthur, TX, 1989, p. 2). Good writes:

As the ancient Jewish scholars and Rabbis began to study the scriptural information about the Messiah, they encountered a serious problem: many of the passages seemed to contradict one another. Often the Messiah is seen as a conquering king…Other passages speak of a suffering servant. From this paradoxical description of the Messiah came a first-century Common Era (AD) rabbinical teaching of two Messiahs. Good goes on to say that the ancients called the conquering Messiah “Messiah Ben David,” and called the suffering Messiah “Messiah Ben Joseph.” The Talmud applied Zechariah 12:10, which says, “They will look on me, the one they have pierced, and they will mourn for him as one mourns for an only child,” to Messiah Ben Joseph (Edersheim, The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, book 2, p. 736). However, Edersheim writes that even on that point the Jewish rabbis were divided, some saying the mourning is caused by the death of the Messiah Ben Joseph, while others said it was due to evil concupiscence.

Good goes on to conclude:

This anticipation of two Messiahs by the Jewish people of the first century is the background for the question posed by Yochanan the Immerser (John the Baptist) to Yeshua [Jesus] as to whether He was the Messiah (indicating one, singular), or if they were to expect another. His question was specifically whether Yeshua would fulfill all of the prophecies concerning Messiah, or whether the Rabbis, who said there would be two Messiahs, were right. Yeshua’s answer is a paraphrase of various passages that Rabbis identified as referring partially to Messiah Ben Joseph and partially to Messiah Ben David. Therefore, Yeshua was expressing, in dramatic language that was clear to His listeners, that He would fulfill all of the messianic prophecies. Rather than send two Messiahs with two different roles, G-d would send one Messiah in two separate appearances or comings (Good, Rosh HaShanah, p. 5).

It is also possible that John was not confused about who Jesus was, but his disciples had doubts, and John, fairly certain that he was about to die, wanted his disciples to hear for themselves who Jesus was, so they would follow him when John was no longer alive.

“a different one.” The Greek word “different” is heteros (#2087 ἥτερος), in this case, referring to someone of a different quality. Another in number, another of the same kind, would have been the Greek word allos. The Emphasized Bible by Rotherham and The New Testament by Williams are versions that also use the word “different.” Was this gentle and loving man the Coming One, or was there another, different, conquering Messiah Ben David, who they should be looking for? Interestingly, the question that John’s disciples ask Jesus that is recorded in Luke 7:19 is not heteros, but allos. So there the emphasis is not on “another of a different kind or quality,” but just “another,” i.e., a second one.
11:7. “A reed shaken by the wind.” The area around the Jordan River where John was baptizing had very dense vegetation, including lots of reeds that grew close to the water. No one ever went to see them. Jesus was speaking to the people about John, whom the people had gone out to see. Was he “a reed shaken with the wind,” in other words, a man of weak character, easily swayed by circumstances and the opinions of others? Or was he a man of soft clothing, in other words, rich and politically connected? Or was he a prophet? Jesus testified that he was more than a prophet, but the very one Isaiah had referred to as a voice in the wilderness.

11:8. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

“road.” See commentary on Mark 1:3.

11:11. “least important person.” The Greek is mikros (#3398 µικρός). It can refer to being a limited size, measure, or quantity, or it can refer to being of little import, and thus means insignificant or unimportant. In this verse it is an adjective, and so the supplied noun “person” is understood. The grammarians argue about whether micros is used in a comparative sense (“the unimportant person”) or a superlative sense (the least important person) (cp. Lange’s Commentary). However, “least” seems to make sense in this context. The Kingdom of Heaven has not come yet, but will come when Christ sets it up on earth after he comes and fights the battle of Armageddon (Rev. 19). At that time the dead people who are judged to be righteous are raised and get to live with Christ in his kingdom (Ezek. 37; Rev. 20:4-6). Thus, the “least” person in the Kingdom of Heaven is still in the Kingdom of Heaven, and has passed from death to everlasting life. No wonder the “least” in the Kingdom of Heaven is greater than John! Also, that explains the next verse, in which Jesus speaks of how to attain the Kingdom of Heaven. No one can ignore the commands of God and expect to get in. Christ said at many times, and in many different ways, that getting into the Kingdom took work and focus. The way in was narrow and difficult (Matt. 7:13). God’s commands had to be obeyed (Matt. 19:16-19). A person had to take up his cross and follow Christ (Luke 9:23-26). In Matthew 11:12 Jesus taught the same message, that it took a violent effort, but the Kingdom of Heaven could indeed be seized as a prize. Surely the Kingdom of Heaven and everlasting life is available for those who really want it, and anyone there is greater than John, who was still in his fleshly body.

Some theologians teach that the one who is “least” is Jesus himself, because Jesus was younger than John by six months. However, that interpretation seems quite forced, because there is no reason in the context or culture that Jesus would point to the fact that although he was younger than John he would be greater. The Messiah was always assumed in all the prophecies and Scripture to be the greatest of all the prophets and indeed, the greatest person to ever live.

11:12. “advancing.” Matthew 11:12 has been an enigma for generations of Bible scholars for a couple reasons: the vocabulary in the Greek New Testament is unclear due to multiple possible definitions of some of the Greek words, and also the verb baizetai (“suffers” or “has been forcefully advancing”) can be either passive voice or middle voice. Because of that the verse has been translated in two different ways, represented by the two versions below.

ASV “And from the days of John the Baptist until now the Kingdom of Heaven suffereth violence, and men of violence take it by force.”

NIV “From the days of John the Baptist until now, the Kingdom of Heaven has been forcefully advancing, and forceful men lay hold of it.”

There are two basic possible interpretations:

1. The passive voice of baizetai (i.e., “suffereth”) would indicate that the Kingdom of Heaven is being attacked. The context shows that John was in jail and Jesus was being persecuted. Furthermore, “violent” (the Greek word is usually used in a negative sense) men are trying to “take” it, i.e., trying to overcome it and stop it. (Cp. New International Biblical Commentary by Mounce; The Gospel According to Matthew by Morris).

2. The middle voice of baizetai would indicate that the Kingdom is “forcefully” (instead of violently) “advancing itself,” i.e., it is moving forward, and those men who are forceful and determined are the ones who will seize it. The context shows that the Gospel message is being preached and people have to make a decision about it. (St. Matthew’s Gospel by Lenski; Companion Bible by Bullinger).

The more likely interpretation of the verse is as we have in the REV, also represented in the NIV. The first interpretation, that the Kingdom of Heaven suffers violence is less likely due to the qualifying phrase, “from the time of John the Baptist until now.” The Kingdom had always suffered violence, it had always been attacked. This is clear from the time when Cain killed his brother on down through the centuries, so it does not seem proper to say that it has suffered violence from the time of John. In contrast, with the appearance of John and Jesus the kingdom was forcefully advancing. Both John and Jesus were preaching that “the Kingdom is near.” John was ministering in the power and spirit of Elijah, even as Gabriel has said to Zechariah (Luke 1:17), and Jesus was ministering more powerfully than any prophet before him. There is a third possibility that is less likely, and also hard to represent fully in the English. Since the Greek can be legitimately translated both ways, it is possible that both interpretations are valid. In that case, this verse would be an example of the figure of speech amphibologia, literally, “a throwing in both directions” (Bullinger, Figures). However, in the REV we have gone with the translation we consider more likely.

“are seizing it as a prize.” The Greek is harpazo (#726 ἁρπάζω), and it means “to make off with someone’s property by attacking or seizing, steal, carry off, drag away, to grab or seize suddenly so as to remove or gain control, snatch/take away” (BDAG). It is commonly used with seizing or dragging off someone else’s property. Thus in this case the clear implication of the word is that forceful men grab hold of the kingdom as a prize for themselves, not just that they “seize it.” Lenski writes: “…the kingdom itself, with all its gifts, treasures, and blessings put power and courage into them “to snatch,” let us say “to grab” it all. Williams translates the last half of the verse: …those who take it by storm are seizing it as a precious prize.” This verse helps us to understand the effort it takes to walk in the blessings of the Kingdom. We must each make up our minds to “grab” the kingdom blessings, and that usually takes both desire and effort.

11:14. “Elijah.” [For information on John the Baptist being Elijah, see commentary on Matthew 17:10].

11:15. “Anyone who has ears had better listen!” The word “listen” is akouo (#191 ἀκούω, pronounced “ah-koo-oh”), and it can mean “hear” (the opposite of deaf; i.e., hearing the sounds or words), or it can refer to listening and understanding what you hear (the English word “hear” is used the same way). In this verse it is third person, present tense, active voice, imperative mood, and is thus a command, not a suggestion.

The NET translation is quite literal and very good: “The one who has ears had better listen!” The NET translators explain their translation with the following note: “The translation, ‘had better listen!’ captures the force of the third person imperative [which is the conjugation of the Greek text] more effectively than the traditional, ‘let him hear,’ which sounds more like a permissive than an imperative to the modern English reader.” A. Nyland (The Source NT) is a little more casual, but catches the sense very well: “If you have ears, you had better listen!” Stern (Complete Jewish Bible) translates: “If you have ears, then hear!” Phillips translates: “The man who has ears to hear must use them!” (NT in Modern English).

The Interpreter’s Bible correctly notes that the way Jesus spoke the phrase was “urgent” and “sharp kindness.” Jesus sharply but kindly reminded his audience that God created them to hear and obey, and they better get about doing it. Lenski adds: “In ‘he that has ears’ lies the implication of willful guilt when those ears that were made to hear (and understand) are not used for this purpose.”

Some Greek manuscripts have “the one who has ears to hear,” instead of “the one who has ears.” However, the verb “to hear” was almost certainly added so that this verse matches other verses that do include it, such as Mark 4:9, 23; Luke 8:8; 14:35. If it were original, there seems to be no reason it would have been omitted from early and important texts (cp. Metzger, Textual Commentary).

This phrase, or a very similar one, occurs here and in Matthew 13:9, 43; Mark 4:9, 23; Luke 8:8; 14:35. It is important to ask, “Why is this phrase here” each time it occurs. In this case, Jesus was teaching about John the Baptist, and in verse 14 he made the point that John was Elijah. Malachi 4:5 made it clear that “Elijah” would come before the Messiah, and before the Day of the Lord. That Jesus (the Messiah) seemed to come before Elijah confused many, even the disciples (Matt. 17:10; Mark 9:11). In Matthew 11:14 Jesus points out that “Elijah” was John, which would have not only answered their questions, but would have awakened the people to the days in which they were living—the days of the Messiah. No wonder Jesus said, “‘Anyone who has ears better listen!’” [For more on John the Baptist being Elijah, see commentary on Matthew 17:10].

11:19. “See.” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

11:27. “All things.” Although the text does not say so, it is clear from the content of what Jesus is saying that he has stopped his prayer and has started speaking to his disciples.

“really knows...really know.” The Greek word is epiginōskō (#1921 ἐπιγινώσκω) an intensified form of ginōskō (#1097 γινώσκω). At that time in Jesus’ ministry, no one really understood the Son except the Father, and no one really knew and understood God but the Son and those people to whom the Son revealed Him, such as Jesus’ close disciples. All one has to do is look at the misguided doctrine and behavior of the Pharisees and Sadducees to know they did not “really know” God. They knew things about Him, but they did not “really” know Him. That is still true today. Many people know some things about God, but do not “really know” Him.

“anyone to whom the Son determines to reveal him.” This verse is not saying that Jesus picks and chooses who gets to know about God, including some and excluding others apart from that person’s desires. God wants everyone to know Him, and calls them fools if they do not (Jer. 4:22). Jesus Christ came to make known the Father (John 1:18), and expended himself trying to get people to understand both him and his Father. Jesus went so far as to say that people could see the Father by seeing him (John 14:9). God also makes it clear that He wants everyone to fully know the truth (1 Tim. 2:4). Nevertheless, many people do not know God. They do not know Him because they do not want to know Him, something they express by both their words and actions. John 3:20 make it clear that people who practice evil will not come to the light. Also, we must keep in mind that when someone does not love God or want God in his life, God honors that. Similarly, when someone loves God, that is honored also, and Jesus says he will show himself to that kind of person (John 14:21).

“determines.” The Greek is boulomai (#1014 βούλομαι), and it means, to deliberately desire, will, or purpose something. To plan. Although it can be used of desire or want, it is somewhat different than thelō, “want, desire.” Thus, boulomai includes “the thought of ‘purpose, intention, not mere will, but will with premeditation’” (Moulton and Milligan, Vocabulary of Greek NT). This verse is very similar to Luke 10:22, but Luke uses ginōskō instead of epiginōskō for “know.”

11:29. “take my yoke.” In this phrase, the word “yoke” is referring to what Jesus is asking people to do: the sum total of his teachings, and he said it was gentle (not “easy”) and light. The word “yoke” is the figure of speech, hypocatastasis, a comparison by implication (see commentary on Rev. 20:2).

In the biblical culture, the literal yoke that was used to harness animals together for work was essential for survival: it was used so animals could plow, thresh grain, and pull loads such as carts. The yoke was not something animals liked to wear, because the loads they pulled were often heavy and difficult. Furthermore, many yokes rubbed sores on the animal’s necks because they were quickly and crudely made.

People also used the word “yoke” figuratively, and applied it to things that were heavy and unpleasant. The hard work that Solomon made his subjects do was called a “yoke” by his subjects (1 Kings 12:4). Enemies put a “yoke” on the people of Israel, placing various kinds of burdens on them (Deut. 28:48; Isa. 10:27; 47:6; Jer. 27:11). The word “yoke” was also used of being a slave, because it was usually burdensome (1 Tim. 6:1). It was foretold that when the Messiah came he would shatter the yoke that burdens people (Isa. 9:4).

The word “yoke” was also used for submission to a system of beliefs, and the expression, “the yoke of the Law” was common in rabbinic literature. “In Jewish literature a ‘yoke’ represents the sum-total of obligations which, according to the teaching of the rabbis, a person must take upon himself. This definition accounts for such terms as ‘yoke of the Torah,’ ‘yoke of the commandments,’ ‘yoke of the Kingdom of Heaven, etc.” (Hendriksen: New Testament Commentary). In saying, “the yoke of the Law,” the rabbis were not so much emphasizing the “weight” of the Law, or the difficulty of keeping it (although that could easily be part of the meaning, depending on the context), but rather the fact of being submitted to the system of beliefs that constituted the Law. The Law of Moses was considered a “yoke” because of the restraints it put on people and the amount of effort it took to keep it and obey its precepts.

Although the Law was a “yoke” upon people, whether they found it difficult or a blessing depended upon the attitude of the people. Romans 7:12 says the Law is holy, righteous, and good. The Apostle Peter used “yoke” to represent the teachings of the Law in Acts 15:10: “Now then, why do you try to test God by putting on the necks of Gentiles a yoke that neither we nor our ancestors have been able to bear?” Peter did not mean to say the Law was in any way ungodly—he did not feel that way. However, even though he believed the Law was from God and was a good thing, he still recognized that it was a system that restrained and controlled people and no one, not even the Jews to whom God gave the Law, could obey it without sin.

As the Early Church continued, the figure “yoke” was even used for the teachings about grace in the New Testament. The Church Father Clement of Rome referred to Christians as those who come under the yoke of grace. Even the teachings about grace include restrictions and responsibilities that Christians need to heed. Jesus says, “Take my yoke upon you and learn from me.” The verbs “take” and “learn” are in the imperative mood, which in this context is an imperative of exhortation but has the overtone of a command. Jesus’ statement was a strong exhortation, made with love. Christ’s “yoke” is still a yoke. Jesus did not say, “I free you from religious bondage; go do whatever you want!” Jesus wants us under his yoke, his system of grace and love. It is easy and light, but it is still a yoke, and we must have desire and self-control to live under the yoke of Christ.

The yoke Jesus asks us to take was different than a yoke of religious bondage. The people in Jesus’ time had been burdened by the yoke of the religious leaders—their system of religious requirements. In fact, something that does not show up well in English is that in 11:28 (ESV), when Jesus says, “Come to me, all who labor and are heavy laden...,” the verb “are heavy laden” (one word in the Greek text), is in the passive voice. This means that the burdens had been placed upon the people (although it is possible, but less likely, that a burden had been placed on them because they picked them up themselves). Little has changed since the time of Christ. Many religious systems are full of man-made regulations that are a great burden, and there is as much need now as there ever was to “learn of me,” learn the truth about Christ and what he teaches, and then take his yoke.

“souls.” The Greek word often translated “soul” is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoo-kay’), and it has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person or animal; an individual person; or attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. Here it refers to the thoughts, feelings, and emotions of the person himself. The person will find rest within himself and be at peace [For a more complete explanation of “soul,” see Appendix 7, “Usages of ‘Soul’”].

11:30. “kind.” The Greek word is the adjective chrestos (#5543 χρηστός), and it means “kind” (the noun form is chrestotes (#5544 χρηστότης), which in Galatians 5:22 is the fruit of the spirit, “kindness”). Christ’s yoke is “kind” (chrestotes, not “easy” as many translations have), because there is nothing harsh, sharp, or galling about it. You can put on Christ’s yoke without worrying about getting painful blisters, splinters, etc.

“light.” The load that Jesus asks us to carry is “light,” not heavy, but it is still a “load” we must make up our minds to carry. But sometimes the loads of life are not light yet all, but very heavy, even for the most faithful believers, so how can it be that Jesus says his load is “light.” The load that Jesus asks us to carry is always light. It includes things like trust and obedience, and it lightens the heart and rests the soul. The confusion that many people have over this verse is they think that any burden we have in our lives is part of the yoke of Christ, but that is not true.

A person who believes God controls everything that happens in this world has trouble understanding the words of Jesus. If God is in control of the world and everything that happens is His will, then the burdens we carry are all due to the will of God and are all part of the yoke of Christ. But those burdens are often very heavy, so why did Jesus say his yoke was “light?” The truth is that God is not in control of everything that happens in our lives or in the world around us. The world is a battleground, where the forces of Good fight the forces of Evil. The Adversary is the god of this world (2 Cor. 4:4) and “the whole world lies in the power of the Wicked One” (1 John 5:19). Satanic forces and evil people can make life very hard to bear. Also, the earth is a fallen world. Hunger, poverty, deterioration, and aging, are a part of the curse on the world. Added to that, we humans have freedom of will and make stupid decisions that cause problems for ourselves and others. None of these things are part of the yoke of Christ, even though we have to bear them and they make life difficult.

Jesus said his yoke was gentle and the load was light, and that is true of the yoke of Christ. As for the yoke that is put upon us by the Fallen World, thankfully, Isaiah foretold that when the Messiah came in his kingdom, which is still future, he would shatter the yoke that burdens people (Isa. 9:4). That is a wonderful hope to look forward to.

Chapter 12

12:10. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).
12:16. “warned.” The Greek word translated “warned” is epitimaō (#2008 ἐπιτιµάω). Usually epitimaō means to express strong disapproval of someone: rebuke, reprove, censure; or to speak seriously, and thus warn in order to prevent an action or bring one to an end. It can also mean “punish” (cp. BDAG Lexicon). Epitimaō is also used in a technical sense in the NT, see commentary on Mark 1:25. Jesus “warned” his disciples, no doubt including some of what might happen if they ignored what he said.
“Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).
“my servant.” Matthew 12:18-21 is quoted from Isaiah 42:1-4 and are the first four verses of the first “Servant Song” in Isaiah (called a “song” because Isaiah wrote in Hebrew poetry). The “Servant Songs” are sections of Isaiah that are about the Messiah, Jesus Christ, and present him as the Servant of God. The four “Servant songs” are: Isaiah 42:1-7; 49:1-7; 50:4-11; 52:13-53:12. The last Servant song is familiar to us because of Isaiah 53, but few people realize the song starts in chapter 52, and unfortunately is broken up by the chapter break of Isaiah 53. The chapter breaks were added to the Old Testament in the 13th century AD, some 2000 years after Isaiah wrote, and the song would have been much easier to see and understand had it not be interrupted by the chapter break. The fact that Matthew 12:17 says that Jesus fulfilled the Servant Song shows conclusively that Jesus is the “servant” of the Servant songs in Isaiah. The disciples understood this also, because in Acts 4:27 they prayed to God and referred to Jesus as “your holy servant Jesus, whom you anointed.” This is likely an illusion to Isaiah 42:1, which speaks of Jesus as the Servant of God and that he was given (thus “anointed with”) the holy spirit by God.

The Servant Songs are sections of Isaiah that are specifically about the Messiah, and would have enabled Jesus to more clearly understand his mission and what he would have to endure to accomplish it.

“my soul.” The Greek word often translated “soul” is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoo-kay’), and it has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person or animal; an individual person; or attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. We can tell that in this verse “my soul” is equivalent to “me” (including my thoughts, emotions, and feelings) because the “my” is God, and He is not a body powered by soul. [For a more complete explanation of “soul,” see Appendix 7, “Usages of ‘Soul’”]

12:20. Quoted from Isaiah 42:3, 4.

“A bruised reed he will not break.” In this verse, the “bruised (or broken) reed” and the “smoking flax” are the figure of speech hypocatastasis for afflicted and weak people [For an explanation of hypocatastasis, see commentary on Revelation 20:2]. In fact, the verse is a litotes (“meiosis”), because it is stating in the negative something that is really positive. It is not just that Jesus will not break a reed that is bruised, but he will heal the reed and cause it to stand upright. It is not just that Jesus will not put out a smoldering wick, he will trim that wick and make it burn brightly. Jesus will not oppress the oppressed. A “smoking flax” is a smoldering wick—the wicks of the oil lamps were made of flax

“leads justice to victory.” This is the figure of speech personification. “Justice” is portrayed as a person, and today justice is currently being thwarted and ignored. If we were to translate the verse without the personification, we might say something like: “until the Messiah’s victory brings justice.”

12:24. “Beelzebul.” The Greek is Beelzeboul (#954 Βεελζεβούλ), which gets put into English as “Beelzebul.” He is called the “prince of demons” in Luke 12:10. “Beelzeboul” is “lord of the dunghill.” This comes from the Hebrew zebul (dung, a dunghill). [For more on the name Beelzebul and other names of the Slanderer (the Devil), see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”] .

12:26. “the Adversary.” The Greek word for Adversary is Satanas (#4567 Σατανᾶς), which has been transliterated into “Satan” in most versions. This causes the meaning of the word, which is important, to be lost. For more information on it, see the note on Mark 1:13. [For information on the names of the Devil, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”].

“sons.” Here “sons” refers to disciples, not literal children. The Greek word is huios (#5207 υἱός), and means “son,” but the key to understanding what the verse is saying is recognizing that “son” was used in many ways in Semitic languages, just as we use it in several ways in English. In this case, the “sons” are the students, or disciples, of the Pharisees, in the same way that in the Old Testament, the disciples of the prophets were called “the sons of the prophets” (1 Kings 20:35; 2 Kings 2:3, 5, 7, 15; 4:1, 38; 5:22; 6:1, etc.).

Other meanings of the word “son” include: someone who was a person’s immediate child (John 9:19); a grandchild or descendant, such as a “son of David” (Matt. 1:20); a male heir that is adopted or taken into the family (Exod. 2:10); and a younger person for whom you have taken on a fatherly role or the role of a mentor/teacher and have special affection for (2 Chron. 29:11; 1 Pet. 5:13). The word “son” also refers to a person who is closely related or associated, especially in a group; thus all mankind is referred to as the “sons of men,” and Jesus referred to himself as “the son of man” which confused the religious leaders, because it could have been a simple way of saying “a man,” but was also a Messianic title due to Daniel 7:13. “Son” also was used to refer to a person who has the character, and even follows in the footsteps, of another (Acts 13:10 “son of the Devil”). Also, a person who has a certain specific characteristic is called a “son” of that characteristic (e.g., “sons of disobedience” are disobedient people, Eph. 2:2).

Just as someone’s disciples were called “sons,” a person who was a father figure, mentor, and guide, was called a “father.” Thus, Joseph said he had become a “father” to Pharaoh (Gen. 45:8). In the book of Judges, first Micah of Ephraim, and then people of the tribe of Dan, asked a Levite to be a “father” to them, that is, be their spiritual guide (Judg. 17:10; 18:19). The prophet Elisha referred to the elder prophet Elijah as his “father” (2 Kings 2:12), and the servants of the Syrian commander, Naaman, referred to him as “father” because he was a mentor and guide (2 Kings 5:13). The king of Israel referred to the prophet Elisha as his “father,” his spiritual mentor and guide (2 Kings 6:21).

In this verse, the “sons” of the Pharisees were the disciples of the Pharisees. This same use of “sons” or “children” can be found in Revelation 2:23, where the “children” of Jezebel were those people who were following in her footsteps and acting like she did.

12:28. “Spirit of God.” This is the gift of holy spirit that God put upon believer’s in the Old Testament so they could do the works of God. It is not a “person,” but the very nature of God; holy and spirit. It is referred to as the finger of God in Luke 11:20. See, Graeser, Lynn, Schoenheit, The Gift of Holy Spirit: The Power to Be Like Christ.

12:29. “binds.” The Greek word “binds” is the common word deō (#1210 δέω), which means to bind or tie up. However, here it has a special meaning. The word was used in magic and spells for binding someone via a spell. The word was used to “to describe the ‘binding’ power of curses” (Moulton and Milligan, Vocabulary of the Greek NT). The context is the casting out of demons (v. 28), so the “binding” in this verse refers to binding a demon and making it powerless by the power of God.

12:30. “He who is not with me is against me.” This verse does away with the idea that people can somehow “sit on the fence” when it comes to God and the things of God. There are many people who fancy themselves “not religious,” who would say that they are not for Jesus but neither are they against him. Actually, that is an impossibility. We are God’s creations, and as such we have a moral obligation to serve God. Furthermore, the Adversary is constantly attacking God, and one of the ways he does it is to get people to not commit to any religious belief. However, not being committed to a religious belief is being committed to the fact that there is nothing that deserves to be committed to. Thus these “uncommitted” people are committed to something, just not God. Furthermore, they are a part of the general “background noise” of the many people who are not committed to God, which helps encourage other people that being “uncommitted” is okay. In one of his sermons rabbi Shalom Lewis of Atlanta said, “Brutal acts of commission and yawning acts of omission both strengthen the hand of the devil.” Each person either scatters or gathers, there is no middle ground. This maxim is stated the opposite way in Mark 9:40, and for more information on it, see commentary on Mark 9:40.

12:31. “People will be forgiven for every sin and defaming word, but the defaming of the Spirit will not be forgiven.” These words of Jesus Christ are very direct: “every” sin and defaming word can be forgiven except one, a sin he referred to as “defaming” or to “speak against,” the Holy Spirit. The definition of “defaming” includes slander, speaking against God, or verbal abuse, and it is clear from comparing the above two verses that Christ is defining defaming as “speaking against” something.

Jesus said there is one form of defaming against God that will never be forgiven, and he was referring to a specific defaming, not just speaking against God in general. Many people have at some time been angry at God due to the horrific circumstances of this fallen world, and many have spoken very harshly about God, and to Him. In fact, it is safe to say that most people have even cursed at God, and yet, when they ask for forgiveness, He forgives them. But there is a defaming that will not be forgiven.

What we will learn in this study is that the defaming that cannot be forgiven is a person saying, and truly meaning in the depths of his heart, that Satan is the true God. The Bible reveals that the Devil can have “children,” that is, people who have a unique relationship with him that makes them different from other sinners whose sins can be forgiven. People who are children of the Devil have sinned in such a way that they are no longer redeemable, that is, they cannot be forgiven, and it is not possible for them to be saved.

The Bible has much evidence of the “unforgivable sin,” which leads to the everlasting death of the individual who commits it.

If any man see his brother sin a sin which is not unto death, he shall ask, and he shall give him life for them that sin not unto death. There is a sin unto death: I do not say that he shall pray for it.

This verse reveals the same basic truth Jesus spoke about: there are sins that are “not unto death,” and there is a sin that is “unto death.” The Word of God directs us not to pray for those who have committed the sin unto death, and it does so because they cannot be forgiven.

Scripture shows a link between the unforgivable sin and those referred to as “children of the Devil.” When speaking to some of the religious leaders, Jesus said, “You are of your father the devil” (John 8:44 NASB). These leaders were in a different category than “regular” sinners like the prostitutes and tax collectors, who Jesus never referred to as “children of the Devil.” Neither did he ever spurn them, but actively tried to win them to salvation and a life of righteousness. In contrast, there is no evidence Jesus attempted to evangelize those he referred to as being fathered by the Devil. Instead, he told his disciples, “Leave them; they are blind guides” (Matt. 15:14).

The Apostle Paul also encountered a child of the Devil. Confronting the false prophet Bar-Jesus, he said by revelation: “You are a child of the devil and an enemy of everything right” (Acts 13:10). Paul confronted many stubborn, sinful, hard-hearted people on his journeys, but this was the only man he called a child of the Devil. The fact that the text tells us that Paul was filled with holy spirit as he spoke alerts us to the fact that this was not just his opinion, but came from the Lord. Those people who commit the unforgivable sin become children of the Devil. [For more on the children of the Devil, see Appendix 14: Names of the Slanderer, under “Belial” and “Father.”]

Interestingly, there is a lot of folklore about people who “sell their soul to the Devil.” The folklore usually goes something like this: a person wants something really badly, like money, power, fame, or love. So the Devil comes to him and says something like, “I will give you what you want at a very reasonable price—your eternal soul.” The person, blinded by desire, makes the deal with the Devil and then at the end of his life has to go to “hell,” with no chance of “heaven.” Most such folklore has some basis of truth in it, and this folklore is no different. Some people so strongly lust for what they want that in their heart they make Satan, or one of his many fronts or idols, their “true” god and provider, and thus become his children (more will be said about this in a later section). These self-centered people turn to Satan’s ways in order to quickly gain their desires, and in so doing turn away from the true God, and His ways of love, self-discipline, and giving.

The Bible does not describe exactly how a person becomes a child of the Devil, but it gives us some important information. Because Christ categorized it as a form of blasphemy, we know it is something that is said, either audibly or by speaking to oneself. It cannot simply be saying, “I hate God” or “I love the Devil,” or something such as that. It has to be fully believed in the heart as well as in the mind. From what we see in Scripture, it occurs when someone completely turns away from God, and confesses and believes in his heart that Satan, or one of his many forms, is in fact his true “god,” his lord, sustainer, and provider.

In the context of the unforgivable sin, it is important that Christians understand “god” in its more basic meaning of sustainer, provider, something that is worshipped or idealized, and something considered of supreme value. To blaspheme God does not mean one has to believe that the Devil is actually the Christian God and Father, as if God was a fake who was pretending to be the Father of Jesus. Nor does it mean confessing the Devil, in his true form as the fallen angel who opposes God, as the true God, although one could commit the unforgivable sin by believing the Devil was god, as Cain did.

The unforgivable sin can be committed by believing and saying in your heart, that Satan or one of the forms he hides behind and supports, including idol gods, or things of worth and worship such as wealth, is the true sustainer, provider, or object of supreme value in one’s life. No doubt that was what Satan was asking Jesus to do when he offered him all the power of the world if he would worship him (Luke 4:6). The Devil was not asking Jesus to think that God did not exist or that Satan somehow was in fact God, but rather that Satan would be Jesus’ true sustainer and provider, the true god of his life. The Devil wanted Jesus to become a child of his, which would have been the ultimate coup, but to do so Jesus would have had to “worship” the Devil, not just in form, but in the depths of his heart.

The evidence of Scripture is that a person can become a child of the Devil by choosing in his heart to totally commit himself to making money, attaining power and fame—any of Satan’s forms—his god. For example, it is unlikely that the Pharisees who were children of the Devil had taken “the Devil” per se as their god, but rather so highly valued their prestige, power, and position that they had in their hearts made that their god, and in doing so completely turned away from the true God.

Another thing that is not clarified in Scripture is what happens to a person spiritually, mentally, and physically when he becomes a child of the Devil such that he is unable to repent and be saved. We have no way of knowing what actually happens, but one possibility is that when one commits the unforgivable sin, a demon enters him and gains access to, or perhaps even takes control of, the portion of the brain that controls freedom of choice, and the demon continually blocks his ability to repent. [For more information on the Unforgivable Sin and the children of the Devil, see truthortradition.com and our article, “The Unforgivable Sin.”] “defaming word...defaming” Greek noun blasphēmia (#988 βλασφημία; pronounced blas-fay-me’-ah), and the verb blasphēmeō (#987 βλασφημέω; pronounced blas-fay-meh’-ō) are transliterated (not translated) from the Greek into English as “blasphemy.” There is a problem with that, however, because “blasphemy” in English has a different meaning than blasphēmeō and blasphēmia do in Greek. In English, “blasphemy” is only used in reference to God. It is insulting God or a god, insulting something considered sacred (like defacing a cross or statue of Jesus), or claiming to be God or a god in some way. However, in Greek, blasphēmia and blasphēmeō did not have to refer to God or a god, but were common words that were used of someone speaking against another. The primary meaning of them as they were used in the Greek culture was showing disrespect to a person or deity, and/or harming his, her, or its reputation. In the honor/shame society of the biblical world, that was even more heinous an act that we would think of it today, because honor and reputation were at the very core of societal status and were the basis of all social interaction. [For more on blasphēmia and blasphēmeō, see commentary on Matt. 9:3].

12:32. “the Holy Spirit” Literally, “the Spirit, the Holy one.” A name of God. [For more information on the uses of “Holy Spirit”, see Appendix 6: Usages of ‘Spirit’.]

12:33. “declare.” The Greek is poieō (#4160 ποιέω), which is properly “to do” or “to make,” and many versions read “make.” However, poieō can refer to what is made up in the mind, and thus what is thought, or in this case, as the context shows, what is declared or spoken. Examples of this include John 5:18; 8:53; and 10:33. The key to understanding this verse is realizing that Jesus is referring back to the evil and hypocritical judgment of the Pharisees, who said that when Jesus was delivering people by casting out demons, he was doing it by the prince of demons (Matt. 12:24). Jesus was telling the Pharisees that they could not rightly come to the conclusion that Jesus was evil when the result of his work was good. If they said the tree (i.e., Jesus) was evil, then his fruit would have to be evil too. But if they acknowledged that Jesus’ fruit was good, then they should acknowledge that he was good. The justification for the translation “declare” comes from the context: what the Pharisees were saying (v. 24ff), and Christ’s reference to what is coming out of the mouth and idle words (v. 34-37). Cassirer’s translation of this verse reads: “Suppose a tree is good, then its fruit will be good; suppose a tree has fallen into decay, then its fruit will be worthless.” Jesus taught with great consistency when it came to people and the fruit they produced (Matt. 7:15-20).

12:40. Quoted from Jonah 1:17.

“three days and three nights in the heart of the earth.” Jesus was in the “heart of the earth,” the grave, for three days and three nights. Tradition teaches that Jesus died on Friday and was up Sunday morning, but that would not fulfill the words of Christ. Tradition acts as if Jesus said he would be “three days” in the grave, treating a “day” as any part of a day. But that is not what Jesus said! He specifically said he would be “three days” and “three nights” in the grave. Before we get into the specifics of the tradition and the truth, we need to remember that the Jewish day started at sunset, not midnight. Thus the Jewish day is a “night and day,” not, as we normally say in English, “day and night.”

If we take the traditional position that Jesus was buried just before sunset on Friday evening, that little sliver of time between his being put in the tomb and sunset could be considered daytime Friday and thus the first “day” of the three days and nights. Then sunset would start Saturday, and Saturday night would be the first night, then Saturday day would be the second “day.” Then Saturday sunset would start Sunday night, which would be the second “night,” but Sunday would have no “daytime,” because it was still dark when Mary came to the tomb and found it empty (John 20:1). From that exact counting we can see that a Friday crucifixion and burial does not allow Christ to be in the grave three days and nights, which is what Jesus specifically said. Tradition only gives us two days and two nights in the grave (and that is generous since the time on Friday we are counting as a “day” was very likely less than an hour). In conclusion, the traditional teaching about Jesus dying on Friday does not fulfill the prophecy of Jesus Christ, and there are other problems as well, which we will see below.

The major reason tradition says Jesus was crucified on Friday is the Bible says he was crucified the day before the Sabbath (Mark 15:42; Luke 23:54; John 19:31). However, John 19:31 says that Sabbath was a “high day,” a special Sabbath. It was not Saturday, the regular Sabbath. The Passover Lamb was always killed before a Sabbath because sunset after the Passover Lamb was killed started the first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread which was always a Sabbath. So just because Jesus was crucified the day before a Sabbath does not mean he was crucified on Friday, and we will see below he was not.

The real truth of the situation is that Jesus was crucified on Wednesday, was buried just before sunset on Wednesday night, and got up Saturday night. Then when the women came to the tomb on Sunday morning they were told that he had already risen from the dead and was not there. To fulfill the prophecy Jesus gave, he had to be in the grave three days and three nights. Wednesday sunset to Thursday sunset is one full day and one full night. Thursday sunset to Friday sunset makes two full days and nights, and Friday Sunset to Saturday sunset makes three full days and nights. So Jesus got up around sunset Saturday night, three days and three nights after he was buried. Then, when the women came to the tomb on Sunday morning, the angel said he is not here. Most people assume that Jesus had just gotten up a few minutes before the women arrived, but the Bible never Matthew 8:4 says that. The angel never tells the women when Jesus got up, we have to learn that from the prophecy of Jonah.

One of the keys to understanding the record of Jesus’ crucifixion is realizing that Jesus died on the cross on Golgotha as our true Passover Lamb at the same time the regular Passover Lamb was being slain in the Temple. Leviticus 23:5-7 (and Exodus 12:6-16) set forth the regulations of Passover and Feast of Unleavened Bread. The Passover Lamb was slain “between the evenings,” a phrase that has been interpreted to mean the time when it can be clearly seen the sun is starting to fall in sky, thus about 3 PM. The lamb is cooked before sunset, and the Passover meal is eaten after sunset, which, according to Jewish reckoning started the next day, the fourteenth of Nisan and the first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread, which was always a special Sabbath. Thus sunset after the Passover Lamb was killed began the special Sabbath of the Feast of Unleavened Bread.

The day the Passover Lamb was killed was known as “the preparation” or “the preparation day,” because preparations were being made for the special Sabbath that began at sunset. The Bible is clear that Jesus Christ was the true Passover Lamb who died for our sins (1 Corinthians 5:7), and all Four Gospels testify that Jesus was killed on “the preparation day” (cp. Matt. 27:62; Mark 15:42; Luke 23:54; John 19:31, 42), so Jesus died on the cross at the same time the Passover Lamb was slain in the Temple. The day after the “preparation” day is the first day of Unleavened Bread and always a Sabbath, and John 19:31 correctly differentiates that Sabbath from the regular weekly Saturday Sabbath by saying the Sabbath after Jesus died was “the High Day” (REV); “a special day” (HCSB), and thus not the weekly Sabbath.

To find out what day Jesus was crucified and buried we have to fit together some basic facts. First, he had to be in the grave three days and three nights. Second, he was already up on Sunday morning when the women came to properly bury him. Third, he was placed in the grave by Joseph of Arimathea just before sunset, so to have three days and three nights he would most logically get up from the grave just before sunset. Fourth, the women bought and prepared spices before a Sabbath but brought them to the tomb after a Sabbath. Using these facts and working backwards in time from Sunday morning, we can see that Jesus had to get up Saturday night before sunset, and thus had to be crucified and buried on Wednesday. Thus, Wednesday was the “preparation” when the Passover Lamb and Jesus were slain, Thursday was the first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread and a Special Sabbath, Friday was a regular work day, Saturday was the regular weekly Sabbath and by Sunday morning at dawn Jesus had already been raised.

We can now construct the chronology and make Jesus’ prophecy of being in the grave for three days and three nights work perfectly with him being the real Passover Lamb.

- Wednesday morning about 9 AM Jesus is crucified (Mark 15:25).
- Darkness comes over the land from 12 noon to 3 PM (Matt. 27:45; Mark 15:33; Luke 23:44)
- Jesus dies on the cross around 3 PM at the same time the Passover Lamb was being slain in the Temple (Matt. 27:46-50; Mark 15:34-37; Luke 23:44-46).
- Joseph of Arimathea goes to Pilate and gets permission to take the body of Jesus (Matt. 27:58; Mark 15:43; Luke 23:52; John 19:38). He wrapped the body in a clean linen cloth, put it in the tomb, and went away (Matt. 27:59, 60; Mark 15:46; Luke 22:53).

- The women were watching Joseph and saw that he had laid Jesus’ body in the tomb without preparing it with spices according to the common custom (Matt. 27:61; Mark 15:47; Luke 23:55).

- Nicodemus, who was likely late for some reason, came with his servants carrying seventy-five pounds of spices and gave Jesus a burial that was according to Jewish custom (John 19:39, 40). Nicodemus would have had servants with him to help him carry the spices and also as a guard because 75 pounds of spices would have been extremely valuable. However, the women had already left and did not see what Nicodemus had done because the Sabbath was beginning (Luke 23:54).

- Thursday, the 15th of Nisan and the Special Sabbath of the first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread began at sunset, and everyone had a day of rest.

- Friday the 16th of Nisan. The women, not knowing about Nicodemus burying Jesus with spices, go and buy spices and prepare them to properly bury Jesus. It is after the Sabbath like Scripture says (Mark 16:1; after the Special Sabbath) and also before the Sabbath like Scripture says (Luke 23:56; the regular weekly Sabbath), but they cannot get to the tomb because of the guard (Matt. 27:63-66).

- Saturday: the women rest on Saturday the weekly Sabbath. Jesus gets up from the grave just before sunset.

- The women come to the tomb early Sunday morning, the first day of the week (Mark 16:2), bringing the spices. When they get to the tomb they find out Jesus has already risen from the dead.

There is an important proof that there were two Sabbaths during the time Jesus was in the grave. The two Sabbaths were Thursday the 15th of Nisan, the Special Sabbath that started the Feast of Unleavened Bread, and Saturday the 17th of Nisan, the regular weekly Sabbath. The Bible tells us that the women went and bought and prepared spices to properly bury Jesus (Mark 16:1; Luke 23:56). But Mark says the women did this “when the Sabbath was over.” That in and of itself is problematic, because the Sabbath was not over until sundown Saturday and it is unlikely that the women would have been able to buy the spices after sunset on Saturday night. The merchants were likely closed. But even if they could have bought the spices at night, Luke contradicts Mark and says the women bought the spices before the Sabbath, not after it. Luke says, “having returned, they prepared spices and perfumes. And on the Sabbath they rested according to the commandment.” So did the women buy the spices before the Sabbath, like Luke says, or after it, like Mark says? The answer is “both.” The women bought and prepared the spices on Friday after the Special Sabbath on Thursday, but before the regular weekly Sabbath on Saturday. They could not take the spices to the tomb on Friday because of the guard, and they had to rest on Saturday which was the regular weekly Sabbath. They were able to take the spices to the tomb on Sunday, because it was the fourth day (Thursday, Friday, Saturday, and Sunday), and the soldiers were only going to guard the tomb for three days. Thus they thought the guard would be gone, and they went very early Sunday morning, only to find that Jesus did not need the spices because he had already risen from the dead.

12:41. “men of Nineveh.” The Greek word translated “men” is anēr (#435 ἀνήρ; pronounced an-air), meaning men; males. This verse is a window into the biblical culture. It would never have been considered in the biblical world that women would sit as judges, hence the men will rise up in judgment.

“someone greater.” The adjective “greater,” pleiōn (#4119 πλείον) is being used as a substantive (BDAG). As such, it implies a greater something, which is in this case a person, so “someone” is an appropriate noun to use to complete the sense. This is another time when Jesus revealed that he was the Messiah to those who had ears to hear. He was not simply saying he was a greater person or a greater prophet than Jonah.

“someone greater.” See commentary on 12:41.

12:43. “a resting place.” The Greek is anapausis (#372 ἀνάπαυσις), and it can either mean “rest” or “a resting place.” Here, the better translation is “a resting place,” that is a place to settle in and use as a base for causing trouble and harm. See commentary on Luke 11:24.

12:46. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἴδον), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

12:47. Brackets. This verse is omitted in many of the early and diverse manuscripts, including some manuscripts from the Majority Text, so it is omitted in some of the modern versions, such as CJB, ESV, RSV, and NJB. We put it in brackets to mark the fact that it is doubtful.

“your mother.” There is no mention of Joseph; he had apparently died. See commentary on John 19:27.

13:3. “The Sower.” The parable Jesus tells in verses 3-8 is almost universally referred to as “The Parable of the Sower.” However, it should more accurately be called, “The Parable of the Soils,” because the parable is not about the one who sows the seed; nor is it about the seed itself, which is the Word of God (Mark 4:14). The parable is about the people who hear the Word, and the kind of soil they are. Each person determines the kind of person he or she is: like the path (v. 4); like rocky places (v. 5); like thorny ground (v.
It is misreading this parable to read it and say, “we are what we are,” and we are stuck that way. Christ does not teach about the types of soils so we can then discover what soil we are. He teaches about them as a warning, so people can change.

Jesus’ explanation reveals the lesson.

• The person who is the path: If a person is hard hearted (like the soil on the path is hard), then he will not understand the Word, and/or not care about it. However, that should be obvious to him, even if he has to hear it from others. His challenge is to soften his heart and do things that cause him to grow in the Word so that his heart will receive it. If he does not care enough to do these things, the Devil will eventually snatch away the Word from his heart and mind and it will cease to matter to him at all. No one has to remain hard soil.

• The person who is rocky soil: This is the person who receives the Word with joy, but has no depth of understanding, so he abandons the Word when there is trouble or persecution. The key to understanding this soil (this kind of person) is realizing that when a person has no depth of knowledge or understanding, he knows it. We all know when we do not know or understand something, and when it comes to the things of God, that is unacceptable. After hearing the Word of Christ, each person has the responsibility to do what it takes to grow in the Word, both by quitting activities that are ungodly or detrimental, and by doing things that contribute to a complete and godly walk with the Lord. No one has to remain shallow soil.

• The person who is soil with thorns: This is the person who likes the Word of God, but never gets rid of his worldly attachments. He wants to be rich, or wants to have fun or be involved in his other worldly interests (Mark 4:19), and/or he is overly concerned about worldly things. The key to this soil (this person), is that anyone who hangs on to worldly desires realizes that fact. No one loves money, fame, sports, sex, alcohol, drugs, video games, etc., without realizing it. A man or woman knows if he or she has watched 20 hours of sports, soap operas or game shows, on TV in the week but has not read the Bible at all. Everyone can make the freewill choice to put away the things of the world and spend more time and energy with the things of God. No one has to remain thorny soil.

• The person who is good soil: This is the person who hears the Word and understands it and brings forth fruit. The mistake that people can make when reading about this soil is assuming that the soil (person) was always that way—somehow inherently godly and God-knowing. Nothing could be further from the truth. Christ is talking about soil in a kind of overview of the person’s life. The person who is good soil started out as everyone else started: ignorant of the deep things of God and with worldly loves and attachments. But he or she put aside the things of the world and focused on the things of God and grew in the Word. Eventually his or her life produced great fruit. Everyone can be good soil if they want to badly enough.

“Pay attention.” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. Ordinarily it would have been good to translate this as “Listen,” but since the parable ends with a command to “listen” (v. 9), it would have seemed an undue emphasis to double up on that word, thus the translation here, “pay attention.” See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

13:9. “Anyone who has ears had better listen!” This is the same Greek phrase as Matthew 11:15 (see commentary on that verse). Jesus has just taught the Parable of the Sower (13:3-8), which shows that each person has the responsibility before God to do something godly with his life and bring forth fruit. Unfortunately, as the parable shows, many people will never do what it takes to bring forth fruit, but that does not absolve us from the responsibility to do so. Each person should heed the words of Jesus and strongly endeavor to bring forth fruit.

13:11. “sacred secrets”. We translate the Greek word musteron (#3466 μυστήριον) as “sacred secret” because that is what musteron actually refers to: a secret in the religious or sacred realm. [For more information on the “Sacred Secret” and the Administration of Grace, see Ephesians 3:9.]

13:13. “neither do they understand.” Why do the listeners not understand? Is it because they have covered their own ears and closed their hearts, as Matthew’s record portrays (13:14-15), or because God has blinded their eyes and hardened their hearts as John’s words could be read to say (John 12:38-40)? The answer comes only when we put these two records together and understand them in light of the entirety of scripture’s teaching on this subject.

Why did the Lord speak to the crowds with parables? To this question Christ could have responded that he takes his own advice, by not throwing his pearls before the swine. God says, “Do not speak in the hearing of a fool, for he will despise the good sense of your words” (Prov. 23:9). Parables are designed so that the hearers must think, seek, and even ask to understand. By speaking to the crowds in this way, the Lord separates those who have a will to listen and be healed from those who foolishly reject his teachings.

All three synoptic gospels record the parable of the Sower in the context of the fulfillment of the prophecy of Isaiah (Matt. 13:10-18; Mark 4:2-12; Luke 8:9-11). John does not relate the Sower parable but speaks of the prophecy of Isaiah: John 12:35-42. It is interesting that the Sower is related in this context, for this parable deals with how one’s heart is prepared to receive the Good News. In the parable of the Sower there is no indication that God decides what kind of soil one’s heart is. Rather, it is the own person’s responsibility to determine the nature of his heart’s soil. This is where the quotation from Isaiah comes in. Jesus says in Matthew the prophecy “is fulfilled” (3:14, present indicative), in that some of those listening had dull hearts and could barely hear, and further that they have chosen to close their eyes and ears lest they see, hear, understand, and turn. The Greek word for “lest,” mepote (#3379 μηποτε), is an indicator of negative purpose, showing they purposely intended to not see, hear, or understand. These Jews hardened their hearts against God.

John begins the record by pointing out even though Jesus had done so many signs before these people, they still did not believe in him (12:37). This “resulted in” another word of Isaiah being fulfilled regarding Israel’s unbelief: “Who has believed what he heard from us?” (12:38). The “resulted in” expression of this verse is a hina with a verb in the subjunctive result clause (see entry on Matt. 2:15, “resulting in...what was spoken being fulfilled”). John says it was “for this reason,” “on account of this,” (Greek: dia tutto) that these people could not believe (12:39). That is to say, because they rejected Jesus and refused to believe, “He has blinded their eyes and hardened their heart, lest they see with their eyes, and understand with their heart, and turn, and I would heal them” (12:40).

God is portrayed as doing the blinding and hardening in the passage in John. Yet we know from Matthew these people hardened their own hearts first by choosing not to believe. John tells us that it was because of this unbelief they were blinded. How are we to understand this blinding? It is not as though God actively hardens the hearts of those who close their eyes to the truth. Rather, he has allowed them to be blinded by setting in place a spiritual principal that while one is rejecting Jesus they are left in a state of spiritual blindness. It is the idiom of permission [See Graeser, Lynn, Schoenheit, Don’t Blame God, Ch. 4, and commentary on Romans 9:18]. Scripture teaches that in actuality, the Devil is the one who blinds these people: “In their case the god of this world has blinded the minds of the unbelievers, to keep them from seeing the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ” (2 Cor. 4:4); it is only when they turn to the Lord that the veil is taken away (2 Cor. 3:14-16). Unbelievers have dull hearts and ears that can barely hear, but whether they will turn to the Lord or decide to close their eyes is their free choice. If they turn to him, the veil is lifted off their hearts and they can see at last. But if they choose to reject Christ and close their eyes, as some did on this day, those people remain under Satan’s dominion of spiritual blindness. This is why Christ told these people, “The light is among you for a little while longer. Walk while you have the light, lest darkness overtake you… While you have the light, believe in the light, that you may become sons of light (John 12:35, 36).

Once someone rejects the light they are “overtaken” by darkness and God allows them to stay in this state until they turn to the Lord and are healed—so that Christ may be the only means of spiritual enlightenment. Only in the sense of this permission can it be said that God blinds them and hardens their hearts. Thus we can get to the proper understanding of these passages only if we consider the whole of scripture. We must put the records together to understand the full picture, that people first choose to harden their own hearts and as a result are left by God in a state of spiritual blindness.

When this record occurs in Mark 4:12 and Luke 8:10 it comes in the form of two purpose-result clauses (see entry on Matt. 2:15, “resulting in…what was spoken being fulfilled”), thus sandwiching the truth revealed in Matthew and John together into one perspective. They write that Christ’s teachings come in parables “so that” the people may see but not perceive, hear but not understand. The “so that” indicates the purpose and the result of the speaking in parables.

13:18. For an explanation of the parable of the Sower, see commentary on 13:3.
13:19. “Wicked One.” The Greek is poneros (#4190 πονηρός), which the BDAG Greek-English Lexicon describes as, “pertaining to being morally or socially worthless; therefore, ‘wicked, evil, bad, base, worthless, vicious, and degenerate.” Poneros is an adjective, but it is a substantive (an adjective used as a noun; for more on substantives, see the commentary on Matthew 5:37).

The Slanderer is the fount and foundation of wickedness. It was in him that wickedness was first found, when he was lifted up with pride and decided to rebel against God. Ever since that time he has been true to his name, “the Wicked One,” and has been doing and causing wickedness wherever he can, which, since he is “the god of this age,” is a considerable amount of wickedness. [For more names of the Slanderer (the Devil) and their meanings, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”].

13:25. “darnel.” The Greek word is zizantion (#2215 ζίζανιον) and it refers to the plant Lolium temulentum, or the Bearded Darnel. There are other varieties of Lolium, but they do not closely resemble wheat, and therefore are almost certainly not the plant referred to in the parable. The Bearded Darnel looks so much like wheat that it cannot be distinguished from it except by an expert, until the grain starts to form. The darnel grain is much smaller than wheat and dark brown. The seeds of the darnel were believed to be poisonous to men and animals (although not fowl). It has now been asserted by some botanists that it is not the seed of the darnel that is poisonous, but rather that it is easily susceptible to getting a mold that is poisonous (Harold and Alma Moldenke, Plants of the Bible, Dover Publications, NY, 1952). Nevertheless, the ancients, and even the modern Arabs, do not make any such distinction, and consider the seeds to be poisonous. The symptoms of eating the darnel include nausea, vomiting, diarrhea, convulsions, and sometimes even death. The roots of the darnel are quite extensive, and when it appears in a wheat field, become entangled with the roots of the wheat so that if anyone tried to pull up the darnel they would most certainly pull up the wheat also.

Using the translation “weeds” as many modern translations do misses much of the depth of the parable. People frequently “weed” their gardens, and it is not hurtful but even helps the other plants grow. Only by knowing that one cannot do that with darnel makes that part of the parable make sense. Also, the parable epitomizes “by their fruit you will know them,” because it is when the grain starts to appear that the darnel can be easily seen.

13:32. “Smaller...becomes a tree.” Although there has historically been some disagreement about it, today scholars identify the “mustard” in the parable as the common black mustard (brassica nigra). In the parable the man purposely grew this mustard in his garden, just as people still do today, and mustard was valued as a spice and for the oil it produced. Although these annual plants commonly grew to only 3 to 4 feet tall, much larger plants are regularly observed, some growing to 10-15 feet tall with a central stem as large as a man’s forearm, and especially in the fall as the lack of rain hardens the plant they are well able to support a bird’s nest (Plants in the Bible, p. 59, 60).

The context of Jesus’ statement about the size of the mustard seed is the man sowing seed in his garden, which is confirmed by the word “garden plants” (lachanon; #3001 λάχανον; a potable herb; a vegetable). This verse is not a botanical reference to the size of every seed known to man, but rather a comparison of the mustard seed to the other seeds a gardener would typically sow in his garden in the biblical world at the time of Christ. It is absurd, and a misuse and misunderstanding of how the Word of God is written, to try to prove an error in the Word of God by finding a seed smaller than a mustard seed. Harold and Alma Moldenke correctly point out, “Such statements as that concerning the size of the mustard seed must always be judged in the light of the knowledge of the time of the people involved” (Plants of the Bible; Dover Publications, 1952, p. 61). Furthermore, but less likely, Jesus may also have been using a natural hyperbole (exaggeration), a common figure of speech used in discourse, the same way many Westerners will say, “I am starving” when they are just hungry, or “I’m freezing” when they are just cold. The point of Jesus’ parable was that just as the mustard seed starts out very small but becomes very big, so too the Kingdom of Heaven seems to have a small start, but will one day fill the earth.

Matthew 17:20 and Luke 17:6 refer to “trust like a mustard seed.” The mustard seed is small, but it has complete trust that it can grow into the large garden herb. See commentary on Matthew 17:20.

13:33. Three satons of meal is about 9 gallons of meal.

13:35. Quoted from Psalm 78:2.

13:38. “the Slanderer.” This is “the Devil.” The Greek is diabolos (#1228 διάβολος). The Greek word diabolos means “slanderer,” the one who slanders others, and that is a primary characteristic of the Devil. He has no regard for a person’s reputation or the illicit means he uses to discredit and destroy people. Slander is a primary tactic of the Devil. [For commentary on the names of the Devil, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”].

13:40 “burned up.” The Greek is katakaiō (#2618 κατακαίω), and means to burn up, or to consume. It cannot be overstated that the weeds “burn up,” they do not burn forever. Similarly, the people who are unsaved will be burned up in Gehenna, they will not burn forever.

13:43. “Anyone who has ears had better listen!” This is the same Greek phrase as Matthew 11:15 (see commentary on that verse). Jesus has just finished teaching that wicked people will be burned in Gehenna, while godly people will live and shine in the Kingdom of God. This is not mere threats. There will be a Judgment and unsaved people will be annihilated in Gehenna while saved people will live forever. Everyone better listen and pay attention. [For annihilation in Gehenna, see commentary on Rev. 20:10].

13:46. “pearl.” Pearls were very expensive in the ancient world, and very highly valued. [For more on pearls, see commentary on Revelation 18:12].

“great value.” The Greek word is polutimos (#4186 πολύτιμος), and it means to be of great value, or very expensive. To say the pearl was of “great price” is not as accurate a translation today because many things are priced way above, and sometimes way below, their actual value. This pearl was of great value, but the only way we know the price was high was that the man had to sell all he owned to buy it.

13:47. “lake.” He was teaching from a boat on the Lake of Galilee, so the context dictates that thalasso be translated “lake.”

13:52. “has been discipled.” The Greek word mathēteuō (#3100 μαθητεύω) means to be a disciple, and the fact that it an aorist participle means that the disciple has graduated and finished his training and reached a level of expertise. It is related to the noun mathētēs (#3101 μαθητής; pronounced ma-thay-tase) “disciple.” Some versions have “has been instructed,” but we went with “has been discipled” to maintain consistency with the word “disciple.”
“new and old.” The person who has been well trained about the Kingdom of Heaven has wisdom and knowledge and applies it well. Some of it is old knowledge that has been around for many generations, some of it is new knowledge that has recently been revealed.

14:3. “put him in prison.” According to the records we have from Josephus, Herod Antipas put John in prison at Machaerus, his palace-fortress east of the Dead Sea. Machaerus was originally built about 90 BC by the Hasmonean king, Alexander Jannaeus (104 BC-78 BC). It is located about 15 miles (24 km) south and east of the point at which the Jordan River enters the Dead Sea. In 57 BC it was destroyed by Pompey's general Gabinius, but rebuilt by Herod the Great in 30 BC. Machaerus was the easternmost palace-fortress of Herod, and he strongly fortified it, in part due to its proximity to Arabia.

When Herod the Great died, the palace-fortress was passed to his son, Herod Antipas, who ruled from 4 BC until 39 AD, and who imprisoned and beheaded John the Baptist at Machaerus. Because Herod the Great built his palace in the center of the fortified area, we know the location Salome was when she danced before Herod Antipas and his guests and asked for the head of John the Baptist. Machaerus passed from Herod Antipas to Herod Agrippa I, and when he died in 44 AD, it came under Roman control. Jewish rebels took control after 66 AD during the First Jewish Revolt, but the Romans began a siege of the fortress in 72 AD. They built a wall of circumvallation around the fortress, and an embankment and ramp for the Roman siege engines, but the Jewish rebels surrendered before the Roman began their attack. The rebels were allowed to leave and the Romans tore the palace-fortress down, leaving only the foundations, which are still there today.

Some scholars think John was in prison for two years at Machaerus, but that is because they think Jesus had a three-year ministry. We believe Jesus’ ministry lasted only shortly over a year, from before Passover in 27 AD to Passover in 28 AD, and therefore the imprisonment of John would have been considerably less than a year. It seems clear that John was put in prison not too long after he baptized Jesus, because Jesus had not yet gone into Galilee and started his teaching nor had called out his disciples to follow him, who were later to be the apostles (Mark 1:14-16). However, John was imprisoned after Passover of 27 AD (compare John 2:13ff with John 3:22-24). John the Baptist was beheaded by Herod Antipas at his birthday celebration, but unfortunately we do not know when Herod’s birthday was. However, it was before the feeding of the 5000 (Matt. 14:13ff; Mark 6:32ff; Luke 9:10ff; John 6:1ff), and thus before the feast of Tabernacles, which occurred in our September/October (John 7:1ff). Actually, it was likely some months before Tabernacles, likely sometime in the summer months. Thus, if John was imprisoned in our April or May of 27 AD, and beheaded by October that same year at the latest, the most he would have been in prison is 6 months, but it was likely a much shorter time.

14:22. The record in Matthew 14:22-33 (Mark 6:45-51; John 6:15-21) is a good example of how different Gospels treat the records of Christ’s life, because all four Gospels record
Jesus feeding the 5,000, so what happens after that could be similar. We must keep in mind that although there is a “total picture” of what Jesus did, each Gospel portrays that in a different way to reveal and emphasize different things. The Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and John record Jesus walking on the water, but Luke says nothing about it at all. Only Matthew records that Peter walked on the water. This no doubt helped people recognize the primacy of Peter in relation to the rest of the apostles, and also showed that Peter’s personal doubt was created by fear and taking his eyes off Jesus, a valuable lesson. By leaving the Peter event off, Mark is better able to emphasize the hardness of the disciples’ hearts and that they had not gained insight from the multiplying of the loaves, something that would have been overshadowed by the Peter incident. Thus Mark emphasizes that we are all supposed to learn from the examples of Jesus—what Jesus did and what is recorded about him is not just for us to know, but for us to learn from in our own walks. The Gospel of John does not focus on Jesus’ interaction with the apostles at all, but keeps its focus on what Jesus said and did, thus elevating him as the Son of God.

“immediately he compelled.” See commentary on Mark 6:45.

14:25. “fourth watch of the night.” The fourth watch of the night started at our 3 AM. At the time of Christ, in both Jewish and Roman reckoning of time, the night was divided into four “watches,” each being three hours long (see commentary on Mark 6:48 and 13:35).

14:26. “Ghost” is from the Greek phantasma, which means “an appearance.” Something that would appear and be of the spiritual world. Ghost is not exactly a perfect translation, since “ghost” means the spirit of a dead person, while “phantasma” might be any sort of spiritual appearance. Nevertheless, the disciples yelling, “It is an appearance!” just does not seem to do the verse justice.

14:30. “saw.” The Greek is blepō (#991 βλέπω), and it means to see, but its range of meaning includes, “to notice, to pay attention to.” Peter was so focused on the Lord that even though he and the others had been fighting the wind, he did not pay attention to it. However, once he was away from the boat and out on the water, his attention once again turned to the strength of the wind and he “saw” it clearly.

14:34. “Gennesaret.” This is where Jesus and the disciples landed, and it is confirmed in Mark 6:53. The records of Matthew, Mark, and John must be understood in light of the storm, which was coming from the northwest, so that the apostles on the boat were rowing right into it. Jesus apparently told them to go “toward” (pros = toward) Bethsaida (Mark 6:45), and the Gospel of John says that the apostles were sailing “to” (eis = to, into) Capernaum (John 6:16). Thus, Capernaum is likely where Jesus told the apostles to go. Bethsaida was almost a suburb of Capernaum, which was a major city, and site of a tax office and Roman troops, so for travel purposes, the names Bethsaida and Capernaum were basically synonymous. However, when Jesus got on the boat, that is not where they eventually went. Both Matthew and Mark make it clear that the boat landed at Gennesaret, which was a fertile plain just south and west of Capernaum. At the time of Christ it was densely populated, and had a small city by the same name on it. According to Josephus, date palms, figs, walnuts, olives and grapes were all grown there. No doubt Jesus planned to go to Capernaum shortly, but landed at Gennesaret and healed people there, then made the short walk to Capernaum, where he was when the people found him (John 6:24).
Chapter 15

15:3. “even you yourselves.” The kai (#2532 καὶ) before the emphatic humeis (5210 ὑµεῖς) is not ‘also’ and does not place the Pharisees alongside of Jesus’ disciples [as if they too had sinned]; it signifies ‘even you yourselves,’ the very ones who are truly guilty of transgression, while they pretend to find transgression in others” Lenski, Matthew, p. 583.

15:4. Quoted from Exodus 20:12 (Deut. 5:16) and Exodus 21:17.

“doctrines.” The Greek word is didaskalia (#1319 διδασκαλία), a noun, and it has two primary meanings: It is used of the act of teaching or instruction (as if it was a verb), and it is also used for what is taught, i.e., the doctrine or material that was presented. In this verse we felt “doctrine” was better than “teaching.” [For more on didaskalia see commentary on 1 Tim. 4:13].

15:17. “toilet.” The Greek word is aphedrōn (#856 ἀφεδρόν), and it refers to a place where human waste goes: toilet, latrine, privy, sewer. By the time of Christ many of the larger cities had some kind of public toilets. Often they were seats over a kind of sluice that was periodically flushed by water. Also, some cities had very developed sewer systems. For example, Caesarea, on the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, had a sewer system that was flushed by the tide.

15:19. “insults.” The Greek noun is blasphēmia (#988 βλασφημία; pronounced blas-fay-me'-ah), and was used of someone speaking against another. The primary meaning as it was used in the Greek culture was showing disrespect to a person or deity, and/or harming his, her, or its reputation. [For more on blasphēmia, see commentary on Matt. 9:3].

15:22. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἵδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

15:23. “as she follows us.” The Greek reads, “from behind us,” which most versions translate “after us.” However, to cry out “after” someone can mean that you are chasing after, or “chasing,” the person (like “He is after me,” means “He is chasing me”), but that is not its meaning here. She was not chasing them. She knew they heard her and that she was being ignored. So she was walking behind them trying to get them to change their minds and help her; give her mercy. We tried to better capture the sense of the scene with “as she follows us.” Jesus was coming into the region of Tyre and Sidon, on the Phoenician coast, and was apparently walking down the road with the apostles following him. This woman followed the group, crying out as she went, “Have mercy on me!”

15:26, 27. (Cp. Mark 7:27 and 28)

“dog” = little dog. This verse is a wonderful example of how one reading the Bible must pay attention to the cultural background involved. Although Jesus was Jewish and most of the time in the Gospels the standards of Jewish culture apply, in this verse the standards of Greek culture apply. The Greek is kunarion (2952 κυνάριον), which is the diminutive of “dog.” It sometimes happened in the Greek and Roman world (although not in the Jewish world except among those who had given up being Kosher and were more apt to follow Roman customs) that “little dogs,” or “house dogs” were kept, and like our house dogs today, sometimes ate under (or beside) the table (Cp. Xenophon, Plato, Theophrastus, Plutarch, others. See Thayer’s lexicon and Liddell and Scott). The word can also refer to “puppies,” (Cp. Liddell and Scott; Vine) but that would probably not be the case here, since the woman was a Syrophoenician and would have been familiar with the Greek custom of having a little house dog that would eat by the table. The reference to the “little dog” is made only in the account of the Syrophoenician woman. There is no other use of kunarion in the Septuagint (Greek OT) or the Greek NT.

That Jesus would say “little dogs” is amazing grace. He did not, even by implication, call her a “dog,” which in Greek culture had overtones of shamelessness or audacity (cp. Liddell and Scott). Instead, by using the word “little dog,” or “housedog,” he only made a glancing reference that she did not deserve any help (but really, who does?). He opened a door of grace for her, and she walked through it. Also, he said it was not “good,” kalos (#2570 καλός), for the children’s bread to be thrown to the little dogs. He did not use the word “lawful” (exestin, # 1832). Rather, it was not “good” or “proper,” or “a fine thing to do.”

15:27. “for even...” It would not be correct to translate this as “but,” “however,” etc. The woman is not opposing Jesus in any way. She is merely pointing out that the little dogs do get crumbs when the family eats.

16:14. “Elijah.” For information on why the people thought that Elijah would come, and why John the Baptist was called “Elijah,” see commentary on Matthew 17:10.

16:18. “congregation.” This is the translation of the word commonly translated “Church,” ekklēsia (#1577 ἐκκλησία). Ekklēsia has a wide range of meanings, but none of them refer to a physical building. The word ekklēsia refers to an assembly of people, any assembly of people for any reason. It does not have to be a religious gathering. The gathering of people in Acts 19:32 was a mob coming together with no particular ethnic or religious affiliation, in fact, the Bible says, “most of them did not know why they had come together” (ESV). In Acts 7:38 the term is used of the Jewish throng, including some Gentiles (Exod. 12:38), who were led out of Egypt by Moses. Another example is Matthew 18:17, where the “congregation” could refer to a congregation of Jews or the Church. In that verse, “congregation” has a multidispensational application. So the term ekklēsia does not solely apply to the Christian Church.

In modern English the term “Church” refers to a Christian building of worship; however this is not how the word ekklēsia is used in Scripture. Translating ekklēsia as “Church” causes some problems, primarily because almost everyone who reads “Church” thinks of the Christian Church. But, as we have seen, ekklēsia does not always refer to Christians.
We do need to recognize that the most common use of ekklēsia is referring to Christians, but as a congregation of people, not as a “church” building. This is made clear in Colossians 1:18: Christ is “the head of the body, the church,” which refers to the entire world congregation of Christians (Cp. also: Acts 5:11). The term ekklēsia can be used solely of a particular local assembly of believers (e.g., 3 John 1:10), or to specific groups, which by extension applies to the entire Church (e.g., 1 Cor. 1:2; 2 Cor. 1:1; Gal. 1:2; Eph. 1:22). Lastly, ekklēsia is used in Revelation (2:1, etc.) in regard to the “congregation” after the Rapture. These are Jews and some God-fearing Gentiles, but not Christians, who have been Raptured off the earth before the book of Revelation starts (see commentary on Revelation 2:1).

16:19. “whatever you forbid on earth must be already forbidden in heaven, and whatever you permit on earth must be already permitted in heaven.” On the flyleaf of the paper cover to The New Testament: A Private Translation in the Language of the People, by Charles B. Williams (1953), the Greek grammarian Mantey, (co-author of the well-respected Greek grammar book, A Manual Grammar of the Greek New Testament by Dana and Mantey) introduced the translation by saying that Williams did a better job of translating the Greek verb into English than any other New Testament he had studied. One of the examples he gave was Matthew 16:19 and 18:18. These are almost always translated as: (NIV) “I tell you the truth, whatever you bind on earth will be bound in heaven, and whatever you loose on earth will be loosed in heaven.”

However, the phrase, “will be bound in heaven” is not a good translation of the Greek verb. The “to be” verb is not a simple future, but rather a future passive periphrastic (and thus is most accurately translated “shall have been”), while the verb “bind” is a perfect passive participle. Williams translates the verse as:

Matt. 16:19: “I will give you the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven, and whatever you forbid on earth must be what is already forbidden in heaven, and whatever you permit on earth must be what is already permitted in heaven.”

Matt. 18:18: “...whatever you forbid on earth must be already forbidden in heaven, and whatever you permit on earth must be already permitted in heaven.”

The 1995 revision of the New American Standard Bible follows that translation quite closely: Matt. 16:19: “I will give you the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven; and whatever you bind on earth shall have been bound in heaven, and whatever you loose on earth shall have been loosed in heaven.” Matt. 18:18: “Truly I say to you, whatever you bind on earth shall have been bound in heaven; and whatever you loose on earth shall have been loosed in heaven.”

Williams’ translation not only fits the Greek, but is how ministry actually works. God’s ministers do not make commands that God must then follow. Rather, God’s ministers work hard to be aware of what God is doing, and then follow His lead. God’s ministers follow God’s guidance, so what we bind or loose on earth must be inside the will of God, or what He has first done in heaven. Jesus himself worked that way, even as he said over and over: “So Jesus said to them, ‘Truly, truly, I say to you, the Son can do nothing of his own accord, but only what he sees the Father doing. For whatever the Father does, that the Son does likewise’” (John 5:19 ESV). “I can do nothing on my own. As I hear, I judge…” (John 5:30). “For I have come down from heaven, not to do my own will but the will of him who sent me” (John 6:38 ESV). “…I do nothing on my own authority, but speak just as the Father taught me” (John 8:28 ESV). “The words that I say to you I do not speak on my own authority, but the Father who dwells in me does his works” (John 14:10 ESV).

It is clear that even Jesus did not bind and loose on His own, without knowing the Father’s will. Similarly, we also must know what God has already bound or loosed in heaven before we try to act on earth. It is appropriate that when Jesus was giving Peter the keys to the kingdom, he also told Peter that he walk in the will of God and not try to bind or loose on his own. The ministry does not belong to people, it belongs to God and Jesus, and the minister of the Lord follows the leading of the Lord.

Robertson provides a wonderful explanation of this difficult verse, based on his extensive knowledge of Greek and understanding the use of the language at the time by the Rabbis. He writes: “The same power here given to Peter belongs to every disciple of Jesus in all the ages. Advocates of papal supremacy insist on the primacy of Peter here and the power of Peter to pass on this supposed sovereignty to others. But this is all quite beside the mark. We shall soon see the disciples actually disputing again (Mt 18:1) as to which of them is the greatest in the Kingdom of Heaven as they will again (20:21) and even on the night before Christ’s death. Clearly neither Peter nor the rest understood Jesus to say here that Peter was to have supreme authority. What is added shows that Peter held the keys precisely as every preacher and teacher does. To ‘bind’ (dêsêis) in rabbinical language is to forbid, to ‘loose’ (lusêis) is to permit. Peter would be like a rabbi who passes on many points. …The teaching of Jesus is the standard for Peter and for all preachers of Christ. Note the future perfect indicative (estai dedemenon, estai lelumenon), a state of completion. All this assumes, of course, that Peter’s use of the keys will be in accord with the teaching and mind of Christ. The binding and loosening is repeated by Jesus to all the disciples (18:18). Later after the Resurrection Christ will use this same language to all the disciples (John 20:23), showing that it was not a special prerogative of Peter. He is simply first among equals because on this occasion he was spokesman for the faith of all. …Every preacher uses the keys of the kingdom when he proclaims the terms of salvation in Christ.” (Word Pictures in the New Testament).

Robertson correctly states (above) that the Greek is a future perfect indicative, and could literally be translated “will have been bound…will have been loosed.” As he points out, this construction indicates a state of completion. Williams understands this when he translates the verse such that what we allow or forbid must be inside the will of God, or already allowed or forbidden in heaven. If God had wanted the verse to say that what we bind on earth will then be bound in heaven, the Greek would have been worded quite differently than it is.

16:21. “From that time Jesus began to show to his disciples…” Now that the disciples know that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God (Matt. 16:13-17; Mark 8:27-30; Luke 9:18-21) Jesus begins to tell them that he must suffer, die, and be raised from the dead. In spite of his clear teaching about it, however, they did not understand what he meant, and in this verse Peter even tried to stop Jesus from voicing it. [For more on Jesus’ clear teaching that he would suffer and die, see commentary on Luke 18:34].

16:22. “never, ever.” The Greek double negative ou me is usually translated “by no means” in the REV. However, in this case the reader may think that Peter is saying that Jesus could not be killed by any means known to man. The “never, ever” makes the point clear and preserves the double use of “no.” The disciples did not expect Jesus to be killed and then raised from the dead. That is simply not what most first-century Jews believed about the Messiah, so they did not understand what Jesus was speaking of when he spoke of being raised from the dead (see commentary on Luke 18:34).

16:23. “Get behind me, Adversary.” The Greek is hupago opiso satanas, “Go behind me, Adversary.” The Greek is similar to what Jesus said to the Adversary in Matthew 4:10, hupago Satanas “Go, Adversary.” It is most likely that what Jesus said to Peter was just a rebuke meaning “Get away from me” (International Critical Commentary, Matthew; Davies and Allison); “Get out of my sight” (Lenski; cp. Thayer, BDAG). However, the addition of opiso (“behind, after”), which can in certain contexts be translated “follow,” (“Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men”; Matt. 4:19, ESV) has led some people to conclude that Jesus is saying in essence, “Get following me,” meaning, “become a disciple again.” Although that is a lexical possibility, there are a couple reasons that militate against it. For one thing, if Jesus was telling Peter to be a follower again, it seems that he would not have added “Adversary.” After all, “Follow me again, Adversary,” does not seem very likely. Secondly, early scribes ascribed the same phrase to the Adversary himself in Luke 4:8. Although modern textual research shows that the phrase was added later, many Greek texts in the Western family have the same phrase in Luke 4:8 when Jesus was speaking to the Adversary (which is why “Get thee behind me, Satan” appears in the KJV). Thus it is clear that the early scribes did not think it was a request to return to being a proper follower, or disciple. Given the evidence, it seems that Jesus was strongly rebuking Peter, saying in essence, “Go away from me, Adversary,” a harsh rebuke that would have gotten Peter’s attention immediately, and caused him to think about the seriousness of the situation.

“Adversary.” The Greek word for Adversary is Satanas (#4567 Σατανᾶς), which has been transliterated into “Satan” in most versions. This causes the meaning of the word, which is important, to be lost. For more information on it, see the note on Mark 1:13. [For information on the names of the Devil, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”.

16:24. “he must.” Jesus’ statement contains three imperative verbs: “deny,” “take up” [lift up], and “follow.” In some cases, the imperative verb has the sense of an invitation, hence the traditional translation, “let him.” In this context, however, the sense of the verse is not an invitation, but a command, and a number of versions pick up on that fact (cp. HCSB; NAB; NET; NIV; The Source New Testament).

16:25. “life” (2x). The Greek word is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoo-kay’), often translated “soul.” The Greek word has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person or animal; an individual person; or attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. Here it refers to the physical life of the body, which is why most versions translate it “life,” which is accurate in this context. [For a more complete explanation of psuchē, “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’”].

16:26. “life” (2x). The Greek word is psuchē, as in verse 25. It is used twice in verse 25 of the life of the body, and it is expanded in this verse to be life in general, both here and the hereafter, which is why many versions translate it “life” in verse 25 but “soul” in verse 26 (ESV, KJV, NASB, NIV). We felt it was better to translate the word the same way in these two verses and point out that “life” can be just our physical life or our physical and everlasting life [For a more complete explanation of psuchē, “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’”].

16:27. “about to come” (Lenski; cp. Wuest, New Testament). Jesus spoke of his Second Coming and the events that surround it quite often. Some of these include, Matthew 16:27 (cp. Mark 8:38; Luke 9:26); 24:30-44 (Mark 13:26; Luke 21:27); 25:31-46; 26:64 (Mark 14:62); Mark 8:38; Luke 12:40; 17:24-30; John 14:3, 18; 21:22). The Old Testament is not nearly as clear about the first and second coming of the Messiah as the New Testament is, which makes sense because prophecies about something are never as clear as the events themselves. Nevertheless, even though somewhat veiled, Old Testament passages that speak of the Second Coming of Christ include Isaiah 63:1-6, Daniel 2:34, 35, 44; Zechariah 14:3-6, and there are many more that speak of Christ ruling the earth, which we know he does in his Second Coming.

The “Second Coming” is not “the Rapture,” which is a totally different event that is best described in 1 Thessalonians 4:16-18. In the Rapture, Jesus does not land on earth, but Christians are taken up into the air to be with Christ. There is a debate among Christians who believe in the Rapture (some do not believe there will be one) as to exactly when it will occur and whether it is before all the tribulation described in Revelation, during it, or after it, but all agree that the Rapture and the “Second Coming” when Christ physically comes to earth and conquers it, are different events.

“repay.” The Greek is apoodidomi (#591 ἀποδίδωμι), and it means to give or give out; to pay, repay, or fulfill a contractual obligation, to reward or give a recompense. It is used in both a positive sense (Matt. 6:4) and a negative, or bad sense (Matt. 12:36). In this verse, the word “repay” can refer to a good repayment, if the person has obeyed God, or a bad repayment, if the person has disobeyed God. Those people who have completely ignored God and not even gotten saved will be “repaid” by being thrown into the Lake of Fire and burned up (see commentary on Rev. 20:10). Those people who have gotten saved will be “repaid” with everlasting life, and also rewarded in the future Millennial Kingdom, for what they have done for Christ (see commentary on 2 Cor. 5:10, “good or worthless”).

17:2. “transfigured.” The event described in Matthew 17:1-9 (Mark 9:2-9; Luke 9:28-36) referred to as “the Transfiguration,” is a wonderful miracle of God’s grace, preparing Jesus for his torture and death by giving him a taste of his glorious future and by having him talk, via a revelation vision, with “Moses,” and “Elijah.” The Transfiguration shows how much God loved both Jesus and us, and it serves as a model and reminder that God is always at work behind the scenes to prepare people for the difficulties that they will face in life.

There are many aspects to the Transfiguration, and it raises many different questions, and these should be handled subject by subject. We will first consider whether the Transfiguration was the coming Kingdom. There are some theologians who say that the “Kingdom” Christ was referring to in Matthew 16:28 actually came in some form at the Transfiguration, because in verse 28 Jesus said that some of the disciples would not die until the Kingdom of God came.

There are several reasons why this cannot be correct. The first and foremost is that the Kingdom did not come at the Transfiguration. After all, none of the Kingdom promises were fulfilled and the angels that Jesus said would come did not come. Also, Christ did not sit on his throne, lions do not eat straw like the oxen nor lie down with domestic animals, neither the deserts nor the people of earth have been healed, and no one has been rewarded at the Judgment. In fact, there is nothing about the Transfiguration that indicates it was the coming of the Kingdom in any sense.

Jesus had been teaching that the Kingdom was near since he first started teaching and preaching, and there is no theologian who says that Christ’s message, “the Kingdom is near,” is actually saying, “the Transfiguration is near.” Jesus started teaching about the Kingdom in Matthew 4:17, and mentioned it some 30 times between then and the Transfiguration. Not once did the “Kingdom” Jesus spoke of refer to the Transfiguration. The “Kingdom” in Christ’s preaching refers to the coming Messianic Kingdom on earth [see Appendix 3, “The Meek Will Inherit the Earth”]. There is no justification for changing the meaning of “Kingdom” in Matthew 16:28 to mean the Transfiguration, which was new, unexpected, and only seen by three men, who were then told not to talk about it to anyone. The Transfiguration was not the “Kingdom.”

At the Transfiguration, Christ was given a taste of what he would be like in the future (he was clothed in white and he was glorious in appearance), but the subject being discussed was his death (Luke 9:31). The Kingdom could not come if the Messiah was an unacceptable sacrifice, and so his enduring to his death was extremely important. God gave Christ the vision to help prepare him for “his departure.” Many of the prophets of old, and certainly Paul and John, had visions of the future Kingdom. But it would be wrong to say that because Isaiah, Zechariah, Paul or John got a vision of the future Kingdom that meant that the Kingdom had actually come in some way, and it is wrong to say that because Christ had a vision of the Kingdom it had come. Matthew 17:9 clearly calls the experience a “vision,” although the NIV translation makes that point a little less clearly, saying, “What you have seen.”

Another reason to believe that Scripture does not equate the Transfiguration with the coming Kingdom is that one place the Transfiguration is recorded in is Luke 9, but after that, in Luke 11 Christ prayed in the Lord’s Prayer, “Your kingdom come.” If Christ prayed for the Kingdom to come after the Transfiguration, then the Transfiguration was not the Kingdom. Also, other scriptures after the Transfiguration mention the coming Kingdom, for example, Luke 12:40 speaks of the Son of Man coming; Luke 13:29 speaks of the banquet in the coming Kingdom, etc.

Another reason that the Transfiguration cannot be “the Son of Man coming in his Kingdom” is that Christ did not know that the Transfiguration was coming. It was a miracle done by God to help prepare Christ for his death. It was not foretold in prophecy nor anticipated in Scripture in any way. It certainly caught the only three witnesses by surprise. Jesus may have been given revelation that it was going to occur shortly before it happened, but none of the disciples knew anything about it. For Christ to tell his disciples that some of them would not die until he came in his Kingdom, and then somehow to expect them to realize that he was speaking about an unknown future event and not about the well-known Kingdom they and their ancestors had expected for years, makes that interpretation unacceptable. There is simply no good reason to equate the well-known and expected “Kingdom” with an unknown and unexpected vision of that Kingdom.

Lastly, it needs to be stated that if Christ were speaking of the Transfiguration in Matthew 16:28, then what he actually said does not make sense and is not factual. He said, “There are some standing here which shall not taste death [i.e., die] before they see the Son of Man coming in his Kingdom.” However, the Transfiguration occurred shortly after Christ made the statement. Luke 9:28 says it was about 8 days. It is almost certain that all of Jesus’ disciples were still alive 8 days later. Even if one of them had died, that is no justification for Jesus to say that only “some” would be alive. That Christ would prophesy that “some” of his disciples would be alive 8 days later makes no sense.

Furthermore, Jesus openly foretold that “some” of his disciples would still be alive to see the Kingdom. Remember, however, that only Peter, James and John were present at the Transfiguration, and they were strictly told keep it a secret (Matt. 17:9). If it was a secret between Jesus and 3 disciples, how could it be the fulfillment of Jesus’ public prophecy in any meaningful sense?

It can be concluded that it makes no sense at all that Christ would say that only some of his disciples would see him come in his Kingdom if what he was actually talking about was his Transfiguration. However, Christ knew the Old Testament very well, and he knew that many people would die in the Tribulation that would precede his Second Coming, Armageddon, and his setting up his kingdom on earth. Even if his Second Coming was very soon, after only seven years of Tribulation, it was still probable that most of his disciples would be killed. Thus it makes perfect sense for Christ to say that, after the Tribulation when the Son of Man came into his kingdom, only “some” would be alive to actually see it.

“Moses and Elijah.” To properly understand the Transfiguration, we must recognize that it was “a vision;” a spiritual experience. Moses and Elijah were not there in person, but only as part of the vision. Matthew 17:9 clearly calls the experience a “vision.” The Greek word translated “vision” is horama (#3705 ὁραμά), and besides here, it is used of visions in Acts 9:10, 12; 10:3, 17, 19; 11:5; 12:9; 16:9, 10; and 18:9. Many Bible versions translate the Greek text as “vision” (cp. HCSB; Darby; ESV; KJV; NASB; NET; NKJV; RSV; YLT). The NIV is not as clear, saying, “What you have seen.”

In the revelation experience at the Transfiguration, Jesus was transported to the future, to the exalted state he would have after his resurrection. The Bible says, “and his face shone like the sun” (Matt. 17:2), which is exactly how it was after he was glorified when he appeared to the Apostle John (Rev. 1:16); in fact, the promise of God is that after the resurrection, all the righteous people “will shine like the sun” (Matt. 13:43). And just as on that mountain that day Jesus was not yet actually glorified, neither were Moses and Elijah actually there in person. But the promise was that if Jesus succeeded in being a sinless sacrifice for the sins of mankind, he would be glorified, and also Moses and Elijah would really be raised from the dead in the Resurrection of the Righteous (Luke 14:14; Acts 24:15). The vision God gave Christ would one day be a reality if Jesus endured to the end, which he did.

God gave Jesus a revelation vision of what things would be like in the future for the same reason that He gave many prophets a vision of the future—for encouragement, strength, and hope. God gave Christ the vision to help prepare him for “his departure,” and the subject that “Moses” and “Elijah” discussed with Jesus was his death (Luke 9:31). Jesus was not the only one to whom God gave courage and hope by giving them a revelation vision of the future. Prophets such as Isaiah, Ezekiel, and Zechariah, had very clear revelations of the future, and so did New Testament figures such as Paul and John.
So while what God did for Jesus at the Transfiguration was very graphic, it was not materially different from what God had done to encourage others. This should show us the importance of having a clear hope, and building hope in the lives of others.

Although it is commonly taught that Moses and Elijah appeared in person at the Transfiguration, they were only there in a vision, not in reality. The Bible teaches that when a person dies, he is dead in every way, and not alive in any form until God raises him from the dead at the Rapture or one of the resurrections [see Appendix 4: “The Dead are Dead”].

Another clear reason that Moses and Elijah could not have been on the Mount of Transfiguration is that they could not be alive before Christ paid the price for their sin. If Moses and Elijah could get up from the dead and be in a glorified state before Jesus paid for their sin, then anyone could be raised before Jesus paid for their sin. In that case, there would have been no point in Jesus dying. Some people say, “Well, the body does die, but the soul lives on.” That cannot be correct. If the “souls” of Moses and Elijah could be as glorious as they were on the Mount of Transfiguration before Christ died for sin, then anyone’s soul could live with God in a glorified state before Christ died, so we again arrive at the conclusion that there would have been no need for the death and resurrection of Christ. The Bible is clear that until the death of Christ, no one’s sin had been paid for, which is why no one who had died could be alive in any form before the death and resurrection of Christ.

Another reason we know it was not really Moses and Elijah on the Mount of Transfiguration with Jesus is that 1 Corinthians 15:23 says that Christ is the “firstfruits” from the dead. However, if Moses and Elijah were alive on the Mount of Transfiguration in glorified bodies, then they were alive and glorified before Jesus got up from the dead. In that case, Jesus would not have been the “firstfruits” from the dead, but Moses, Elijah, or even some other godly person who died before they did would have been the real “firstfruits.” That cannot be the case. Moses and Elijah were not “firstfruits” before Jesus; they were a vision of the future.

Another reason that we know the Transfiguration event was a “vision” was that neither Jesus nor the Apostles would have known Moses and Elijah by sight. So part of the revelation vision was that Jesus, Peter, James, and John actually understood who and what they were seeing. God did not need to say, “Hey everyone, this is Moses and Elijah.” It often happens that when God gives someone a revelation vision, He also gives him an understanding of what he is seeing in the vision, and that is what happened on the Mount of Transfiguration.

It is sometimes taught that Elijah could be on the Mount of Transfiguration because he never died, but was taken directly up to heaven by God. This idea comes from 2 Kings 2:11, which says that Elijah “goeth up in a whirlwind, to the heavens” (YLT). To understand this verse we need to understand that the word “heaven” (“heavens” in the Hebrew), can refer either to the dwelling place of God, or to the air above the earth. That is why the Bible speaks of the birds of heaven (often translated “birds of the air), the rain from heaven, and the snow from heaven (2 Sam. 21:10; Deut. 11:11; Isa. 55:10). Elijah was taken by God’s whirlwind into the air, and moved away from Elisha, who could then take over his position as head prophet. Culturally, Elisha could never replace Elijah as long as Elijah was there, so God took Elijah away in a dramatic fashion.
The prophets with Elisha knew that God did not take Elijah to heaven, but to somewhere else on earth, and they begged Elisha to let them go look for him, which he finally allowed them to do. Of course they never found Elijah—God made sure of that, and Elisha stepped into the leadership role over the prophets of Israel.

Elijah eventually died somewhere on earth. We know that because the wages of sin is death, and Elijah was not sinless; no person has ever lived a sinless life except Jesus Christ. If God could take Elijah to heaven and give him everlasting life without Jesus dying for his sins, then God could have taken any good person to heaven before Christ paid for their sins, and the death of the Christ would have been unnecessary.

17:5. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

17:9. “from among the dead.” See Romans 4:24. Wuest says, “from among those who are dead.”

17:10. “Then why do the scribes say that Elijah must come first?” The religious leaders of Christ’s day taught that Elijah would come before the Messiah, a doctrine based on a misinterpretation of Malachi 4:5: “See, I will send you the prophet Elijah before that great and dreadful day of the LORD comes.” However, Elijah was long dead, and God did not raise him from the dead to live again before the time of the Messiah. To properly understand Malachi 4:5, we need to know that the name “Elijah” in that verse is the figure of speech Antonomasia, or “name change” (see Bullinger, Figures of Speech Used in the Bible). Antonomasia is the figure of speech in which one person is called by the name of another person in order to ascribe the characteristics of the second person to the one we are addressing. For example, we might say to a child who is jumping on the couch, “Stop that, Tarzan!” We know the child’s name is not “Tarzan,” but by calling him “Tarzan,” we ascribe the jungle behavior of Tarzan to the child. There are quite few examples of antonomasia in the Bible. Examples include:

- Jezebel called Jehu, “Zimri” (2 Kings 9:31) as a threat that his reign as king would be short if he killed her (which he did and still reigned for 28 years; 2 Kings 10:36).
- the Messiah (Jesus Christ) is called “David” because he shepherded the people like David did (Ezek. 37:24).
- Judah is called “Sodom” because it was so wicked (Isa. 1:10).
- John the Baptist is called “Elijah” because Elijah’s life and ministry paralleled John’s in many ways.

That John would be like Elijah was made clear to Zechariah by the angel Gabriel. When Zechariah was ministering in the Temple, Gabriel appeared to him and said that Elizabeth would have a son they were to name “John,” and he would go before God “in the spirit and power of Elijah” (Luke 1:17). For those who remembered the angel’s words years later when John started his ministry, it was clear that John was indeed the “Elijah,” who was to come.

17:11. “Elijah comes, and will restore all things.” Jesus knew that John the Baptist was “Elijah.” Here Jesus used the words of the doctrinal formula commonly used about Elijah by the religious leaders to show they were quite correct—Elijah was coming, but now he had already come. The Scribes had not been wrong when they said “Elijah is coming,” they just did not know to whom they referred and thus missed it when he was among them. Jesus, however, knew that “Elijah” was John the Baptist, as is clear from verses 12 and 13.

In this verse Jesus was referencing the promise in Malachi that Elijah would come. The verb “will restore” (ἀποκαταστήσεις) appears here in the same form as in the Septuagint text, an echo of the fact that Jesus, speaking Hebrew or Aramaic, would have been using the same vocabulary as Malachi. The Apostles were not confused by Jesus saying John “will restore” things because they knew the Old Testament text and Jesus immediately followed up what he said by adding that “Elijah” was John. Since John was already dead (see Matt. 14:1ff), it was clear that he was not going to restore anything. That was now left to Jesus. We learn from Mark that John the Baptist came to restore things and tried unsuccessfully to do so, thus being one of the reasons that the Messiah would have to suffer (see commentary on Mark 9:12).

17:18. “And Jesus subdued him.” The “him” refers to the demon. This is a good example of how spiritual insight and being a “sympathetic listener” (one who is looking for the author’s meaning, not stumbling at every “possible meaning”) is necessary to understand the text. Jesus did not “subdue” the child.

“subdued.” The Greek word translated “subdued” is epitimaō (#2008 ἐπιτιµάω). Usually epitimaō means to express strong disapproval of someone: rebuke, reprove, censure; or to speak seriously, and thus warn in order to prevent or end an action. It can also mean “punish” (cp. BDAG Lexicon). However, in this context, epitimaō has the technical meaning it has in Greek religion of gaining control over a spirit, a demon. Robert Guelich (Word Biblical Commentary: Mark) notes that in contexts like these epitimaō is “a commanding word uttered by God or by his spokes- man, by which evil powers are brought into submission.” Jesus subdued the demon by the power of God that he wielded, his power, which he expressed in words.

The demon would not respond to just being “rebuked.” Therefore, we cannot agree that Jesus “reproached the demon for having taken possession of the boy” (Meyer). For a “rebuke” to be effective, the hearer must have a heart to listen to and obey God, and demons do not have that kind of heart. The demon had to be dealt with by spiritual power. See commentary on Mark 1:25.

17:20. “trust like a mustard seed.” This phrase has been mistranslated in a number of versions, resulting in a confusing and Jesus giving a teaching contradictory to the context. The context of Jesus’ statement is that Jesus’ disciples were not able to cast a demon out of a boy (17:16) and wanted to know why (17:19). Jesus told them it was because of their little trust (17:20). At that point the Greek text says: “If you have trust [faith] like a mustard seed….” How much trust does a mustard seed have? Total trust! It may look small to the world, but it has no doubt that it can do what God created it to do and become the largest garden herb. That is the point Jesus is trying to make. It does not matter what he, or his disciples, looked like to the world, if they have the same kind of total trust that a mustard seed does, they could move mountains.

Unfortunately many translations entirely miss the point that Jesus was making. For example, the NIV84 has Jesus saying, “…if you have faith as small as a mustard seed….” But they added the word “small,” which is not in the Greek text, and that added word completely turns the parable upside down. Other versions that add words about the size of the mustard seed include the HCSB, NET, and NRSV. The problem the disciples had was that their trust was too small for them to cast out the demon. So Jesus is not saying if they had small faith they could move mountains—that is the opposite of what he is saying! Small faith won’t cast out demons or move mountains. But total trust, like the tiny mustard seed has in its ability to grow into a huge plant, will cast out demons and move mountains.

17:21. This verse was added to some texts by being copied from Mark 9:29. The textual evidence is quite clear that it was not in the original version of Matthew.

“betrayed.” Jesus’ teaching that he (the Messiah) was going to be betrayed, suffer, and die, was so contrary to what the disciples believed that they could not grasp his clear teaching about it. See commentary on Luke 18:34

17:23. “kill him.” For more on Jesus’ clear teaching that he would suffer and die, see commentary on Luke 18:34.

17:25. “poll-tax.” The Greek word is κῆνσος (#2778 κῆνσος). In the NT it referred to the tax or tribute levied on individuals, and it was to be paid yearly. See commentary on Mark 12:14.

17:27. “lake.” The Sea of Galilee, see context, v. 24. They were in Capernaum, right beside the Sea of Galilee.

Chapter 18

18:9. “Gehenna.” See commentary on Matthew 5:22. [For information on annihilation in the lake of fire, see Appendix 5: “Annihilation in the Lake of Fire”].

18:11. The textual evidence is that this verse was not in the original text, but was added by copyists to harmonize with Luke 19:10. See Metzger, Textual Commentary.

18:19. “again.” The Greek word palin (#3825 πάλιν), here rendered as “again,” could be translated “furthermore.” The sense of the word is described by BDAG as a “marker of a discourse or narrative item added to items of a related nature, also, again, furthermore, thereupon” The word is not necessarily totally changing subjects but introducing a slightly related subject—that is, the topics of binding and loosing covered in verses 18 and of agreeing together in verse 19 are technically different subjects, although they are slightly related. Other examples of palin being used to change subjects are Matthew 5:32-33 and 2 Corinthians 11:15-16.

18:22. “seventy times seven.” Forgiveness: “77” or “70 times 7?” The versions differ. The King James Version says, “Jesus saith unto him, I say not unto thee, Until seven times: but, Until seventy times seven.” In contrast, the NIV says: “Jesus answered, ‘I tell you, not seven times, but seventy-seven times.’”

Although the Greek reads in a way that means seventy times seven in regular Greek, Matthew 18:22 may not be “regular” Greek. The Greek in Matthew 18:22 is the exact wording of the Septuagint (LXX) of Genesis 4:24, where Lamech is bragging to his wives about the vengeance he will take on his enemies: “77” times. The Hebrew text of Genesis 4:24 is very clear: 77 times, and very noted linguists assert that the accepted translation of the LXX came into Greek usage such that what in classical Greek meant “70 times 7,” in this biblical context of revenge and forgiveness it meant “77.” If this is the case, Jesus was contrasting the vengeful Lamech, who stated he would avenge himself “77 times” with the behavior of a godly person, who should forgive “77 times.” If the illusion is to Lamech, it forces us to be forgiving, but also to face the end of our forgiving. Will we act like the vengeful Lamech, willing to take vengeance on those we will not forgive?

Scholars who assert that the number should be “70 times 7” play down the association with Lamech and assert that the standard reading of the Greek should apply here. Some argue that “77 times” is not enough, and that the larger figure, 70 times 7, is a hyperbole (exaggeration), which was common in oriental thought. In that case, the hyperbole would be simply making the point that all the forgiving we can do is not enough—we must keep on forgiving.

Michael Hall (unpublished manuscript) pointed out that there were 70 periods of 7 in Daniel 9:24, from the going forth of the commandment to restore Jerusalem until the Messiah came and set up the Millennial Kingdom. Thus, he suggested that “70 times 7” was a veiled way of saying, “until the Millennial Kingdom.” If that is the case, then Jesus told us to forgive and forgive until this age of sin is over and he sets up his kingdom on earth. Mitigating against that idea are the number of scriptures showing that sin and forgiveness will still be necessary in the Messianic Age. Although Christ will reign, he will rule with a rod of iron, and although he, and the judges he appoints, will judge justly, they will still have to “settle disputes for many peoples” (Isa. 2:4). Furthermore, the existence of the Temple and the sin offering (Ezek. 43:19ff) show that mankind will still make mistakes and need forgiveness.

There is a good reason why scholars are in profound disagreement about this verse: the real meaning is not clear. If we had the original Hebrew or Aramaic that Jesus was speaking we could be sure, but we do not have them. It could also be argued that Jesus knowingly used a number that was unclear, driving us to both conclusions at the same time: by hyperbole, we should always forgive people, and by comparison, when we refuse to forgive any more, we become like ungodly Lamech who boasted of his revenge. However, there is no way to know that either.

18:23. “That is why.” The Greek is dia touto, and it connects the parable which follows with the forgiveness in the verses above. Jesus was teaching on unlimited forgiveness, and after making the statement that Peter should forgive seventy time seven times, he said, that is why what we should be doing can be compared to the Kingdom of Heaven, because God practices unlimited forgiveness (cp. Meyer’s Commentary on the New Testament and New Testament Commentary: Matthews, by W. Hendrickson).

18:24. “ten thousand talents.” Different cultures had different talents, but most scholars believe Christ would have been referring to the Attic talent, which was equal to 6,000 denarii, or 6,000 days wages. One denarius (the plural is denarii) was a day’s wage for a field hand or a soldier. Different classes of workers worked different weeks, most would work 6 days per week in the biblical world. If we assume they would have 2 weeks off for sickness and perhaps a small vacation, the worker would work 50 weeks, or 50 X 6 days, which equals 300 days. Thus, to be paid a talent he would work 6000 ÷ 300, or 20 years. If one talent was 20 years wage, then 10,000 was the wages for 200,000 years, or 60 million days. To arrive at an idea of how much money is being referred to, if a field hand made $8 per hour ($64 per day), then 1 talent was $384,000, and 10,000 talents was $3,840,000,000 dollars (3 billion, 840 million dollars), a ridiculously huge sum. According to Josephus, the total taxes that Judea, Samaria and Idumea made to imperial Rome was only 600 talents a year. The figure is meant to make the point that no one can ever actually pay off their debt to God. Another way of looking at the debt would be that a minimum wage worker would have to work 6,000 days times 10,000 talents, or 60 million days to work off the debt. Even if a person had a working life of 100 years he or she would only work 30,000 days, far short of the 60 million he would need to pay off the debt. At the time of Christ the average lifespan for a woman was in the early 30’s and for men it was their late 30’s. Since a person usually only worked about 300 days per year, if a boy started to work at 10 and worked to 50, he would only work 12,000 days in his life, not even getting a good start on the sixty million days needed to work to pay his debt.

18:25. “His lord commanded him to be sold…” Slave owners were under no obligation to keep families together, and it was common for slave families to be separated by being sold one by one to others, although sometimes more compassionate owners tried to keep families together. This was at least as true in Rome as in Israel and the other countries of the East. Furthermore, people sometimes even sold their own children to pay their debt (Nehemiah 5:5).

18:28. “one hundred denarii” = one hundred days wages, which, by the figures given for v. 24 above, would be $6,400. Not a small sum, but infinitesimal compared to the 10,000 talents. Jesus made an important point in his parable. Notice that he did not act as if the slave was owed nothing by his fellow slave. When people sin against us it hurts, sometimes very deeply. Jesus knows that and used the figure of 100 denarii to demonstrate that the debt we feel that is created by the sin of others is very real. Nevertheless, if we keep in mind how much we have been forgiven for, we can forgive it.

18:34. “the torturers.” Prisoners were often tortured, and it could even be said that prison itself was a torture. It certainly was not a good place to be. At the time Jesus was teaching, under the Law Administration, salvation was not guaranteed, and thus if lack of forgiveness was profound enough to destroy a person’s trust (“faith”) in God, it could jeopardize his everlasting life. Today in the Grace Administration, everlasting life is guaranteed after a person has trust in Christ, but rewards are not, so profound disobedience in the form of unforgiveness could lead to a loss of rewards in the Kingdom. There is, however, another truth that must be considered about the torturers. Anyone who lives in unforgiveness tortures himself. It is a constant weight on the shoulders that produces unhappiness, and robs the individual of peace and joy. The person who refuses to forgive hands himself over to the torturers who relentlessly do their work.

19:5. Quoted from Genesis 2:24, occurs again in Mark 10:7.

“be glued to.” The Greek word is kollaō (#2853 κολλάω), and Thayer’s Lexicon says, “properly, to glue, glue to, glue together, cement, fasten together; hence universally, to join or fasten firmly together; in the N. T. only the passive is found.…”

19:16. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (αδου), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”). The “Look!” (the figure of speech asterismos) in this verse is important, because it shows that it was considered remarkable that someone (especially someone well off) would come to Jesus and ask how to have everlasting life. How many people actually seek everlasting life, especially rich people?

19:21. “If you really want to reach the goal.” The Greek word teleios (τελειος) refers to bringing something to an end, a finish; bringing to completeness, maturity, perfection, or to a goal. In this case, the word “perfect” can be misleading. The man wanted to have everlasting life, which Jesus said he could have by keeping the commandments (v. 17). However, when the man pressed in and asked if he lacked anything, Jesus took the conversation to a new level, and said if you really want to reach your goal, sell all you have and you will have treasure stored up in heaven [that treasure would be actually conferred when the Lord set up his kingdom on earth; see Appendix 3: “Christ’s Future Kingdom on Earth”].

19:24. “camel.” Here, “camel” is a hyperbole, and exaggeration to make a point. Jesus’ illustration is not extreme given the fact that Jesus, and Orientals from that era in general, were fond of hyperbole (cp. Luke 6:41, a person having a “beam” in his eye). As the “gnat” in Matthew 23:24 is a real hyperbole, so also is the camel. For the idea of the needle’s eye being a gate, or the “camel” being a “rope,” see commentary on Luke 18:25.

19:26. “With people...with God.” The key to understanding this passage, and the parallel passage in Mark, is the word “with,” which is the Greek preposition para (παρα). See commentary on Mark 10:27.

19:27. “Look.” The Greek word is idou (αδου), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”). Here it is not spoken with great force, but to remind Jesus of the sacrifices the apostle[s] had made.

“...so then what will we have?” Peter’s question is a good one, and one that all of us should be asking more. All of us are either like the rich man in verses 16-22 who hold on to worldly things and lose out on heavenly things, or we are like Peter who has “left everything” and will have great reward in the kingdom.

19:28. “New Beginning.” The words New Beginning are from the Greek word paliggenesia (παλιγγενεσια), a compound word that means “new origin” or “new birth.” It is comprised of palin, meaning “again,” and gennēsis, “origin” (the Greek word used for the Book of “Genesis”). Here in Matthew paliggenesia is used as a technical term for the Messianic Age (the HCSB translates the word “Messianic Age”). The only other usage in Scripture is Titus 3:5, which uses the term in a totally different context, and refers to the new beginning given to Christians when they are born again and receive holy spirit.

Christ’s Millennial Kingdom lasts 1000 years (Rev. 20:2-4) and is Christ’s kingdom on earth. Jesus will one day come back to earth, fight the battle of Armageddon, and set up a kingdom that fills the earth (Rev. 19:11-21; Dan. 2:34, 35, 44; The name “Armageddon” comes from Rev. 16:16, the place where the enemy kings are gathered). Jesus’ kingdom on earth is so different from our current fallen world and this present evil age that the Bible calls it a new beginning or new creation. Here in Matthew 19:28 Jesus calls it a paliggenesia, a new beginning. Isaiah 65:17 says God will create a new heaven and earth (this is a different creation from the final heaven and earth of Rev. 21:1, which are also called a new heaven and earth). Peter called it the “restoration of all things” (Acts 3:21). The Bible also calls this future earth “paradise,” and it is the earth that the meek will inherit when they are raised from the dead. [see Appendix 3, “Christ’s Future Kingdom on Earth”].

The wonderful teaching of the new earth that saved people will enjoy is almost completely unknown by Christians due to the unbiblical teaching that “heaven” is the eternal home of those who are saved. But the Bible is clear that Jesus comes back to earth, and when he does, the saved will be where he is.

19:29. “will receive a hundredfold.” Not everyone who is saved and receives everlasting life will receive the same reward on the Day of Judgment. Those people who have obeyed God’s commands, and done more for Christ, will receive more (see commentary on 2 Cor. 5:10, “good or worthless”).

Chapters 20

20:3. “third hour.” About our 9 AM. The original workers had likely started about 6 AM, the start of the day, and when hired for a day were expected to work until 6 PM; 12 hours.

Both the Jews and Romans divided the day into 12 hours, starting at daylight, roughly 6 AM. The start of the Christian Church on the Day of Pentecost, marked by the outpouring of the gift of holy spirit, occurred at the third hour of the day (cp. Acts 2:15). [For the hours of the day and the watches of the night, see commentary on Mark 6:48].

20:5. “sixth hour; ninth hour.” The sixth hour is our noon, and ninth hour is our 3 PM. Both the Jews and Romans divided the day into 12 hours, starting at daylight, roughly 6 AM. [For the hours of the day and the watches of the night, see commentary on Mark 6:48].

20:6. “eleventh hour.” The eleventh hour is roughly 5 PM. (see commentary on 20:5). The workers were hired at the eleventh hour, and were expected to work until 6 PM.

20:8. “evening having come.” This is defined in verse 12 as 6 PM. The last workers started at the eleventh hour, 5 PM, and worked only one hour.

20:15. “Is your eye evil.” Meaning, are you greedy for more, covetous of what the others received? The “evil eye” was idiomatic in Semitic languages for someone who was greedy, covetous, and stingy. In Western cultures, the “evil eye” was a look or glance that meant harm and brought harm, but there is no evidence it was used that way in the Bible. See commentary on Matthew 6:22.

20:18. “Pay attention.” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

20:21. “drink the cup.” “Drinking the cup” was a common idiom meaning to experience, whether that experience was good (cp. Ps. 16:5; 23:5; 116:13; Jer. 16:7) or

20:28. “life.” The Greek word is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoo-kay’), often translated “soul.” The Greek word has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person or animal; an individual person; or attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. Here it refers to the physical life of the body, which is why most versions translate it “life,” which is accurate in this context. This verse is evidence that the soul does not continue on after the body dies. Jesus gave up his soul and died so that others could have life. [For a more complete explanation of psuchē, “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’”].

“ransom.” The Greek word is lutron (#3083 λύτρον; pronounced loo’-tron). In the Greek literature, the lutron, “ransom” was the price paid for the release of a slave or prisoner of war. See commentary on Mark 10:45.

20:30. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

Chapter 21

21:5. Quoted from Isaiah 62:11 and Zechariah 9:9

“Hosanna.” The people who were shouting praises to Jesus as he entered Jerusalem were for the most part not the same group as the group that shouted, “Crucify him” only a few days later. See commentary on Luke 23:21.

21:19. “a lone fig tree by the path.” This is an important addition, because it tells us that the fig tree was not owned by anyone, but was public property. Jesus did not destroy private property.

21:21. “trust.” To properly understand “trust” in this verse, see the commentary on 1 Corinthians 12:9, “trust.”
“this mountain.” Jesus was on the Mount of Olives, where both Bethany and Bethphage were.

“snatched up.” The Greek is airō (#142 αἰρω; pronounced eye-rō), and it is passive voice, imperative mood. Although it would be very literal to say, “Be taken up,” the imperative mood combined with the context, moving a mountain at your command, gives the sense that the mountain is being snatched up out of its place and thrown into the ocean.

“doubt.” See commentary on Mark 11:23.

21:25. “discussed it among themselves.” The Jewish rulers were lying to Jesus, and he knew it (cp. v. 32). John 2:25 says that Jesus knew what was in people. The Jews believed that John’s baptism was from man and had no divine authority whatsoever, but they would not say so publicly. This kind of thing goes on all the time in religion, business, and politics. People lie to get an advantage. That is why we have to be “wise as serpents” and walk by revelation if we are going to do well in the world.

Jesus did not want to answer the question that the Jews asked about where he got his authority. He knew they would only use the information against him. He also knew that if he asked them the right question, in this case about John, he could stop their attack, which is exactly what happened. We have to follow Jesus’ example and realize that many people will use what we say against us, so we have to rely on God to know what is really going on in the hearts of people and what we should or should not say.

21:29. “changed his mind.” The Greek is metamelomai (#3338 µεταμέλομαι); but it is sometimes spelled with two “L”s and it has two distinct meanings in the NT: 1) to change one’s mind; and to regret; be ashamed over; feel remorse for, or 2) to reproach oneself for what one has done. It occurs five times in the NT: Matthew 21:9, 32; 27:3; 2 Corinthians 7:8; Hebrews 7:21.

21:33. “Hear another parable.” This parable is a clear reference to the parable of the vineyard in Isaiah 5:1-7, except in Isaiah the vineyard is itself Israel, and is wicked, while in Jesus’ parable the vineyard is God’s and it is the people who are hired to tend it who are evil. Jesus was using thinly veiled language to speak of the leaders of the Jews, who had been entrusted by God to take care of His vineyard, i.e., His people, but were evil. The Jews got his point (v. 45), and wanted to arrest him but were afraid of the people. This parable appears here in Matthew 21:33-46; Mark 12:1-12, and Luke 20:9-19.

21:42. Quoted from Psalm 118:22, 23.

“Yahweh.” “Yahweh” is the personal name of God, and a rabbinic abbreviation for it appears in the Hebrew manuscript of Matthew as well as in the verses of the Old Testament that Matthew quoted. There is evidence that Matthew wrote a Gospel in Hebrew and used the name Yahweh, so we have put it in the REV (see commentary on Matthew 3:3).

22:4. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ιδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).
22:14. “For many are called, but few are chosen.” This verse is quoted as if God was the one who did the choosing, but in fact it is solid evidence that God chooses those who first choose Him. We cannot ignore the parable and just interpret the conclusion like we want to. In the parable, the king invited people to the feast, but the first people who were invited “did not want to come” (v. 3). Then the king sent more people to invite them again, but they “paid no attention” (v. 5). Worse, they not only declined the king’s invitation, they mistreated the servants who were sent to invite them (v. 6). So the king invited others and they came to the feast (v. 10). Thus it is clear that the “chosen” are “chosen” because, as well as God choosing them, they chose God.

22:17. “poll-tax.” The Greek word is κῆνσος (#2778 kēnsoς). In the NT it referred to the tax or tribute levied on individuals, and it was to be paid yearly. See commentary on Mark 12:14.

22:19. “poll-tax.” The Greek word is κῆνσος (#2778 kēnsoς). In the NT it referred to the tax or tribute levied on individuals, and it was to be paid yearly. See commentary on Mark 12:14.

22:23. “who say there is no resurrection.” At the time of Christ the High Priest and the majority of the Sanhedrin, the Jewish ruling counsel in Jerusalem, were Sadducees. The Sadducees denied the legitimacy of the “oral law,” and for the most part saw themselves as drawing their beliefs directly from the Torah, the five books of Moses (Genesis-Deuteronomy). On that basis, they denied the resurrection from the dead, and believed that both the body and soul of a person died and were gone forever. For the Sadducees, there was no Messianic Hope promised by God. There is evidence that because the Sadducees believed that they had no life but their one life, they tried to capitalize on every advantage they could in this life, which, as one can imagine, led to stretching moral boundaries to the breaking point. Thus the Roman guard could tell the priests that an angel had rolled back the stone of Jesus’ tomb and that Jesus had risen from the dead, and the priest, rather than say they were wrong about Jesus and jeopardize their position of power, bribed the guards to say Jesus’ disciples stole his body.

22:25. “Now there were with us seven brothers...” The Sadducees cite this as if it was a real case, and it probably was. Jesus did not try to refute their example. If there was one woman married to two brothers, that would have been good enough to make their case, but the Sadducees had a more involved example, so they used it.

22:29. “You err.” You are mistaken. Lenski asserts that the verb may be taken in a middle sense, “you are deceiving yourselves,” and he may be right.

“not having known the scriptures.” The Sadducees were misusing Moses’ teaching on what came to be called the “Levirate Law,” that if a man died, his brother would marry the widow and have children by her to preserve the name of the brother (Deut. 25:5-10). There is no reason to assume conditions on earth in the resurrection will be the same as they are in this life. Moses certainly did not teach that they were, so the Sadducees were taking a liberty with the text that had no foundation in truth.

Furthermore, the Scriptures clearly teach a resurrection from the dead (see verse 32). Even though the Sadducees only take the Torah (Genesis-Deut.) as authoritative, there is certainly an afterlife implied in the Torah. Abraham believed God would raise Isaac from the dead, for example. Moses knew there was a book of life (Exod. 32:32). Furthermore, Job, who lived around the time of Abraham, certainly knew about it (Job 19:25ff).
Besides, the Sadducees were in error in rejecting the Word of God spoken through the prophets, saying it was not Scripture.

“nor the power of God.” In denying the resurrection from the dead, the Sadducees denied the power of God. Furthermore, God is not only able to raise dead people to the state they were before, i.e., living, it is in His power to raise them such that they will be different from how they were on earth. On earth, we have a need for children and families, but that may not be the case in the next life. Our fleshly bodies will change.

“…the doctrine of the future state was there [in the Scripture], and the Sadducees should have believed it as it was, and not have added the absurd doctrine to it that men must live there as they do here. The way in which the enemies of the truth often attempt to make a doctrine of the Bible ridiculous is by adding to it, and then calling it absurd” (Barnes’ Notes; verse 29.)

“but are as the angels in heaven.” The assumption is that angels do not marry and have families. That will be the case with us in the next life. There are some important things to pay attention to in this verse. One is that Jesus said we will be like the angels, not that we become angels. There are people who believe when a believer dies, he or she goes to heaven and becomes an angel. That is not the case. The context of this section is marriage, and when it comes to marriage, resurrected believers will be like angels in that they do not marry.

Also, this verse comes as close as any to addressing the question about whether or not there will be sexual intercourse in the next life, but it does not settle the issue completely. It is possible but unlikely that angels have sexual intercourse. There is no indication in Scripture that angels participate in sexual intercourse with each other. The most likely case is that human sexual drive was given by God to insure the future of the race, and that there will be no sexual drive in our new bodies. Without any sexual drive or desire, there would be little point to sexual intercourse. It is true that sexual intercourse is exciting and fulfilling here on earth, but again, that is most likely the design of God so that the race could continue.

“Yahweh.” “Yahweh” is the personal name of God, and a rabbinic abbreviation for it appears in the Hebrew manuscript of Matthew as well as in the verses of the Old Testament that Matthew quoted. There is evidence that Matthew wrote a Gospel in Hebrew and used the name Yahweh, so we have put it in the REV (see commentary on Matthew 3:3).

22:32. “I Yahweh am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob.” Taken from Exodus 3:6. Jesus uses this verse to show that the Torah teaches a resurrection from the dead. God did not say that He “had been” the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, but rather that he was the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. That is, that he was still their God, and would actively be so when they were raised from the dead.

Some would say that the present tense of the verb proves that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were alive in heaven at that time (and now), but the context is clearly “the resurrection,” (used four times in the context: verses 23, 27, 30, and 31).

“Yahweh.” The name “Yahweh” appears in the Hebrew text of Matthew. Yahweh is the personal name of God, and a rabbinic abbreviation for it appears in the Hebrew manuscript of Matthew. There is evidence that Matthew wrote a Gospel in Hebrew and used the name Yahweh, so we have put it in the REV (see commentary on Matthew 3:3).

22:35. “testing him.” The Greek word translated “testing” is peirazō (#3985 πειράζω; pronounced pay-ra’-zō), which can mean to tempt or to test. In this case, “test” is better. Behind this questions by the Pharisee was a swirling undercurrent of group rivalry coupled with suspicion about Jesus. The Sadducees and Pharisees differed greatly about what were the commandments in the Law. The Sadducees only accepted commandments in the 5 books of Moses, while the Pharisees thought there were many more. Thus, when the Pharisees heard that Jesus had silenced the Sadducees, they were looking for even more ammunition against them, and would have been happy to have more to hold against Jesus as well. Thus they wanted to see what this young Rabbi from the Galilee could add to the ongoing debate about the commandments.

22:37. Quoted from Deuteronomy. 6:5.

“Love.” This is an instance of the verb “love,” agapao, (#25 ἀγαπάω) being in the future tense and the indicative mood but being used idiomatically as a present imperative (see Robertson, Grammar, p. 330). Given the imperative mood of “love,” it would be quite correct to translate this verse: “You must love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind.” (cp. this command in Mark 12:30 and see commentary on Mark 12:30).

“Yahweh.” “Yahweh” is the personal name of God, and a rabbinic abbreviation for it appears in the Hebrew manuscript of Matthew as well as in the verses of the Old Testament that Matthew quoted. There is evidence that Matthew wrote a Gospel in Hebrew and used the name Yahweh, so we have put it in the REV (see commentary on Matthew 3:3).

“soul.” The Greek word often translated “soul” is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoo-kay’), and it has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person or animal; an individual person; and attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. Here psuchē is used very broadly, but certainly includes the attitude, feelings, and emotions of the person himself. [For a more complete explanation of “soul,” see Appendix 7, “Usages of ‘Soul’”].

22:40. “hangs.” After speaking about love, Jesus said, “On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets” (Matt. 22:40 KJV). An essential part of every biblical household were the pegs in the walls and posts from which things could be hung. Even tents sometimes had pegs in the tent-poles, or at least some kind of hook tied to the tent poles so that clothes and other items could be kept in order and off the ground.

It was important that pegs for hanging things were made of good solid wood so that they would be sturdy and not break off. Wood from vines, for example, was not good for pegs, as we learn in Ezekiel. God asked Ezekiel, “Is wood ever taken from it [a vine] to make anything useful? Do they make pegs from it to hang things on?” (Ezek. 15:3 NIV). The expected answer was “No, they do not.” A peg made from the wood of a vine would break when something heavy was hung from it. In Isaiah 22, God said He would remove Shebna, the steward in charge of Hezekiah’s palace, and replace him with Eliakim. Shebna had been a disappointment, but God said that He would make Eliakim like a firm peg, so firm that all the glory of his family could hang from him. “I will drive him [Eliakim] like a peg into a firm place; he will be a seat of honor for the house of his father. All the glory of his family will hang on him: its offspring and offshoots—all its lesser vessels, from the bowls to all the jars” (Isa. 22:23, 24).

Sadly, Eliakim was human, and eventually was not able to perform his duties, and even though he had once been a firm peg, he was broken off and what he supported was destroyed. “…the peg that was driven into a firm place [Eliakim] will give way, be cut off, and fall, and the load on it will be destroyed” (Isa. 22:25 HCSB). The word “destroyed” is accurate because many different things were hung from pegs, and it was common that when a peg broke holding a clay jar, or a skin of wine or milk, the load was destroyed.

Psalms speaks of a wineskin being hung from a peg. People hung their wineskins from a peg to keep them from being accidentally kicked, and also because they were less likely to spill when hung. “Though I am like a wineskin in the smoke, I do not forget your decrees” (Psalm 119:83 NIV). The wineskin was “in the smoke” because in the biblical era common houses did not have chimneys. If a fire was built in a house, for warmth and/or to cook, it was usually built in the middle of the room. The room would fill with smoke, but since people sat, ate, and slept on the floor, the really thick smoke usually stayed above them. In contrast, the poor wineskin was hung on a peg up in the thick smoke. What a wonderful Psalm! The psalmist says that even if he feels like a wineskin in the smoke, neglected and in a difficult situation, he would not forget God’s decrees and laws.

Wall pegs were vital to ancient living. They gave order and organization to the ancient household and held clothes, water jars, and other things that were essential to life. Thus it is not surprising that one of the many names of Jesus Christ is “the tent peg.” Zechariah 10:4 has three of the names of Jesus, the “cornerstone,” the “tent peg,” and the “battle bow.” “From Judah will come the cornerstone, from him the tent peg, from him the battle bow, from him every ruler” (Zechariah 10:4 NIV). Calling Jesus Christ “the tent peg” shows how essential he is to the organization of our lives. He does much more than give us everlasting life. He organizes our lives in a meaningful way, does a lot to keeps us out of the dirt of life, and helps keep us from some of the kicks and bumps of life. In return, we should realize that we are hung up for all to see, and like a nice piece of clothing on a peg reflects the wealth and value of the household, we can reflect the glory of Christ to those around us.

In Matthew 22:40 Jesus is using a very familiar scene in every home, and even in tents, of a peg or nail from which were hung wineskins and many other valuable things. In a very real sense, as a wineskin or article of clothing hangs from a peg and depends on the peg to keep it orderly and effective, the laws and commandments depend on love for God and love for mankind to be truly orderly and effective. It helps us understand how love is the peg that keeps the commandments orderly if we remember that the Hebrew word “torah” does not mean “law,” but “instruction.” Most of the “laws” in the Law of Moses are individual commands, certainly, but more than that, they are examples that serve as guides for us from which to build godly rules and laws to govern our society. For example, the Law tells us what to do if a person’s ox goes a person (Exod. 21:28-32), but does not tell us what to do about other animals that might be dangerous. We are to understand that the rules about oxen are “instruction” that we then use to build other, similar righteous rules and laws.

One of Jesus’ complaints about the rules the religious leaders had put in place was that they did not properly apply the instruction of the Torah when making up their rules. So, for example, they realized a person could pull an animal out of ditch on the Sabbath, but believed that healing a human being on the Sabbath was breaking the Sabbath (Luke 13:14; 14:3-6). Similarly, the Jews wrongly thought that the message of Torah was to withdraw from sinners, while Jesus properly understood Torah and spent time with them. When questioned about it, he said to them, “Go and learn what this means: ‘I desire mercy, not sacrifice.’”

With the above background about tent pegs, we are now able to see the wonderful point Jesus was making when he spoke of the law and commandments hanging from love. He was speaking to the Pharisees, who were trying to trap him in his words (Matt. 22:15). One of them asked him which was the greatest commandment in the Law, to which he answered, love God with all your heart, soul, and mind; and love your neighbor like yourself. Then Jesus added, “On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets” (Matt. 22:40 KJV). Jesus was making the point that loving God and loving our neighbor are like a great peg in God’s house that give order and meaning to the rest of His commandments. Without love the commandments lie broken, or in a disorganized heap, on the muddy floor, not able to profit us or others. Without love, the commandments are just heartless demands, but with love, they become the godly fabric upon which a godly society can be built. This should have been a huge lesson to the Pharisees, who were very particular about keeping the fine points of the Law, but often did so without love. Let us not be like the Pharisees, but instead let us understand the point that Jesus was making, that love is the essential peg from which every commandment hangs, and that gives order and meaning to the commandments.

As a final comment, we should point out that the REV and the King James Version gives us the correct and literal rendering of the Greek text by using the word “hang.” However, most Christians do not understand the common illustration that Jesus was making by comparing love to a great wall peg, so modern versions such as the HCSB, ESV, NASB, NET, and NIV, say “depend” instead of “hang.” While “depend” gets the general sense of “hang,” some of the depth of what Jesus was saying is lost.

22:43, “spirit.” It is very hard to tell whether it is more proper to say “Spirit” referring to God, or “spirit” referring to God’s gift of holy spirit when translating this verse. The Greek had no such problem, because every letter was either capital (in uncial manuscripts) or lower case (in miniscule manuscripts). God works seamlessly with people through the agency of His gift of holy spirit, which He puts upon people (and now is born and sealed inside people; Eph. 1:13, 14). It was God who originated the words David spoke, but like any prophet, he spoke them because he was energized by way of the gift of holy spirit that was upon him (cp. 1 Sam. 16:13). We used “spirit” here, knowing that the English “spirit” limits what actually transpired to the gift of holy spirit upon David energizing him, but knowing that the educated Christian knows that the gift of holy spirit never acts on its own, but is energized by God. (Cp. Mark 12:36; Acts 1:16; 4:25, which are the other times when David is said to speak by spirit).

It seems in keeping with the flow of the context and standard OT usage that Jesus is saying that David was speaking “by” (or “in association with”) the gift of God. In other words, it seems more likely that Jesus is saying David is speaking by the spirit of God (i.e., not on his own) than saying that he was speaking, being directed by God Himself, although it may well be that is indeed the emphasis here; it is very hard to tell, and it bears repeating that the original text did not make a difference between spirit and Spirit. Also adding weight to the fact that this is likely a reference to the gift, not the Giver (God) is the fact that ἐν πνεύματι is clearly used of the gift of God in other places (cp. Matt. 3:11; Mark 1:8; Luke 3:16; 11:13; John 1:33; Acts 11:16; Rom. 9:1; 14:17; 15:16; 1 Cor. 12:3; 1 Thess. 1:5; Jude 1:20), but not once clearly used with God Himself.

The Old Testament context of speaking out in prophecy because a person has the spirit of God upon them is well established (and “upon,” as per the KJV, is a good rendition of the Hebrew and very accurate, in contrast to some modern versions). Many people spoke or acted prophetically when the spirit came upon them (cp. Num. 11:17, 24, 25; 24:2, 3; Judg. 3:10; 1 Sam. 10:6, 10; 1 Chron. 12:28; 15:1; 2 Chron. 24:20). That would make this verse in Matthew similar, and show David to be following in that prophetic pattern.

The REV has “by the spirit,” adding the word “the” even though the Greek text does not have it. The Greek reads ἐν πνεύματι (“in spirit;” ἐν πνεύματι), but the definite article is not needed in prepositional phrases to make the noun definite. Daniel Wallace writes: “There is no need for the article to be used to make the object of a preposition definite. ...This is recognized by most grammarians.” (Greek Grammar Beyond the Basics, p. 247). Thus, when prepositions such as en, dia, or hupo are used before the noun pneuma hagion, as occurs here in Matthew, the noun can either be definite (i.e., “the pneuma”) or indefinite (i.e., “pneuma”) depending on the context or what reads most smoothly in English, because sometimes “the” just refers to “the” spirit in the context or the spirit that is commonly known.

22:44. “Yahweh said to my Lord.” This is a quotation of Psalm 110:1. The Hebrew text reads, “Yahweh said to adōnī [translated “my lord], “Sit at my right hand until I make your enemies a footstool for your feet.”

This is a very important verse showing that Jesus Christ is not God, but a fully human servant of God. To see that, however, we must understand the use of “Lord” in this verse. Trinitarian commentators sometimes argue that “my Lord” in this verse is another name for God, and is therefore proof of the divinity of the Messiah. However, that is incorrect. Actually this verse is one of the great proofs of the complete humanity of the promised Messiah.

In all languages words are built from root words, and the meaning of the inflected word can sometimes be quite different from the meaning of the root. Psalm 110:1 is an example of the root word, which means “lord,” taking on a more specific meaning when it is inflected, and we need to understand that meaning to understand this verse.

The root word of the word “lord” in Psalm 110:1 is adōn, which means “Lord or lord,” and can refer to a human lord or God (Strong’s #113 אֲדֹנָי pronounced ah-dōnī, and sometimes shortened to אֲדֹנָי). When the root word adōn is inflected to adōnay, it refers to God. (Strong’s #0136 אֲדֹנָי, usually spelled out as adōnay or adōnai and usually pronounced either ah-doe-nay or ah-doe-nigh).

In stark contrast, however, when the root word adōn is inflected to adōnī, it refers to a human or angelic lord (Strong’s #113 אֲדֹנָי pronounced ah-doe-nee). The “i” ending is possessive in Hebrew, and thus is usually translated “my.” Some examples will help us understand this: El is a name of God, so Eli (pronounced El-ee’) is “my God” (cp. Matthew 27:46). Ab or abba is “Father,” so abi (ab-ee’) is “my father.” The name Abimelech (pronounced Ab-ee-mel’-ek) is a compound word from abi, “my father” and melek, king, and meant, “my father is king” (cp. Judges 8:31). Similarly then, adôn is “Lord,” and adôni is “my Lord,” and that designation was never used of God, instead, the Hebrew uses adônay for God.

What most people who study the Bible must understand is that most Hebrew-English concordances and lexicons, for example Young’s Concordance or Strong’s Concordance, give only root words, not the word that actually occurs in the Hebrew text. Even most computer-based research programs give the root word when you mouse over “lord” in Psalm 110:1. The roots can be confusing, and we have sometimes discovered that even the same research tools assign different Strong’s numbers for these words, making exacting study using English resources sometimes quite difficult. This is one reason why biblical research done by people using only tools such as a Strong’s Concordance is limited, and people who genuinely want to do serious research into the text of Scripture must understand, not just the root words, but the inflected forms of the words and the impact those inflections have on the translation of the Bible.

Adôni is always used in Scripture to describe human masters and lords, but never God. Buzzard and Hunting write:

Psalm 110:1 provides a major key to understanding who Jesus is. The Hebrew Bible carefully distinguishes the divine title, adôna’i, the Supreme Lord, from adôni, the form of address appropriate to human and angelic superiors. Adôni, “my lord,” “my master,” on no occasion refers to the deity. Adôna’i, on the other hand is the special form of adôn, lord, reserved for address to the One God only. (The Doctrine of the Trinity, International Scholars Publications, New York, 1998, pp. 49 and 50).

The difference between adôn (the root word), adôni (“lord,” always used of men or angels) and adôna’i (which is almost always used of God) is critical to the understanding of Psalm 110:1. The Dictionary of Old Testament Words by Aaron Pick makes a difference between adônay and adôni, saying that adôni was “applied to man.” The Hebrew Lexicon by Brown, Driver and Briggs (BDB), considered by many to be the best available, makes the distinction between these words, and says that adôni “refers to human superiors.” The BDB lexicon points out that the following people were among those called “lord.” A master (Exod. 21:5); a husband (Gen. 18:12); a prophet (1 Kings 18:7 and 13); a prince (Gen. 42:10; 43:20); a king (1 Sam. 22:12); a father (Gen. 31:5); Moses (Num. 11:28; 12:11); a priest (1 Sam. 1:15 and 26); a theophanic angel (i.e., an angel representing God; Josh. 5:14; Judges 6:13); a captain (2 Sam. 11:11); and adôni was used for general recognition of superiority: Genesis 24:18; Ruth 2:13;

The fact that the Hebrew text uses the word adôni of the Messiah in Psalm 110 is very strong proof that he is not God. If the Messiah was to be God, then the word adôna’i would have been used. This distinction between adôni (a lord) and adôna’i (the Lord, God) holds even when God shows up in human form. In Genesis 18:3, Abraham addresses God who was “disguised” as a human, but the text uses adôna’i, not adôni.
Many scholars recognize that there is a distinction between the words adōnī and adōnai, and that these distinctions are important. The International Standard Bible Encyclopedia notes:

The form ADÔNI (“my lord”), a royal title (1 Sam. 29:8), is to be carefully distinguished from the divine title ADONAI (“my Lord”) used of Yahweh. (Geoffrey Bromiley, The International Standard Bible Encyclopedia; Eerdmans, Grand Rapids, MI, 1979, “Lord”).

There are several uses of adōnai that refer to angels or men, giving them an elevated status, but that does not indicate that the speaker believed they were God. This is in keeping with the language as a whole. Studies of words like Elohim show that it is also occasionally used of humans who have elevated status. Examples of adōnai referring to humans include Genesis 19:18 and 24:9, 39:2. In contrast to adōnai being used occasionally of men, there is no time when adōnī is used of God. Men may be elevated and represent God, but God is never lowered.

So that students can study the uses of adōnī (אֲדֹנִי) for themselves (since most sources only give the root words), we list below its occurrences in the Old Testament.

The following 148 verses contain 166 uses. Every one of them either refers to a human lord or an angel. None refers to God: Gen. 23:6, 11, 15; 24:12(2x), 14, 18, 27(3x), 35, 36, 37, 39, 42, 44, 48(2x), 49, 65; 31:35; 33:8, 13, 14(2x), 15; 39:8; 42:10; 43:20; 44:5, 7, 18(2x), 19, 20, 22, 24; 47:18(2x), 25; Exod. 21:5; 32:22; Num. 11:28; 12:11; 32:25, 27; 36:2; Josh. 5:14; 10:1, 3; Jdg. 1:5, 6, 7; 4:18; 6:13; Ruth 2:13; 1 Sam. 1:15, 26(2x); 22:12; 24:8; 25:24, 25(2x), 26(2x), 27, 28, 29, 31, 41; 26:17, 18, 19; 29:8; 30:13, 15; 2 Sam. 1:10; 3:21; 9:11; 11:11; 13:32, 33; 14:9, 12, 15, 17(2x), 18, 19(2x), 22; 15:15, 21(2x); 16:4, 9; 18:31, 32; 19:19(2x), 20, 26, 27, 30, 35, 37; 24:3, 21, 22; 1 Kings 1:13, 17, 18, 20(2x), 21, 24, 27(2x), 31, 36, 37(2x); 2:38; 3:17, 26; 18:7, 10; 20:4; 2 Kings 2:19; 4:16, 28; 5:3, 18, 20, 22; 6:5, 12, 15, 26; 8:5, 12; 10:9; 18:23, 24, 27; 1 Chr. 21:3(2x), 23; 2 Chron. 2:14, 15; Isa. 36:8, 9, 12; Jer. 37:20; 38:9; Dan. 1:10; 10:16, 17(2x), 19; 12:8; Zech. 1:9; 4:4, 5, 13; 6:4.

The following 24 uses “to my Lord” (לַאדֹנִי). While we in English separate the preposition from the noun or verb following, in Hebrew the preposition is attached directly to the word. Genesis 24:3; 54, 56; 32:5, 6, 19; 44:9, 16, 33; 1 Samuel 24:7; 25:27, 28, 30, 31; 2 Samuel 4:8; 19:29; 1 Kings 1:2; 18:13; 20:9; 1 Chronicles 21:3; Psalm 110:1.

The following 6 uses can be found under (v’adōnī; וַאדֹנִי), which would generally mean, “and” lord: Genesis 18:12; Numbers 36:2; 2 Samuel 11:11; 14:20; 19:28; 24:3.

The following use can be found under (m_*adōnī*; מֵאֲדֹנִי): Genesis 47:18.

Students of Hebrew know that the original text was written in an “unpointed” form, i.e., without the dots, dashes and marks that are now the written vowels. Thus some people may point out that since the vowel points of the Hebrew text were added later, the rabbis could have been mistaken. It should be pointed out, however, that the two Hebrew words, adōnai and adōnī, even though written the same in unpointed Hebrew, sound different when pronounced. This is not unusual in a language. “Read” and “read” are spelled the same, but one can be pronounced “red,” as in “I read the book yesterday,” while the other is pronounced “reed,” as in “Please read the book to me.” The correct way to place the vowels in the text would have been preserved in the oral tradition of the Jews. Thus when the text was finally written with the vowels it would have been written as it had always been pronounced.

Further evidence that the Jews always thought that the word in Psalm 110:1 referred to a human Messiah and not God is given in the Greek text, both in the Septuagint and in quotations of the Old Testament that appear in the New Testament. It is important to remember that the Septuagint, the Greek translation of the Hebrew Old Testament, was made about 250 BC, long before the Trinitarian debates started. Yet the Septuagint translation is clearly supportive of Psalm 110:1 referring to a human lord, not God. It translates adōnī as ho kurios mou, “my lord” (see, Anthony Buzzard and Charles Hunting, The Doctrine of the Trinity, Christianity’s Self-inflicted Wound; International Scholars Publication, New York, 1998, Atlanta Bible College and Restoration Fellowship, Morrow, GA, 1994, p. 28).

When Psalm 110:1 is quoted in the New Testament the same truth about the human lordship of the Messiah is preserved. Anthony Buzzard writes:

The New Testament, when it quotes Psalm 110:1, renders l’adōnī as “to my lord” (to kurio mou). But it renders adōnai ([Psalm 110] v. 5 and very often elsewhere) as “the Lord” (kurios). This proves that the difference between adōnai and adōnī was recognized and reported in Greek long before the Masoretic vowel points fixed the ancient, oral tradition permanently in writing (Anthony Buzzard, ed., Focus on the Kingdom, Atlanta Bible College, Morrow, GA, March 2000, p. 8, emphasis his.).

Sadly, many scholars have not paid close attention to the Hebrew text of Psalm 110:1, and incorrectly say that the second “Lord” in the verse is the Hebrew word adōnai (or adōnay) and thus means “God,” not recognizing that adōnai is not the actual Hebrew word in the verse. One such source is The Bible Knowledge Commentary edited by Walvoord and Zuck, Victor Books, 1985, p. 873. Another is Herbert Lockyer, All the Divine Names and Titles in the Bible, Zondervan, 1975, p. 15. A third is Alfred Plummer, Gospel According to S. Luke: International Critical Commentary; Edinburgh; T&T Clark, 1913, p. 472.

The well-known Smith’s Bible Dictionary contains an article on “Son of God,” written by Ezra Abbot. He writes:

Accordingly we find that, after the Ascension, the Apostles labored to bring the Jews to acknowledge that Jesus was not only the Christ, but was also a Divine Person, even the Lord Jehovah. See, H. B. Hackett, Dr. William Smith’s Dictionary of the Bible, article: “Son of God.” Baker Book House, Grand Rapids, MI, reprint 1981, vol. 4, p. 3090).

We believe Abbot’s conclusion is faulty because he did not pay attention to the exact wording of the Hebrew text. Even scholars who contributed to Smith’s Dictionary of the Bible apparently agree, because there is a footnote after the above quotation that corrects it. The footnote states:
In ascribing to St. Peter the remarkable proposition that “God has made Jesus Jehovah,” the writer of this article appears to have overlooked the fact that kurion (“Lord”) refers to kurio mou (“my Lord”) in verse 34, quoted from Psalm 110:1, where the Hebrew correspondent is not Jehovah but adōn, the common word for “lord.”

The footnote is quite correct, for the word in Psalm 110 is the word for a “lord” or “master” and not God. Thus Psalm 110:1 gives us very clear evidence that the expected Messiah of God was not going to be God himself, but a created being. The Jews listening to Peter on the Day of Pentecost would clearly see the correlation in Peter’s teaching that Jesus was a “man approved of God” (v. 22 - KJV), the “my lord” of Psalm 110:1 which Peter quoted just shortly thereafter (v. 34). The use of adōn in the first verse of Psalm 110:1 makes it very clear that the Jews were not expecting their Messiah to be God, but were expecting a human “lord.”

The misinformation given about the Hebrew text of Psalm 110:1 in these respected and generally very helpful resource tools is very unfortunate, because it propounds the teaching that Jesus is God, which is actually exactly the opposite of what the Psalm itself is saying. There is a reason that in the Psalm David writes that God is “Yahweh” while the Messiah is his “lord.”

One of the clearest proofs that there is no Trinity is that neither Jesus nor the Apostles ever taught it. Psalm 110:1 is just one of many verses that were reasons the Jews were expecting a human Messiah. The ancient Jews had a lot of expectations about their Messiah that were based on Scripture. The Jews worshipped one God (Deut. 6:4), and never considered there to be a Trinity. Similarly, the Messiah the Jews were expecting was to be real human, not a God-man. He was to be a descendant of Eve (Gen. 3:15), a descendant of Abraham (Gen. 22:18), from the tribe of Judah (Gen. 49:10); and a descendant of David (2 Sam. 7:12, 13; Isa. 11:1). He was to be a “lord” under Yahweh (Ps. 110:1) and a servant of Yahweh (Isaiah 42:1-7), but he was to be able to draw near to Yahweh (Jer. 30:21). He was to be a Jew, “one of their own” (Jer. 30:21), and he was to be born in Bethlehem (Micah 5:2).

Since the Jews were expecting a human Messiah and did not think of “the Holy Spirit” as a “Person,” if the doctrine of the Trinity was true and was to be believed, someone, ostensibly the Messiah himself, had to teach it. But he never did. While there are a few verses where Jesus said things that modern Trinitarians say mean he was God, each of those can also be interpreted from the perspective that Jesus was not God, and many biblical Unitarian scholars have demonstrated in their writings. Meanwhile, the vast preponderance of New Testament verses are Jesus or the New Testament authors showing that Jesus was sent by God and did God’s will, not his own. Jesus quoted the Shema (Deut. 6:4), that there was only one God, to Jews who would have taken what he said at face value. Jesus did not take the opportunity—ever!—to teach what modern Trinitarians say is the foundation of the Christian Faith: that the Father is God, the Son is God, and the Holy Spirit is God; and together the three Persons make One God. Why not? The most logical explanation is that there is no Trinity [For more information see, One God & One Lord: Reconsidering the Cornerstone of the Christian Faith, by Graeser, Lynn, and Schoenheit].

Psalm 110 is a Messianic and prophetic psalm in which God gave David a vision of the future, when God and the Messiah speak about what the Messiah will accomplish.
The fact that David does not call both God and the Messiah his “Lord,” but carefully words what he says such that Yahweh maintains His elevated position while the Messiah, God’s “right hand man,” is seen as David’s “Lord.” If God and Christ were both God and were co-equal and co-eternal, as the Trinity states, then Psalm 110:1 fails to recognize that equality, or even that Yahweh and the Messiah are both God. Quite the opposite! The Messiah, David’s adōnī, is seen to be distinct from, and lesser than, Yahweh.

“Yahweh.” “Yahweh” is the personal name of God, and a rabbinic abbreviation for it appears in the Hebrew manuscript of Matthew as well as in the verses of the Old Testament that Matthew quoted. There is evidence that Matthew wrote a Gospel in Hebrew and used the name Yahweh, so we have put it in the REV (see commentary on Matthew 3:3).

23:14. This verse is omitted in the earliest and best Greek text of the Western, Alexandrian, and Caesarean text families, and when it is included in Greek texts, different texts have it in different places, a clear indication it was added as a harmonization from Mark 12:40 or Luke 20:47. “Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye devour widows’ houses, and for a pretense make long prayer: therefore ye shall receive the greater damnation” (KJV).

23:15. “Gehenna.” See commentary on Matthew 5:22. [For information on annihilation in the lake of fire, see Appendix 5: “Annihilation in the Lake of Fire”].

23:16. “it is nothing.” The practices regarding oaths reveals the blindness and dishonesty of the religious leaders. Of course they had a “reason” for their view that an oath made by the gold of the sanctuary or the gift on the altar was binding, but an oath made by the sanctuary or altar itself was not binding. It seems that they reasoned that the binding nature of the oath was determined by the value of what the person swore by, and because neither the Temple nor altar was for sale, an oath by those things was not binding (R. L. Harris, Inspiration and Canonicity of the Bible, p. 49, 50). Of course the priests could use this to their advantage, because they could very sincerely swear an oath by the Temple to someone who did not know their customs, knowing full well that they were deceiving the person, and just shrug off their oath if it was not convenient to keep it, saying that “it is nothing,” that is, it is not binding. They were so blind and self-righteous they did not think God would judge such behavior. No wonder Jesus called them “fools,” and “blind,” and said “woe” to them, referring to great distress and disaster.

23:24. “gnat”...“camel.” The illustration combines the figures hyperbole (exaggeration) and hypocatastasis (comparison by implication; see commentary on Revelation 20:2). The “gnat” is the small things, while the “camel” represents the big things. The illustration was made more emotionally graphic to the Jews because the camel was an unclean animal and could not be eaten at all. For Jesus to imply that the Jews swallowed a camel would have been extremely offensive to them.

23:33. “Gehenna.” See commentary on Matthew 5:22. [For information on annihilation in the lake of fire, see Appendix 5: “Annihilation in the Lake of Fire”].
23:34. “Take notice!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδοὺ), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

23:35. “with the result that.” This is an example of the Greek hina introducing a result (see commentary on Matthew 2:15). The Jews were not evil just so that they would be punished for it, but their evil will result in their being punished.

“will come.” The verb erchomai (#2064 ἔρχομαι) is in the subjunctive mood, but that is due to the fact that the hina at the beginning of the phrase makes the verb subjunctive. It must be translated from the context, which is future (cp. HCSB, NET).

23:37. “she.” The definite article is feminine and agrees with the pronoun “her” at the end of the phrase.

“keeps on killing.” The Greek word apokteinō (#615 ἀποκτείνω), kill, is a present participle. She kills and keeps on killing. The translation, “is killing” would be appropriate in some contexts, but not here. The point is that she has killed the prophets and keeps on killing them, something that was about to be fulfilled in Jesus himself in just a few days.

23:38. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδοὺ), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

23:39. Quoted from Psalm 118:26. The Hebrew text of Matthew is different from the standard quotation from the Old Testament. Is simply reads, “Blessed is our savior.” See note on Matthew 21:9 and Matthew 3:3. Since the Hebrew text did not have Yahweh, we followed the reading of the Greek text.

Chapter 24

24:1. “Temple.” Properly understanding this verse requires an understanding of the Temple complex during the time of Jesus. The “Temple” in this verse is the Temple proper, into which only Jews were allowed to enter. Once a person left the Temple, he was in the Temple courts. The courts were an approximately 40 acre area enclosed by walls. On the south end were tall buildings that were used as marketplaces, etc. On the north end was the Antonia Fortress, the Roman fortress that allowed the Romans to control mobs in the Temple (Cp. Acts 21:34 etc. “castle” KJV). Jesus left the “Temple,” the Temple proper, called the “sanctuary” in some versions, but in doing so was in the presence of the huge buildings on the south end of the Temple Mount enclosure. The disciples, mostly Galileans who did not have anything in Galilee like the Temple structure, were amazed by the buildings, even though they had seen them before, and pointed them out to Jesus. Jesus answered them in a way that should have kept them grounded in the truth that we are not to get too attached to the things of this life, for they are all temporary. Jesus said that not one stone of all those great buildings would be left standing on top of another. True to Jesus’ teaching, there is now not one single stone of those buildings left standing. The disciples, rightly believing they were speaking with the Messiah, but wrongly thinking that very soon he was going to come into Jerusalem and conquer it and set up his kingdom, then asked him the question in 24:3, “What will be the sign of your coming and of the end of the age?”

24:3. “what will be the sign of your coming.” This question of the disciples was prompted by Jesus saying that not one stone in all the buildings around them would be left
The “coming” of Christ that the disciples asked about in this verse is misunderstood by most Christians. As we study the verse, we will see that the Apostle were not speaking of Jesus “coming” from heaven to earth, but were taking about him simply coming into Jerusalem and conquering it.

It is important to properly understand both the Apostles’ question and Jesus’ answer. It helps if we remember that the Apostles asked this question during the last week of Jesus’ life here on earth, and even though they had been with him for a long time, there was a lot they did not understand. For example, the Apostles did not think of Jesus’ “coming” the way we do today. Therefore, we must be careful not to read our understanding of the coming of Christ back into the minds of the Apostles and disciples.

The Apostles did not think of Jesus’ “coming” as “coming from heaven.” To fully understand this, it is helpful to know that the word translated “coming” is parousia (παρουσία; pronounced par-oos-ee’-ah), and it was used in several different ways, including to refer to a king or official “coming,” “arriving,” the “presence” of the person after he arrived, or a “visit,” in the biblical sense of visiting in blessing or judgment. The visit of a king, for example, was referred to as a parousia.

The BDAG Greek-English lexicon says that parousia was “the official term for a visit of a person of high rank, esp. of kings and emperors visiting a province.” Robert Mounce writes that parousia “is widely used in nonbiblical texts for the arrival of a person of high status” (New International Biblical Commentary). Ann Nyland writes that the Emperor Nero wanted as many people present as possible at his parousia to Corinth (The Source New Testament; note on Matt. 24:3). Visits by dignitaries were expensive, so the cost of the “visit” was often paid for by special taxes that were levied, making the parousia of a high-ranking official a burdensome event for many people. A parousia was a public event, because kings and dignitaries arrived with great pomp and pageantry. So when the Apostles asked Jesus about his parousia, they understood that when he came in judgment and to set up his kingdom it would be something everyone would see. It was not going to be an event that was private or hidden from public view.

Even after Christians started using parousia as a technical term for the “coming” of Christ, which they did after Jesus ascended into heaven, it still never lost its ordinary meaning of the arrival or personal presence of someone important. So, for example, in 1 Corinthians 16:17, Paul refers to the “coming” of Stephanas; in 2 Corinthians 7:6 and 7, he refers to the “coming” of Titus, and then in 10:10 to his own personal presence; in Philippians 1:26 and 2:12, he refers to his “coming” to visit the Philippians; and in 2 Thessalonians 2:9 he refers to the parousia of the antichrist.

Knowing the many meanings of parousia helps us understand that just because the Apostles asked, “what will be the sign of your coming,” that does not mean that they knew he was going to come down from heaven. They did not even know he was going to die, so they certainly did not understand the things that had to happen after his death; i.e., his resurrection, ascension into heaven, and his coming back to earth from heaven.

The Apostles could not have known about Jesus’ coming from heaven when they asked him about it as recorded in Matthew 24:3, because they did not know about it a couple days later at the Last Supper (almost one-quarter of the Gospel of John is taken up by the Last Supper; chapters 13-17). At that final meal before his arrest, in a lengthy teaching and prayer, Jesus told the Apostles he was going away to the Father. But the Apostles did not understand what he was saying to them. They said among themselves, “We do not understand what he is saying” (John 16:18; see commentary on John 16:31).

Since the Apostles did not know Jesus was going to die, be raised, ascend, or return to earth from heaven, what did they mean by the question, “What will be the sign of your coming…”? To answer that question it is vital to remember that Jesus had been speaking of the city of Jerusalem and that it would be destroyed (Matt. 24:1, 2). Although Jerusalem was controlled by the Romans, the Apostles knew that it was going to be conquered by Messiah, and that he would rule the earth from there (Isa. 2:1-3; Jer. 3:17; Micah 4:1, 2; Zech. 2:12). So when Jesus spoke of the destruction of the Temple, it was natural for the Apostles to ask when it would happen.

Jesus was going to “come” to Jerusalem, end the present age, and start the new age. The New Jerusalem, the new Temple, and the division of the land of Israel when Jesus rules the earth is described in Ezekiel chapters 40-48. The essence of the Apostles’ question was, “Tell us when you are going to come to Jerusalem in judgment and end this age?” It is possible that the Apostles thought that Jesus was going to go back to Galilee for a while before he came in judgment. Or, since Isaiah said that the Messiah would come from Edom, splattered in blood (Isa. 63:1-4), they may have thought he needed to leave Jerusalem and start his conquest of the earth from another place.

What the Apostles were asking was, “When are you going to come to Jerusalem to conquer and judge it, and end this present evil age?” Roger Hahn writes, “The fact that they connected the coming of the Messiah and the end of the age reflected their acceptance of the general Jewish understandings of eschatology. Most Jews believed human history was divided into two great ages: the present, evil age and the glorious age to come. …The ages overlapped during the lifetime of the Messiah” (Matthew: A Commentary for Bible Students). The pre-conceived notion held by the Apostles from their Jewish upbringing, that when the Messiah came the present age would end and the new age would begin, was the main thing that kept them from understanding what Jesus had been clearly telling them for months about his death and resurrection. It did not fit with what they had been taught, and so they did not understand it. Similarly, they could not grasp that Jesus would go away into heaven and not usher in the Messianic Age, which is why at the Last Supper they did not understand what he was talking about when he told them he was going to the Father (John 14-16).

Jesus did not try to directly correct the Apostles misunderstanding about his parousia. W. C. Allen correctly observes that Jesus “overlooks the fact that the disciples, according to the Gospel narrative, did not have the requisite understanding of the future for a question about Christ’s coming” (International Critical Commentary). Instead, he answered the Apostles’ question in a straightforward way, realizing that they would later be able to remember and understand those things that they did not understand right then. After Jesus’ ascension into heaven, the nature of his parousia became clear, just as what Jesus had said about his death and resurrection became clear after his resurrection. Hindsight is always 20-20, especially if we remember that people told us beforehand what would happen.

The book of Acts gives us more proof that the Apostles did not understand about Jesus ascending to heaven until when it occurred. In the days between Jesus’ resurrection and ascension, the disciples asked him, “Lord, is it at this time you are going to restore the kingdom to Israel?” (Acts 1:6). Their question was logical because Jesus had just spoken to them about the coming holy spirit (Acts 1:5), and the disciples knew that the Old Testament prophesies connected the giving of the gift of holy spirit with the Messianic Age (cp. Isa. 32:15-18; Joel 2:28-3:17). So when Jesus told them that the gift of holy spirit was going to be poured out, it was natural for them to assume that the Messianic Kingdom was at hand. But for them to think that Jesus could restore the Kingdom to Israel right then meant they did not expect him to go to heaven and spend time there. Had the disciples known that Jesus was going to ascend into heaven and be there for a while, they would have never asked him if he was going to restore the Kingdom to Israel at that time (see commentary on Acts 1:6).

We now shift our focus from the “coming” of Christ to the purpose of the Gospel of Matthew, and study the word parousia from that perspective. Each of the Four Gospels presents a different picture of the Messiah. Matthew shows Jesus as the King, Mark as the servant, Luke as a man, and John as the Son of God (see commentary on Mark 1:1; “the Gospel of Jesus Christ”). In light of that, it is noteworthy that the only Gospel that uses the word parousia is Matthew (Matt. 24:3, 27, 37, 39), the Gospel portraying Christ as a King. In Matthew, the “coming” of Christ is a parousia. In contrast, Jesus’ “coming” in Mark is the word erchomai (#2064 ἔρχομαι), the standard Greek word for coming or going, used over six hundred times in the New Testament. Since Mark portrays Christ as a servant, it makes sense that Mark does not use the word parousia. Similarly, Luke portrays Jesus as a man, a human being, and Luke also uses the word erchomai for Christ’s coming. The Gospel of John, which portrays Jesus as the Son of God, could appropriately use parousia for the coming of Jesus, but does not contain Jesus’ teaching on the end of the age that Matthew, Mark, and Luke, do. So from a study of the Four Gospels and an understanding of the word parousia, we can see that the use of parousia in Matthew supports its specific portrayal of Jesus as the King.

“and the end of the age.” One thing we can see from the Greek text is that the disciples thought of Jesus’ “coming” and the end of the age as one event, not two. Although most translations have something such as, “the sign of your coming and the end of the age,” in the Greek text the sentence has only one definite article (“the”), thus connecting the “coming and end of the age.” We know that when Jesus comes from heaven and fights the Battle of Armageddon (Rev. 19:11-21), he will end this present evil age and start the new Messianic Age. The Apostles did not know anything about the Rapture of the Christian Church, which is part of the Administration of the Sacred Secret, so they did not mention it (see commentary on Ephesians 3:2).

24:5. “Messiah.” The Greek is christos, which is usually translated “Christ.” However, the word means “anointed” or “messiah”; we translated the meaning of the word here and said “Messiah” rather than “Christ,” because these false messiahs may not actually be claiming to be Jesus himself, but only claiming to be the messiah.

24:6. “you will hear wars nearby and reports of wars far away.” This phrase is traditionally translated as “wars and rumors of wars.” But we feel that is misleading even though some of the “reports” may in fact turn out to be rumors. We should keep in mind that this statement of Jesus is a prophecy of the last days, and in our modern time world-wide communication and reporting is both more immediate and more accurate than it was years ago. In our common English, a “rumor” is a report that is most likely false, and that is not the meaning of the Greek here. In this verse the “reports” are reports of war, not false or unsubstantiated reports of war. The Greek word usually translated “rumors” is simply akoē (#189 ἀκοή pronounced ah-kō-ē), a noun, and it means the ear (the organ of hearing), or what is heard by the ear, in this case, a report.

In the first part of the sentence, “you will hear wars nearby,” the word “hear” is a verb, akouō (#191 ἀκούω; pronounced ā–koo-ō), and it means “hear.” The verb “hear” is followed by the noun “wars,” and the whole phrase is usually translated as, “you will hear of wars,” as if the word “wars” was in the genitive case, but it is not. The word “wars” is accusative, the direct object of “hear,” meaning the people will “hear wars.” To understand what Jesus is saying we must remember that the Bible is Israel-centered. So in the first part of the sentence Jesus is saying that as the times of the end approach, the people in Israel will be able to hear wars going on (which they may themselves be involved in). Then, the second part of the sentence tells us the people will also hear “reports” (or “news”) of wars that they cannot hear themselves; wars far away.

B. Newman and P. Stein (A Translator’s Handbook on the Gospel of Matthew) write: “The word ‘rumors’ in English is usually used for news about things that may or may not have happened, but it is important to note that the sense here is that there will be wars everywhere. The TEV rendering [given below] is thus a good model to follow.” Also, H. Meyer (Meyer’s Commentary on the New Testament) notes that Jesus is speaking “with reference to wars near at hand, the din and tumult of which are actually heard, and to wars at a distance, of which nothing is known except from the reports that are brought home” (see also, John Bengel, Bengel’s New Testament Commentary; D. Hagner; Word Biblical Commentary).

Today’s English Version (TEV) translates the sentence as, “you will hear the noise of battle close by and the news of battles far away.” The New English Bible is very similar to that, saying “near at hand” instead of “close by.” The Source New Testament has: “You will hear wars nearby and you will hear reports of wars.” Other versions that have a similar translation include the Complete Jewish Bible and the Concordant Literal New Testament.

24:7. “group will rise against group.” The Greek word translated as “group” is ethnos (#1484 ἔθνος), which has a large number of different meanings. These include the meaning that we feel fits the best in this context: a group of people united by kinship, culture, or traditions. The other meanings of ethnos include: a group or multitude (of people or animals) that is living together or closely associated; the whole human race (thus “people”); a race; a nation; a company, troop, or mass of people; a group of the same nature or ancestry; the unbelievers in contrast to God’s chosen people; also, in the New Testament ethnos is sometimes used for Gentile Christians in contrast to Jewish Christians.

The exact meaning of ethnos has to be determined by the context in which it is used. In this case, Jesus is speaking of the end times and saying that ethnos will rise and fight against ethnos, and the meaning that fits best is people groups that are united by kinship, culture, traditions, and belief systems. Lensiki basically agrees and says the term refers here to “a body of people that is held together by the same customs.” Although ethnos has been traditionally translated “nation,” that is not its best use in this context. One reason for that is today most of what we call “nations” would be called “kingdoms” in the biblical culture, even though they are not strictly ruled by a “king,” and thus would be included in the next phrase, “kingdom against kingdom.” That leaves the phrase ethnos against ethnos to refer to smaller people groups.
What we see in the world around us is “group against group” and “kingdom against kingdom” (more properly, “nation against nation”). While it is true that nations (kingdoms) are fighting each other, such as North versus South Korea, or Russia versus the Ukraine, the greater fighting seems to be group against group. In the USA, gangs are fighting other gangs, and there is also much racial violence. All over Europe, anti-Jewish groups are rising up and terrorizing Jews. In the Moslem world, Shiites are fighting Sunnis. It seems to be group versus group all over the world. These “groups” are people groups that are united by kinship, culture, traditions, and belief systems, and the “group versus group” mentality is intensifying around the world.

It is decidedly difficult to translate the word ethnos as it is used in Matthew 24, Mark 13, and Luke 21 into English. A few modern translations are getting away from the word “nation,” which is misleading, and translating ethnos as “people” or “peoples” (cp. CJB, MGI). While “people” is certainly better than “nation,” the reader may misunderstand and think that Jesus was speaking of general violence between individuals. While there will certainly be violence by individuals in the end times, that is not what the verse is referring to. On the other hand, we must understand “group” as referring to a group that is connected by lineage, race, creed, tradition, or belief, and not just a gather at the local store. Each member of the group is definitely connected to the group. Perhaps 50 years ago, “tribe” would have communicated the meaning well, but today “tribe” is more exclusively used of native tribes. Other words that come close are “sect,” but that puts too much emphasis on belief, and “ethnic group,” but that puts too much emphasis on race. Jesus was referring to the fact that as we approach the end, groups will rise up against each other: racial and ethnic groups, religious groups, socio-economic groups, and so forth. The concept of ethnos as a connected group of people was much easier to understand in the ancient world, when governments were often adversarial to people and families, and families were both big and the foundation of the culture. In the ancient world much more than today there was “safety in a multitude,” and people grouped based on family, ancestry, and creed.

24:9. “tortured.” The Greek is thlipsis (#2347 θλῖψις), and it refers to outward trouble that inflicts distress; oppression; affliction; tribulation; and also the inward experience of distress, affliction, or trouble (BDAG). It was common practice to torture prisoners in the first century, and in this case the fact that believers would be handed over to thlipsis clearly means torture. Two thousand years after Matthew was written, we humans have not become any more civilized, and torture is common practice all over the world. It will be even worse after the Rapture, which is why Revelation 14:13 says that those who die in the Lord (i.e., without remaining unconverted or renouncing the Faith) will be blessed.

24:15. “Holy Place” is a designation of the Temple. Quoted from Daniel 11:31. “Place” is the Greek topos (5117 τόπος). The word “place” can refer to any place specifically mentioned; however it was also one of the designations of the Temple in Jerusalem. Matthew 24:15; John 4:20, 11:48, 19:20; Acts 6:31, 14, 21:28. See Kittel’s Theological Dictionary of the New Testament. Also, see Secrets of Golgotha by Ernest Martin.

“Messiah.” See commentary on 24:5.

24:25. “Take notice!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

24:26. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

“inner rooms.” A reference to the inner rooms of the Temple. It would have been a sin for an ordinary Israelite to enter into the Holy Place or the Holy of Holies of the Temple, so it was safe to say the Messiah was in there when no one would check to see if the report was true.

24:29. Quoted from Isaiah 13:10

24:30. “Son of Man coming on the clouds of heaven.” Jesus’ coming in the clouds is a reference to Daniel 7:13. This is the “Second Coming” of Christ. Jesus spoke of his Second Coming and the events that surround it quite often. Some of these include, Matthew 16:27 (cp. Mark 8:38; Luke 9:26); 24:30-44 (Mark 13:26; Luke 21:27); 25:31-46; 26:64 (Mark 14:62); Mark 8:38; Luke 12:40; 17:24-30; John 14:3, 18; 21:22). See commentary on Matthew 16:27.

“gather his elect.” This is the first resurrection, and includes both the elect on earth (cp. Matt. 25:32) and the dead who are righteous and who will live with Christ in the Millennial Kingdom (cp. Ezek. 37:12-14; John 5:28, 29; Rev. 20:4-6).

24:36. “But about that day and hour no one knows.” Many attempts have been made to determine when Jesus will Rapture the Church, then later come to earth, fight the Battle of Armageddon, and set up his Millennial Kingdom. Usually people who try to determine the dates for the events of the End take the phrase “day and hour” in a Western, literal way, and say that we may not know the day and hour, but we can know the year. This misses the simple point of the way the vocabulary was used at the time of Christ and in the Bible. Although they could be used specifically for a 24-hour “day” and a 60-minute “hour,” there is no reason to think “day” or “hour” were used that way here.

In the Bible and in the Greco-Roman world, both “day” and “hour” were often used generally. In fact, the word “day” was sometimes used to describe a quality, such as in the phrase, “children of the day” (1 Thess. 5:5), and “day” was also used to describe a period of time (cp. Eph. 6:16, the evil day). Similarly, although “hour” is sometimes used of just an hour or a short period of time, it is also used of a specifically appointed time, such as the hour of the incense offering (Luke 1:10), or the dinner hour (Luke 14:17). Remember, in this teaching Jesus is trying to tell people what they do not know, and making the point that these future times are unknown; he was not trying to tease people and get them to guess the “year” by saying they did not know the “day” or “hour.” In this context, the phrase seems to best refer to the fact that people do not know the time period (including the duration) or appointed time of the return, and in fact we do not. We do not know how long the Battle of Armageddon will take, for example.

This understanding of the verse is augmented by the way Matthew 24:36 reads. It does not say that only the Father knows the day and hour. It says that only the Father knows “about” or “concerning” (the Greek is the preposition peri; “about” or “concerning”) that day and hour. This is a subtle but important point to understand, because since the Father works with people, it is possible that even He does not know the exact time He will send Jesus back to earth, but will adjust it depending on what people do, just as He did with many other events in history, such as the death of Hezekiah (2 Kings 20:1-6); the destruction of Ahab (1 Kings 21:20-29).

This is also one of the clear verses that shows that Jesus was not God, but only knew what God showed him. Trinitarians try to side-step the clear meaning of this verse by saying that Jesus’ human part did not know the day or hour, but his divine part must have known. But even Trinitarians admit Jesus was not schizophrenic: even with two natures, Trinitarians teach that Jesus was “fully God and fully man.” Furthermore, in this passage Jesus does not refer to himself as “Jesus” but as “the Son,” emphasizing his position of authority and the fact that he was the Son of God. This verse is clear and simple proof that “the Son” is not God, but the created Son of God.

24:37. “For as in the days of Noah…” For an explanation of why Jesus used the days of Noah as a comparison to his Sheep and Goat Judgment, see commentary on verse 40.

24:40. “one will be taken and the other left.” This verse describes the harsh reality of what happens when Jesus Christ comes down from heaven and sets up his kingdom on earth—some people will be allowed into the Kingdom and some will be destroyed in the flames of Gehenna. The Apostles knew about the Tribulation period from the many references to it in the Old Testament (cp. Isa. 13:9-13; 24:1-6; Dan. 12:1; Amos 5:18-20). They also knew that the Tribulation would be followed by the Lord setting up his kingdom on earth (Dan. 2:44; 7:13, 14; Ezek. chapters 40-48), and that the Messiah’s kingdom would be inhabited by resurrected believers (Ezek. 37:11-14; Dan. 12:2). Of course, there were things the Apostles did not understand; such as that the Messiah would have to die and later ascend into heaven before setting up his kingdom on earth.

The Apostles were anxious for the Kingdom to come, so in Matthew 24:3 they asked Jesus about the coming of his kingdom. Matthew 24 and 25 are Jesus’ answer to their question. In the first part of Matthew 24 Jesus describes some events of the Great Tribulation, which occurs after the Rapture of the Christian Church and precedes his coming from heaven (Rev. 19:11ff). Matthew 24:30 begins to describe Jesus coming to earth and gathering the elect, who are the ones who will be allowed into the Kingdom. Jesus described the Judgment that will follow his arrival on earth in a way they could all understand it: the Flood of Noah. In the Flood, evil people were “taken” away, while Noah and his family were “left” on earth and repopulated the earth.

After comparing the Judgment to Noah’s Flood, Jesus tells the disciples to watch and be ready, and tells the “Parable of the Ten Virgins” (Matt. 25:1-13) about staying ready in order to be able to enter the Kingdom, and he also tells the “Parable of the Talents” about getting into the Kingdom and being rewarded by the Master (Matt. 25:14-30). Then Jesus returns to his teaching about the events of the Tribulation and Judgment. In Matthew 25:31-46, Jesus tells about how, when he comes to earth, he will gather everyone who is left alive after the Great Tribulation (“all the nations”). He will have them brought before his throne and he will judge them, dividing the people into two categories: the “sheep” (righteous) and the “goats” (unrighteous). Jesus will let the sheep into his kingdom and they will live on the earth. In contrast, the “goats” will be taken away to destruction. Although it was never stated in the Old Testament or Gospels, we learn from the Book of Revelation, that the first part of Jesus’ Kingdom on earth lasts 1000 years (Rev. 20:2-5).

It is sometimes wrongly taught by Christians that Matthew 24:37-41 is about the Rapture of the Church. But these verses in Matthew 24 cannot be wrested from their context, which is Jesus Christ’s Second Coming, when he comes in judgment to the earth (cp. Rev. 19:11-20:4). Matthew 24:30 says the nations will see the Messiah as he comes in power and glory, and that they will “mourn.” Then Matthew 25:31–33 speaks of the coming of the Messiah and notes that Christ will “sit on his throne” and “all the nations will be gathered before him.” These things are not associated with the Rapture of the Christian Church. At the Rapture, the Church meets the Lord in the air (1 Thess. 4:17). He never comes all the way to the earth. Those left on earth will be confused about the disappearance of the Christians. They will not know where the Christians went. Furthermore, at the Rapture the nations do not see Christ nor do they “mourn.” So the context shows that Matthew 24 and Luke 17 are speaking of the Second Coming of Christ to the earth to Israel when he fights at Armageddon, judges the people, and sets up his Kingdom.

The meaning of “one shall be taken and the other left” is made clear by the words themselves, the context, and the scope of Scripture. The time of Christ’s coming in judgment will be similar to the time of the judgment in the days of Noah when the flood came and “took” people away. Note that Matthew 24:39 specifically says that the flood “took” the unrighteous, while the righteous—Noah and his family—were “left.” That is historically correct. The flood took all the unrighteous people away and left Noah and his family alive on earth. So too in Matthew, the ones who are “taken” are taken for judgment and then “taken” off the earth. Being “taken” is not a blessing. At the Sheep and Goat Judgment, the unrighteous are taken to the flames (Matt. 25:46), while the righteous are left on the earth and inherit the Kingdom. Spiros Zodhiates writes:

In Matt. 24:40, 41; Luke 17:34, 35, paralambano in the passive form is used as the opposite of aphieimi, “to let be.” In these verses, those who are taken are not to be misconstrued as those whom the Lord favors, as if they were the same saints spoken of in 1 Thess. 4:17 who will be raptured (harpazo, “to seize, catch away, as if by force”) to meet the Lord in the clouds. The verb paralambano in most cases indicates a demonstration in favor of the one taken, but not always. In Matt. 4:5, 8, it is used of Satan “taking” Jesus up to tempt him. In John 19:16 it is used of “taking” Jesus to lead him to the cross. It is used to refer to those in the days of Noah who were taken away, not being favored but being punished, while Noah and his family were “left” intact. Therefore, in this passage in Matthew and the parallel passage in Luke, paralambano must not be equated to the believers who are to be raptured at the coming of the Lord for his saints. It refers rather to those who, as in the days of Noah, are taken to destruction. The others are left alone (aphieimi) for the purpose of entering into the blessings of Christ’s kingdom (identified by some as the Millennium) and the righteous rule of Christ upon earth” (The Complete Word Study Dictionary New Testament; entry on paralambano p. 1108).

Robert Mounce writes: “The man working in the field (v. 40) and the woman grinding meal (verse 41) will be taken away in judgment (not to safety; cf. parallel in v. 39 with those “taken away” by the flood)” (New International Biblical Commentary: Matthew p. 229).
Another clear way we know that Matthew 24:37-41 is not about the Rapture is by comparing it to its parallel Scripture in Luke 17:26 and 27. As in Matthew 24, in Luke 17 Jesus was asked when the Kingdom would come (Luke 17:20). Luke 17 gives a much shorter answer than Matthew 24, and includes different information, but it speaks of Noah’s Flood, and says when the Flood came, it “destroyed them all” (Luke 17:27). Luke also then compared the coming of the Son of Man to the days of Lot, when fire fell on Sodom and Gomorrah and “destroyed them all.” This parallel teaching is positive proof that Jesus was not teaching about the Rapture, because in the Rapture Christians will be taken from the earth while the unrighteous who are left on earth to experience the Tribulation. The unbelievers will not be destroyed at the Rapture, but will continue their lives.

People sometimes doubt that there will be the “Rapture” because Jesus did not mention it in this teaching about the end times. Jesus did not teach about it because it is part of “Sacred Secret,” of the Administration of God’s Grace (see commentary on Ephesians 3:2). It is not found in the Old Testament or the Gospels but is part of the revelation of the Church Epistles. The revelation that is addressed specifically to the Christian Church is written in the seven epistles (letters) of Paul to the Church, known theologically as the “Church Epistles.” The fact that these seven epistles (Romans through Thessalonians) are especially important to the Christian Church is not often taught, yet it is of vital importance. Israel will not be Raptured, but will be resurrected and then return to the land of Israel (Ezek. 37:11-14).

One last thing to cover is the objection of those Christians who say that the scholars quoted above are wrong and that “take” refers to those who are taken for a blessing in the Rapture while “left” refers to those who are left for judgment. Even though this interpretation ignores the context, there is another, more important point that needs to be made. The context of Matthew and Luke are crystal clear about the circumstances of Christ’s coming, such as the nations mourning and being gathered to the Judgment, and this is plainly his Second Coming and not the Rapture. Therefore, no matter which group is blessed and which group is judged, neither group is Raptured. One is blessed and left on earth to enter the Kingdom (Matt. 25:34) while the other is judged and taken away (Matt. 25:41).

24:41. “Two women.” Although the word “women” is supplied from the context and is not in the Greek text, it is correctly supplied on the basis of the biblical culture. The biblical culture was very segregated by sex: there were jobs men did that women just did not do, and jobs that women did that men would not do. Working in the fields was usually done by men, hence “men” is supplied in verse 40, and the grinding of the grain with a hand mill was always considered to be women’s work, just as carrying water was considered women’s work (thus it is a woman Jesus meets at Jacob’s well in John 4:7). It was also considered women’s work to set up and take down the family tent, which was why Jael was so confident in driving a tent stake through Sisera’s head (Judges 4:21); she had driven many tent stakes in her lifetime.

24:43. “allowed” = eao (1439) = “1. to let, allow, permit; 2. to let alone, to allow to do as one wishes; 3. to let go, give up, leave.” The difference between “let,” “allow,” and “permit” can be very slight, but “allow” usually means no more than lack of prohibition whereas “permit” implies a granting of express permission. Thus “allow” was usually the better choice for eao in this verse.
“dug through.” Biblical custom. Most houses were of some mud or mud and stone construction, so thieves “dug through” the wall and gained entrance to the house.

Chapter 25

25:1. “At that time.” This is one of the times when chapter headings can be unhelpful. Matthew 25:1 continues the context from 24:51 and that would have been much easier to see for most people had there not been a new chapter. The subject Jesus is speaking about is the time when the Kingdom of Heaven finally arrives on earth. The parables show that life will go on “as usual” here on earth until one eventful day when the Lord, the Bridegroom, will come and set up his kingdom on earth, and then the door to salvation will be shut. Those who have been obedient (24:46) and wise (25:2) will get to enter. The evil and foolish will be shut out, and “there will be the sobbing and the gnashing of teeth” (24:51).

25:6. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἵδον), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

25:13. “watch.” The Greek is grēgorō (1127 γρηγόρω; pronounced grey-gor-eh’ō), which means “be awake” (sometimes used for being alive) “watch,” “be alert,” “pay attention.” However, in this context it means more than just “watch,” it has the pregnant meaning of being alert and paying attention, in large part by doing what we are supposed to be doing. It does not mean, “sit back, relax, and just keep watch.” It means be doing what you are supposed to be doing until the Lord comes.

25:31. “glorious throne.” This is an example of the Figure of Speech Antimereia (of the noun in regimen for an adjective. Bullinger, Figures). The Greek literally reads “a throne of his glory.” “Glory” is moved by antimereia from an adjective to a noun to give it more emphasis. Unfortunately, in English, it makes the sentence hard to understand, so using the simple adjective makes sense.

25:32. “goats.” The typical goat of the ancient Middle East was black. This made separating the sheep from the goats an easy job, and added to the differences between the sheep and goats in biblical metaphor. Second to man, goats have been the most severe destroyers of land in history. They will overgraze areas of vegetation, eating weeds, shrubs, and small trees, and stand on their hind legs to eat the twigs of larger trees (and will climb the trees if the branches are dense enough and eat twigs and small branches they can reach). They will usually stick with a flock, but are not averse to wandering off, and a couple goats can quickly establish a feral flock that damages crops. The meat was eaten, but usually only of the young goat, or kid, and it was not valued as highly as the meat of the cow or sheep. Similarly, goat milk was used, but not valued as highly as cow milk, perhaps in part due to volume. Those things, added to the fact that the sheep was white, the color of righteousness and purity, and the goat was black, the color of evil and darkness, made the metaphor between the sheep (believers), and goats (unbelievers), a natural and good one.

A major reason for keeping goats was their hardiness and their hair. Usually goat hair was long and black, and thus easily woven. It was woven into a rough cloth which was made into sacks for storing and carrying things, and thus this cloth was called “sackcloth” (cp. Matt. 11:21; Luke 10:13; Rev. 6:12; 11:3). Another important use for goat hair was it was tightly woven into the cloth that tents were made from. The reason that goat hair was especially good for tents was that it swelled when wet, and shrank when dry. That meant that if it started to rain, the tent cloth would swell and naturally repel the rain, but when it was dry the tent hair shrank and let the air circulate so that the tent was comfortable.

The Beloved woman in Song of Solomon said her skin was “dark like the tents of Kedar” (Song of Sol. 1:5), because she worked out in the sun so her skin had become dark like goat hair. Her Lover said to her: “Your hair is like a flock of goats descending from Gilead” (Song of Sol. 6:5), meaning she had black hair that waved and bounced from the top of her head over her shoulders, dark and shining and bouncing like a large flock of goats wending its way down the mountain.

25:41. “fire of the coming Age.” The Greek does not refer to “eternal fire,” as if the fire would last forever, but rather “the fire of the coming Age,” that is, the fire associated with Christ’s kingdom on earth, when the wicked will be punished by being thrown into Gehenna. [See Appendix 2, “Life in the Age to Come.”]

“the Slanderer.” This is “the Devil.” The Greek is diabolos (#1228 διάβολος). The Greek word diabolos means “slanderer,” the one who slanders others, and that is a primary characteristic of the Devil. He has no regard for a person’s reputation or the illicit means he uses to discredit and destroy people. Slander is a primary tactic of the Devil. [For commentary on the names of the Devil, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer.”]

25:46. “punishment in the Age to come.” This is the punishment “in” or perhaps even better, “associated with” the Age to Come, i.e., the Messianic Age [For the translation “life in the Age to come,” see Appendix 2: “Life in the Age to Come”].

The simple understanding of this verse has been obscured by orthodox Christian tradition. From the context is seems clear that the primary emphasis of the verse is as it is translated in the REV: “punishment in the Age to come.” People who have died are not being punished “in hell” now as is commonly taught. Right now, when a person dies, he is dead in the ground awaiting a resurrection and judgment [For the dead being dead now, and not alive in any form, see commentary on 1 Cor. 15:26, “death”].

When Christ comes to earth and fights the Battle of Armageddon, he will throw the “beast” and the false prophet into the Lake of Fire. Those two are the first two people who are thrown into the Lake of Fire. After Armageddon, Jesus will set up his Millennial Kingdom on earth. It is called his “Millennial Kingdom” because it lasts 1000 years (Rev. 20:2-6. For commentary on what Christ’s Millennial Kingdom will be like, see commentary on Matt. 5:5, “the meek will inherit the earth”).

When Jesus sits on his throne in his Millennial Kingdom, one of his first acts will be to gather before him all the people who have survived the Tribulation and Armageddon, and judge them according to their works. This judgment is called by scholars, “the sheep and goat judgment,” because Jesus is said to separate the people into two categories, “sheep” (believers), and “goats” (unbelievers) (Matt. 25:32). The goats are then led off to their punishment.

Another misconception that must be cleared up about this verse is that it does not teach that people burn forever in the Lake of Fire. The “goats” are thrown into the fire and burned up; annihilated. The phrase that has caused the confusion is κόλασις οίωνον, which usually gets translated, “eternal punishment” (kolasis aiônios literally means, “age punishment,” because in Greek the adjective (aiōnios; age) usually is after the noun (kólasis; punishment). As we stated above, because of the context, which is the start of Christ’s kingdom on earth, we feel that the primary emphasis of this verse is, “the punishment associated with the Age to come.” However, the adjective aiōnios can refer to duration as well as a specific age, so there is a sense in which “everlasting punishment” is a good translation, but it must be properly understood.

The Greek word kolasis, “punishment,” is a noun, not a verb. The phrase is not “everlasting punishing,” as if the “punishing” went on forever, but rather it is “everlasting punishment,” because the punishment, which is death, goes on forever. For those who are thrown into the Lake of Fire and experience the “second death” (Rev. 20:14), their punishment, death, will never end. They are never given life again; they are annihilated from existence forever.

There are times when the noun “punishment” is used for the process of the act of being punished, so how do we know that this verse does not use “punishment” in the sense of “punishing”? The way to know that is from the scope of Scripture. Does the whole Bible, taken together, teach that the unsaved are annihilated in the fire, or survive in the fire and burn forever? The clear reading of Scripture is that mankind is given a choice between life and death. There is no verse that states that God gives people a choice between living forever in a good place or living forever in a bad place. John 3:16 gives the choice between “perish” or “everlasting life.” Romans 6:23 says the wages of sin is “death,” but the gift of God is “life.” Jesus said the believer has passed from “death” to “life” (John 5:24). The orthodox teaching is that people burn “in hell” forever, but that mostly comes from the unbiblical idea of the “immortal soul,” a concept that does not exist in the Bible. [For more on annihilation in the Lake of Fire, see commentary on Rev. 20:10].

“life in the Age to come.” [See Appendix 2, “Life in the Age to Come”.]

26:5. “Not during the feast.” The Feast of Passover was attended by hundreds of thousands of Jews from around world, and there was great nationalistic fervor the accompanied it because of its historic roots associated with deliverance from Egypt. The Jews of Jesus’ day would have loved nothing better than deliverance from Rome, and would welcome a Messiah to do that for them. The Jews knew this and, as much as they wanted to arrest Jesus, did not want to risk a riot, but preferred to wait until after the feast when the crowds went home. Their plans were altered when one of Jesus’ closest men, Judas, offered to hand him over to them.

26:7. “perfume.” The Greek word is muron (#3464 μῦρον), and it is a general term for perfume, ointment, perfumed oil, or even a sweet smelling substance. In the New Testament the emphasis is on the way it smell, and thus “perfume” seems to be the best translation. It is not an “ointment,” per se, because that implies it would be being used for healing. Also, what Mary put on Jesus was likely not oily, so “perfumed oil” is perhaps not the best translation.

“poured it on his head.” This record of Mary (we learn who she is from John) pouring the oil on Jesus occurs in Matthew 26:6-13; Mark 14:3-9; and John 12:1-8. The anointing occurred in the house of Simon the Leper (Matt. 26:6; Mark 14:3), which is why John specifically says Martha was serving. If the supper occurred at the house of Mary and Martha that would never be stated because it would be obvious and expected.

At first glance there seems to be a contradiction between Matthew, Mark, and John, because Matthew and Mark say the ointment was poured on Jesus’ head, while John says the feet. The key is to realize that a flask of oil worth a year’s salary would be quite large, and covered both his head and feet. That is why Jesus said that the woman “poured this perfume on my body” (Matt. 26:12).

26:25. “Rabbi.” It is very telling that Judas would call Jesus “Rabbi” when the other disciples call him “Lord” (cp. 26:22). In the book of Matthew, Jesus is only called “Rabbi” by Judas.

26:26. “bread.” This was not special bread, but the ordinary bread that the apostles were eating. Originally, communion was not a “ceremony,” but occurred at the start of a communal meal. There was no special bread or wine. Jesus did not have any, nor did the early Church. They used the bread and wine they were already eating and drinking. As with most things, over time the simple offering of thanks and time that was taken to eat some bread and drink some wine in recognition of Jesus’ sacrifice became ritualized and the “communion service” was invented.

In the early Church, anyone who wanted to eat and drink and recognize the sacrifice of Jesus could. There was no “membership,” or “requirements” that had to be met. Jesus did not ask for any, nor, as far as we can tell from the apostolic Church, did the early Christians. Again, over time Christians became concerned about not having the “right” people partake of the bread and wine, especially because it was supposed to accompany a personal commitment to the Lord. That was exacerbated by the Roman persecution of the early Church, because many Christians, rather than be tortured, gave in and offered sacrifices to the Roman gods. They would be "Romans" until the time of persecution was over (most persecutions lasted only a short time), and then they wanted to be received back into the congregation. However, the "confessors," (those Christians who were tortured and often maimed because they continued to confess Jesus as Lord but survived—in contrast to the martyrs, those Christians who died for Christ) often did not want to allow these "weak" and "uncommitted" Christians back into the Church. Thus they would try to exclude them from the meetings and the communion.

26:28. “covenant.” See commentary on Hebrews 7:22. The word “new” is not included, as it is in the KJV. Textual scholars conclude that it was added to some Greek texts so that this verse mirrored Luke 22:20 more closely. Had “new” been original, there is no good reason for dropping it from the early texts.

26:38. “soul.” The Greek word often translated “soul” is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoo-kay’), and it has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person or animal; an individual person; or attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. Here it is used more broadly of Jesus himself with an emphasis on his thoughts and emotions. Thus, while the verse could read something such as, “I am troubled” (cp. NAB; CJB), the inclusion of the word “soul” points us to his thoughts, feelings, and emotions. [For a more complete explanation of “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’”].
“deeply grieved.” The Greek word is perilupos (#4036 περιλύπος), and it means deeply grieved, very sad, exceedingly sorrowful. Jesus knew the time of his arrest was approaching, and he was dealing with the emotions that were flooding him. He knew from Scripture and from the culture that he would be whipped and beaten for some 40 hours before dying on the cross as the true Passover Lamb. It was requiring all his love and resolve to move ahead and obey God to his painful death.

26:41. “spirit.” This is the use of spirit that refers to the action of the mind, i.e., attitudes and emotions. The Apostles had a willing attitude, but their flesh was weak and unable to stay awake. [For more on “spirit,” including a long list of the ways it is used in the Bible, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’.”]

26:45. “Are you still sleeping…?” The verse can be translated with a statement, i.e., “sleep on now…” or with a question, “Are you still sleeping…?” Commentators are divided, but most of them agree that, since Christ said very shortly after that, “Rise and let us go” that if Christ did in fact make a statement, then it is irony, not a serious statement. We have decided to translate the verse as a question given the following:
A) The words can legitimately be translated as a question.
B) Irony is hard to detect in a book and usually confuses the reader.
C) Christ obviously did not mean for them to sleep since he spoke to them (if they were sleeping and he wanted them to continue sleeping, he would not have woken them up just to tell them to sleep on) and since he told them to get up in the very next verse.

“clubs” The KJV has staves, but the Greek just reads “woods” leaving the reader to figure out what the people were carrying that was made of wood. Since many people carried staffs, it would be natural to say that, but staffs were hard to fight with in a crowd and the association of this weapon with swords makes “clubs” the more likely choice.

26:51. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδοú), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

26:52. “those who take the sword will perish by the sword.” This verse is speaking about self-willed aggression outside the bounds of the law. It has nothing to do with self-defense or the proper use of the criminal justice system. Earlier that same day, Jesus had told the disciples to buy a sword if they did not have one. “He [Jesus] said to them, ‘But now if you have a purse, take it, and also a bag; and if you don't have a sword, sell your cloak and buy one’” (Luke 22:36). Obviously, Jesus would not tell people in the afternoon to go buy a sword if they did not own one, but then later that night teach that if they used the sword they had bought they would die by it.

There is a perfectly good reason Christ told his disciples to go buy a sword: self-defense. Peter, however, was not acting in self-defense when he drew his sword and used it on the servant of the priest. The people who came to arrest Jesus represented the legal authorities at the time. If the police came to your house to arrest you, even if you had not actually committed the crime, you would not be acting in self-defense if you pulled a weapon and started to fight with them. To be acting legally, you would have to win your case in court. When Peter pulled his sword and smote the servant of the High Priest, he was acting outside the will of God and outside the law of the land, and that is the context of Jesus’ rebuke. What Jesus said has absolutely nothing to do with self-defense, war or the criminal justice system.

What Jesus said has historically been proven to be true. Throughout history, robbers and brigands who unlawfully taken up the sword against the legal authorities have ben killed or executed.

The police and other civil authorities set up by governments are charged with the duty of maintaining a social justice system. They “bear the sword” to keep society safe, and God calls them His “servants.” The Bible states: “For he is God's servant to do you good. But if you do wrong, be afraid, for he does not bear the sword for nothing. He is God's servant, an agent of wrath to bring punishment on the wrongdoer” (Rom. 13:4).

26:57. “led him away to the house of Caiaphas.” Caiaphas was the High Priest. The Gospel of Matthew skips over the fact that Jesus was taken first to Annas, and from Annas to Caiaphas, but that is clearly recorded in the Gospel of John. For the chronology of the arrest and crucifixion of Jesus, see commentary on John 18:13.

26:64. Quoted from Psalm 110:1, Daniel 7:13.

“Yes, it is as you say.” See Matthew 27:11 note on “It is as you say.” In the related record in Mark 14:62, Jesus says, “I am.” Some critics say that Jesus never claimed to be the Son of God. Here, he swears to it.

“nevertheless.” This is a legitimate translation of the Greek, and is somewhat adversative due to the fact that the High Priest was asking if Jesus was the Christ, but not to believe him, but to confirm his “blasphemy.” Jesus agrees that he is the Christ, but he is certainly not confirming the accusation of blasphemy, so he says, “nevertheless, you will see the Son of Man....”

26:65. “tore his garments.” The word “garments” is himation (#2440 ιμάτιον; hi-mä-tee-on), which refers to a garment of any type, or the outer garment like a cloak or mantle. The Greek is plural, so it may well be that the High Priest grabbed both his inner and outer garment at the neck and tore them a handbreadth, which was the standard tearing when blasphemy was heard.

“Defaming talk...defamation.” The Greek verb blasphēmeō (#987 βλασφημεώ) and the Greek noun blasphēmia (#988 βλασφημία) are transliterated (not translated) from the Greek into English as “blasphemy.” However, “blasphemy” in English has a different meaning than blasphēmeō does in Greek. In English, “blasphemy” is only used in reference to God. It is insulting God or a god, insulting something considered sacred (like defacing a cross or statue of Jesus), or claiming to be God or a god in some way. However, in Greek, blasphēmeō and blasphēmia (the noun) did not have to refer to God or a god, although they could, but were common words that were used of someone speaking against another. The primary meanings were showing disrespect to a person or deity, and/or harming his, her, or its reputation. In this case, the religious leaders thought it was insulting to God’s reputation that Jesus would refer to himself as God’s Messiah. [For more on blasphēmeō and blasphēmia see commentary on Matt. 9:3].

26:69. “servant-girl.” The Greek word can be either “slave-girl” or “servant-girl.” The context determines which. This girl (and the ones in Mark 14:66, 69; Luke 22:56; Acts 12:13) may have been slave-girls, but there the context does not give enough weight to go in that direction.
26:71. “another servant-girl.” We felt it was important to add “servant-girl” in italics because the Greek is feminine, so any Greek reader would know it was another servant-girl, and not just another servant. There are times the Greek can be more condensed and clearer than the English.

26:73. “your accent makes you known.” It is common for “city folk” to make fun of the way “country folk” talk, and the culture at the time of Christ was no different. Galilee was considered unsophisticated by the standards in Judea and Jerusalem. Robertson (Word Pictures in the New Testament) writes: “The Galileans had difficulty with the gutturals.” Paul Maier (First Easter, p. 53) writes: “It was a standing joke that you couldn’t tell if a Galilean were talking about an ass, a lamb, or a jug of wine, since they pronounced hamor, innmar, and hamar just about the same.”

27:2. “Pilate.” This is the first mention of Pontus Pilate in the Bible. Pilate was Prefect from 26-36 AD, the second longest rulership of any Prefect of Judea. It helps to know that because there is a lot of misinformation among Christians that Pilate was a horrible governor, but not according to Roman standards.

In order to really understand Pilate’s actions at the trial of Jesus Christ, it is helpful to understand another incident that occurred less than a year earlier. About half a year before the trial of Jesus, Pilate had set up some golden shields in his Jerusalem headquarters that had a dedication to Tiberias on them. The Jews protested the presence of these shields, but Pilate refused to remove them. The Jews took their case straight to Tiberias, the emperor of Rome at the time. The letter got to Tiberias as quickly as it did because it was sent through Herod Antipas, the Tetrarch of Galilee, who forwarded it from the Jews to Rome. No wonder Scripture says Pilate and Herod were hostile towards each other before the trial of Jesus (Luke 23:12).

Tiberias wrote a terse letter to Pilate, ordered him to move the shields to Caesarea, and warned him to uphold all the religious and political customs of the Jews. This letter was no doubt on his mind at the trial of Jesus, and when Pilate was about to let Jesus go, the Jews played their trump card and said, “If you release this man, you are not Caesar’s friend. Everyone who makes himself a king speaks against Caesar” (John 19:12).

What is not known by the average reader is that “Caesar’s Friend” is more than just a phrase; it is a name, a designation, a “badge of belonging” to a very exclusive group of people who were especially close to Caesar. If a person who was designated to be “Caesar’s Friend” officially displeased Caesar to the point of being kicked out of the club, so to speak, the consequence was compulsory suicide or exile from Rome.

When we closely follow the events in the trial of Jesus, we can see that the Jews knew about the letter from Tiberias to Pilate and Pilate’s position as “Caesar’s Friend,” and used them to their advantage to pressure Pilate. When Jesus first came before Pilate, the Jews accused him of being an evildoer (John 18:30), and tried to say things that would convince Pilate to crucify him because of Roman law and sensibilities, such as that he had been corrupting the nation and forbidding paying taxes to Caesar (Luke 23:2). Had Pilate complied, that would have ended the matter as far as the Jews were concerned. But when Pilate refused to crucify Jesus, saying he had not committed a capital crime, Jews moved their reason to their religious customs and the charge of blasphemy, saying that Jesus needed to die because he made himself the Son of God (John 19:7). Of course, when Pilate heard that Jesus had called himself the Son of God, he tried even harder to let Jesus go, but that was when the Jews, in a less than subtle way, made it clear it was going to be Pilate or Jesus. Besides, as Pilate continued to resist the Jews pressure to crucify Jesus, it got to the point a riot started to break out (Matt. 27:24). Preventing a riot was the reason the Roman governor came from Caesarea to Jerusalem during the feasts in the first place, and if there had been a riot, and if news of that got back to Tiberias, it would not go well for Pilate. Pilate realized that, in the face of the hatred and determination of the Jews, he was not accomplishing anything but stirring up a riot, something that would likely cost lives—including his own.

Pilate also realized that if he did not crucify Jesus, the Jews would write to Tiberias and say that Pilate had not obeyed Tiberias’ command that had come in the letter, because he had not been respectful of Jewish laws and customs about things such as blasphemy, and worse, he allowed a man to live who called himself a king and threatened the unity of the Jewish people and even the Roman Empire. At that point, most people would have done what Pilate did: save his own life. Pilate had Jesus crucified. [For the order of the events of Jesus’ last days, see commentary on John 18:13].

We know quite a bit about Pilate from Roman records. However, there was no physical evidence found in Israel for his governorship until 1961. An Italian team of archaeologists under the direction of Antonio Frova discovered a stone about two feet by three feet while excavating an ancient theater in Caesarea, the Roman capital of Israel. The stone tablet read in Latin: “Pontius Pilatus, Prefect of Judea, has presented the Tiberieum to the Caesareans.” The record that Pilate was a “Prefect” is correct; he was not a “Procurator” (despite the many reference works that say he was). Calling Pilate a “Procurator” is a historic anachronism, because it was not until later, under the Emperor Claudius (ruled 41-54) that the Roman governors of Judea were referred to as Procurators. The Prefects had more military responsibilities than the Procurators. We can correctly call Pilate a Prefect or a governor.

Pilate’s name tells us much about him. The family name, Pontius, was the name of a prominent clan among the Samnites, a group of people who lived along the Apennine Mountains southeast of Rome, and early on in Rome’s history the Samnites had fought a series of wars with Rome and almost conquered them. A fighter that was often seen in the gladiator arena was a person dressed as, and trained to fight as, a Samnite warrior. The Samnites were conquered and absorbed by Rome, their leading class becoming Roman equestrian class (the Roman middle class). Pilates’ first name is typically Samnite, and means, “armed with a pilum.” The pilum was a javelin about 6 feet long that was half wooden spear handle and half pointed iron shaft. It was a very effective weapon, and quickly copied by the Romans and used in the legions.

27:9. “spoken.” Not “written,” either by Jeremiah or Zechariah, but “spoken” by Jeremiah. See Bullinger’s note in The Companion Bible. These words are found in Zechariah 11:12, 13 with allusions to Jeremiah 18:1-4; 19:1-3. They are ascribed to Jeremiah since, in Jesus’ day, the books of the prophets were headed by Jeremiah, not Isaiah as now, and the quotation is identified by the name of the first book of the group, rather than by the name of the specific book within the group. Similarly in Luke 24:44, “Psalms” includes all the books known as the writings because it is the first book of the group. See commentary in The Ryrie Study Bible.

The Hebrew Gospel of Matthew has the abbreviation for Yahweh in this verse, but it is very different from the Greek text and is not included in the REV (see commentary on Matt. 3:3).

27:11. “It is as you say.” Jesus answers Pilate’s question in the affirmative, that he is a king. It is important to translate this verse in the affirmative. Jesus was not playing word games with Pilate, giving him an ambiguous answer. Pilate’s everlasting life was at stake, and Pilate, like everyone else, had to have a chance to believe and accept Jesus as Messiah. This should not be considered unusual. Jesus had told many others he was the Messiah (Matt. 16:16-20; Mark 14:62; John 4:26; 10:24-25); besides that, the conversation between Pilate and Jesus was not as short as Matthew, Mark (15:2-5), or Luke (23:3) records. The Gospel of John records the longer conversation (John 18:33-38; 19:9-11). In this longer conversation, Jesus tells Pilate that although he is a king, “My kingdom is not of this world” and “my kingdom is from another place” (John 18:36), and “Everyone on the side of truth listens to me” (John 18:37). Of course Pilate, being a Roman and believing in the Roman gods, if he believed anything at all, did not have a clear and accurate picture of God, the afterlife, the Messianic Age, or anything that would have given true meaning to what Jesus said. To Pilate, Jesus’ words were likely nonsense, and he responded with “What is truth?” (John 18:38). One thing Pilate did get from his conversation with Jesus was that he was not a threat to Rome in the sense that he was trying to foment rebellion and overthrow Roman rule. That is what the religious leaders were accusing Jesus of, so that Pilate would crucify him, but Pilate, after questioning Jesus, was satisfied that was not the case, and came to the religious leaders and said, “I find no basis for a charge against him” (John 19:6).

Many excellent Greek scholars attest to the fact that Jesus’ answer to Pilate, “It is as you say,” was not an ambiguous statement. A. T. Robertson correctly states, “By his answer (‘thou sayest’) Jesus confesses that he is” (Robertson, Word Pictures in the New Testament). The Expositor’s Greek Testament by W. R. Nicoll simply says that Jesus’ answer “== yes.” R. C. H. Lenski says this about Jesus’ answer: “It is the regular way of affirming the contents of the question.” Albert Barnes, in Barnes’ Notes, says, “Thou sayest.” [KJV] That is, thou sayest right, or thou sayest the truth. …Though he acknowledge that he was the king yet he stated fully that his kingdom was not of this world, and that therefore it could not be alleged against him as treason against the Roman emperor.” Further evidence that this was an affirmative statement comes from Matthew 26:64 and Mark 14:62 (Robertson, Word Pictures in the New Testament). In these are two parallel records the high priest asks Jesus if he was the Messiah. Matthew records that the Lord answered, “You have said it” (su eipas); but Mark reports the answer with the clear affirmative, “I am” (ego eimi). This interchangeability of the two statements demonstrates that the idiom was confirmatory. (Cp. Matt 26:64; 27:11; Mark 15:2; Luke 22:70; 23:3; John 18:37).

27:19. “dream.” The Romans put a lot of weight into dreams, particularly when there was a lot going on politically. Calpurnia, the wife of Julius Caesar, had a dream that he was going to be killed, and her pleas were so insistent that he almost stayed home, but did not, and was killed by Brutus and his co-conspirators. That event gave dreams a lot of standing to the Romans, and was no doubt one of the reasons Pilate worked so hard to have Jesus released.

27:20. “persuaded.” The Greek word is peithô, to persuade, have confidence in. The Word Study Dictionary by Zodhiates does a very good job defining this word. It sometimes gets translated “trust” but we have stayed away from that translation and stayed with “confidence.” It also gets translated “obey,” but that is not technically correct, and especially in Hebrews 13:17 (“obey your leaders”) it gets misused. We have left it “obey” in James 3:3, because although the horse’s bit does allow us to persuade it, “obey” is more understandable in the context.

27:29. “mocked.” The Greek word translated “mocked” is empaizô (#1702 ἐμπαίζω), and means “mock,” “make fun of,” “ridicule.” In some contexts it has a second meaning, that of outwitting someone in a way that makes a fool of the person; to trick; to deceive; (Matt. 2:16). The “mocking” can be simply verbal, or it can be physical as well, and thus it can be categorized as physical abuse. It is used that way in the Septuagint (Judg. 16:25, 1 Sam. 31:4, Prov. 23:35). Empaizô is also used euphemistically for rape (Gen. 39:14, 17; Judg. 19:25; 20:5), which has caused some people to speculate that during his torture Jesus was raped by one or more of the Roman soldiers. Although homosexuality and bisexuality were common in the Roman world, the context of “mock” in the NT seems to exclude rape. For one thing, empaizô is used of Jesus being mocked when he was in public settings and even when he was on the cross (Luke 22:63; 23:36). He was also mocked in Herod’s presence but certainly not likely raped right there in the public of Herod’s court (Luke 23:11).

The times Jesus is recorded as being “mocked” when he was alone with the soldiers also seem to exclude him being raped. Both records, Matthew 27:29-31 and Mark 15:17-20, show that the soldiers put royal clothes on Jesus, then mocked him, then removed those clothes. That the clothes were removed after he was “mocked” certainly seems to exclude rape as part of the mocking. Jesus went through terrible and prolonged verbal and physical abuse between the time he was arrested and the time he died on the cross, and that included being mocked in many different settings by many different people. Sadly, Jesus still suffers physical abuse via his Body, the Church, which is persecuted for his name. Nevertheless, there will come a day when that will stop, and every knee will bow before him.

27:39. “insults.” The Greek verb blasphêmeô (#987 βλασφημέω) is transliterated (not translated) from the Greek into English as “blasphemy.” However, in Greek, blasphêmeô and blasphêmia (the noun) did not have to refer to God or a god, although they could, but were common words that were used of someone speaking against another. The primary meanings were showing disrespect to a person or deity, and/or harming his, her, or its reputation. In this case, the people were hurling insults at Jesus. [For more on blasphêmeô, see commentary on Matt. 9:3].

27:45. “sixth hour…ninth hour.” The sixth hour is our noon, and the ninth hour is about our 3 PM. Both the Jews and Romans divided the day into 12 hours, starting at daylight, roughly 6 AM. [For the hours of the day and the watches of the night, see commentary on Mark 6:48].

“My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?” It is sometimes taught that God forsook Jesus, and that He did so because Jesus became sin. That is simply not true. First, God did not forsook Jesus, the Scripture clearly states that Jesus was doing God’s will and could have even had 72,000 angels to help him if he wanted (Matt. 26:53). At the time of the crucifixion, “God was reconciling the world to himself through Christ” (2 Cor. 5:19). Furthermore, God does not leave us when we sin. If there is any truth that is central to Christianity, it is that God loves sinners and stays with us even when we do sin. Even if Jesus did “become sin,” God would have stayed with him just like He stays with us when we sin. Also, Jesus did not “become sin,” as if he could somehow embody sin. He became a “sin offering,” and was the completion and fulfillment of all the sin offerings that had gone before him that could not actually take away sin. [For more on Jesus becoming a sin offering, see commentary on 2 Corinthians 5:21].

In one of the greatest examples of love the world has ever seen, Jesus continued to try to demonstrate to people that he was the promised Messiah even from the cross. One notable way he did that was by quoting at least the first and last verse of Psalm 22, a Psalm of David and one that his audience would have known well. Psalm 22 is a Messianic Psalm, and one that clearly portrays the crucifixion and what was going on in those circumstances.

For one thing, it certainly looked like Jesus had been forsaken by God, even though he certainly knew he had not been (cp. Ps. 22:1).

- Ps. 22:6 says, “I am a worm,” and the Hebrew word for “worm” also refers to the scarlet color of the dye produced by the worm, and Jesus, covered with blood from head to toe, fit the description of that red worm.
- Ps. 22:7 says, “All who see me mock me; they hurl insults, shaking their heads.” That was certainly true at the location could see.
- Ps. 22:8 tells us what the mockers said: “He trusts in the LORD; let the LORD rescue him. Let him deliver him, since he delights in him.” We know from the Gospel records that is what the mockers were saying.
- Ps. 22:11 says, “Do not be far from me, for trouble is near and there is no one to help,” and that was certainly true. Trouble was all around him in the form of his enemies, and his disciples had fled the scene.
- Ps. 22:12 says, “Many bulls surround me; strong bulls of Bashan encircle me.” The bull represented a powerful, irresistible force, and in this case the Roman soldiers who guarded Christ were certainly like bulls surrounding him.
- Ps. 22:14 says, “I am poured out like water, and all my bones are out of joint.” Jesus’ strength was almost gone, he was dehydrated, and his bones had been pulled and stretched by Roman torture and by the act of crucifixion itself, but miraculously, not a bone was broken.
- Ps. 22:15 says, “My strength is dried up like a potsherd, and my tongue sticks to the roof of my mouth.” After losing all that blood and being beaten for so long Jesus has almost no strength left. As he became dehydrated, his tongue would swell and become sticky in his mouth. This also explains why, even though he quoted Psalm 22:1, some people misunderstood and thought he was calling out for Elijah.

- Ps. 22:16 says, “Dogs have surrounded me; a band of evil men has encircled me, they have pierced my hands and my feet.” The Gentiles were known as dogs, and the Roman soldiers surrounded Jesus and had pierced his hands and feet. This is an amazing prophecy since crucifixion did not exist in the time of David, so David wrote this prophecy purely by revelation, there is no cultural way David could have known about crucifixion.

- Ps. 22:17 says, “I can count all my bones; people stare and gloat over me.” Jesus hurt so badly it was like he could count all his bones. Besides that, the Roman flagellum whip was tipped with pieces of metal or bone and ripped the flesh off the body, often exposing some of the bones. It may well have been possible that some of Jesus’ bones were actually exposed. Also, people were staring at him and gloating.

- Ps. 22:18 says, “They divide my garments among them and cast lots for my clothing.” The Roman soldiers did exactly what the prophecy said.

- Ps. 22:24 says, “For he [God] has not despised or disdained the suffering of the afflicted one; he has not hidden his face from him but has listened to his cry for help.” This shows that although we can feel like we are abandoned when we are suffering, godly people know in their heart that God is still with them, and Jesus certainly knew that.

- Ps. 22:31 closes with, “for he has done it,” which can be “It is finished.” Jesus knew that godly people standing within hearing distance would be able to mentally recite much or all of Psalm 22 and then see how it was being fulfilled right before their very eyes, and then would also be able to describe that to others and spread the news about him. Thus, with his dying words Jesus was trying very hard to reach a lost world and reconcile them to God.

As Jesus was quoting from Psalm 22, there is every reason to believe that his audience recognized what he was quoting, even if he only quoted the first and last verse. (It is noteworthy that Charles Spurgeon thinks that Psalm 22, “may have been actually repeated word by word by our Lord when hanging on the tree” (The Treasury of David, introductory notes on Psalm 22)).

By the time of Jesus, the Jews read from the Old Testament in the synagogue every week (Acts 13:15; Acts 15:21; see also Luke 4 when Jesus read from Isaiah). After Nebuchadnezzar burned the Temple to the ground and thus brought the sacrifices and rituals associated with the Temple to an end, the reading and study of the Old Testament became much more central to Judaism. Even after the Temple was rebuilt in the Persian period, the attention to reading and study of the Old Testament that had become part of the synagogue service never stopped. Since the average Jew did not have a copy of much if any of the Old Testament, it was important to them to go to the synagogue to hear it read and discussed. Furthermore, the Jews encouraged each other to memorize the Scriptures even starting from the time they were children (Deut. 6:1-5). This meant that every devoted Jew had more than a passing familiarity with the Psalms.

Another way we can see that the Jews were very familiar with the Psalms is from how many times Psalms are quoted in the New Testament, and quoted as if the audience was familiar with them (Matt. 4:6 [Luke 4:10, 11]; Matt. 5:5; 13:35; 21:9; 23:39 [Mark
This large number of quotations shows that, as well as comforting and encouraging verses, the Psalms contained verses that gave important information about the Messiah and the Kingdom, something that would not have been lost on the Jewish audience, nor on the coverts who came to Judaism.

The words that Jesus spoke from the cross were not the words of a man who had been forsaken by God. They were Jesus' last possible attempt to reach the world with the Word of Truth.

“ninth hour.” About our 3 PM. Both the Jews and Romans divided the day into 12 hours, starting at daylight, roughly 6 AM. [For the hours of the day and the watches of the night, see commentary on Mark 6:48].

27:51. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

27:52. “Many bodies of the holy ones who had fallen asleep were raised…” Matthew 27:51-53 has caught the attention of readers for centuries because of the notable miracle that those verses describe. These verses occur immediately after the death of Jesus recorded earlier in the chapter. We do not believe it was in the original text. This record of the earthquake, the rocks being split, the graves being opened and the dead being raised occurs only in Matthew, and it contains some apparent inconsistencies. There are no manuscripts of Matthew that omit these verses. This means that if these verses are an addition or contain added material, it would have had to have been done very early, no later than the first part of the second century. Although it is very unusual to have an addition to the text present in every extant manuscript, it has been known to happen, and interestingly enough, in Matthew (it seems very clear that “in my name” was changed to “in the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit” in Matthew 28:19 [One God & One Lord, M. Graeser, J. Lynn, J. Schoenheit, p. 448]).

The patristic literature also indicates that these verses are original. “Patristic” comes from the Latin word for “father,” which is pater. So the word “patristic” is used by scholars for the writings of the early theologians, who are known as “the Church Fathers.” When the Church Fathers quote Matthew 27 as a body of text, the part about the dead being raised is also quoted. It is interesting that there are times when it would seem natural for those early theologians to refer to these events, when in fact they do not mention them, but it is always dangerous to argue from silence. So, the textual and patristic evidence shows us that if Matthew 27:52 and 53 were an addition, it is a very early one.

In spite of the textual evidence indicating that Matthew 27:52 and 53 are original, there are some very disturbing things about these verses. First and foremost is that if “many” of the Old Testament saints arose and went to Jerusalem, why are they not mentioned anywhere else? In fact, the entire event is not mentioned anywhere else in the Bible. This seems quite incredible if it actually occurred. Are we to believe that “many” Old Testament saints such as Joshua, Josiah or Jeremiah got up from the dead and entered Jerusalem, but never joined the apostles? When Lazarus was raised from the dead, he rejoined Jesus and the apostles. The traditional answer to that question is that when the saints got up from the dead they were in their glorified bodies and at some point, perhaps very shortly after witnessing in Jerusalem, they ascended up into heaven. Thus they would not have been around for the events in Acts. However, that cannot be, because Scripture is very clear that Jesus is the “firstfruits from the dead” (1 Corinthians 15:20-23).

Jesus is the very first person to be raised from the dead unto everlasting life. The Old Testament and Gospels have records of people being raised from the dead, but all those people were raised in their normal bodies and died again. They were not raised to everlasting life because Christ had not yet been raised from the dead. The “many holy people” Matthew refers to as being raised were raised when Jesus died, and not after his resurrection, and that is a big problem. Some Bible teachers say that the phrase, “after his resurrection,” in verse 53 refers to the entire event, and that the dead were not raised until after Jesus’ resurrection. However, this is not the reading of the Greek text. The raising from the dead is clearly set at the time of the death of Christ. Thus if they were raised, they could not have been raised with everlasting bodies.

Other theologians point out that these “holy ones” did not enter Jerusalem until after the resurrection, but that really misses the point. If someone was raised from the dead with a glorified and everlasting body before Jesus was, then that person would have been the “firstfruits from the dead,” and not Jesus. If these saints spent three days near their tombs, this in itself is a problem, because these verses seem to have a chronological inconsistency. What would be the point in raising them from the dead just to have them stay near their tombs, and then appear in Jerusalem three days later? If God got them up to be witnesses, would they not begin witnessing immediately?

Another verse that would contradict a theory that Old Testament believers got up from the dead in their new and everlasting bodies, and then shortly ascend to heaven, is that John 3:13 affirms that when the book of John was written (perhaps 80-90 AD), no one was in heaven but Jesus (see commentary on John 3:13, 16). The KJV of John 3:13 reads: “And no man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven.”

Although most modern versions of John 3:13 have the shorter version, omitting the last phrase (“which is in heaven”), it is our belief that it is original, and part of the narration of John, not part of Jesus’ speech to Nicodemus. The Companion Bible by E. W. Bullinger has some good notes about this on John 3:13ff. If no one was in heaven except Jesus by the time the Gospel of John was written (perhaps 90 AD), then there is no way that those Old Testament believers could have gotten up unto everlasting life around the time of the death of Christ, because there is no way they would have been alive throughout the period covered by the Book of Acts and not been mentioned or had a noticeable impact.
Even assuming that these Old Testament believers got up from the dead in their fleshly bodies, only to die again shortly afterwards, presents some serious problems. There is the chronological question as to why they stayed by their tombs for three days, and did not enter Jerusalem until “after the resurrection.” Also, the lack of biblical evidence that they had risen is a major problem. Did no one notice them for three full days? That would be very unlikely. Also, why did they not get word to the apostles who were living in fear during those same three days (John 20:19)? Furthermore, where were they when the apostles were first hearing about the resurrection? Evidence for the resurrection was coming to the Apostles from many places. Peter and John went to the empty tomb, but were not convinced of Jesus’ resurrection (John 20:3-10). Mary Magdalene told them she had seen Jesus, but they still did not believe (Mark 16:9-11). Later Mary and all the women told the disciples about the angel at the tomb who said Christ was raised, but they still did not believe (Luke 24:1-11). Since Jesus’ tomb was outside the city and there were many tombs all over that whole area, would not some of the disciples have encountered a few of these risen saints? That seems logical, especially since “they appeared to many people.” Are we to really believe that none of those “many people” were disciples or would have gotten word to the disciples? Then Jesus appeared to two disciples as they walked to Emmaus. Those two traveled back to Jerusalem and told the disciples about it (Luke 24:13-35), and it was while they were all talking that Jesus appeared in the room with them. By that time it was Sunday evening (John 20:19). It seems impossible that “many” Old Testament saints had been raised for three days and had begun to enter the city of Jerusalem.

Another problem is where were these “many saints” on the Day of Pentecost, only 50 days later? The number of disciples was specifically given at about 120. That is not a large number considering the many lives that Jesus touched. It does not seem possible that the 120 believers were both those who had followed Jesus and those saints who were raised from the dead. When Peter met with them to choose a successor to Judas, would not a risen saint be a great potential leader? Yet nothing is said about them at all.

There is no evidence that any of these “many saints” joined the disciples, yet what else would they do? Where would they go? All of their families were long dead and they would not have had any jobs, food, money, or places to stay. Furthermore, there is no evidence that they convinced any of the unbelievers. The crowds on Pentecost, and the religious leaders, seem to have never heard of them. Thus it certainly seems they would have joined the disciples for support.

Furthermore, on the day of Pentecost, Peter assures the crowds that David died and was buried, and his tomb was still known (David’s body, 1000 years old, would have been decayed and gone). Had David just been resurrected and walking around Jerusalem witnessing, it seems certain that Peter would have mentioned that fact, and not said that he was dead. Of course, David might have been one saint that God did not raise. But if there were Old Testament believers walking around Jerusalem, that certainly weakens Peter’s argument that Jesus is the firstborn from the dead. It would be logical for someone in the crowd at Pentecost to ask why Peter was saying Jesus was the first one up from the dead if there were “many” believers up before him.

Also, the unbelievers and the critics of the apostles never mentioned these resurrected believers. The religious leaders of Jerusalem, for example, accused the apostles, saying, “…you have filled Jerusalem with your teaching.” (Acts 5:28). Surely, if even a few Old Testament believers were also in Jerusalem and had appeared “to many,”
the religious leaders would have been concerned about that also, yet there is no mention that anyone else was spreading the teaching of Christ’s resurrection.

Another problem with these verses is that they break the flow of events in Matthew. Matthew records that at the time of Christ’s death there was an earthquake, rocks split, and the curtain of the Temple was torn (v. 51). Then verse 54 says that when the centurion and those guarding Jesus “saw” the things that happened, they exclaimed that Jesus was the Son of God. We believe that Jesus was crucified on the top of the Mt.
of Olives (The Place of Christ’s Crucifixion by Earnest Martin), and that the centurion and the others could have indeed seen the Temple curtain rip and the earthquake and rocks split. Thus, without verses 52 and 53, Matthew 27: 51 and 54 read smoothly and is possible. But when verses 52 and 53 are added, then the centurion and guards could not have seen “all that had happened” (v. 54), because there is no way they could have seen many bodies come out of tombs all around the area. Thus the addition of verses 52 and 53 add a contradiction to the text.

The problems mentioned above are not the only difficulty with these verses in Matthew. The vocabulary in the verses seems unique to this section of Scripture even though it can be anchored in other biblical texts. We will look at two words in the order they appear in the verse: “bodies,” and “resurrection.” Verse 52 says that many “bodies” of the holy people arose. At first this seems unusual because the vast majority of the time it is the “people” who arise, not just the body. It was Lazarus who came out of the tomb, ot Lazarus’ body. Thus this vocabulary of the “body” usually was used in later debates when Gnostics and Neo-Platonists were bringing into Christianity their ideas about the soul living on after death, and saying that only the body would need to get up because the soul would return to it from heaven, where it had been since the death of the body. It is true that Isaiah 26:19 says that in the future the dead bodies will arise, and Romans 8:11 mentions life being given to our “mortal bodies.” However, the fact that “bodies” is used in Matthew 27:52 is unusual and makes it suspect.

The most unusual word in Matthew 27:53 is “resurrection.” The Greek word is egerais (#1454 ἐγεραῖς), and this is the only time it is used in the New Testament. Indeed, it is used only once in the Greek Old Testament, and that was not about getting up from the dead, but arising from sleep. “You know when I sit and when I rise” (Ps. 139:2). The word means “a waking up as from sleep, a rousing or rising up.” As far as all other extant Greek literature is concerned, egerais was not used of rising from the dead until the Church Father, Irenaeus. (Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, Gerhard Kittel, Matthew 27:52b and 53,” by Dr. Dan McConaughy). Several scenarios are possible: by the time Matthew wrote, Christians were using “egerais” to refer to the resurrection because it can mean a waking from sleep, and Matthew used it that way. Or Matthew may have been the first to use it that way and the concept spread in Christianity. What we believe is the case, however, is that this verse was written a little later than the Gospel of Matthew and then imported into it. Although there is no “absolute proof” that Matthew would not have used the word, it is very unusual that its only occurrence in the entire
New Testament is in this one difficult section.
The contextual evidence and the scope of Scripture give good evidence for believing that Matthew 27: 52 and 53 were added to the text. However, there is really no honest way to absolutely exclude these verses from the text. They are not missing in any of the texts of this section of Matthew. They are referred to by many Church Fathers and, lastly, although the vocabulary is not common, it does not demand that the section be considered a later addition to the text. We can conclude that if Old Testament believers were raised, they were not raised to everlasting life because then Jesus would not be the firstfruits from the dead. It is possible that they were raised and then died again in a few weeks or months. But as we have seen, it is unlikely, due to a lack of supporting evidence.

“fallen asleep.” The Greek verb is koimaō (κοιμάω), to fall asleep, to be asleep. Sleep is used as a euphemism and metaphor for death. See commentary on Acts 7:60.

27:57. “when it was evening.” After Jesus died, Joseph of Arimathea went to Pilate and got permission to take the body of Jesus (Matt. 27:58; Mark 15:43; Luke 23:52; John 19:38). He wrapped the body in a clean linen cloth and put it in the tomb, which was not the traditional Jewish burial custom (Matt. 27:59; Mark 15:46; Luke 22:53). Why would Joseph do that? The most likely reason is that Nicodemus, who brought the spices, was supposed to meet Joseph at the tomb but was delayed. Then Joseph not knowing what had happened, closed the tomb and left (Matt. 27:60). At that point the women from Galilee who were watching Joseph, and had seen that he had laid Jesus’ body in the tomb without preparing it according to the common custom, left also. The Sabbath would have been starting by that time.

It is also possible, but less likely, that Joseph believed Jesus would be raised from the dead, and thus he did not bother to bury Jesus with all the spices and formal wrappings. However, that explanation leaves us with some unanswered questions, such as how did Nicodemus know Joseph was going to get Jesus’ body and how did he know where Joseph buried him? Also, if Joseph did not properly bury Jesus because he believed Jesus would be raised from the dead in three days, it would have been inappropriate and presumptuous for Nicodemus to go to Joseph’s personal tomb, open it, and wrap Jesus’ body without Joseph’s permission.

The women from Galilee were watching Joseph, and all of them saw that he had laid Jesus’ body in the tomb without preparing it according to the common custom (Matt. 27:61; Mark 15:47; Luke 23:55). That is why they went and bought and prepared spices, and went to properly bury Jesus on Sunday morning. The women went home intending to prepare Jesus’ body properly, but Luke makes it clear the Sabbath was too close to do that, so they had to wait until Friday to buy and prepare the spices. Luke 23:54 says the Sabbath was beginning, however, this “Sabbath” is not the weekly Sabbath, but the Sabbath that was the 15th day of Nisan, the first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread, which was always a Sabbath (Lev. 23:7). The year Jesus was crucified, the 15th of Nisan was a Thursday (see commentary on Luke 23:54).

The woman bought and prepared the spices on Friday, and rested Saturday (the weekly Sabbath), and then brought the spices to the tomb early Sunday morning (see commentary on John 20:1). Although the women would have had time to bring the spices to the tomb on Friday, they did not do that. The most logical explanation for that is that they knew there was a guard at the tomb. In contrast, they would have thought that by Sunday, the fourth day, the guard would be gone and they could successfully anoint Jesus’ body.
After Joseph of Arimathea and the women left the tomb, Nicodemus came with his servants and gave Jesus a burial that was according to Jewish custom. He brought spices with him, and re-wrapped Jesus’ body with the spices. However, the women had already left and did not see what Nicodemus had done. It would have been natural for a rich man like Nicodemus to have servants with him, who are the “they” of John 19:40. After all, Nicodemus was a wealthy man and member of the Sanhedrin (John 3:1), and he was bringing 75 pounds of spices, which would have required help and were very valuable. It is possible that Nicodemus’ work was completed after dark, and thus on the Sabbath, or he may have gotten Jesus buried just before the Sabbath started. In either case, he would not have been able to eat the Passover meal because he had touched Jesus’ dead body. [For more on Nicodemus, see commentary on John 19:40].

27:58. “Then Pilate commanded it to be given to him.” From a Roman perspective, Jesus was a criminal, and after his death his dead body would have been simply thrown into a pit with the other criminals who were crucified that day and all of them would have been buried together and forgotten. Of course, if a family member or friend wanted a body, he could have it. Thus, when Joseph asked Pilate for the body of Jesus, it was given to him. The whole arrest, trial, and crucifixion of Jesus seems to have caught Mary and the apostles completely off guard, and they were not prepared for his death, nor were the apostles prepared to publicly step forward and get the body. From a Roman legal perspective, after Pilate gave Joseph the body, it belonged to him and he could do with it as he pleased.

27:60. “laid it in his own new tomb.” This was just before sunset Wednesday evening. [For more information on a Wednesday crucifixion and burial, see commentary on Matthew 12:40].

27:61. “And Mary Magdalene was there, and the other Mary…” The Bible does not specifically say how the women knew about Jesus’ burial and knew where to go so they could watch Joseph put the body of Jesus in the tomb. The most likely explanation is that they did not want to leave Jesus just hanging on the cross, and so stayed in the area. It is even possible that Mary, Jesus’ mother, thought she would claim Jesus’ body if the Romans came and took him down. In any case, the women were likely still there when Joseph took Jesus down from the cross and carried his body away. They would have followed Joseph, and sat down where they could see what he was doing. That is why Matthew 27:61 says they were “sitting opposite the tomb,” i.e., they were sitting in a way they could see the tomb. Nicodemus may have noticed them, or he may have been trying so hard to get done before the darkness set in that he did not pay attention to them. The women noticed that Joseph did not properly prepare Jesus’ body for burial, but simply wrapped him in a cloth, closed the tomb, and left, which is why they went to prepare spices themselves (see commentary on Matt. 27:60 and John 19:40).

27:62. “now on the next day.” This is the morning on the 15th of Nisan. The Passover sacrifice is killed in the late afternoon on the 14th of Nisan and eaten after sunset. Since sunset starts the next day, the Passover meal actually ends up being eaten on the next day, the 15th day of Nisan, which is the first day of the seven-day Feast of Unleavened Bread (Exod. 12:6-19). In spite of the fact it was a Sabbath day, the Pharisees and chief priests were so filled with trepidation about Jesus that they went to Pilate and requested a guard to keep the tomb secure.
Pilate’s answer, “You have a watch,” or as it is in some versions, “You have a guard,” has sometimes been misunderstood to mean that the Priests already had the Temple police, so they should use them. That is not correct. Pilate gave permission to the priests to requisition a detachment of Roman guards, which is why the guards would have been in trouble if the governor heard that the body of Jesus had been stolen while they were guarding it (cp. Matt. 28:12-15).

“were gathered.” Passive voice. The spiritual and social forces were powerfully at work, exerting an influence. It is as if an invisible hand rounded up these religious leaders.

27:63. “will be raised.” Passive voice. The religious leaders remembered, but did not believe, what the disciples never grasped—that Jesus taught he would be raised after three days.

27:65. “You can have.” The Greek word is echō (#2192 ἔχω), which is usually “you have,” but in this case it can be “you can have” (see BDAG, ἔχω, definition 9).

“a guard of soldiers.” The Greek word is koustōdia (#2892 κουστωδία), a guard of Roman soldiers. The Pharisees and chief priests were so filled with trepidation about Jesus that they went to Pilate and requested a guard to keep the tomb secure (Matt. 27:62-66). Pilate’s answer as it appears in many English versions, “You have a watch,” or “You have a guard,” has sometimes been misunderstood to mean that Pilate told the priests that since they already had the Temple police, they should use them. That is not correct. Pilate gave permission to the priests to requisition a detachment of Roman guards, which is why those soldiers would have been in trouble if the governor heard that the guard and fallen asleep and the body of Jesus had been stolen (Matt. 28:12-15). Pilate would not care if the Temple police had fallen asleep and Jesus’ body had been stolen.

27:66. “put a seal on the stone.” They did not “seal” the stone in the sense of somehow gluing it closed. That is not the meaning of “seal” in this case. If they could have glued the stone closed, they would not have needed the guard. They put a seal on the stone, which would have been wax or clay that connected the stone to the wall and which would have had a “seal” (an insignia of some kind), pressed into the wax. If the stone were moved, the wax or clay would have been broken and the insignia destroyed. This seal let everyone know the grave had not been tampered with. It is even possible that in this case the seal was clay attached to the wall of the tomb and wax on the rolling-stone, with a chord between them.

“setting the guard.” The Greek text simply has the phrase “with the guard” at the end of the sentence, which has led to various interpretations and translations. For example, the NASB says that the Jews sealed the tomb “along with the guards.” Some interpreters have even suggested that the Jews “sealed” the tomb “with the guards,” meaning that the guards were the effective seal, but this interpretation seems very unlikely. It seems most likely that the phrase is not meant to communicate that the guards helped seal the tomb, but rather that the tomb was left “with the guards,” as the Jews requested, so the body would not be stolen. Perhaps a more conflated translation the preserved the phrase “with the guard” would be: “So they went and made the tomb secure by sealing the stone and leaving it with the guard.”

28:1. “as it began to dusk and come toward the first day of the week.” This event, Mary Magdalene and the other Mary coming to view the tomb, is not recorded in any Gospel but Matthew. This is now Saturday the 17th of Nisan, in the late evening, just before the Saturday Sabbath ended and Sunday, the first day of the week, began. The Jewish day starts with sunset, and this verse says it was late on the Sabbath (late Saturday afternoon); it was not Sunday morning as many people believe.

Although many translations have “dawn,” not “dusk,” that is a misunderstanding of what the Greek text is saying. The Greek text reads in a way that seems very difficult when translated literally, which is due to the idioms involved. A very literal rendering of the Greek text is: “Now late of the [on the] Sabbaths, at the dawn [or beginning] toward the first of the Sabbaths.” This is a very difficult sentence, and to understand it we need to know two things: that “Sabbaths” (the plural of Sabbath) was the regular Hebrew idiom for a week, and also that the Jewish day, and thus each new week, “dawned,” or “began” at sunset on the weekly Sabbath. Thus, sunset on Saturday started Sunday and the new week. Although many English versions read “dawn” in this verse, the Greek word epiphōskō (ἐπιφώσκω) literally means, “to grow light,” and it was used of the “dawn” or “beginning” of something [For more on epiphōskō, see commentary on Luke 23:54]. According to Jewish reckoning of time, the new day was dawning, or beginning, at sunset.

Thus the women came to see the tomb late on one “Sabbaths” (on one week), just before the beginning of another “Sabbaths” (the beginning of another week). So this record occurs Saturday evening, just around sunset, but it was still the Sabbath. Even so, it would not have been wrong for the women to come late on the Sabbath, because walking was allowed on the Sabbath as long as one did not walk too far. Thus, this verse does not contradict the verse that says the women “rested” on the Sabbath (Luke 23:56). Besides, that verse was speaking in the context of the work involved in preparing the spices for Jesus’ burial.

About this verse, Robertson (Word Pictures in the New Testament) writes: “This careful chronological statement according to Jewish days clearly means that before the Sabbath was over, that is before six PM, this visit by the women was made ‘to see the sepulcher.’” Robertson is correct that this is a “careful chronological statement,” and not paying attention to it is one of the reasons people wrongly think the Bible contradicts itself in the timing of some the events that occurred after the death of Jesus. The Sabbath that ended would logically been the weekly Sabbath, Saturday. Mary Magdalene and the other Mary were checking on the tomb in expectation of anointing Jesus’ body at daylight the next morning, i.e., on Sunday morning.

This verse is saying that just as the Sabbath was coming to an end on Saturday evening, the women came to “look at” the tomb. The Greek word theoreō, “to look at,” usually refers to viewing something from a distance, which would have been the case since the guards would have kept the women from getting too close to the tomb. At this time the stone would have been still in place in front of the tomb. If the women came Saturday night just to “see the tomb,” it is very possible that they were checking to see if the guard was gone yet. The third day of Christ’s “three days and three nights” ended just about this time Saturday evening, so if the guards had already left, then the way was clear to bring the spices Sunday morning. However, the guards were still there and so was the stone that was covering the tomb door. Due to the time of day, it is possible that Jesus was already up from the dead and out of the tomb. If not, his resurrection would have occurred very shortly after they saw the tomb.

There is a time break between 28:1 and 28:2. The events of 28:2 occurred around dawn Sunday morning, because when the angel opened the tomb, some of the guards went and reported to the chief priests what had happened. One of the astounding things about the four Gospels is that there is no explicit description of Jesus getting up from the dead, an event that would have happened around the time Mary Magdalene and the other Mary came to the tomb. There is no description such as, “Then the life of God entered Jesus and he woke up from the dead and passed effortlessly through the stone wall of the tomb.” No amount of guesswork will tell us for certain, but it is possible that any description of the resurrection cannot come close to describing it as it would need to be described. After all, it involved changing Jesus’ dead human body into the living spirit-powered body of the one who is second in command to God in all the universe.

“there was a great earthquake.” On the 18th of Nisan, Sunday morning, while it was still very dark, but getting close to early dawn, there was an earthquake and an angel rolled the stone away from the tomb door. We know this occurred close to dawn because the guards would have gone back into the city and told the chief priests what had happened shortly after they had been frightened by the angel (Matt. 28:4, 11). However, the Scripture says that the guards were still talking to the chief priests when the women, who had come to the tomb at dawn just after the sun rose, had already seen both the angels and Jesus, and were on their way to tell the disciples what they had seen (Matt. 28:5-11). Thus, the angel rolling back the stone and scaring the guards could not have been too long before daybreak. However, it was early enough that the guards had left by the time Mary Magdalene arrived, and she had come alone to the tomb before the sun rose and thus before the group of women who came with the spices, who arrived after the sun had risen. The guards coming to their senses, discussing what to do, going to the chief priests, and reporting to them what happened, would have likely taken no more than an hour, two at the most.

It is often taught that the resurrection occurred simultaneously with this earthquake. However, Scripture never says this. The actual event of the resurrection is not portrayed in Scripture. Furthermore, this was now Sunday, the first day of the week, which would have been the fourth day since Jesus was buried. But Jesus was only in the grave 3 days and 3 nights (Matt. 12:40). Christ’s resurrection was “three days and three nights” after his burial, so it would have been on Saturday just before sunset.

If Jesus got up from the dead Saturday night around sunset, why would the angel wait until just before dawn to open the grave? The most likely reason is that God knew the disciples would start coming to the tomb Sunday morning, and did not want to have the tomb open all night without a guard lest people think that the most likely explanation for the missing body of Jesus was that people stole it (which is what people believed anyway; cp. Matt. 28:15). So likely not too long before sunrise Sunday morning (an hour or so would be enough), there was an earthquake. The earthquake and angel were not needed for Jesus to rise from the dead and leave the tomb, they were for a witness of the resurrection to people, and to clear the way for the disciples to get to the tomb without Roman interference. The angel rolled the stone away, doing it without human involvement, proving the tomb was empty. Then, when Mary Magdalene arrived at the tomb before sunrise, the guard was already gone, and by the time the women who brought the spices to the tomb were going to tell the disciples what had happened to them, the guard was in the city reporting to the priests.

“Yahweh.” “Yahweh” is the personal name of God, and a rabbinic abbreviation for it appears in the Hebrew manuscript of Matthew as well as in the verses of the Old Testament that Matthew quoted. There is evidence that Matthew wrote a Gospel in Hebrew and used the name Yahweh, so we have put it in the REV (see commentary on Matthew 3:3).

“rolled away the stone.” The Greek is ἀποκυλίω (apokúliō), to roll away. In this context it seems that the stone was more than simply rolled back away from the entrance of the tomb, but rather rolled away from the tomb entirely. It would have been lying flat on the ground some distance from the grave to mark that fact that the grave was empty for all to see, and could not be closed again without a major effort requiring many men. The flat stone also provided a good seat for the angel, who sat on it in triumph of the resurrection.

28:6. “Come, see the place where he was lying.” Since the women were already in the tomb, this is a clear indication that there was more than one room in the tomb, and the women were standing in the weeping chamber, the large room just inside the door of many tombs. The angel invited the woman to step into the room that had held the dead body of Jesus (See commentary on Mark 16:5).

28:7. “go.” The Greek verb is πορεύομαι (poreúomai), and is an aorist participle, literally, “having gone.” This is the idiom of the prophetic perfect, when a past tense is put for something that is actually future to express the certainty of it or emphasize it [For more information of the prophetic perfect, see commentary on Ephesians 2:6].

“Look!” The Greek word is ἰδού (idon), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

“Galilee.” One of the interesting details in the record of the death and resurrection of Christ is the fact that it took so long for the disciples to obey the command to go to Galilee. The chronology of the trip to Galilee is: On the night of his arrest Jesus told the disciples that he would meet them in Galilee after his resurrection; so obviously they were supposed to go there (Matt. 26:32). However, they were all denying that they would forsake him, and his statement about Galilee seemed to go unnoticed. It would have been a great act of trust for them to have gone to Galilee and waited for him to meet them, just as he said. It seems certain, however, that he knew they did not believe he would be raised from the dead, and just as certain that he would have to tell them a few times to go to Galilee, which is what he ended up doing.

The Sunday after he was resurrected, angels, then Jesus himself, told the women to tell the disciples to go to Galilee (Matt. 28:7, 10), but they still did not go. Then, when Jesus appeared to the disciples behind closed doors that evening (Luke 24:36-46; John 20:19-24), the Bible does not say he told them to go to Galilee, but at that point they should have believed the women (and what Jesus said in Matt. 26:32) and left for Galilee. Instead, they were still in Jerusalem, still behind locked doors, a week later when Jesus appeared to them again (John 20:26-29).
The Bible does not say if Jesus told the disciples to go to Galilee in this second behind-locked-doors meeting with his disciples. However, it seems that he did, because the next thing the Bible says after the second meeting is that the disciples went to Galilee (Matt. 18:16a), and Jesus met them at the Sea of Galilee (which John 21:1 calls the Sea of Tiberias, because Tiberias was the most influential city on the lake).

A major reason for the disciples to go to Galilee was it was the base of Jesus’ operation and where he had the most disciples. In the days before his ascension, in Jerusalem there were only 120 disciples (Acts 2:15). In contrast, he met with more than 500 people at one time (1 Cor. 15:6), which is likely the meeting on a mountain in Galilee, mentioned in Matthew 28:16-20.

The Bible does not record the consequences of the disciples not obeying Jesus and going to Galilee. However, we know that Jesus would not say to do it if there was not some good reason, so we can be sure that there were some consequences. There was almost certainly two important consequences: for one thing, if all the Apostles had returned to Galilee right after his death, the rumor that they had taken Jesus’ body from the tomb would have been difficult to perpetrate, because if his leaders had all left the area, what disciple would steal the body? The lie that the disciple’s had stolen Jesus’ body only made sense because the Apostles were still in town, and in hiding.

Even on Sunday morning, however, Jesus was still directing the Apostles to go to Galilee. He still wanted the witness of his resurrection to reach the people of Galilee, and there may have been another reason as well. It is likely that the disciples were being sought out by the religious leaders and painfully interrogated. The situation was dangerous enough that a week after the resurrection the disciples were still hiding behind locked doors. It is typical that the Bible would not focus on any hardship to the disciples at this time, focusing instead on the resurrection of Christ and events involving his appearances to people, so the fact that the Bible does not mention any specific persecution does not mean it did not happen. By the time Jesus and the Apostles showed back up in town, likely almost a full month later, Jesus apparently did not publicly show himself, and the religious leaders apparently thought the crisis was over and left them alone.

“Jesus met them.” The first person that Jesus met after his resurrection was Mary Magdalene. The next people Jesus appeared to was this group of women that had come to the tomb to properly bury his body but were met by angels and now were on their way to the disciples to tell them that Jesus had been raised from the dead. How much more convincing their testimony should have been now that they could all say in unison that they had actually seen the living Christ. No matter; the Eleven and the disciples did not believe them any more than they had believed Mary Magdalene. By evening, however, when Cleopas and the other disciple return from the road to Emmaus, where they had seen the Lord, Jesus had already appeared to Peter, and at last the disciples (most of them, anyway), believed he was raised from the dead (Luke 24:34).

“Greetings.” The Greek reads chaírō (#5463 χαίρω; pronounced kī-rō). It means “be well,” or “rejoice,” and was a standard greeting like our “Hi.” The Hebrew text of Matthew (see commentary on 3:3) has, “May the Name deliver you.” In this case, “the Name” in full is used instead of the rabbinic abbreviation for Yahweh, which is apparently an abbreviation of the Hebrew for “the Name.”

“paid homage.” The act of grabbing the feet was an act of homage. See commentary on Matthew 2:2.

28:11. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (ιδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

“some of the guard.” At the same time that the women were traveling to tell the disciples, some of the guards arrived at Jerusalem and gave their report to the Jews. The Bible does not say how many guards watched the tomb, but only “some” of the guards reported what they saw, the rest were apparently so terrified they ran off and stayed hidden.

The religious leaders bribed the guards with a large amount of money to say the disciples stole the body while they were asleep, a report that is still often believed. Also, the Jews told the guards that if Pilate heard they had fallen asleep, a capital offense, the Jews would take care of that also. That fact confirms that the guards were Roman soldiers and not Temple police, because if Jewish police had fallen asleep on the job and the body of Jesus been stolen, Pilate would have not cared at all about it. But if Roman soldiers on duty had fallen asleep and botched their assignment, they could have been executed.

God sent an angel to roll back the stone in sight of the guards (Matt. 28:2-4). This was grace upon grace to them. He did not have to do that. He could have just rolled the stone back by invisible power. God gave the guards a wonderful opportunity to believe in, and testify to, the resurrection of Jesus Christ. It was not something they expected when they got “tomb guard duty,” but it is what happened. We never know when God is going to move powerfully in the world. If we happen to be fortunate enough to be part of a move of God, we need to be prepared to believe and testify. These guards showed that they were more interested in money than the truth.

28:16. “The eleven disciples.” The “eleven disciples” are the apostles minus Judas, who has committed suicide (Matt. 27:5). In Greek, the sentence has a de, which is usually a break or a change of subject. It seemed the best way to represent that break here was simply to start the new sentence without any connective particle in English.

“went into Galilee.” The “eleven disciples” go to Galilee, and the Eleven are the apostles minus Judas, who has committed suicide (Matt. 27:5). There is a long time break between Matthew 28:15, when Jesus met with the women, and the first half of 28:16 when the Eleven go to Galilee. It would have been ten days or more.

Jesus had met the women on Resurrection Sunday, the 18th of Nisan and spoken with them about the disciples going to Galilee. But they were still in Jerusalem on Sunday the 25th of Nisan when he appeared to them a second time behind closed doors. Even if the disciples left that day for Galilee, it was usually a trip of three days.

Then between the first half and second half of Matthew 28:16 there is another time break. After the Apostles go to Galilee, Jesus’ meets them on the Sea of Galilee, which is the third time he appeared to all of them together (John 21:14). Sometime after that meeting we know that Jesus met with the Apostles and a large group of disciples on a mountain (Matt. 28:16b).

28:17. “they.” This refers to all the disciples together. This is almost certainly the event recorded in 1 Corinthians 15:6 when he was seen by more than 500 believers at one time.
There were not 500 disciples in Jerusalem, which is clear from the fact that there were only about 120 there around the Day of Pentecost (Acts 1:15). However, Jesus’ headquarters through most of his ministry had been the Galilee, and thus the account of the more than 500 people who saw him at one time would have occurred there. The fact that he got with so many disciples at least partially explains why he would go to Galilee at all. There were many like Thomas who needed to see proof to be sure, and Jesus’ appearing in person in the Galilee was surely a boost to the believers.

Although all the disciples “worshipped” Jesus, which in that culture meant to bow down before him or prostrate oneself before him, some of them “doubted.” This is understandable. Jesus told the Apostles over and over he was going to be killed and then raised from the dead, and it was such a foreign concept to them they did not understand the plain words he was speaking. The death and resurrection of the Messiah was a new concept to these Jews, and so it was natural that, even when they were faced with the living Christ, some of them “doubted;” they were not 100% sure of what they were seeing.

“All bowed before him.” See commentary on Matthew 2:2. Most versions translated proskuneō as “worship” here, but that is an unclear translation. The act of “worship” in that biblical culture was to fall down before someone, which is what these disciples did. That does not mean that they did not doubt at the same time. They bowed (or fell down) before him, but even in doing that act of showing respect, some were doubting.

28:18. “has been given to me.” This is one of the many verses that make it clear that Jesus Christ is not God. If Christ were really God, and co-equal and co-eternal with the Father as the Trinitarians teach, then it is illogical to say Christ was given authority. God, by definition, has authority. The authority Jesus now has is delegated and derived, and is not a function of his “divine nature.” The wording of these scriptures is, in actuality, a refutation of the Trinity. Jesus is that man to whom God gave “all authority.” In contrast to Christ, there is no verse anywhere that says “God” was given authority. God has all authority, and delegates it to others. The fact that this verse says Jesus was “given” the authority shows he is not God. Although there are some Trinitarians who teach that Jesus divested himself of his authority when he was incarnated as a human, this verse is Jesus talking after his resurrection, and all Trinitarians admit that Jesus supposedly resumed his full Godhood after he was raised from the dead.

Trinitarians then argue that when the Scripture says that “God” gave Jesus his position and authority, such as in Acts 2:36, which says, “God has made Jesus both Lord and Christ,” that “God” means the Father. We believe, however, that the Bible is making a simple and clear contrast between “Jesus” and “God” in those verses. We assert that is introducing false doctrine into the Bible to define the word “God” as “the Triune God” if “Jesus” is not in the context, but if he is, then “God” suddenly means “the Father.” We see no need for such verbal gymnastics. If we read the Bible with the assumption that Jesus is not God, then “God” does not have to be constantly redefined as sometimes the Father and sometimes the Triune God.

Matthew 28:18 is only one of many verses that say the same basic thing: that Jesus got his authority from “God.” For example, God “placed” everything under his feet and “appointed” him to be Head of the Church (Eph. 1:22).

28:19. “Go and make disciples of all the nations.” The phrase, “of all the nations” reads as if it was a genitive when in fact “nations” is in the accusative case (direct object), not the genitive case. Thus, in one sense, a more proper translation is “go disciple all the nations.” Normally we would want to avoid the genitive in this case because it can be limiting and mean “out of, “ thus referring to make some of the people disciples, whereas the accusative is a clearly broad goal, “disciple all the nations.” The reason that most versions read, “make disciples of all the nations” rather than “disciple all nations” is that the Greek word mathēteuō (μαθητεύω) more naturally refers to both the making and training of disciples. Thus, if we say, “go and make disciples of all the nations,” we clearly understand that they were not disciples before, and we have to get them saved and then disciple them, whereas if we say, “go disciple all nations,” they may already be disciples and we are going to give them further instruction. Translators differ as to which translation is closer to representing what Christ said, and so both translations exist among the English versions.

It seems clear that after his resurrection Jesus expanded the missionary work of his disciples. Whereas before his resurrection he clearly said, “Do not go on any road of the Gentiles, and do not enter into any city of the Samaritans, but go instead to the lost sheep of the house of Israel” (Matt. 10:5, 6), now he says to go to the nations and disciple them.

“in my name.” We have translated the text according to the evidence we have that there were early Greek texts that read that way, and also according to what the Apostles did in Acts. They made disciples in the name of Jesus. We admit that there is no extant Greek text that says “go and make disciples of all the nations in my name,” they all read “baptizing them in the name of the Father, and the Son, and the holy spirit.” Nevertheless, we believe that the historical evidence, as well as the evidence in the Bible itself, supports the conclusion that the common rendering is a very early addition to the text, and the original reading was “in my name.” We give the following evidence to support our conclusion:

1). There is not a single occurrence of the disciples baptizing anyone in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Every single record in the New Testament show that people were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus. “Peter replied, ‘Repent and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ for the forgiveness of your sins.'” (Acts 2:38). “They had simply been baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus” (Acts 8:16). “So he ordered that they be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ” (Acts 10:48). “On hearing this, they were baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus” (Acts 19:5).

It is inconceivable to us that Jesus would command his Apostle to baptize in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit just before he ascended, and yet about a month later, on the Day of Pentecost, they completely ignored what he said and baptized “in the name of Jesus Christ.” To us, it seems clear that Christ told the Apostles to make disciples in his name, so that is what they did, baptizing in Jesus’ name.

2). Based on the biblical and historic evidence, it is the consensus of many scholars that the Trinitarian formula that appears in Matthew 28:19 was a later addition to the text. For example, the conservative Christian publication, The Zondervan Pictorial Encyclopedia of the Bible, states (“Baptism,” Vol. 1, p. 465):

It appears from Biblical records that the earliest Christians baptized with the formula ‘in the name of Jesus Christ’ (Acts 2:38). The Trinitarian formula ascribed to Jesus in his final commission (Matt. 28:19) is generally regarded to have been shaped at a later date through the liturgical usage of the community of Christians.

3. Eusebius (c. 260–c. 340) was the Bishop of Caesarea and is known as “the Father of Church History.” Although he wrote prolifically, his most celebrated work is his Ecclesiastical History, a history of the Church from the Apostolic period until his own time. Today it is still the principle work on the history of the church at that time.
Eusebius quotes many verses in his writings, and Matthew 28:19 is one of them. Fredrick Conybeare studied the works of Eusebius and documented that on 17 different occasions he quoted Matthew 28:19 without the Trinitarian formula, but instead with “in my name” (see Fredrick C. Conybeare in Zeitschrift fur Neutestamentlich Wissenschaft, “The Eusebian Form of the Text of Matthew 28:19,” 1901, pp. 275-288). For example, in Book
III of his Ecclesiastical History, Chapter 5, Section 2, which is about the Jewish persecution of early Christians, we read,

But the rest of the apostles, who had been incessantly plotted against with a view to their destruction, and had been driven out of the land of Judea, got unto all nations to preach the Gospel, relying upon the power of Christ, who had said to them, ‘Go ye and make disciples of all the nations in my name.’

We read the same thing in his Oration in Praise of Emperor Constantine, Chapter 16, Section 8, which says:

What king or prince in any age of the world, what philosopher, legislator or prophet, in civilized or barbarous lands, has attained so great a height of excellence, I say not after death, but while living still, and full of mighty power, as to fill the ears and tongues of all mankind with the praises of his name? Surely none save our only Savior has done this, when, after his victory over death, he spoke the word to his followers, and fulfilled it by the event, saying to them, ‘Go ye and make disciples of all nations in my name.’

The Greek text that Eusebius was using read, quoted by Conybeare, is, πορευθέντες μαθητεύσατε πάντα τὰ ἔθνη ἐν τῷ ὄνοματί μου διδάσκοντες αὐτοὺς τηρεῖν πάντα ὁσα ἐνετειλάμην όμι. This translates to “Go, disciple all the nations in my name, teaching them to keep all things, whatsoever I have commanded you.”

Eusebius was present at the council of Nicaea, and involved in the debates about Arian teaching and whether Christ was God or a creation of God. We feel confident that if the manuscripts he had in front of him read “in the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit,” he would never have quoted it as “in my name.” Interestingly, however, after (and only after) the Counsel of Nicaea, when there was great pressure from the Emperor and other bishops to conform to a Trinitarian belief, Eusebius quoted Matthew 28:19 with the Trinitarian formula on three different occasions. We believe that the earliest manuscripts read “in my name,” and that the phrase was enlarged to reflect the orthodox position as Trinitarian influence spread.
4). Although Eusebius is the only Church Father that directly quotes a shorter version of Matthew 28:19, Conybeare (cited above), notes that there are “echoes” from two other pieces of pre-Nicene literature, both earlier than Eusebius, that indicate they were referencing a version of Matthew without the Trinitarian baptismal formula. Those two sources are Justin Martyr (c. 100-165) in his dialogue with Trypho, and the early Christian work called “The Shepherd of Hermas.” While not strong evidence of a shorter version of Matthew 28:19, the evidence of these Church Fathers does add some support to our conclusion.

5). The reading “go and make disciples of all the nations in my name” creates internal agreement with what we see in Luke and in the Epistles of Paul. In the last chapter of Luke, when Jesus was talking to his disciples, he said, “Thus it is written, that the Christ should suffer, and rise out from among the dead the third day, and that repentance and remission of sins should be proclaimed in his name to all the nations, beginning from Jerusalem” (Luke 24:46, 47). It fits the scope of Scripture that both Matthew and Luke would end with Jesus speaking to his followers about making disciples in his name in all of the nations, and not that Jesus would command baptism in Matthew but leave it out in Luke. Furthermore, Paul wrote, “For Christ did not send me to baptize, but to tell the Good News” (1 Cor. 1:17). It hardly seems correct that Paul could say that Jesus did not send him to baptize if in fact one of the very last commands of Jesus to his disciples was to go and baptize people.

6). That the command to baptize in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit would have been added to the text of Matthew fits the scribal tendency to add the practices of the Church at a later time back into the text. For example, when it comes to baptism, textual research shows that there is little doubt that the closing verses of Mark were added to Mark and were not part of the original text, and they too include the command to baptize (cp. Mark 16:16, and see commentary on Mark 16:9). Another example of adding a practice of the Church back into the text involves fasting. Fasting was important to the developing Church, and the word “fasting” became inserted into the Greek manuscripts in several places, and from there even got into some of the early versions such as the King James Version (cp. Matt. 17:21; Mark 9:29; Acts 10:30; 1 Cor. 7:5). Thankfully, the number of Greek texts and early manuscripts we have today and our ability to compare them has allowed us to ferret out most of the later additions, but there are still some problem verses, such as Matthew 28:19.

7). The traditional reading of Matthew 28:19 has long been noted to have some problems. In the words of Hans Kosmala, “The traditional conclusion is, even as a prose text, comparatively ‘heavy;’ its syntax is awkward and, as Otto Michael has remarked, we miss some logical order.” The logical order that Michael, Kosmala, and other scholars have referred to is that making a disciple in the early Church involved teaching them to obey and then baptizing them when they made a commitment to Christ. Yet in the closing verses of Matthew 28, the disciples are first baptized, then taught to obey. While this is not conclusive in and of itself, it is evidence to the fact that the phrase “baptizing them in the name of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit” seems to be put in the text out of order, rather than just being a part of the original text.

8). The short reading has a balance and elegance that the longer reading lacks. Kosmala writes:
“The older Eusebian version enables us to divide the conclusion of Matthew into four natural lines… We see the passage is no longer a prose text like the traditional text, but a hymnic piece. The Eusebian conclusion has a definitely poetical and almost elegant form. It is a self-contained unit of four lines. It is well balanced in its structure and the lines follow one after the other in a logical sequence;…. The poem is not a Greek poem… It is Semitic in the structure of its contents. In its Greek garb it is most likely a translation from Hebrew. … the interrelation between the four lines is obvious. It is the same as in all well-constructed Hebrew poetry” (Hans Kosmala, “The Conclusion of Matthew;” Annual of the Swedish Theological Institute 4 (ASTI 4), 1965, pp. 132-147).

9). The short reading fits with the scope of Scripture regarding the importance of the name of Jesus. It makes perfect sense that before leaving earth, Jesus would instruct his followers to make disciples in his name (Matthew 28:19; Luke 24:47) and be witnesses for him (Acts 1:8). From the book of Acts alone, we learn that the name of Jesus was central to Christian life. The disciples baptized in his name (Acts 2:38; 8:12; 10:48; 19:5); healed in his name (Acts 3:6, 16; 4:10; ); taught that salvation came by his name (Acts 4:12); taught and preached in his name (Acts 5:28; 9:27); suffered for his name (Acts 5:41; 9:16), called on his name (Acts 9:14, 21; 22:16); received forgiveness through his name (Acts 10:43); were called by his name (Acts 15:17); risked their lives for his name (Acts 15:26); cast out demons by his name (Acts 16:18); and were willing to die for his name (Acts 21:13). The Bible even tells us that there was opposition to the name of Jesus (Acts 4:17, 18; 5:26; 26:9).

From what we can see in the New Testament, it completely fits with the scope of Scripture that shortly before leaving earth, Jesus would tell his disciples, “Go and make disciples of all the nations in my name, teaching them to obey all that I commanded you.” Then, from what we know about the developing church, it makes sense that likely sometime in the middle of the second century someone would add the phrase about baptizing in the name of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit.

10). Another “interesting” piece of information about Matthew 18:19 is that it seems to be missing in some places where it seems logically it would have been. Conybeare (cited above) points out some of the places in ancient writings where we would have expected Matthew 28:19 to be, but it is not copied, or only partially copied. While it is true that there is no way to prove that an original was somehow expunged, or even if the text would have supported the Trinitarian formula if we had the text, it is well known that, particularly after the time of the Emperor Theodosius (346-395), writings that did not agree with the official position of the Church were sought out and destroyed. Origen, for example, is cited as quoting the first part of Matthew 28:19 three times, but each time stopping with “nations.” Conybeare also points out that in the fourth century, the group called the “Pneumatomacki,” those people who resisted recognizing “the Holy Spirit” as the third person of the Trinity, apparently used a text of Matthew that did not have the Trinitarian formula, something that can be inferred from the things written by and against them.

11). The Trinitarian formula does not appear in the Shem-Tob Hebrew manuscript of Matthew. In the fourteenth century a complete Hebrew text of Matthew appeared in the body of a Jewish polemical treatise entitled Even Bohan, “The Touchstone.” The author was Shem-Tob ben Isaac ben-Shaprut (sometimes called Ibn Shaprut; because his name was actually Shem-Tov, sometimes the manuscript it referred to as the Shem-Tov manuscript). This Hebrew manuscript does not seem to be copied from the Greek or Latin, as was thought by earlier scholars, but clearly seems to be a copy from a Hebrew manuscript tradition, which is very important because some of the Church Fathers testified that Matthew wrote his gospel in Hebrew. [For more on the Shem-Tob Hebrew manuscript of Matthew, see commentary on Matthew 3:3].

In contrast to the common reading found in the Greek manuscripts, the Shem-Tob Hebrew manuscript reads:

19Go, 20 and (teach) them to carry out all the things which I have commanded you forever.”

The omission of the command to baptize and the Trinitarian formula in the Shem-Tob manuscript contributes to our conclusion that the Trinitarian formula did not exist in the original manuscript of Matthew, but was a later addition.

12). The book of Matthew has no presentation of the doctrine of the Trinity. Some prominent Trinitarians doubt that the apostles were even introduced to the doctrine until after they received holy spirit. It seems strange that there would be an inclusion of the doctrine of the Trinity at the very end of Matthew when it had not been a subject of discussion earlier in the book, and it seems even stranger that Jesus would introduce a new baptismal formula that had the name of the Father, Son, and holy spirit without some teaching as to what that meant or why it needed to be there.

13). Why would the Trinitarian baptismal formula have been added in Matthew 28:19? As the Church developed, both the ceremony of baptism and the doctrine of the Trinity became more central to the Faith, and so verses that dealt with those subjects were sometimes altered or added. In fact, many passages of the Bible were altered by scribes to fit their theology (see Bart Ehrman, The Orthodox Corruption of Scripture). The Gospel of Matthew became the favorite Gospel in the Greek Church, so it was important that doctrines central to the Faith could be found in it. As Kosmala points out: “It [Matthew] was put to an extensive liturgical use, as research of the past few decades has shown. No gospel lent itself so readily for any additions which the Church felt obliged to make than the Gospel of Matthew.”

We must keep in mind that today if people disagree on an issue of the Faith, about the worst thing that happens is that they refuse to speak to each other. But in the centuries after Christ, theology was hotly debated and “losers” could be beaten or killed by angry mobs, imprisoned, banished or even executed. So there was a lot of pressure on bishops to have verses that supported one’s particular position to be able to “win” any debate.

Although the ancient manuscripts often differ, thankfully, that does not mean we cannot trust the Bible. Today we have some 5700 Greek manuscripts, plus manuscripts in Latin, Georgian, Coptic, Syriac, etc., plus quotations that exist in the Church Fathers, and furthermore today we are aided by computers that can compare and contrast all these manuscripts. So given today’s situation, scholars are usually able to determine the original reading of the text. Nevertheless, there are a few verses such as this one, Matthew 28:19, which are still hotly debated.

Scholars have proposed different possibilities as to when the Trinitarian baptismal formula would have been added to the text, and how it came to be so widely dispersed. Conybeare suggested that the reading was created sometime around 130-140 AD and first appeared in the Old Latin texts and texts from Africa [Alexandria], and then got copied into the Greek texts in Rome and then, during the Nicene time got established enough to get into the Greek texts that have survived until today.

14). We have dealt above with reasons why the REV translation reads, go and make disciples of all the nations in my name, teaching them to obey all that I commanded you,” and leaves out the phrase about baptizing in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. We now turn to a different side of the argument. What if we are wrong and the common text is correct. Does that mean there is a Trinity? No, it does not. There is no “proof” of the Trinity in the common reading of Matthew 28:19. If the Father, Son and holy spirit are mentioned in the original text of this verse, it would only affirm that those three exist, something we do not contest. The doctrine of the Trinity states that the Father, Son and “Holy Spirit” together make “one God,” and that is never stated in this verse. This verse refers to three, but never says they are “one.” If the phrase about the Father, Son, and holy spirit is original, then the three things this verse refers to are: God the Father; His Son the Lord Jesus Christ; and the power of holy spirit. (We say “holy spirit” instead of “Holy Spirit” because we believe that this verse is referring to God’s gift of holy spirit that is born inside each believer. It is lower case because it refers to the gift of God, and not God. For more on this, see Graeser, Lynn, Schoenheit, The Gift of Holy Spirit: The Power to be like Christ.

15). It is sometimes stated that in order to be baptized into something, that something has to be God, but that reasoning is false, because Scripture states that the Israelites were “baptized into Moses” (1 Cor. 10:2).

16). It is important to understand why the word “name” is used. A study of the culture and language shows that the word “name” stood for “authority.” Examples are very numerous, but space allows only a small selection. Deuteronomy 18:5 and 7 speak of serving in the “name” (authority) of the Lord. Deuteronomy 18:22 speaks of prophesying in the “name” (authority) of the Lord. In 1 Samuel 17:45, David attacked Goliath in the “name” (authority) of the Lord, and he blessed the people in the “name” (authority) of the Lord. In 2 Kings 2:24, Elisha cursed troublemakers in the “name” (authority) of the Lord. The Apostles baptized in the “name” of Jesus Christ because it meant all his authority, similarly, Paul rhetorically asks the Corinthians if they were baptized “in the name of Paul,” which of course they were not because Paul had no power or authority to save anyone. These scriptures are only a small sample, but they are very clear. Also, we should know that there are other customs involving the word “name,” but authority is a major one we need to be aware of.

In conclusion. In deciding how to translate the REV and omitting the Trinitarian formula from Matthew 28:19, we carefully considered the points above and concluded that the Eusebian version of the Greek text was most likely the original. Hans Kosmala asks the following important question: Would the Gospel suffer any loss by the substitution of the shorter conclusion, or would this conclusion perhaps bring out the Gospel’s message even more clearly? We assert that the shorter version quoted by Eusebius explains why the Apostles never baptized in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; fits with the conclusion of Luke and the words of Paul, and magnifies the name of the Lord Jesus, in keeping with the rest of the message of the New Testament.

28:20. “Remember.” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”). This could have been translated “Pay attention,” because Jesus was trying to make sure he had the attention of those he was speaking to, but given the circumstances, “remember,” is a good way to translate the word idou here (cp. HCSB).

“I am with you always.” This is a wonderful promise to believers, especially when we feel that Jesus is not with us. Life is difficult, and there is a universal spiritual war going on between the forces of light and the forces of darkness. God cannot “just make things better.” He will one day, but not right now. Furthermore, we must remember that God has to be righteous and also follow His own promises. For example, He says that as we sow we reap. So if we sow into our lives in such a way as to cause trouble for ourselves, God just cannot step in and override His own law so things will be better for us here on earth. That does not mean that Jesus is not with us, watching us and helping as best he can: he always does that, and we need to trust that he is [For more on God’s help in troubled times, see commentary on Romans 8:28].

Occasionally this verse is used to prove the Trinity because it is said that the only way that Jesus could always be with his Church is if he were God. However, that is an unproven assumption, and is not stated in Scripture. Furthermore, there are different ways of being “with” someone. For example, Scripture shows us that there is a use of “with us” that is spiritual in nature, not physical. Also, we must be careful not to underestimate the power and authority God gave Christ when He set him at His own right hand and gave him a name that is above every name. Just two verses before this one, Christ said he had been given “all authority.” God gave Christ all authority, and made Christ Head of the Church, so it is only logical to conclude that God also gave Christ the power to stay in communion with his Church.
1:1. “The beginning.” Mark is the only Gospel that has anything like the phrase, “the beginning of the Good News of Jesus Christ.” Yet when we understand that Mark is the Gospel that portrays Jesus Christ as the Servant of God, we can see that the phrase fits perfectly with the purpose of Mark (see commentary on “the gospel” on Mark 1:1 as to why there are four Gospels). Jesus Christ’s ministry as the obedient and suffering Servant of God came to an end with his death, which is why in the Gospel of Mark, Jesus never appears after his death. He was resurrected, not as a servant, but as Lord of all. But the Good News of Jesus Christ did not end with his death. It continued with his resurrection, his ascension, and now with his ministry from heaven. Thus Mark, which portrays Jesus as the Servant of God, only gives us the “beginning” of the Good News concerning him. In contrast to Jesus’ ministry as a Servant, which came to an end, his ministry as King (Matthew); human man (Luke); and Son of God (John) continues to this day, and Matthew, Luke, and John all have post-resurrection appearances of Jesus Christ.

Some scholars have suggested that the word “beginning” is referring to the start of Jesus’ ministry, as if the verse read, “This is the way the Good News of Jesus begins.” However, that cannot be correct. The “Good News” of Jesus began many years before John the Baptist came on the scene. At his birth about 30 years before, the angel announced that Jesus birth was “Good News” (Luke 2:10).

“The gospel of Jesus Christ.” It is sometimes asked why there are four Gospels. Part of the answer is likely that for any testimony to be validated, there needs to be 2 or 3 witnesses (Deut. 17:6, 19:15; Matt. 18:16; 1 Tim. 5:19; Heb. 10:28), and the four Gospels provide that, especially since Matthew and John were eyewitnesses. Nevertheless, the accounts by Mark and Luke have been recognized by most Christians not only as authentic historical documents, but also as God-inspired records of the life of Christ just as Matthew and John are.

The second reason there are Four Gospels is that each is written from a different perspective, and together they comprise a very profound, prophetic and precise fourfold pattern of the Messiah. We will see that the pattern in the four Gospels is that Matthew portrays Christ as a king, Mark as a servant, Luke as a man, and John as the Son of God. This pattern had already been set forth and foreshadowed long before by the Old Testament prophets. This fourfold pattern has its roots in an important Hebrew term used in the prophecies of Christ, which is tsemach. Tsemach means “sprout” or “offspring,” and is often translated “Branch,” and the vital “Branch,” and center of Old Testament prophecy is the Messiah, Jesus Christ.

Tsemach paints a mental picture of a new sprout or shoot coming up out of a dead-looking stump, certainly an appropriate picture of the Messiah, because just when it looked like Israel was cut down and dead, out of it sprang the Messiah. In the Old Testament, tsemach is used five times in direct prophetic reference to the Messiah and aspects of his life. Although “the branch” was a common term for the Messiah, five Old Testament verses in particular lay out a fourfold prophetic picture of him. In two verses the Branch is shown to be a king (Jer. 23:5; 33:15), also the Branch is shown as a servant

(Zech. 3:8), also the Branch is shown to be a man (Zech. 6:12), and also, the Branch is shown to be “the Branch of the LORD (Yahweh)” i.e., one directly from LORD God (Isa. 4:2).

These four descriptions of the Messiah subdivide according to one of the most basic distinctions we can make about any person: who he is and what he does. Two of the four terms refer to his person—Son and man, while the other two relate to his work—King and servant. Intrinsic to these terms is another important distinction in the life of the Messiah: he is humbled and he is exalted, that is, both “sufferings” and “glory” will characterize his life. We see Jesus’ humility in the designations man and servant, we see his exaltation in the terms king and Son of God. Although the four Gospels are in many ways the same, they are also unique, each having its own vocabulary and style.

Matthew has a number of unique characteristics that point to Christ as King. Matthew’s genealogy presents Jesus as a King from the line of David, and starts out with the “record of the genealogy of Jesus Christ the son of David,” and then gives the genealogy from Abraham, the one who was promised the land, through King David, who was promised the kingdom in a covenant of salt with God (2 Chron. 13:5). Matthew mentions the humble birth of Christ in one sentence (1:25), but then skips forward almost two years until the Magi arrive and ask “...Where is the one who has been born king...?” (Matt. 2:2). Then the Magi present the royal Son with gifts appropriate of his status as king. The phrase, “the Kingdom of Heaven” is associated with the specific reign of the Messiah on earth. It occurs more than 30 times in the gospel of Matthew, but not once in any of the other Gospels, which use the phrase, “Kingdom of God.” The title, “Son of David,” occurs ten times in Matthew and only six times in all the other Gospels combined. There are a number of parables that are unique to Matthew, and most of them have a clear reference to the Kingdom. These include: the Darnel (13:24-30); the Hidden Treasure (13:44); the Pearl (13:45); the Dragnet (13:47); the Unmerciful Servant (18:23-35); the Laborers in the Vineyard (20:1-16); the Two Sons (21:28-32); the Marriage of the Kings Son (22:1-14); and the Ten Virgins (25:1-13). Only Matthew records the “sheep and goat judgment,” when the king lets the righteous into his kingdom but excludes the unrighteous (Matt. 25).

The Gospel of Mark, which presents Christ as a servant, is short, simple and forceful, emphasizing Christ’s works more than his words. Unlike the Gospels of Matthew, Luke and John, the Gospel of Mark has no genealogy at all, which makes sense because a servant’s genealogy is not relevant—the work he does is what matters.

Commentators have long noticed that Mark focuses more on what Jesus did than what he said, which makes sense because obedient action is the sign of a good servant. Mark also moves quickly from one event to another. Even the vocabulary reflects this pattern. The Greek word eutheos (“immediately”) occurs 40 times in Mark but only 27 times in all the other Gospels combined. That statistic is made even more vivid when one realizes that there are only 16 chapters in Mark, but 73 chapters in the other three Gospels.

A valued servant is quick to obey. E. W. Bullinger, who also saw the fourfold portrait of Christ, notes that Jesus “is addressed as ‘Lord’ in the other three Gospels 73 times,...he is addressed as such in the Gospel of Mark only twice” (Companion Bible; intro to Mark). Bullinger notes that of these two uses of “Lord” that appear in the KJV, one was by a Gentile woman and was simply the title equivalent of “sir” (7:28), and one is 9:24, which is not even in the earliest Greek texts, but was a later addition. So actually,
Jesus is never called “Lord” in Mark by anyone who knew he was the Messiah, a clear indication of the emphasis in Mark on Jesus’ role as God’s servant. Appropriately, more than a third of Mark takes place in the last week of Jesus’ life, which places special emphasis on his obedience and the fact that he was the suffering Servant foretold in the Old Testament.

Mark also opens with the phrase that Mark gives the “beginning” of the Good News of Jesus (Mark 1:1). That is true, because the Good News of Jesus continues to this day with Jesus sitting on the right hand of God. Jesus’ role of King, human man, and Son of God, all continue to this day, but Jesus’ role as the Servant of God ended with his death. Since Mark portrays Jesus as the Servant, it is appropriate that Jesus does not appear in Mark after his resurrection, when he is no longer the Servant, but “Lord of all.” All three other Gospels have accounts of Jesus after his resurrection, but Mark does not (see commentary on Mark 16:9). Thus the Gospel of Mark only gives us the “beginning” of the Good News about Jesus, it does not continue with Good News about him after his resurrection.

The Gospel of Luke, which portrays Christ as a man, presents the Messiah and his relationships in a way that highlights his humanity as the Last Adam. The gospel of Luke has a genealogy that traces Jesus back to Adam, the first man. Luke opens with information on the parents and birth of John the Baptist, giving information we would expect to find in a “human interest” story. It then gives details about Joseph and Mary and the circumstances of Jesus’ birth, including his being presented at the Temple. These details show that Jesus was born in normal human circumstances (see commentary on those specific verses), and subject to the same laws and regulations as every other Jewish child.

Luke has an emphasis on both prayer and praise to God, which is appropriate for all mankind. Jesus is shown praying in 3:21; 5:16; 6:12; 9:18, 29; 11:1; 22:32, 41, 44; and 23:34. Luke has four great praise hymns that are unique to Luke: the Magnificat of Mary (1:46-55); the Benedictus of Zechariah (1:68-79); the Gloria in Excelsis of the angels (2:14), and the Nunc Dimittis of Simeon (2:29-32), and praise to God is mentioned in many other verses.

Luke clearly portrays Jesus’ great love for all mankind, and describes him as a warm and loving person. Commentators note that the book of Luke portrays Jesus’ special concern for the poor, sinners, women and the family more clearly than any other Gospel. Luke has a unique emphasis on women, and speaks of women in a way not covered in the other Gospels, for example, Elizabeth, Anna, the widow of Nain, the repentant woman (7:37-50); the women who ministered to Christ (8:2, 3), the daughters of Jerusalem (23:27, 28), and Mary and Martha (10:38-42). Also, Luke shows Jesus sympathetically acknowledging the Gentiles. The parables that are unique to Luke emphasize human traits such as love for fellow man (and the importance of an individual), wisdom, and foolishness. Parables unique to Luke include: the Two Debtors (7:41, 42); the Good Samaritan (10:30-37); the Persistent Friend (11:5-8); the Rich Fool (12:16-21); the Lost Coin (15:8-10); the Forgiving Father (15:11-32); the Wise Manager (16:1-12); the Rich Man and Lazarus (16:19-31); the Persistent Widow (18:1-8); the Pharisee and the Tax Collector (18:9-14).

The Gospel of John, which portrays Christ as the Son of God, starts out by saying that God, in the beginning, had a plan, purpose or wisdom (the logos) that became flesh, that is, the Son “comes from” the Father. This is a very short genealogy: the Father had a Son, an only begotten Son, and since Jesus’ father is God, any portrayal of his earthly birth would only take emphasis away from the true Father. Jesus’ intimacy with his Father is uniquely portrayed in John. For example, the word “father” occurs as many times in John as in all the other Gospels combined.

The narrator writes the Gospel of John from the standpoint that Jesus is already exalted and in heaven, something both unique to John and appropriate to his status as the Son of God (cp. John 3:13 and commentary). Theologians have long noticed that John is different from the other Gospels and truly unique. This fits with our expectations, because, as “the only begotten Son of God,” Jesus is truly unique.

John is also unique from the standpoint of what it leaves out. For example, there is no temptation in the wilderness. Kings, servants, and humans need to demonstrate their qualifications and be proven for the job they do, but as the Son of God, Jesus is qualified to be the Messiah without being tempted first. Similarly, there is no record of the event called “the Transfiguration,” because, as we have already said, John sees Jesus from the perspective of already being risen and in glory, not the perspective of preparing for his glory.

It should catch our attention that when the Messiah does a miracle in his role as King, Servant, or Man, the act is called a “miracle” (dunamis). The Greek word dunamis (miracle; power) occurs almost 40 times in Matthew, Mark, and Luke, but it does not occur at all in John. In contrast to the other Gospels, when Jesus does a miracle in the Gospel of John, the work is called a “sign” (simeion). A “sign” is something that gives information and points to something else. For example, a road sign with a curved line on it points out that there is a curve in the road ahead. The eight “signs” in John that are clearly miracles are called “signs” because they point to Jesus as the Son of God. Thus, Jesus could say, “though you do not believe me, believe the works, so that you may know and understand that the Father is united with me, and I am united with the Father” (John 10:38); and “Keep on believing me, that I am in the Father, and the Father in me, or else keep believing me because of the works themselves” (14:11). The eight miracle signs in John are:

1. Water to Wine (2:1-11; called a sign in v. 11)
2. The Ruler’s Son Healed (4:46-50; called a sign in 48, 54)
3. Sick Man at the Pool of Bethesda (5:1-47; not specifically called a sign, but in 6:2 Jesus’ healing the sick was called a sign)
4. Feeding the 5,000 (6:1-14; called a sign in 14)
5. Walking on the Sea (6:17-21; not specifically called a sign, but obviously included in the plural “signs” in 6:26)
6. Man Born Blind (9:1-39; called a sign in 16)
7. Lazarus Raised From the Dead (11:1-45; called a sign by the Jews in 47, and called a sign in 12:18)
8. Multitude of Fish (21:1-11; Although the word “sign” is not used in John 21, the sign of the fish occurs immediately after John 20:30 and 31, which speak of “these” signs that are written, and thus certainly includes the sign that follows immediately afterward)

Besides these specifically mentioned signs, there are other places in John that refer to signs Jesus was doing, such as 2:23; 3:2; 7:31; and 12:37. The signs that Jesus was doing shows the prejudice and spiritual blindness of the Jews, who a number of times asked Jesus to show them a sign of who he was (John 2:18; 6:30).

The fourfold portrait of Christ given by the Four Gospels is good evidence they are the God-breathed Word of God, and not just the writing and memories of four men. There is no way the four different writers could have collaborated on their individual Gospels and produced this remarkable fourfold portrait of Christ. Like all the different writers of the Bible, they each wrote independently of one another, separated by both time and space. They could not have agreed upon what to include together and what to emphasize individually such that the wonderful fourfold portrait of Christ that was foretold in the Old Testament was laid out in the Four Gospels. The Four Gospels, like the rest of the Bible, are the God-breathed Word.

“The Son of God.” This phrase, which is only two words in the Greek text, is missing from some early and important manuscripts. The variety of manuscripts that do not have the phrase is such that many scholars have concluded that differences in the manuscripts is not due to an accidental deletion that was simply re-copied, but rather was a deliberate change. That fact has not ended the debate; it has just shifted the question. Is it more likely that the phrase was original, but adoptionist scribes (those who say Jesus “became” the Son at his baptism) deleted it to add support for their position; or is it more likely that the phrase was not original, but scribes added it, following their general tendency to expand titles. At this point there is no conclusive evidence for either position, and since the adoptionist view is erroneous, whether the phrase “Son of God” was added to simply expand the title of Jesus Christ, or whether it is original, the fact remains that Jesus was the Son of God from his conception, so we left the phrase in.

1:2. “As it is written in Isaiah.” The quotation is from both Malachi 3:1 and the book of Isaiah 40:3. This is not “a mistake” or “error,” as some people claim, as if Mark thought the whole quotation was from Isaiah. Verses 2 and 3 are run together as if they were one quotation, not two. By just mentioning the part quoted from Isaiah, Mark is using a literary device that puts the emphasis of the extended quotation on the part that Isaiah wrote, which says what we are to do in light of the Lord’s coming. Hendrickson writes: “Mark tells us that he is going to quote from Isaiah. He does exactly that, though not immediately.” Had Mark quoted only Isaiah, we would be left knowing only that a “voice” was crying in the wilderness. By quoting Malachi before Isaiah, we know to whom the “voice” belongs: to none other than the messenger who will begin to prepare the way of the Lord.

The quotation from Malachi has been adapted to fit the Messiah. A more literal quotation of the Hebrew of Malachi 3:1 would be, “Behold, I [Yahweh] am sending My messenger, and he will clear the way [road] before me.” In Mark, the verse has been modified so that the messenger prepares the road for the Messiah. Hence here in Mark the verse means, “Look!, I am sending my [Yahweh’s] messenger before your [the Messiah’s] face, who will prepare your [the Messiah’s] way.

This is not the only place two places in the OT are quoted but only one prophet is cited. For example, Matthew 27:9 and 10 come from Zechariah and Jeremiah, but only Jeremiah is quoted. This same pattern occurs in the OT in 2 Chronicles 36:21, which says it quotes Jeremiah, but actually quotes both Jeremiah and Leviticus. When God quotes two sources, but only gives credit to one, He is telling us where to place the emphasis in what he is quoting so there is no guesswork about it.
In light of the fact that the extended quotation comes from Malachi and then Isaiah, it is easy to see why copyists would change “Isaiah the prophet” to “in the prophets.” The earliest texts from both the Alexandrian and Western text families have Isaiah the prophet, and the change to “the prophets” is “an obvious correction” (Roger Omanson, A Textual Guide to the Greek New Testament).

“prepare the road.” See commentary on verse 3.

1:3. “Make the road ready for the Lord! Make his paths straight!” This quotation, which comes from Isaiah 40:3 (and the quotation in Matt. 3:3 and Luke 3:4) is from the Septuagint, the Greek Old Testament. [For more information on the Septuagint and the original NT texts being in Greek, see commentary on Luke 3:4].

The word “road” is hodos (#3598 ὁδὸς). Like our English word “way,” it can refer to a road or path, or it can refer to a specific way of doing things. Many times, such as here, its primary meaning is “road,” and it is helpful to translate it that way.

In the Old Testament times (this verse is quoted from Isaiah, roughly 750 BC), there was not much attention paid to the condition of the roads in a country. Even in Roman times, usually only the very important central roadways, and the roads in cities, got any real attention. Nobody owned the roads, and nobody profited from spending time repairing them. It was just repeated use that made the terrain into dirt paths, some wider than others, that then were referred to as roads. Books on the customs of the Bible lands (especially those from the 1800’s or earlier), are replete with stories of the horrors of traveling on roads. They were full of pits, or rocky, or had overhanging foliage that could knock a rider off a mount. They were dark at night and slippery when wet or frozen. They often ascended or descended quickly, and became very dangerous if the conditions were less than ideal. Often thorn bushes grew near the road such that unwary travelers were scratched or had their clothing torn. Added to all this was that there were no road signs to tell travelers where they were, or what road to take if they came to a crossroads. This caused a lot of anxiety to travelers, who did not want to waste time going the wrong way, and could be quite dangerous if the road went to an area that was inhabited by robbers. When Jesus said, “I am the road,” (usually translated, “I am the way”), he was being clear that if a person did not want to get lost trying to get to God, that Jesus was the road to travel on.

When a king (or sometimes a high official) was going to go on a journey, he would send out messengers before he traveled. They would announce to the farmers and villagers who lived close to the road to take the time to go out and prepare it to make the king’s trip easier. The villagers would clear the rock and bushes, fill in ruts and pits, and generally make the road safer and easier to travel. “Make his paths straight” does not refer to taking winding sections of the road and re-routing them, although that might have been done on a small scale if the road went around something that was no longer an obstacle. The word “straight” can also mean “level,” and in this context refers to filling up the pits and holes that developed in the road so it was level and easy to ride on.

1:4. “John came baptizing...” There is a textual variation in this verse concerning whether or not John came baptizing or John the Baptizer came. Some versions read, “John appeared, baptizing in the wilderness” (ESV); while others read, “John the baptizer appeared in the wilderness,” (NRSV). The difference depends on the addition or deletion of the single letter for the article ho, (#3588 ὁ), meaning “the.” It is most likely, however, that the ho is not original and the preferred reading is “John came baptizing.” The reason for this is that John is frequently elsewhere called John the Baptist, but never John the Baptist. This leads credence to viewing the participle “Baptizing” as descriptive of John’s action and not a title (Cp. Metzger, Textual Commentary).

“A baptism that symbolized repentance.” The Greek word translated “repentance” is, metanoia (#3341 μετανοια), and it means to change one’s mind, and therefore life and lifestyle. It is ceasing thinking and doing things that are contrary to God, and instead thinking and behaving in the way that is in obedience to God.

“repentance” is in the genitive case, so literal translation is: “baptism of repentance.” Daniel Wallace points out that the genitive is so ambiguous that it can have many meanings, and therefore he says, “it may well be best to be non-committal: ‘baptism that is somehow related to repentance’” (Greek Grammar Beyond the Basics, p. 80). While Wallace’s statement is accurate, it is unsatisfying. It leaves us with the same problem we started with, which is that we do not know the meaning of the phrase. We should be able to draw a conclusion about the meaning of the genitive from the scope of Scripture. Of course, the denominations vary greatly about their interpretation of the scope of Scripture, and the scholars do also. On one extreme, for example, is saying the genitive is one of production, so the meaning would be “a baptism that produces repentance.” We assert that the baptism did not produce the repentance, or “complete” it in any way, except perhaps cementing in the mind of the person who had been baptized that since he had made a public declaration before God and people, he better honor his vow and life a godly lifestyle.

In his list of possible interpretations, Wallace himself gives what may be the best way to understand and translate this verse and the concept behind it: “baptism that symbolized repentance.” In the same way that animal sacrifice was a symbol that pointed to the ultimate sacrifice of Christ, water baptism and washing rituals were part of the Old Testament and pointed to and symbolized the coming of the greater baptism, which was baptism in holy spirit. Many Old Testament prophets foretold the coming of the spirit, which they universally said would be poured out from heaven (Isa. 32:15, 44:3; Ezek. 39:29; Joel 2:28, 29; Zech. 12:10). Then, John the Baptist was the first person we know of to refer to that pouring out as “baptism,” and then Jesus also referred to the pouring out of the holy spirit upon people as a “baptism” in the holy spirit (Matt. 3:11; Acts 1:5).

A number of translators and scholars have seen that the genitive in this sentence is a genitive of relation, and the relation that best is being expressed is that when a person repents before God, he demonstrates that repentance by a public ceremony of baptism. Thus the outward act of water baptism symbolized the inner act of going from the old to the new, or from death to life, in the heart. C. S. Mann writes: “An alternative rendering of this Semitism would be, ‘A baptism which symbolized repentance’” (The Anchor Bible: Mark). F. Grant writes: “This baptism was the symbol of repentance” (The Interpreter’s Bible). Walter Wessel writes: the baptism indicated the repentance had already occurred of was being accompanied by it” (The Expositor’s Bible Commentary; F. Gaebelein general editor). Ann Nyland translates the last part of Mark 1:4 as: He [John] preached that people should be baptized as a symbol that they had changed their minds, and this resulted in their sins being cancelled” (The Source NT). Charles Williams translates: “a baptism conditioned on repentance” (The NT in the Language of the People). The New Testament in Modern English by J. B. Phillips translates the last part of the verse: John came... “proclaiming baptism as the mark of a complete change of heart and of the forgiveness of sins.”

“repentance resulting in the remission of sins.” The Greek word eis, here translated as “resulting in,” has many meanings, primarily purpose or result. The translation in most versions, “for” is somewhat ambiguous although accurate. A major theme in the Bible is that if a person will repent he will be forgiven. Over and over God tells people that if they will humble themselves and come to Him for forgiveness, he will indeed forgive them (1 John 1:9 is very clear, but also see such verses as: Neh. 9:7; Ps. 32:5; 103:11-13; Prov. 28:13; Jer. 5:1; 36:3; Luke 6:37). There is no place where God says something such as: “If you confess your sin I will consider forgiving you.”

The eis can be translated “because,” a less frequent but very valid meaning of eis (cp. Wuest, Word Studies). In that case, people were baptized as a symbol because their sins had been forgiven. However, that is actually just another way of understanding the eis as a result clause—it would be saying the people were baptized because their repentance led to remission. That concept can be worded as a result clause, as we have in the REV: “baptism that symbolized repentance resulting in the remission of sins.” In other words, the people were baptized as a symbol that they had repented, a repentance which had, as always, resulted in the remission of their sin.

The people came to John to be baptized so they could enter the Kingdom of God. As they stood by John they confessed their sins and repented. That confession and repentance resulted in their sins being forgiven (remitted), and John baptized them as a symbol of that repentance and forgiveness. Ann Nyland translates the phrase: “baptized as a symbol that they had changed their minds, and this resulted in their sins being cancelled” (The Source NT).

1:5. “the whole country of Judea, and all Jerusalem.” A good example of oriental hyperbole (exaggeration). Not everyone went to John to be baptized, but a great many did.

1:8. “in holy spirit.” There is no definite article. This holy spirit is the gift of God. (cp. Matt 3:10). [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”].

1:10. “immediately as he was stepping up.” The words in many versions, “coming up out of the water,” do not make it clear that the Greek text of Matthew and Mark do not refer to Jesus breaking the surface of the water of the Jordan, but rather to him walking out of the water, up the bank, and away from the river after the baptism was completed. The Greek text of Mark reads, anabainōn ek tou hudatos (ἀναβαίνων ἐκ τοῦ ὕδατος), “coming up out of the water,” where the word “ek” means “out of,” in the sense that he was getting “out of” the water, not standing in it. The water was below the level of the bank, as it is in all rivers, so in order to get out of the water, Jesus had to “come up” out of the Jordan. We need to become clear about the fact that someone standing waist deep in water is not “out of” the water, but very much in it. However, the text says that Jesus was coming “out of” the water.

The Gospel of Matthew makes the action of Jesus crystal clear, especially when combined with Mark. Matthew 3:16 reads, anebē apo tou hudatos (ἀνέβη ἀπὸ τοῦ ὕδατος), “he came up away from the water.” This is the same basic vocabulary as Mark but inflected differently, except Matthew uses the preposition apo, “away from,” not ek,
“out of.” Thus while Mark says Jesus was coming “out of” the water, Matthew emphasized that he was moving “away from” it, walking up the bank and away from the Jordan River.

The Greek word anabainō (#305 ἀναβαίνω) means “to go up,” “to come up,” and so saying, like many English versions, that Jesus “was coming up” out of the water is a very literal translation, and the REV could have used the translation “coming up from” in Mark, and “coming away from,” in Matthew. However, these translations are too often misinterpreted to mean that Jesus was still in the Jordan River with John when the heavens opened, so given the context, saying he “was stepping up” out of the water is a very acceptable translation, especially in light of the fact that it exactly describes what he was doing. It is also the translation preferred by Hendrickson (New Testament Commentary). The noted commentator R. C. H. Lenski writes:

“The descent of the Spirit occurred after the baptism had been completed, while Jesus was walking up onto the bank of the river. We should not picture it as the artists do, as though it occurred while Jesus was being baptized or while he was standing knee-deep in the water. Matthew 3:16 has apo, Jesus went away from the water; Mark has ek...Jesus stepped out of (ek) the water onto the bank and walked away from (apo) the water up the bank” (The Interpretation of St. Mark’s Gospel).

But why is it important to know that John’s baptism was finished and Jesus was walking away on the bank of the river? After being baptized by John, Jesus was truly ready to start his own ministry as the Messiah apart from the ministry of John or anyone else. By making it clear that the baptism of John was over and Jesus had left John, we can clearly see that the heavenly vision and voice were not connected with John, but were specifically and individually to Jesus (cp. notes on Matt. 3:16 by W. Davies, and D. Allison, The International Critical Commentary). It is appropriate that God would put holy spirit upon Jesus just as he started off to do his own ministry, and not as he was standing in the water with John, as if the two ministries were somehow related. The work of the Messiah could only have been done by the one man, the true Messiah, Jesus Christ.

Another time people stepped up and out of the Jordan was in Acts 8:38 and 39, when Philip baptized the Ethiopian eunuch. Acts makes the getting into and out of the water of the Jordan River a little more clear because it speaks of them both getting in the water and coming back up from it. We can mentally picture them as they “went down into the water,” getting out of the chariot, walking down the bank into the water, and then Philip baptizing the eunuch. Then Acts 8:39 says they “came up out of the water” (“stepped up out of the water;” REV) coming up the bank and back toward the chariot, at which point Philip was miraculously transported away from there to Azotus (the Ashdod of the OT). [For more, see commentary on Matthew 3:16; Acts 8:39].

1:11. “You are my beloved Son.” The verb in this phrase, translated “are,” is in the present tense and is ontological: it is declaring who Jesus is. The second phrase is God declaring that He is pleased with Jesus, which makes perfect sense because Jesus had prepared himself through his life and now was ready to step into his public ministry.

Some people have tried to say that Jesus somehow “became” the Son when he received holy spirit, but that argument fails on a number of points. Grammatically it fails because to state that Jesus became the Son at his baptism, the text should say, “You have become my Son.” God uses the present tense verb in 1:11, and He uses the present tense verb again at the Transfiguration, when He says, “This is my beloved Son” (Mark 9:7). Both statements are ontological, stating a fact. There is no evidence that either is announcing a change that had occurred.

It also fails because Jesus had been called the “Son” before his baptism, based on his birth and that God was his Father (cp. Matt. 1:20; Luke 1:32, 35; John 1:14). It also fails because what happened at the Baptism was that Jesus received the gift of holy spirit, but there is no other change than that recorded about him. However, Moses, Joshua, and the prophets of the Old Testament all had the gift of holy spirit put upon them, and there is no evidence that then made them “Sons” of God.

1:13. “being tempted.” The Bible does not record what these temptations were, but they certainly included hunger and danger from wild animals. The Bible records that at the end of the forty days the Devil himself came and tempted Jesus (Matt. 4:3).

“the Adversary.” The Greek word for Adversary is Satanas (#4567 Σατανᾶς). The term means “Adversary,” and it was borrowed from the Aramaic, Satana (ךָתָנָא) which originally referred to one who laid in ambush [as an adversary], and then became used as a proper name meaning “Adversary” (see Vocabulary of the Greek NT, by Moulton & Milligan). The word “satan” means “adversary” in all the biblical languages: Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek, although sometimes it is used just as “an adversary,” and sometimes, especially with the article, it is used as an appellative, a name, for the Devil. Being an adversary to God and the things of God is a major part of the Devil’s character and strategy. “Satan” can refer to the direct work of the Devil as in Job 1, or it can refer to indirect work as in Matthew 4:10 when Jesus called Peter “Satan.” Usually the word “Satan” places the emphasis on the indirect work of the Devil. As the great adversary of the true God, the Adversary is the indirect cause of people’s problems by way of situations or circumstances or other people, which he arranges and controls. He is the influence of these situations, circumstances, and people. It has been generally unhelpful that satanas has been transliterated as “Satan” rather than translated as “Adversary.” Anyone reading Hebrew or Greek knew what the word meant, but almost no Christian knows that “Satan” is not just a name, it is a word that became used as a name, and its meaning, Adversary, is important. For information of the names of the Devil and their meanings, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”.

“were ministering.” The Greek verb is diakoneō (#1247 διακονέω), and it is in the imperfect tense, thus indicating an action in the past which occurred over a period of time. Although a number of commentators state that they believe that Satan had already left Jesus’ presence when the angels came, that does not seem to be the sense of the Greek text or a simple reading of the verse itself. The flow of the verse clearly seems to indicate that the angels were with him at times while he was in the desert, just as the wild animals were. If we read the verse as it stands, the wild animals were certainly with Jesus during his time in the desert, and the verse simply continues on and says that the angels were ministering to him, as if they also were there at times during his temptation in the desert. Jesus’ desert experience would have been like life: the hardships of life (the desert), the presence of physical enemies (the wild animals), the hordes of Satan (including Satan himself), and God’s angels, all around one man who needed to resist temptation and walk in wisdom and power. There is no reason to believe that the presence of angels somehow meant that Jesus was not really tempted. For one thing, it is unlikely that the angels were there all the time, any more than he was constantly surrounded by wild animals. They would likely come and go. Also, the angels did not keep Jesus from being tempted, but their presence helped remind Jesus how much was at stake in his living a sinless life.

The Word specifically says that it was the Spirit, God, who led Jesus into the desert (Matt. 4:1; Luke 4:1). The Gospel of Mark is even more forceful, saying that the Spirit “drove” Jesus into the desert (Mark 1:12). But why? Why the need to be in the desert? It surely makes a parallel between Jesus in the desert and Moses and Israel in the desert. Jesus was 40 days in the desert fasting just as Moses was 40 days fasting on Mt. Sinai (Moses was there twice: Exod. 24:18; 34:28), and Israel was 40 years in the desert. There was an angel of the Lord in the desert who helped Israel in its wanderings (Exod. 14:19; 23:20, 23; 32:34; 33:2) and so too Jesus had angelic support. It was Moses’ and Israel’s disobedience in the desert that led to the death of a generation of Israelites, the deaths of Israel’s great leaders, and by dividing the Twelve Tribes to both sides of the Jordan River, put an end to the vision of a united Israel in the Promised Land. In contrast, Jesus’ obedience in the wilderness, and his resisting physical, mental, and spiritual temptation, contributed to his being able to restore and give life to the nation of Israel once again.

1:14. “Good News of God.” The words “of the kingdom” were added by copyists, to conform this verse to many others that appear in the Four Gospels. This is the only use of “Good News of God” in the Gospels, and from the context it is clear that it does indeed refer to the Good News of the Kingdom.

1:21. “Capernaum.” Capernaum would become Jesus’ home town when he left Nazareth. [For more information, see commentary on Mark 2:1].

1:24. “What do we have in common with you.” See commentary on Matthew 8:29.

1:25. “subdued.” Verse 25 has a couple words that have technical meanings relating to Greek magical arts (which we understand is actually part of the spiritual battle), that we must pay attention to in order to understand the verse. In every language, there are words that have a technical meaning as well as having a standard or usual meaning. In this verse, the Greek word translated “subdued” is epitimaō (#2008 ἐπιτιµάω), which usually means to express strong disapproval of someone: rebuke, reprove, censure; or to speak seriously, and thus warn in order to prevent or end an action; or “punish” (cp. BDAG Lexicon).

That is not its meaning here, however. For one thing, the demon would not respond to being “rebuked.” It is too arrogant to know, or it does not care, that it is doing evil. Jesus would have certainly followed the wisdom of Proverbs: “a mocker does not listen to rebuke” (Prov. 13:1. Cp. Prov. 9:7, 8; 15:5, 12; 17:10; 23:9; 29:9). In this context, epitimaō is used in the technical sense in which it is in Greek religion of gaining control over a spirit, a demon.

The technical sense is not common in the Greek literature that has survived to this day, and so does not show up in many Greek lexicons (cp. Bullinger, BDAG, Thayer, and Vine). That fact helps explains why not many Bible teachers are aware of the technical use of the word that refers to subduing rival powers in the spiritual battle between good and evil. Robert Guelich (Word Biblical Commentary: Mark) translates the opening phrase of verse 25: “Jesus subdued him....” and notes that in contexts like these, epitimaō is “a commanding word uttered by God or by his spokesman, by which evil powers are brought into submission.” (cp. A. Nylan, The Source NT). Greg Boyd writes: “...the term denotes an authoritative exercise of God’s power in subduing his enemies. It accomplishes what it speaks” (God at War; p. 207).

Epitimaō also occurs in the records of Jesus “rebuking” the storm on the Sea of Galilee, after which there was a great calm (Matt. 8:26; Mark 4:39; Luke 8:24). Jesus subdued the storm by superior spiritual power. Greg Boyd writes: “It thus appears that, in “muzzling” this storm, Jesus is muzzling yet another demon” (God at War; p. 206). It seems clear that the storm was caused by a demon. Many of Jesus’ apostles who were with him on the boat when the storm came up were experienced fishermen and would not have risked their lives if the weather looked threatening. The Devil was trying to take advantage of Jesus being in a supposedly vulnerable position and kill him or the apostles by drowning them.

In the spiritual battle there are some spirits that are more powerful than others. Strength and authority are real among spiritual beings, just as they are real on earth among creatures of the flesh. In Daniel 10:1-13 there is a spiritual battle in which an angel of God is prevented by a demon from answering Daniel’s prayer until a stronger angel shows up and assists in the fight. Revelation 12:7-9 describe a war in heaven in which the Devil is the weaker one and loses the fight, resulting in his being thrown down to earth.

Describing the spiritual battle, or any spiritual reality for that matter, is difficult. Therefore the Bible uses vocabulary that describes the spiritual battle that the Greeks would be familiar with—sorcerer against sorcerer and god against god—so the people could understand that Jesus was subduing evil spirits by using greater spiritual power. Jesus wielded the power of the true God, and thus was able to subdue the demon by that power, expressed through words. Jesus did not gain control over the demon by virtue of some “magic words” or formula that he used, as if he was some sort of Greek sorcerer. “It is not a magical incantation...it is powerful Word of the Son” (Gerhard Kittle, Theological Dictionary, ἐπιτιµάω Vol. 2, p. 626). The power came from God and was used by Jesus, who then instructed the Twelve Apostles (Matt. 10:5-8), and the Seventy Two (Luke 10:1-17) in casting out demons in the spiritual battle. Every Christian has the inherent power through the gift of holy spirit to subdue and cast out demons.

“Be bound.” As with the word “subdued” (Mark 1:25 above), the Greek word phimoō (#5392 φιµόω) has a technical meaning in this context that relates to the spiritual battle. Ordinarily phimoō means to close the mouth with a muzzle or to silence. For example, “Do not muzzle an ox while it is treading out the grain” (1 Cor. 9:9). However, it was used in Greek magic to denote the binding of a person with a spell. Moulton and Milligan write that it can refer to “the binding of a person by means of a spell, so as to make him powerless to harm” (The Vocabulary of the Greek New Testament. Cp. Ann Nyland, The Source NT; footnote on Matt. 22:12 and her translation: “Be bound!”).

While it is true that the translation, “Be quiet” or “Silence,” which most versions have, is part of the meaning, the real force of the command, phimoō, is about binding the power of evil. Thus, the Greek conveys a spiritual power which binds evil that is much better expressed by the command “Be bound,” than it is by the English, “Silence,” which does not convey any of the spiritual binding of evil that is the real point of the command. Jesus did not just command the demon to be quiet—although that is included in what he did—he bound it with the power of his word. That he commanded the demons not to speak can be gained from the sense of the word, the context, and scope of Scripture, as we see in verse 34. Another indication that Jesus’ command was not an immediate demand for silence was that the demon came out with a shriek. If Jesus had in fact commanded by the power of God that there be “silence,” the demon would not have even shrieked.

1:27. “so amazed that.” The Greek reads more literally, “amazed so that,” using ἠστε (#5620 ὡστε) to indicate the result of the amazement. We would not typically say that people were amazed so that an argument arose, we would say that they were so amazed that an argument arose. A more literal translation might be: “they were amazed, resulting in an argument” or, “they were amazed, therefore an argument arose.”

1:32. “they brought to him everyone.” This verse shows the great dedication the people of the time had for obeying the Law, and it sets a great example for us. The day being spoken of, that had just ended, was a Sabbath, as we learn from Mark 1:29. On the Sabbath people could not walk very far (a Sabbath day’s journey” was just over ½ mile or .8 km), and they could not carry a burden, so carrying a sick person could not be done.
If the people did not put the Law above their own desires, they would have said, “Forget the Law! I need help now!” and they would have ignored the Law and brought the sick to Jesus as fast as possible. The fact that they waited until sundown to bring the sick to Jesus shows their dedication to God and the Law.

1:41. “touched.” The Greek verb is ἁπτό (#681 ἁπτῶ), a word that has two distinct meanings. It properly means “to fasten to, make adhere to; hence, specifically to fasten fire to a thing, to kindle, set on fire, (often so in Attic Greek); cp. Luke 8:16; 11:33; 15:8.
However, when it is used in the middle voice (hapto; #680 ἃπτοµαι) it means “to make close contact with,” and has a very wide range of applications. It can mean, touch, take hold of, hold; cling to; to have contact with, or partake of something with cultic implications, (often used of touching as a means of conveying a blessing or “touching” or partaking of an unclean thing, including eating, almost like we would say, “you have not touched your food”); it can be used almost idiomatically for intimate touch, sexual contact (1 Cor. 7:1; we use “touch” the same way today); and it can be used for contact with someone with a view to causing harm, i.e., injure (Job 5:19 LXX, “no evil shall touch you.”) (BDAG; Thayer).

In this verse, there is little doubt that Jesus did more than just make a light physical contact with the leper. He would have at the very least placed his hands on him as any priest or healer would do to convey a blessing. He may have even gone so far as to hug the leper, but that is less probable, especially given the culture and cultural expectations of both the leper and the people.

On a lexical note, there is some confusion that can occur when studying haptó because most lexicographers recognize it as one Greek verb that has different definitions in different voices, something not uncommon. Nevertheless, James Strong, author of Strong’s concordance, assigned a different Strong’s number to hapto, the middle voice of the verb. Thus there appears to be two words in Strong’s Concordance and The Englishman’s Greek Concordance, but only one word in Thayer and most other Greek lexicons.

1:44. “See that you say nothing to anyone.” Jesus often said this when he healed people. (cp. Matt. 9:30, blind men; Mark 7:36, a deaf person; Luke 8:56, a dead girl). On the other hand, he told some of the people he healed to spread the news (cp. Mark 5:19).
The reason Jesus told people to not talk about their healing is never explicitly stated, and there are likely various reasons for it. One reason would be the often infectious doubt and unbelief that comes from scoffers who hear of the deliverance which could adversely affect the person who was healed. Another reason would be the personal privacy of the individual, who would often be immediately elevated to “movie star status” in their community, as happened to Lazarus. Still another reason would be likely especially in cases such as this healing, the need for Jesus to not be thought of as “unclean” or worse, as “contagious,” in his culture. Touching a leper made the person unclean (Lev. 15:7), and since the cause of leprosy was unknown, not only were people with leprosy scrupulously avoided, but no doubt sometimes people who touched lepers were looked upon with suspicion and avoided.

“as a testimony to them.” Jesus’ healing the leper would be one more testimony that he was the Messiah. However, the Greek wording can, and often is, understood in a negative sense, “as a testimony against them” (see Robert Guelich, Word Biblical Commentary: Mark). The priests were against Jesus, and their not seeing the miracles that he did as proof of who he claimed to be was against them.

2:1. “at home.” The Greek phrase is en oikos, and it does not mean “in a house” or “in the house,” as if it was Peter’s house. The phrases en oikos and eis oikos (Mark 3:20) are standard Greek phrases or idioms equivalent to our “at home.” Jesus moved to Capernaum after the people of his hometown, Nazareth, tried to kill him (Luke 4:29-31; cp. Matt. 4:13). Jesus either bought or rented a house in Capernaum, because John 2:12 indicates he even moved his family there. Shortly after Jesus moved to Capernaum, it became known as his “own city” (Matt. 9:1).

According to Mark 2:1, Jesus was “at home” when the people crowded his house to such a degree that men had to let a paralyzed man down through the roof (2:4). This was one of the times that the amazing love and compassion that Jesus had for people was clearly visible, because he was much more concerned about the man and amazed by the trust in God those men had than he was concerned about any damage that was done to his house, which was no doubt repaired reasonably quickly.

One of the reasons Jesus likely picked to move to Capernaum was that it was on the Via Maris, the “Road of the Sea,” which was the great trade route from Egypt in the south to Damascus in Syria and on to Mesopotamia (see commentary on Matt. 4:15). The fact that the Via Maris passed by Capernaum helps explain why that city had a centurion, which meant having Roman troops stationed in town, and a tollhouse so revenue could be collected from the passing caravans (Matt. 2:14). Capernaum was thus a cosmopolitan town with much commerce and opportunity. No wonder, Jesus was so disappointed at the overall reception he got in Capernaum, despite the fact the people were so proud of their town and Jesus referred to it as “exalted.” So many people, yet such a small group of them really believed. Thus he said, “And you, Capernaum, will you be exalted to heaven? You will go down to the grave, for if the mighty works had been done in Sodom that were done in you, it would have remained until this day.”
Jesus Christ chose Capernaum to be his home town after he left Nazareth; he chose a cosmopolitan town where there would be plenty of opportunity to share the Word and reach others, as well as opportunity for others to more easily reach him.

2:4. “uncovered the roof.” This record contains an unspoken lesson in ministry and life that is important to learn. Jesus was teaching the Word of God to the crowd, as verse 2 says. He was interrupted by this man and his friends who very badly wanted the man healed. The word of God does not tell us about what Jesus was teaching, it tells us about him be interrupted and changing direction to take care of the man and teach the crowd and Pharisees about what is really important and about his authority on earth. The unspoken lesson has to do with interruptions. Although we generally do not to be interrupted from something we are doing, we should look to see if there is an opportunity to do God’s work when we are interrupted, rather than just being annoyed or always assuming that interruptions are from the Devil.

2:7. “He speaks defaming words.” The Greek verb blasphēmeō (#987 βλασφημέω) is transliterated (not translated) from the Greek into English as “blasphemy.” In English, “blasphemy” is only used in reference to God. However, in Greek, blasphēmeō and blasphēmia (the noun) did not have to refer to God or a god, although they could, but were common words that were used of someone speaking against another. The primary meanings were showing disrespect to a person or deity, and/or harming his, her, or its reputation. In this case, the religious leaders thought it was insulting to God’s reputation that Jesus would forgive sins. [For more information on blasphēmeō, see commentary on Matt. 9:3].

“Who is able to forgive sins but God alone?” The religious leaders thought that by forgiving sins, Jesus was harming the reputation of God, who was alone thought to be able to forgive sins. It is important that we realize the Bible never says only God can forgive sins. The rabbis taught that, but that does not make it true: it was just their tradition. In truth, only God can forgive sins, but God’s representatives, to whom God delegates the authority to forgive sins, can forgive them, or declare that they are forgiven if they get the revelation to make that declaration.

The religious leaders were used to prophets speaking for God, but not forgiving sins, although they should have been open to that. Nathan came very close when he said to David, “Yahweh also hath put away thy sin” (2 Sam. 12:13; Rotherham), and the author/agent aspect of the Hebrew language and culture would have allowed Nathan to say, “Your sin has been forgiven.” It should be especially clear to us that God delegated to Jesus the authority to forgive sins, because Jesus taught that very explicitly. “For the Father does not judge anyone, but he has given all judgment to the Son….I am not able to do anything on my own. As I hear, I judge. And my judgment is righteous because I do not seek my own will, but the will of him who sent me” (John 5:22, 30).

Forgiving sins, or knowing that one’s sins have been forgiven, is essential to having a peaceful life. Great anxiety, and both mental and physical sickness, can come from feeling unforgiven and in danger of judgment. Jesus knew that, and loved the man in the record and told him his sins were forgiven, which opened the door for the person to be healed. Experience tells us that many times people are not healed because they do not think they are forgiven, or they do not forgive others.

Jesus’ action in stating that the man’s sins were forgiven were not meant to prove that he was God, rather, it is to show that God “has given [Jesus] authority to execute judgment, because he is the Son of Man” (John 5:27). Notice that the onlookers were amazed that such authority had been given to men. They did not conclude from what Jesus did that he must be God. They drew the simple conclusion that God must have given authority to this man to forgive sins. Elsewhere, Jesus delegates the authority to the apostles saying, “If you forgive the sins of any, they are forgiven them; if you withhold forgiveness from any, it is withheld” (John 20:23). If being given the authority to forgive sins means the person is God, then we should conclude the apostles were God also. But this is surely absurd. Instead we should acknowledge that the authority ultimately comes from God who has given it to people.

2:9. “Which is easier?” Which is easier to say and accomplish, declaring someone’s sins are forgiven, or divine healing? They are equally easy. See commentary on Luke 5:23.

2:14. “Levi.” This is another name for the Apostle Matthew.

2:15. “his house.” Matthew’s house. Luke 5:29 makes it clear that it is Matthew’s house (Matthew is called Levi in Mark 2:13-17, and Luke 5:27-30). Matthew was a tax collector, and so it makes sense that his friends were tax collectors and “sinners,” which is why so many people like that were at the dinner. [For more information see commentary on Matthew 9:10].

2:16. “and drinks,” which appears in many versions, was added by copyists, prob. to harmonize with Luke 5:30. There is strong evidence that it is not original.

2:26. “Abiathar.” The name “Abiathar” is questioned because in the record in 1 Samuel 21:1-9, Ahimelech is the priest. Although many commentators simply assume Mark made a mistake, we believe the Word of God is “God-breathed” (2 Tim. 3:16), and that “Abiathar” is not a mistake. There are several ways this apparent contradiction might be solved. One of them is that both men may have been referred to by both names. That would be one good explanation why 1 Samuel 22:20 refers to Abiathar as the son of Ahimelech, but 2 Samuel 8:17; 1 Chronicles 18:16; 2 and 4:6 refer to Ahimelech as the son of Abiathar. It was quite common for someone to be referred to by different names. But it also has been suggested that Abiathar had a son named Ahimelech who was a priest, and that could explain the Old Testament verses that seem to switch the names. Another solution, frankly, a more likely one, is that both Ahimelech and Abiathar were present when David came. It is even possible that due to Ahimelech’s age Abiathar had started to take on the duties of the priesthood and Mark recognized him for that. That would be similar to the position of Annas and Caiaphas at the time of the ministry of Christ. Annas was the elder and still called High Priest, but Caiaphas was the man actually running the priesthood and he is also called High Priest. But even if that was not the case, we know it was common for priestly families to live together, just like Eli did with his sons (cp. 1 Sam. 2:12ff), and the city of Nob had at least 85 priests (1 Sam. 22:17). When Doeg the Edomite killed 85 priests, Ahimelech was killed and Abiathar escaped and went to David (1 Sam. 22:20), and became High Priest under David. This could be why Mark says that David entered the house of God “in the days of Abiathar” (KJV; NIV), or “in the time of Abiathar” (ESV; NASB). Since Abiathar would have taken over the priesthood de facto as soon as his father died, David did in fact enter the house of God “in the days of Abiathar,” the well-known High Priest under David.

3:3. “Stand up in the midst of the people.” Christ told the man to stand up in the middle of the crowd. The healing would be performed by a word, not by a touch. He did not ask the man to come up front, but healed him in the middle of the crowd, right where he was.

3:4. “life.” The Greek word is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή, pronounced psoo-kay’), often translated “soul.” The Greek word has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person or animal; an individual person; or attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. Here it refers to the physical life of the body, which is why most versions translate it “life,” which is accurate in this context. [For a more complete explanation of psuchē, “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’”]

3:9. “crush.” The Greek thlibō (#2346 θλίβω) is to press (as grapes), press hard upon (Thayer, Lexicon). The versions are split between “press upon” and “crush,” but the people were already pressing upon him (v. 10). He wanted to be sure they did not crush him.

3:16. “Peter.” Jesus continues the tradition of God and other ancient rulers by changing the names of those whom he rules. Historically, changing someone’s name might be done to prove your power over someone, but Jesus would not have done it if Peter, James and John were not sold out to him. Notice that he does not change Judas’ name. Cp. Gen. 17:5 and 15; 32:28; 2 Sam. 12:24 and 25; Jer. 20:3; Gen. 41:45; 2 Chron. 36:4; 2 Kings 24:17; Daniel 1:7).

3:19. “into his home.” The Greek phrase is eis oikos, and it does not mean “into a house” or “into the house,” as if it was Peter’s house. The phrases eis oikos and en oikos (Mark 2:1) are standard Greek phrases or idioms equivalent to our “at home” [For more information see commentary on Mark 2:1].

3:21. “those who were close to him.” The Greek is para (#3844 παρά), a preposition usually meaning “beside.” Thus the book of Mark is vague here, saying only that these people were those who were beside him. This is a case when we have to rely on other parallel records to give the details, and we learn what happened from the scope of Scripture. Matthew 12:46 and Luke 8:19 let us know that this group of people is his mother and brothers. This verse is a clear indication that Jesus’ step-father, Joseph, was dead, otherwise he would have been leading the group. That means Joseph died between the time Jesus was 12 (Luke 2:42) and the time he started his ministry. He had worked with his father, the carpenter, and had become a carpenter himself (Mark 6:3). This group “set out” to take him. They arrive in verse 31.

3:22. “Beelzebul.” The Greek is Beelzeboul (#954 Βεελζεβούλ), which gets put into English as “Beelzebul.” He is called the “prince of demons” in Luke 12:10. “Beelzeboul” is “lord of the dunghill.” This comes from the Hebrew zebul (dung, a dunghill). [For more on the name Beelzebul and other names of the Slanderer (the Devil), see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”]

The versions differ as to whether this is one statement by the scribes, or two statements. The context seems to support two statements, because it says they “were saying…,” so there was a lot of talking going on.
“the ruler of the demons.” This phrase is used in part to describe Beelzebul, in the first part of the verse, so from it one thing we know is that the Jews were considering Beelzebul to be the ruler of the demons or to us, another name for the Slanderer (Devil). The Greek word translated “ruler” is archon (#758 ἄρχων), which is from archē, “first,” and it means the one who is first, thus the “ruler, commander, chief,” etc. [For more on the names of the Slanderer, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”].

3:23. “the Adversary.” The Greek word for Adversary is Satanas (#4567 Σατανᾶς), which has been transliterated into “Satan” in most versions. This causes the meaning of the word, which is important, to be lost. For more information on it, see the note on Mark 1:13. For information on the names of the Devil, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”.

3:26. “the Adversary.” The Greek word for Adversary is Satanas (#4567 Σατανᾶς), which has been transliterated into “Satan” in most versions. This causes the meaning of the word, which is important, to be lost. For more information on it, see the note on Mark 1:13. For information on the names of the Devil, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”.

3:27. “binds.” The word “bind” (deō) was a common word for bind, and one of its uses was “to describe the ‘binding’ power of curses” (Moulton and Milligan, Vocabulary of the Greek NT). The context is the casting out of demons (v. 28), so the “binding” in this verse refers to binding a demon and making it powerless by the power of God. See commentary on Matthew 12:29.

3:28. “defaming talk...defame.” The Greek noun blasphēmia (#988 βλασφημία) and the verb blasphēmeō (#987 βλασφημέω) are transliterated (not translated) from the Greek into English as “blasphemy.” In English, “blasphemy” is only used in reference to God. However, in Greek, blasphēmeō and blasphēmia (the noun) did not have to refer to God or a god, although they could, but were common words that were used of someone speaking against another. The primary meanings were showing disrespect to a person or deity, and/or harming his, her, or its reputation. [For more on blasphēmeō, see commentary on Matt. 9:3]. The two uses of “defame” in this verse inflected differently is the figure of speech polyptoton. See Bullinger’s Figures of Speech Used in the Bible.

“the Holy Spirit.” “The Holy Spirit” is the name for God that emphasizes His power in operation. God is called “the Holy Spirit” in a number of verses in the NT, including Matthew 1:20; 12:32; and Hebrews 9:8. [For more information on the uses of “Holy Spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”].

3:32. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

Chapter 4

4:1. “facing the lake.” The crowd was on the land, and Jesus was in the boat on the Sea of Galilee, so the crowd was “facing the lake.” (cp. Lenski).

“Listen!” The Greek is akouō (#191 ἀκούω), which means to hear, to listen, or to understand, and it is in the imperative mood. Coupled with idou (“Pay attention!”) it is an extremely powerful way to say that we better pay attention to what Jesus is saying in the parable.

“Pay attention!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

4:9. “Anyone who has ears to hear had better listen!” This is almost the same Greek phrase as occurs in Matthew 11:15, and for an explanation of the exclamation, see the commentary on that verse. This verse is longer, reading, “Anyone who has ears to hear had better listen,” while the occurrences in Matthew read, “Anyone who has ears had better listen!”

4:11. “sacred secret.” We translate the Greek word musterion (#3466 µυστήριον) as “sacred secret” because that is what musterion actually refers to: a secret in the religious or sacred realm. [For more information on the “Sacred Secret” and the Administration of Grace, see Ephesians 3:9.]

4:12. Quoted from Isaiah 6:9, 10. Some texts such as the Byzantine Text from which the KJV was translated, read “of sins” at the end of the verse, but scholars are now aware that this is an explanatory gloss that worked its way into the text.

“so that…” For this quotation from Isaiah and the purpose of parables, see commentary on Matthew 13:13. The “so that” is the Greek word hina plus the verb in the subjunctive mood, which shows this to be a purpose-result clause: see entry on Matthew 2:15, “resulting in…what was spoken being fulfilled.” To fully understand this passage, we must see how Matthew’s record portrays the human side of the events, John’s the spiritual side, and Mark and Luke’s records combine the two into one.

4:15. “the Adversary.” The Greek word for Adversary is Satanas (#4567 Σατανᾶς), which has been transliterated into “Satan” in most versions. This causes the meaning of the word, which is important, to be lost. For more information on it, see the note on Mark 1:13. For information on the names of the Devil, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”.

4:23. “Anyone who has ears to hear had better listen!” This is the same Greek phrase as occurs in Mark 4:9 (see commentary there), and almost the same Greek phrase as occurs in Matthew 11:15. For an explanation of the exclamation, see the commentary on that Matthew 11:15. Jesus emphasized his teaching that everything we do will be disclosed on Judgment day with this solemn command and warning.

4:31. “mustard seed.” For more information on this parable, see commentary on Matthew 13:32.

4:36. “just as he was.” This is a very important verse that shows us how hard Jesus pushed himself to serve and bless people. He was exhausted from serving. That is why he went right to sleep in the boat. The Devil knew he was exhausted, and tried to kill him off, thinking he might be too weak to really defend himself and calm the storm.

4:39. “having fully awakened.” In v. 38 he was awakened, the verb in v. 39 is stronger. He was not “sleepy” or “just coming to his senses” as so many do when they are awakened. He became fully awake.
“subdued.” In this context, epitimaō (#2008 ἐπιτιμάω) has a technical meaning: it is used in Greek religion of gaining control over a spirit, a demon. Jesus subdued the storm, which was no doubt caused by a demon, by the power of God he wielded, which he expressed in words. The power came from God and was used by Jesus. Jesus did not gain control over the storm by some “magic words” or formula that he used. “It is not a magical incantation...it is powerful Word of the Son” (Gerhard Kittle, Theological Dictionary, ἐπιτιμάω Vol. 2, p. 626). For a more complete explanation, see commentary on Mark 1:25.

“Hush!” The Greek siopao (#4623). “To refrain from speaking or making a sound, keep silent, say nothing, make no sound” (BDAG). Although this word gets translated “Peace” in many versions, it is not the standard word for peace.

“Be bound!” As with the word “subdued” (above), the Greek word phimoō (#5392 φιµόω) has a technical meaning in this context. Ordinarily phimoō means to close the mouth with a muzzle or to silence. However, it was used in Greek magic to denote the binding of a person with a spell. Moulton and Milligan write that it can refer to “the binding of a person by means of a spell, so as to make him powerless to harm” (The Vocabulary of the Greek New Testament. Cp. A. Nyland, The Source NT; footnote on Matt. 22:12 and her translation: “Be bound!”). The Greek conveys a spiritual power behind the command that the English, “Be still,” simply does not convey. Jesus did not just command the storm—and the demon causing it—to be still—he bound it with the power of his word. See commentary on Mark 1:25.

Chapter 5

5:3. “in the tombs.” The Greek word “in” (en) can be “in” or, as many versions, “among,” but since the hillsides of that area east of the Sea of Galilee are steep and have many cave-tombs, it is not likely he lived “among” the tombs. That would be akin to living on a hillside with some cave-tombs around. It is much more likely that he lived inside a cave-tomb, but what the state of dead bodies he would be around were we are not told. They could be rotting, or have turned to dust.

5:12. “Let us enter into them.” This is a command clause composed of hina with a verb in the subjunctive mood in Greek. See commentary on John 9:3, “let the works of God be revealed in him.”

5:23. “Come.” Lenski points out that in certain cases the Greek word hina [untranslated] simply introduces an imperative, not a purpose clause. Here, it is the imperative of prayer, which is why some versions, fill in the “ellipsis” with “I pray.”

5:28. “was saying.” She talked to herself (cp. Matt. 9:21) over and over.

5:34. “made you whole.” The Greek sōzō, in the context of sickness, is to be made whole or to be healed. In the context of everlasting life, it is to be “rescued, saved.”
“Go in peace.” Had Jesus simply let the woman take her healing and leave, she would likely have been wracked by guilt. Jesus knew not to let that happen, and in doing so set a wonderful example for us. We need to take care of people emotionally as well as physically.

“affliction.” The Greek mastix (#3148 μάστιξ) is literally a whip, and was used metaphorically of a whipping, affliction, disease, etc.

5:39. “sleeping.” The Greek verb is koimaō (#2837 κοιμάω), to fall asleep, to be asleep. Sleep is used as a euphemism and metaphor for death. See commentary on Acts 7:60.

5:42. “for she was twelve years old.” This describes why she could walk even though she had been referred to as “little” in this and other Gospel records.

“amazed…with a great amazement.” This is the figure of speech polyptoton, the repetition of both noun and verb forms together (Bullinger, Figures of Speech). It highlights the degree of astonishment, they were greatly amazed.

Chapter 6

6:1. “his own city.” The context is clear that this is referring to Nazareth, even though he had moved to Capernaum, and that was now considered his home (see commentary on Mark 2:1).

6:2. “being done.” Present tense. Astonishingly, the people of Nazareth, who did not have trust in him, were able to admit that Jesus was doing miracles.

6:8. “staff.” In Matthew and Luke, it seems Jesus said not to take a staff. For the apparent contradiction, see commentary on Matthew 10:10.

6:14. “out from among the dead.” For an explanation of this phrase, see commentary on Romans 4:24.

6:15. “Elijah.” For information on why the people thought that Elijah would come, and why John the Baptist was called “Elijah,” see commentary on Matthew 17:10.

6:16. “whom I beheaded, has been raised.” The Greek is more emphatic than just, “John, whom I beheaded, has been raised.” The way it is written, Herod had no doubt that John was both dead (because he had killed John) and raised. Wuest says: “raised out from among those who were dead.”

6:20. “feared.” Better than “was afraid of” here because there is an element of holy awe with the fear.

“liked to listen to him.” The Greek we translate as “like to” is hēdeōs (#2234 ἕδεος; pronounced hay-de-ōs) and it means with pleasure, with delight, gladly. This shows that people can hear the Word of God taught and enjoy it, but not have it change their lives (see commentary on Mark 12:37).

6:33. “knew where they were going.” (Cp. Brown and Comfort Interlinear, and Lenski). It is not that the people “recognized them.” Jesus had just been with them. They knew both Jesus and the apostles well. And, had they been sensitive at all, they also would have known why he was leaving—to get some privacy. But they were selfish, and knowing where he would go to be alone, got there before he did.
"went before them." This, and the start of verse 34, which is translated in many versions as "came ashore" or something similar, creates a contradiction with John 6:3-5. The crowd was not waiting on the shore for Jesus. If it were, he would have seen the people long before he came ashore. John makes it clear that the crowd, even if it was ahead of Jesus and the group with him for a little while, eventually lagged behind. Thus, Jesus arrived with his disciples on the shore and spent some time with them before the crowd assembled. Jesus “came out” of his retreat and saw the multitude assembled, and had compassion on them.

6:45. “immediately he compelled.” The feeding of the five thousand (much more when you include the women and children who were there) is one of the few events that is recorded in all four Gospels. It is watershed time for Jesus Christ, and needs to be studied from all four Gospels to really understand it and what happened after it. After the feeding, the huge crowd became convinced that Jesus was their Messiah and they were going to come and take him by force and make him their king (John 6:14, 15). Jesus had to act swiftly to avoid a potential revolution which would have certainly also included charges against him by the Romans that he was a revolutionary, which would have no doubt landed him in prison.

As well as realizing the intent of the crowd, he recognized that his apostles were basically of the same mind as the crowd. They too were tired of Roman domination, Jewish perversion of religion, and the cares of the world, and they too were anxious for the Kingdom of God to come, which Jesus had been saying was at hand ever since he started his ministry. It was a very real possibility that the apostles could have been swept away with the emotion and conviction of the crowd and joined in the revolt. To prevent this, Jesus acted decisively. First, “immediately he compelled” his disciples to leave the scene (Matt. 14:22; Mark 6:45). He made them get into a boat and head west to Gennesaret (Matt. 14:34; Mark 6:53), and the next day they went from there a few miles northeast to Capernaum (John 6:59). Then he dealt with the crowd and sent it away (Matt. 14:23; Mark 6:45). This was not easy to do. The people had to be calmed down and convinced to leave. Mark 6:45 says Jesus “was sending” the crowd away, the verb being in the present tense, indicating the action was ongoing, taking some time. It was not as easy as saying, “Go home now.” Jesus worked with the people to convince them to leave.

Now finally alone, with no disciples and no crowds, Jesus went to a mountain to pray (Matt. 14:23; Mark 6:46; John 6:15). He needed wisdom and needed God’s help to keep his ministry on track, he needed to keep defeating the temptation to avoid the cross and try to become king immediately, and no doubt he prayed hard for his apostles that they would not be led away by false Messianic expectations. We get a glimpse of the wisdom and direction that God gave Jesus in his teaching and action when we read John 6:22-70, which occurred the day after the five thousand were fed (John 6:22). Jesus made a decisive shift in his ministry from just demonstrating the power of God for people and teaching them, to starting to require commitment from them (John 6:29, 53-58).

The reaction of the crowd was about the same then as it is today: most people talk about loving God and living the Word, but when you really require them to do it, they refuse. The people in Jesus’ audience said, “This is a hard saying: who is able to hear it?” (John 6:60), Even Jesus’ disciples grumbled about it (John 6:61). Jesus challenged his disciples about their unbelief, and many of them left (John 6:66). Jesus, most likely hurt and angered by the selfishness of the crowd and many of the disciples, turned to the twelve and asked, “Will you also go away?” Thankfully, they did not.

There are many lessons that can be learned from this account. One is that people are selfish. They are now, and they always have been. Jesus did not convince them otherwise, and neither will we. We must do what Jesus did: work with the people who want to work and let the others go. Another lesson is to not allow ourselves to be tricked and trapped by worldly aspirations. No doubt Jesus would have loved to have come into his kingdom without the pain of rejection and crucifixion, but it was not the will, nor the way, of God. Selflessness, humility and giving are the godly way forward.

Another thing we can learn from the account is that sometimes quick and decisive action is needed to keep us out of trouble. Had Jesus not compelled the disciples to immediately leave the scene, he could have been fighting a battle on two fronts and had a hard time indeed. Another lesson is that prayer is essential for success. If Jesus needed to pray, surely we do too. One more thing we can learn is that the wisdom from God may be to change the direction of what you are doing. The result of what happened after Jesus’ great miracle, the potential revolt against Rome, and his hours of prayer was to change the direction of his ministry by adding that he require things from his disciples. This seemed to have the wrong effect because many disciples left, but the history of the early church shows us that those who stayed were tried and tested, and able to carry on the work of Christ after he ascended.

“toward Bethsaida.” Jesus sent them “toward” (the Greek is pros, “toward”) Bethsaida, which is nearer to Capernaum than they were on the east side of the Sea of Galilee, but the eventual destination was Capernaum (John 6:16). Bethsaida was almost a suburb of Capernaum, which was a major city, and site of a tax office and Roman troops, so for travel purposes, the names Bethsaida and Capernaum are synonymous. However, the boat landed at Gennesaret (see commentary on Matt. 14:34).

6:48. “fourth watch of the night.” The fourth watch of the night started at our 3 AM.

At the time of Christ, in both Jewish and Roman reckoning of time, the “day” was divided into 12 hours (John 11:9, “Are there not twelve hours in the day?”). The first hour started at roughly 6 AM. That made the “third hour” about our 9 AM (cp. Matt. 20:3; Acts 2:15, 10:3); the “sixth hour” about our noon (cp. John 4:6; John 19:14; Acts 10:9); the “seventh hour” about our 1 PM (John 4:52), the ninth hour about our 3 PM (cp. Matt. 27:45, 46; Mark 15:34; Acts 3:1; 10:3); and the tenth hour about our 4 PM (John 1:39); and the eleventh hour about our 5 PM (Matt. 20:6).

Also, both the Jews and Romans divided the night into four “watches,” each being three hours long. This was true even though the Jews started their new day at sunset, at the start of the first watch of the night, and the Romans reckoned their new day at midnight, at the start of the third watch of the night (our day beginning at midnight comes from the Romans). The names of the four night watches were “evening,” “midnight,” “cockcrowing,” and “morning” (Mark 13:35: “So keep watch, for or you do not know when the lord of the house will come, whether during the evening watch, or the midnight watch, or the cockcrowing watch, or the morning watch.”). Sometimes, however, the watches were just called by “first watch,” “second watch,” “third watch,” and “fourth watch.” On occasion, the “watches” were not accurate enough, and so even the night was divided into hours. This is why Paul was taken to Caesarea at the “third hour of the night,” our 9 PM (Acts 23:23).
The hours of the day in Roman times were often approximations, because there was longer daylight in the summer and shorter in the winter. However, in both seasons the day was divided into 12 hours. Thus we would say that the “third hour” of the day was around our 9 AM, not 9 AM exactly.

The feeding of the 5,000 took place in the area we know as Bethsaida-Julius, on the northeast shore of the Sea of Galilee (Luke 9:10). The disciples left that general area in the evening and headed for “Bethsaida” (Mark 6:45; cp. “Bethsaida in Galilee, John 12:21), which was apparently a small fishing village to the southwest of Capernaum (it can be confusing that the disciples left the area of Bethsaida and sailed toward Bethsaida. “Bethsaida” means “House of fishing,” and there were a couple of them on the Sea of Galilee). Thus the total distance the apostles had to row was likely somewhat less than 5 miles (8 km). This should have been an easy journey, but the wind was so against them they had rowed for hours and were no doubt incredibly frustrated and near exhaustion.

6:49. “an apparition.” The word phantasma means “something that appears,” from phaino, to appear. Thus an apparition. The only other appearance of the word is in Matthew 14:26, where it is used in a sentence and translated “ghost.”

6:53. “Gennesaret.” This is where Jesus and the disciples landed, and it is confirmed in Matthew 14:34 (see commentary there).

Chapter 7

7:1. “And the Pharisees and some of the experts in the law…” Mark can be read to mean that only the scribes came from Jerusalem, but Matthew 15:1 is clear that the entire delegation came from there.

7:3. “to the wrist.” The Greek literally reads “with the fist.” This is a good example of a custom being so obscure that translating it into the text would only confuse the reader. Edersheim gives the best explanation we have seen, and Young’s Literal Translation renders according to his explanation.

“The water was poured on both hands…. The hands were lifted up, so as to make the water run to the wrist, in order to ensure that the whole hand was washed, and the water polluted by the hand did not again run down the fingers. …But there was one point on which special stress was laid. In the ‘first effusion,’ which was all that originally was required when the hands were Levitically ‘defiled,’ the water had to run down to the wrist. Fn. “The language of the Mishnah…can only refer to the wrists. Fn. The rendering ‘wash diligently’ gives no meaning; that ‘with the fist’ is not in accordance with Jewish Law; while “up to the elbow” is not only contrary to Jewish Law, but apparently based on a wrong rendering of [the Hebrew]” (Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah).

The general uncertainty among commentators, however, about what the Greek texts, “with the fist” means, explains the huge number of variations in the translations: “oft” (KJV), “carefully” (NASB), “ceremonial washing” (NIV), “thoroughly” (NRSV), “to the wrist” (YLT), etc. “wash.” Greek = nipto, to wash.

7:4. “they bathe themselves.” The Greek is baptizō (#907 βαπτίζω), which means “…Properly, 1. to dip repeatedly, to immerse, submerge. 2. to cleanse by dipping or submerging, to wash, to make clean with water; in the middle and the 1 aorist passive to wash oneself, bathe; so Mark 7:4 ….metaphorically, to overwhelm, as … to be overwhelmed with calamities, of those who must bear them, Matt. 20:22f Rec.; Mark 10:38 f; Luke 12:50 (Thayer). Many commentators have had problems with this verse, believing that even the religious Jews did not bathe themselves each time they came from the marketplace, but the text seems clear, and we must assume that some people did that, because his audience did not charge him with an absurdity.

Some versions have “and couches” (YLT) or “and tables” (KJV) after “copper vessels,” Metzger (Textual Commentary) writes, “It is difficult to decide whether the words…were added by copyists who were influenced by the legislation of Leviticus 15, or whether the words were omitted (a) accidentally because of homoeoteleuton or (b) deliberately because the idea of washing or sprinkling beds seemed to be quite incongruous. In view of the balance of probabilities, as well as the strong witnesses that support each reading, a majority of the Committee preferred to retain the words, but to enclose them within square brackets.” We decided to leave them out, following the original translation of the ASV.

“doctrines.” The Greek word is didaskalia (#1319 διδασκαλία), a noun, and it has two primary meanings: It is used of the act of teaching or instruction (as if it was a verb), and it is also used for what is taught, i.e., the doctrine or material that was presented. In this verse we felt “doctrine” was better than “teaching.” For more on didaskalia see commentary on 1 Tim. 4:13).

7:9. “tradition.” The Greek word is paradosis (#3862 παράδοσις), and it means something that is handed over, or something that is handed down. Thus it can mean surrender or arrest, or it can refer to a “tradition.” Traditions can be a great help to people. God established traditions in the OT, such as keeping the Passover feast every year. Jesus himself started the tradition of “the Lord’s Supper.” However, there are Christians who believe that any tradition created by man is an offense to God and should not be practiced or condoned. How should Christians view traditions? It seems clear that we should view traditions the same way Jesus did. There were hundreds of traditions in the Judaism of the time of Jesus (cp. Mark 7:4), but the ones he spoke against fall into several categories.

One category that Jesus spoke against was traditions of men that had, in the minds of the religious leaders, become equal to the commands of God. No matter how helpful they are or holy they seem, and no matter how many years they have been observed, traditions are only traditions, they are not commandments, and should not be treated as such. When traditions are treated like commandments, first, the words of man become elevated to the status of the word of God, and second, someone who is unable or unwilling to keep the tradition is almost always treated badly by those who do.

Another category of tradition that Jesus spoke against was traditions that could not be kept without ignoring or rejecting the commandments of God (Mark 7:8, 9). These traditions, by their very nature, are harmful. Jesus cited the tradition of giving “to God” the support that elderly parents needed (Mark 7:10-13). Of course, the support that was supposedly given “to God” ended up enriching and empowering the religious leaders, and the honor that God commanded that children give to parents was ignored.
A third category of tradition that is harmful is a tradition that has become a burden to a Christian’s life and walk, instead of being a blessing. The religious leaders had many burdensome traditions that they enforced (Matt. 23:4). A godly tradition is to be a blessing and bring people closer to God. A tradition that makes living a godly life into a burden should not be kept.

There are many traditions in the Church, and very few are kept by all Christian denominations. Most are not harmful, and can be helpful. For example, dressing up for Sunday church is a tradition in some denominations, and is not harmful unless it takes on the force of a command and someone who comes not dressed up is scorned or rejected. It can be helpful in that it helps some people take their worship time more seriously. On the other hand, the tradition of praying to “the saints” is practiced in some denominations, but is against the command of God and therefore harmful.

Christians should view traditions like Christ did. Even if a tradition is not “in the Bible,” it can still bring people closer to God in a very meaningful way. However, if a tradition begins to take on the force of a commandment, or if it makes godly living a burden, or especially if it contradicts the Bible or can only be kept at the expense of ignoring a biblical command, then the words spoken by Isaiah more than 2500 years ago still apply: “in vain do they worship me” (Mark 7:7; cp. Isa. 29:13).

7:16. This verse is omitted in REV. This verse is absent from some important early texts such as K, B, and L. It seems to be a scribal addition, perhaps to parallel 4:9 or 4:23. There seems to be much more likelihood that the verse was added to later texts than removed from earlier ones. See Metzger, Textual Commentary.
7:22. “evil eye.” The “evil eye” was idiomatic in Semitic languages for someone who was greedy, covetous, and stingy, which is why some versions translate it as “envy” or “stingy” (cp. HCSB; ESV, NASB; NET; NIV; NRSV). In Western cultures, the “evil eye” was a look or glance that meant harm and brought harm, but there is no evidence it was used that way in the Bible. See commentary on Matthew 6:22.

“insults.” The Greek noun is blasphēmia (#988 βλασφηµία; pronounced blas-fay-me'-ah), and was used of someone speaking against another. The primary meaning as it was used in the Greek culture was showing disrespect to a person or deity, and/or harming his, her, or its reputation. [For more on blasphēmia, see commentary on Matt. 9:3].
7:30. “having gone out.” Greek = exerchomai (ἐξέρχοµαι 1. to move out of or away from an area. a. of animate entities go out, come out, go away, retire). Demons can inhabit the mind or body, and thus when they leave they are “gone out.”

Chapter 8

8:9. “Now about four thousand people were there…” This is the shorter reading represented in the Nessle-Aland Greek text, 27th edition.
8:11. “And the Pharisees came out.” The Bible says that everyone who lives a godly life will suffer persecution. These religious zealots did not wait for Jesus even to come to where they were, but came out to him to argue with him and defend their religious turf.

8:18. Quoted from Jeremiah 5:21.

8:28. “Elijah.” For information on why the people thought that Elijah would come, and why John the Baptist was called “Elijah,” see commentary on Matthew 17:10.

“have in mind.” The Greek phronein means to have in mind something that sways the thinking (Cp. Lenski).

8:35. “life” (2x). The Greek word is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoo-kay'), often translated “soul.” The Greek word has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person or animal; an individual person; or attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. Here it refers to the physical life of the body, which is why most versions translate it “life,” which is accurate in this context. [For a more complete explanation of psuchē, “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’”].

8:36. “life.” The Greek word is psuchē, as in verse 35. It is used twice in verse 35 of the life of the body, and it is expanded in this verse to be life in general, both here and the hereafter, which is why many versions translate it “life” in verse 35 but “soul” in verse 36 and 37. We felt it was better to translate the word the same way in Mark 8:35, 36, and 37 and point out that “life” can be just our physical life or our physical and everlasting life [For a more complete explanation of psuchē, “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’”].

8:37. “life.” The Greek word is psuchē, as in verse 35 and 36. See commentary on Mark 8:36.

Chapter 9

9:2. “transfigured.” For an explanation of the Transfiguration, see Matthew 17:2.

9:6. “say.” The Greek is apokrithē (ἀποκριθῇ), technically, “answer,” but in this case he was “answering” the situation, not a question. Hendrickson (New Testament Commentary) states: “Here, as in verse 5 and often, the verb ἀποκριθῇ has a wide meaning, so that τί ἀποκριθῇ means, “what he should say,” or “what to say.”

9:10. “And they kept the matter to themselves, discussing…” The disciples did not expect Jesus to be killed and then raised from the dead. That is simply not what most first-century Jews believed about the Messiah, so they did not understand what Jesus was speaking of when he spoke of being raised from the dead (see commentary on Luke 18:34).

9:12. “come first to restore.” If the text is to be translated and understood as if John did restore everything, then the restoration has to refer to a spiritual restoration. However, it seems apparent that John did not restore everything. In fact, that John did not manage to restore everything sets the stage for Jesus’ question, “how is it that it is written of the Son of Man, that he should suffer many things and be treated with contempt?” In other words, the disciples need to understand that John did not restore everything, which is one reason the Messiah must suffer and die.

It is a well-known aspect of the Semitic languages that an active verb can represent an attempt to do something, not an accomplishment of something. In other words, instead of John “restoring” everything, he “tried” to restore everything. This use of the Hebrew verb is well documented and even appears in places such as the “Hints and Helps to Bible Interpretation” section in the front of the Young’s Concordance (Wm. B.
Eerdmans Publishing Company, Grand Rapids, 1970, hint #70). Young’s has, “Active verbs frequently express only an attempt to do the action,” and one of the examples it gives is the verse about Elijah restoring everything.

It is because of the Semitic idiom that versions such as the ESV, NRSV, and RSV, say “to restore all things.” John came to restore all things, but could not accomplish that task, which is a reason that Jesus had to suffer and die.

“and yet.” (Cp. Lenski, NASB). Jesus was asking the question, without answering it, how it could be that if Elijah came and restored everything, there was any need for the suffering of the Messiah. The disciples did not believe that the Messiah would die (and did not truly understand that until after his resurrection). Thus, Jesus is just trying to get them to open their mind to other possibilities for the Messiah than they had learned in Synagogue. The question is a good one, because although the death of the Messiah was veiled to the disciples, the fact that he would suffer should have been clear to them. But why even that if John did indeed restore all things? The restoration of John was a spiritual restoration, turning people’s hearts back to God. It was not a political restoration, or a full restoration in which the Devil and his minions were defeated, the curse removed from the earth, etc.

“and restores.” The Greek uses just the participle, “restoring.”

9:18. “strong enough.” The Greek is ischūō (#2480 ἵσχω), which means strength. This verse gives us a glimpse into the spiritual battle that can wage when demons live inside a body. It takes spiritual strength to cast them out. That strength comes from trust (Matt.
17:20), which is connected to one’s prayer life (Mark 9:29). Another example of strength in the spiritual battle is Revelation 12:8. The Devil and his demons wanted to remain in heaven, but they were not strong enough to fight against Michael and the angels. To say the apostles “could not” cast out the demon is correct, but not helpful, because then we have no idea why. The Greek is more helpful, saying that the spirit did not come out because the apostles were not spiritually strong enough. Spiritual power in the life of a believer is usually not a matter of either having it or not, it is usually a matter of how much power one has, and do we have enough to get the job at hand done for the Lord.

In this context, epitimaō has a technical meaning: it is used in Greek religion of gaining control over a spirit, a demon. See commentary on Mark 1:25.

9:31. “is being delivered.” The Greek is paradidōmi (#3860 παραδίδωμι), and in this context it means to give into the hands of another; to deliver up treacherously; by betrayal to cause someone to be taken. It is present tense, but is an example of the “prophetic present,” meaning the present tense is stated, but it is prophetic of something that will happen in the future. Thus, some versions render the verb, “will be delivered over” or something similar. The prophetic present has “the note of certain expectation” (Lenski), because it is spoken as if the action is occurring at that very time. Jesus’ betrayal was not 9:32. “But they did not understand the saying.” Jesus taught about his suffering, death, and resurrection many times. However, in spite of Jesus’ clearly stating he would suffer, die, and be raised from the dead, the disciples never understood what he meant. This gives us some very important insight into the how the Jews at the time of Jesus viewed their Messiah. Just as they never expected a virgin birth (note Mary’s reaction to the angel’s message--Luke 1:34), they never expected their Messiah to suffer and die. This verse and others, such as Luke 18:34, make that plain. Even after his death and resurrection, upon seeing the empty tomb, they did not understand what had happened (John 20:9). It took Jesus personally appearing to a number of people for the disciples to believe he had been raised from the dead. Jesus first appeared to Mary Magdalene (John 20:16), then to the women who came to the tomb (Matt. 28:9), then to Peter (this appearing is not recorded in Scripture; we are only told that it happened; Luke 24:34; 1 Cor. 15:5); then to the two men on the road to Emmaus (Luke 24:31), then to the disciples as a group (Luke 24:36ff). Even with all that evidence, Thomas, who was not with the disciples when Jesus appeared, still did not believe until he had personally seen the resurrected Lord (John 20:26-28). Ultimately, it took both understanding the Scriptures and seeing the resurrected Christ to fully confirm their belief in the resurrected Christ (Luke 24:45; and see commentary on Matthew 16:21).

9:34. “greatest.” This is not “greatest” in the sense of who had done the most miracles, or had the greatest trust (“faith”). Jesus telling them that the one who is greatest must be the servant of all (v. 35), shows us that “greatest” refers to the person with the most authority. In the patron-client society of the biblical culture and Greco-Roman world, the “greatest” person was the one who had the most authority and ruled the others (cp. 10:42). Jesus was trying to instill in his followers that we must have a servant’s heart, and the greatest one of all must be the most willing to serve.

9:40. “For whoever is not against us is for us.” This is said in the opposite way (and perhaps more clearly) in Matthew 12:30: “Whoever is not with me is against me, and whoever does not gather with me, scatters.” Although they are worded differently, both have the same message and neither statement allows for a neutral ground. There is no neutrality in the spiritual battle: we are either for or against God. Both ways of saying that people were either for you or against you were attested in the ancient world, and Jesus’ disciples were no doubt familiar with the concepts. The world in ancient times was very tough and there were many situations in which neutrality was not acceptable and people had to choose which side they were on. When the Roman philosopher Cicero (106-43 BC) defended the people of Pompeii to Caesar, he quoted Caesar’s own words back to him, saying to Caesar, “Let that maxim of yours, which won you your victory, hold good. For we have often heard you say that, while we considered all who were not with us as our enemies, you considered all who were not against you as your friends” (quoted in The New International Commentary on the New Testament: Mark by W. Lane)

We are all either “for” or “against” God and Jesus. If we are not “against” him then we are for him. If we not “with” him then we are against him. Someone might say, “Well, I am not against him, but I am not ‘for’ him either.” That statement only shows an ignorance of the spiritual battle and the reality behind the spiritual battle. God created the world, and us, and He demands our allegiance. Someone who is unwilling to recognize God to the point of getting saved is an enemy of God and will end up in Gehenna. Someone who recognizes God to the point of getting saved is part of the Kingdom of God. There is no place where “neutral people” go on the Day of Judgment. The sheep go into the Kingdom, the goats into the Lake of Fire. Being unwilling to commit to being “for” or “against” God is actually part of the Devil’s plot to steal, kill, and destroy (John 10:10). Especially to our modern ears, not being for or against something sounds so reasonable and good-natured that it is easy to think that God must be some kind of Ogre for demanding that we believe in Him. But in the End we will not be able to sweep under the rug the fact that He is our creator, and He created us for a purpose; a purpose that is intertwined with His own purposes, and if we do not want to support Him, then we are in fact against Him.

There is a story about a man who was sitting on a fence, with the Devil on one side and God on the other. God and the Devil were both trying to get the man to come down off the fence to their side. The arguments and pleas went on hour after hour, but the man would not make a decision or come down from the fence. At the end of the day God went home to heaven and the Devil said to the man, “OK, come down and come with me.” The man said, “But I am still on the fence; I have not made a decision yet.” The Devil replied, “Come down. You obviously don’t understand. I own the fence.” How true. If you are not “for” God, you are against Him.

9:42. “lake.” From the context, he was teaching in Capernaum, right beside the Sea of Galilee, which is actually a lake.

9:43. “Gehenna.” See commentary on Matthew 5:22. [For information on annihilation in the lake of fire, see Appendix 5: “Annihilation in the Lake of Fire”.

9:46. This entire verse (and v. 44) was an addition to the text, and so is omitted in the REV, just as it is omitted in many other modern versions as well. Metzger (Textual Commentary) simply makes the comment that these verses are “lacking in important early witnesses” [i.e. manuscripts] and “were added by copyists from v. 48.” In other words, the evidence that this verse, as well as verse 46, were added by copyists is so strong that it is not even debated by scholars. See commentary on 9:48.

9:47. “Gehenna.” See commentary on Matthew 5:22. [For information on annihilation in the lake of fire, see Appendix 5: “Annihilation in the Lake of Fire”.

9:48. “Where their worm does not die, and the fire is not quenched.” This verse is quoted from Isaiah 66:24, and it has been used to prove that people “burn in hell forever,” but that is not what it is teaching. Both in Isaiah and here in Mark it is teaching that unsaved people are totally destroyed. Jesus specifically uses the word Gehenna, which is where people will be destroyed (Mark 9:47), while Isaiah does not mention the place, but simply says people will “go out” (of the city) and see the dead bodies. We know from the book of Revelation that the destruction of the wicked will occur in the Lake of Fire (see Rev. 20:14 and 15).

Gehenna was the garbage dump of Jerusalem. [For more information on Gehenna, see commentary on Matthew 5:22]. All kinds of garbage, and even dead animals, were thrown into Gehenna and destroyed. The fires in the valley burned up everything that could be burned, and the maggots and worms ate up the vegetable and animal waste. Everyone in Christ’s audience knew this. No one thought that the wood, rags, or other burnables that had been thrown into Gehenna burned forever in the valley, or that animal and vegetable garbage lasted forever, eternally being consumed by worms. Christ’s point in comparing the Valley of Gehenna to the future Lake of Fire was graphic and clear: if a person was thrown into Gehenna on the Day of Judgment, he would never be restored, he would be totally consumed; he would be annihilated.

One thing that helps us understand Jesus’ teaching is knowing that Isaiah 66:24 is not speaking of living people suffering, but dead bodies in the process of being destroyed. This is clear from paying attention to the context and vocabulary of the verse. Isaiah 66:24 says, “And they will go out and look upon the dead bodies of those who rebelled against me; their worm will not die, nor will their fire be quenched, and they will be loathsome to all mankind.” From this we can see that this verse is not talking about living people being tortured. It is talking about dead people being totally destroyed.

In reading Isaiah chapter 66, we can see that the closing verses are about God’s judgment on the wicked, and how He will destroy them with fire and sword (Isa. 66:16). This is a general picture of God’s judgment, and could refer to either to the Battle of Armageddon just before the Millennial Kingdom (Rev. 19:19-21) or to the Final War at the end of the Millennial Kingdom (Rev. 20:7-10), or even to both. At some point after the battles, the unrighteous people go to the place where God has thrown the bodies of the unsaved, and they are all dead, they are not suffering. Isaiah said the righteous will look upon the “dead bodies,” and the Hebrew word peger (#06297 פֶּגֶר) is always used of dead bodies, never living ones. Those dead bodies were being consumed by worms and fire, and eventually would be completely gone. So we see that Isaiah is not portraying the suffering of the wicked, but their final fate: destruction.

When Jesus quoted Isaiah 66:24 in his teaching, he quoted it to reinforce his point, which was the same point that Isaiah was making: that there is no restitution for the wicked, only complete annihilation. Jesus was not modifying or correcting what Isaiah wrote. Rather, Jesus was teaching about Gehenna, and quoted Isaiah to help emphasize the point he was making about the destruction of the wicked. In another teaching, Jesus made it clear that God would destroy both “body and soul” in Gehenna (Matt. 10:28).

The phrase, “their worm does not die,” does not mean the worms never die. “Immortal worms” would not have made sense to anyone in biblical times. Neither Isaiah nor Jesus was teaching or explaining a new doctrine that worms somehow lived forever. This is not picturing everlasting torment, but rather that the worms and fire will not stop until everything in Gehenna has been annihilated. People who vermapost (that is, compost by using worms), are very familiar with the fact that as long as they keep adding garbage to the worm-bins, the worms there do not die off, but multiply. Individual worms die, but collectively the worms eat and multiply until all their food is gone, at which point they starve and die. Of course there cannot be literal worms, as we know worms, in Gehenna, because they could not survive, so they may just be a metaphor for total destruction, but it is possible that God would miraculously keep worms alive to be part of the destruction of the wicked. Most orthodox teachers do not believe the worms are literal, but believe they are a figure to portray horrible suffering. However, as we saw, the people were “dead bodies,” they were not alive.

Similarly, the phrase “is not quenched,” does not mean the fire burns forever, it means it is never purposely put out. Firemen today are very familiar with house fires that “cannot be quenched,” and do not go out until the house is consumed to ash. We disagree with Lenski and other commentators who insist that these words portray everlasting torment. For example, Lenski writes, “A fire that is ‘unquenchable’ is by that very fact eternal.” We disagree. The text simply states the fire is “not quenched.” No one puts the fire out, but that does not mean the fire does not go out when the fuel is gone. “Not quenched” does not mean “eternal.” The phrase “not quenched” would only refer to a fire that burned forever if the other biblical evidence showed that the fuel for the fire lasted forever, but in fact the other biblical evidence supports the eventual destruction of the wicked.

When people are thrown into Gehenna after they are judged on the Day of Judgment, the fire there will not be able to be put out, and the worms there will not die until there is nothing left to consume and all the sinners have been annihilated [For more on annihilation, see Appendix 5, “Annihilation in the Lake of Fire”].

The Bible does not describe people’s suffering in the Lake of Fire, it simply notes that there will be some suffering there. Nevertheless, as the teaching about “eternal hell” continued to be developed and embellished throughout Church history, there was a tremendous fascination and emphasis on “hell.” This is well represented in Christian art through the centuries, and in literature such as the epic poem, Divine Comedy by Dante Alighieri (the first part of which is titled “Inferno,” which is Italian for “Hell”). It is worth noting that there was such a fascination with hell that somehow the phrase about the worm not dying and the fire not being quenched was added two more times in some manuscripts of Mark. Thus, both Mark 9:44 and 9:46 were added to some manuscripts, but those two times are not in the original text and are not in most modern Bibles.

10:1. “from there.” From Capernaum (9:33).
10:7. Quoted from Genesis 2:24, occurs also in Matthew 19:5.

“be glued to.” The Greek is proskollaō (#4347 προσκολλάω), and it literally means to glue to or to glue upon. Thus it was used to join oneself to someone, or to cleave or stick to that person. We still use the idiom of glue today to express extreme attachment, and say things such as “He stuck to his coach like glue,” or “He is glued to the TV set.” In this verse the meaning of “glue” becomes very important. When a man and woman marry, they become “one flesh.” That is a spiritual reality and has important physical implications as well, so it is important to bring the meaning of the Greek text fully into the English.

10:19. Quoted from Exodus 20:12-16.

10:23. “will be.” The future tense “will be” is supplied from the verb “to enter” which is a future tense. A more literal rendering of the verb, and one that would maintain the future tense of “to enter,” would be to say, “How difficult it will be to enter the Kingdom of God for those who have wealth!” But this is more difficult in English.

10:27. “With people...with God...with God.” The key to understanding this passage, and the parallel passage in Matthew 19:26, is the word “with,” which is the Greek preposition para (#3844 παρά). In this case, the preposition para is modifying “people” and “God,” which are both in the dative case (and all three uses in Matt. 19:26 are in the dative case). When para is with the dative case in reference to people, it means “beside” or “with.” The point that Jesus is making is that when it comes to getting saved, human effort alone will never get anyone saved. There is no amount of human effort, even if others are “with” you and helping, that will get a person saved and into the Kingdom of God. Robertson writes: “The impossible by the side of men becomes possible by the side of God” (Word Pictures in the New Testament). Vincent writes: “Man cannot save himself or his fellow” (Word Studies; Matt. 19:26).

   If a person wants to be saved, if he teams up with God, his salvation becomes not only possible, but assured, because, along with God, all things are possible. Peter responds to Jesus’ statement by pointing out that he and the others have certainly teamed up with God, saying, “We have left everything and followed you.”

   This verse shows that salvation is indeed a team effort between God and the sinner. It is not, like some theologians teach, that God saves who He wants and rejects who He wants, or that salvation is totally accomplished by God apart from human will. In that light, the preposition para should not be translated “for,” because that significantly changes the meaning of the verse. When salvation is “with” God, it is a team effort. The sinner is working “with” God, and salvation can be accomplished. If we change the “with” to “for,” then the meaning of the verse totally changes: “For people it is impossible, but not for God, for all things are possible for God.” Now the verse says nothing about teamwork, but just makes the point that people cannot be saved by their own efforts, but God can save anyone. However, that is not what the verse is saying, or the Greek text means. We know that God wants all people to be saved (1 Tim. 2:4), and if He could save people without them wanting or asking for salvation, then everyone would be. The reason God wants everyone to be saved but not everyone will be, is that salvation is a team effort—the person must want it and ask for it before God can save the person, and not everyone wants to be saved.

10:28. “See.” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἴδον), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

10:32. “amazed...afraid.” The amazement and even fear that the disciples were experiencing is natural. For some time now the Jews in Jerusalem had been trying to arrest and kill Jesus. At the Feast of Dedication (in our December), the Jews were trying to arrest him (John 10:39). Then, when Jesus went back to the Jerusalem area to raise Lazarus from the dead, the Jews made plans to kill him (John 11:12). After that, Jesus made one last itinerary.

10:33. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

10:34. “will be raised.” The Greek verb is anistēmi (#450 ἀνίστημι; pronounce an-hiss’-tay-me). Here the verb acts like a passive (see BDAG Greek-English lexicon) and it means to be raised from the dead. Like many verses say, God raised Jesus from the dead. The translation “rise again” is confusing, because Jesus was never raised before.

10:45. “life.” See commentary on Matthew 20:28, which is a similar verse.

“ransom.” The Greek word is lutron (#3083 λύτρον; pronounced loo’-tron). In the Greek literature, the lutron, “ransom” was the price paid for the release of a slave or prisoner of war. There has been huge debates in Christendom about to whom the ransom is paid. Before summarizing some basics, it is important that we realize that the Bible never says to whom the “ransom” is paid. This should speak volumes to us. God certainly could have told us. The word ransom is specifically used in Matthew 20:28 and Mark 10:45, and the closely related word antilutron, also translated “ransom,” is used in 1 Timothy 2:6. The New Testament tells us that we, by our sin, earned “death.” “The wages of sin are death” (Rom. 6:23). Then to magnify the work of Christ, we are told that Christ paid the price that we owed and died in our behalf (cp. Rom. 5:6, 8; Heb. 2:9). The sinner is “ransomed,” “redeemed,” “bought with a price” “declared righteous,” etc.

God could have told us “to whom” the ransom or price of redemption was paid. He did not clearly say it. This should tell us that we should not put our emphasis there. We can talk about it, surely, but the obvious emphasis in the Word is that redemption is done. It is accomplished. To go beyond “It is finished” is to drift from the realm of certainty into, to some degree anyway, into the realm of speculation. That can be seen at once simply by studying the “theories of atonement.” Dozens of books have been written on the subject specifically because there are unclear issues involved. What is clear is that we are ransomed, we are redeemed, the price has been paid on our behalf, and when we have trust (“faith”) in Christ we are saved and promised everlasting life.

That having been said, it may help to briefly cover a few points. One is that many unbelievers reject the theory of atonement altogether and say that it in and of itself disproves Christianity. They say that no matter to whom the ransom is paid, how can one man righteously die for another? We answer that by saying that unbelievers did not create the universe nor the rules by which God governs it or the people who live in it. It is clear from the sacrifices in the Old Testament that God righteously accepts substitutionary sacrifice, and if He does, He does.

The Church Father Origen said that the ransom paid by the death of Jesus was paid to Satan, and many people still believe that. However, it seems clear that both righteousness (holiness), and the penalty for acting and becoming unholy and unrighteous was established by God. Satan has power today only by virtue of the fact that he is a liar and murderer. He lied his way into getting his power, and will end up destroyed in the Lake of Fire (Rev. 20:10). Satan was not owed any ransom just because he tricked mankind into sin; mankind did not break any of his laws; and Satan cannot, in fact, would not, accept the blood of Christ as a ransom. He cannot because he does not have the power to release mankind from the penalty of sin, he did not give the laws or set the penalty in the first place. Furthermore, if a person is jailed in lieu or payment of a fine, would he pay it to the jailer? No, he would pay it to the court, the system that put the law in place. Lastly, Satan would not accept the ransom of Christ because it is against his purposes: he does not desire mankind to be saved; he desires the destruction of all mankind.

That having been said, there are two more theories of atonement that should be mentioned. The first is that the ransom or redemption price is paid to God. That theory in and of itself has so many variations that books have been written on that alone. The basics of the theory that the payment is made to God as expounded by Anselm, Bishop of Canterbury (1033-1109) is that because God is righteous He must respond with anger and punishment when His laws are broken, thus the payment of breaking those laws is made to Him. Adding to the logic of this theory is that under the Law of Moses, the sacrifices for sin were offered to Yahweh (cp. Exod. 12:48; Lev. 4:3, 4, 14, 15, 24; 5:6, 7, 15; 22:24; 23:12; etc.), and the Passover, and sacrifices, were shadows of Christ. In contrast, sacrifices to the Devil or demons was strictly forbidden. It foreshadowed nothing (cp. Deut. 32:17; 1 Cor. 10:20). It is this theory of atonement that has dominated the orthodox Church for some 1000 years.

Another theory of atonement is that the payment was not actually made to anyone. God set up the laws, and His justice required death for sin. When Christ died, that fulfilled the law, it did not actually “pay” anyone. In that sense, the word “ransom” is understood figuratively, as if “Justice” was personified. We can best understand this in terms of someone paying for his crime by being imprisoned. If a person is in prison for a year and “pays his debt to society,” who gets paid? Not society, they do not receive a dime. Not the jailor (Satan), not the Judge (God). The debt is “paid” in a figurative sense simply by fulfilling the law. The strongest evidence for this argument is that of all the scriptures that refer to the death of Christ, atonement, ransom, redemption, substitution, being “bought with a price,” etc., not once is anyone said to be paid. Not God, and certainly not the Devil. The simple biblical truth would be that Jesus paid the legal price required by mankind’s sin, which was death, and thus fulfilled the legal requirement that the wages of sin is death.

10:50. “tossing aside his garment.” This is an indication of how badly Bartimaeus wanted to be healed. The heavy outer cloak was essential to stay warm and protected from the weather. It was so important to a poor person that if he needed to borrow money and gave his cloak as collateral, even if he could not repay the debt, the cloak had to be returned to him by nightfall, so he could use it (Deut. 24:13). But the cloak was heavy and long, and if someone wanted to move quickly it could get in the way. Bartimaeus did not want anything to get in the way of his healing, and he did not want to be so slow that Jesus moved on before he could be healed. So he risked losing his valuable cloak so he could get his healing, which was of much greater value to him.

11:2. “in front of.” Jesus was traveling from Jericho on what is known as “the Jericho Road,” the road from Jericho to Jerusalem. It is only about a 15 mile journey, and thus a person can walk it in one long day, however, it is a steep climb. Jericho is more than 800 feet below sea level, and the Mount of Olives, which Jesus had to climb and from which he would get the view of Jerusalem (Luke 20:41) is over 2,500 feet high, making the ascent well over 3,000 feet. Jesus would reach Bethphage and Bethany before he reached the summit of the Mount of Olives.

“colt.” This “colt” is not a young horse, but a young donkey (Matt. 21:2-5).

“Hosanna.” The people who were shouting praises to Jesus as he entered Jerusalem were for the most part not the same group as the group that shouted, “Crucify him” only a few days later. See commentary on Luke 23:21 and 27.

11:13. “indeed, it was not the season for figs.” The question this verse poses to the average reader is, “Why would Jesus curse the fig tree for not having figs if it was not the season for figs?” The answer to that question lies in understanding that, although there were a couple varieties of fig tree in Israel, the common variety produces two crops of figs per year. An early fig grows on the old branch stock that grew the preceding year. This early fig often begins to grow even before there are leaves on the fig tree, although sometimes these early figs and the leaves start to grow at the same time. These early figs usually start developing in March, but may be a little earlier or later depending on the climate, and the circumstances of any given tree (Israel has many different climates, usually somewhat depending on elevation). These early figs mature in June, and the leaves grow and mature along with them. A second crop of figs starts on the new tree growth that sprouts that year, and they generally ripen in August.

Since Mark is recording events around Passover, Jesus would have approached the fig tree in April. Although it was not yet the season for figs, Jesus noticed that this particular tree was in full leaf. If the leaves were fully formed, that meant he could expect the figs of this particular tree to be early too, or at least be far enough along to be somewhat satisfying to eat. This should not surprise us. It often happens in horticulture that a plant is a few weeks earlier than the “regular season.” However, when Jesus got to the tree, the situation was not just that the figs it had were not yet ripe, it did not have any figs at all!

This fig tree was a fitting parable of Israel. It was in full leaf and looked very promising, even ahead of the rest of the trees. It should have been a source of great blessing for those who looked for early sustenance coming out of the winter months. Instead it was a liar, promising much but delivering little, deceiving weary travelers and giving them false hope. Jesus cursed it, foreshadowing the curse and destruction that would come upon Israel.

“indeed.” The Greek is gar (#1063 γάρ), and is usually translated “for” or occasionally “because,” and it usually gives the reason for something. However, that use of gar does not fit this verse. Jesus did not find only leaves on the fig tree “because” it was not the season for figs. This phrase is letting us know that, indeed, it was not the general season for figs. But if that was the case, why would Jesus expect figs in the first place? The answer is that this particular tree had leaves, so Jesus could expect to find them on this tree. This use of the gar is what some scholars refer to as the “confirmatory
“will ever eat.” The Greek word translated “eat” is phagō (#5315 φάγω (φάγομαι)), in the optative mood, but as Lenski points out in his commentary, here the optative is equivalent to the imperative mood, a command. Jesus is not saying, “May no one eat,” as if he was making a request, but rather, “No one will eat!” He is commanding something to happen. He is cursing the fig tree [For “curse,” see 11:21 and see commentary on Luke 6:28]. A. Nyland (The Source New Testament) gets the sense correctly: “No one will ever eat fruit from you again!”

“came into Jerusalem.” The exact meaning of “came into” (erchomai eis) must be determined from the context because it is used for “come to,” “come into,” “arrive at,” etc. In this case, Jerusalem was a walled city, so they literally “came into” it. They did not just “come to” it. Although the eastern wall of the Temple was part of the outer wall of Jerusalem, the main entrances to the Temple were from inside Jerusalem, especially from the south (which had both a double and triple entry gate) and from the west.

Quoted from Isaiah 56:7 and Jeremiah 7:11.

“faith.” To properly understand faith in this verse, see the commentary on 1 Corinthians 12:9, “faith.”

“snatched up.” The Greek is airō (#142 αἴρω; pronounced eye-rō), and it is passive voice, imperative mood. Although it would be very literal to say, “Be taken up,” the imperative mood combined with the context, moving a mountain at your command, gives the sense that the mountain is being snatched up out of its place and thrown into the ocean (cp. The Source New Testament, which also uses “snatched”).

“sea.” In this context, Jesus is teaching in Jerusalem, and the Mediterranean Sea and Dead Sea were the closest and best known bodies of water.

“does not doubt.” The Greek is diakrinō (#1252 διακρίνω). In the middle voice, as it is here, it refers to being undecided within oneself. It is the indecision that causes one to hesitate or waver. Nyland (The Source New Testament) makes the case that “doubt” is not a good translation here, saying apisteō or aporeō would be “doubt,” and “undecided” would be better. While it is true that we often use “doubt” in the sense of a specific and steady state of mind, such as when we “doubt” that what someone says is true only because we cannot “prove” them to be lying, it is also true that we use “doubt” of the times we doubt ourselves and waver between doubt and trust. Also, “undecided” might seem to say we are undecided about obeying God, which is not what the verse is saying. This verse makes a strong point about the manifestation of faith (which is the full context here. It takes revelation from God, and then the manifestation of faith to move a mountain). When God gives us revelation that something can be done at our command, of course it will not happen if we doubt we can do it. But even if we are “undecided” and waver between faith (trust) and unbelief, we will not be able to carry out the will of God. Like Abraham, we must be strong in our faith, our trust in God.

“believe that you have received them, and you will have them.” This verse contains great truth, and great potential to be misunderstood and wrongly applied. Certain faith teachers have taken it to mean that through faith we instantly receive what we ask for, even though it may clearly seem to not be the case, we must nevertheless believe that we have already received what has been asked for. Often, this can lead to unhealthy situations where Christians must pretend that circumstances are not as they are, or feel that they are not having “faith.”

This comes from a misguided understanding of the verse. The second half of the verse should settle any thought as to whether the requests have been received—it assumes they have not. This is why it says, “and you will (future tense) have them.” An understanding of the Greek behind this phrase will further clear things up. To properly understand this verse we must understand the tense of the verb translated “you have received.” It is not the present tense, as the KJV can give the impression with their rendering, “believe that ye receive them.” Rather, the verb is in the aorist (past) tense. So understood literally, the verse would not be asking us to believe we have presently received anything, but to believe that we have already in the past received what we are presently praying for; then, perplexingly, it ends with the promise that if we so believe, we will in the future receive what we believe has already been received before we even asked for it.

How are we to understand this? Why would God put the verb is the aorist tense? The reason is this verse contains as idiom known as the proleptic aorist (under the category of the idiom of the prophetic perfect, see commentary on Eph. 2:6). The proleptic aorist is a form of the figure of speech heterosis, where one tense is used instead of another for emphasis. In this case the aorist tense is used for the future tense, speaking as though a yet future event had already come to pass. Wallace explains the proleptic aorist as follows: “An author sometimes uses the aorist for the future to stress the certainty of the event. It involves a ‘rhetorical transfer’ of a future event as though it were past” (Greek Grammar Beyond the Basics, p. 564). Here in Mark 11:24 the event of receiving what is prayed for is yet future, but it is put in the past tense (“have received”) to emphasize it certainty.

When we understand that this phrase is the idiom of the proleptic aorist, we see that God is not asking us to believe we have already in the past received something we do not really yet have, nor is he asking us to believe we have presently received something we have not yet received; rather, he is asking us to believe we will receive our requests in the future. This saves us from the harm of turning biblical belief into make-believe.

11:25. “stand praying.” The indicative mood of the Greek verb “stand” (stēkō #4739 στήκω) indicates that Jesus is thinking of this as something the disciples do; it is not just a hypothetical. Standing up to pray was an ancient practice, and reflected the belief that our Creator deserved the honor of standing before Him when making supplications and requests.

11:26. We omit this verse as do most modern versions as being an addition to the text in order to harmonize Matthew and Mark. Metzger, Textual Commentary: “Although it might be thought that the sentence was accidentally omitted because of homoeoteleuton, its absence from early witnesses that represent all text-types makes it highly probable that the words were inserted by copyists in imitation of Mt 6.15.”

11:27. “came again into Jerusalem.” Jerusalem was a walled city, so they literally “came into” it. They did not just “come to” it. See commentary on Mark 11:15.

Chapter 12
12:1. “And he began to speak to them in parables.” This parable is a clear reference to the parable of the vineyard in Isaiah 5:1-7, except in Isaiah the vineyard is itself Israel, and is wicked, while in Jesus’ parable the vineyard is God’s and it is the people who are hired to tend it who are evil. Jesus was using thinly veiled language to speak of the leaders of the Jews, who had been entrusted by God to take care of His vineyard, i.e., His people, but were evil. The Jews got his point (v. 12), and wanted to arrest him but were afraid of the people. This shows the boldness and honesty of Jesus. He did not just ignore the evil of the Jews, but informed them and any disciple that was paying attention. This parable appears in Matthew 21:33-46; Mark 12:1-12, and Luke 20:9-19.

12:2. “of the fruits.” This is an example of a partitive genitive. We would say, “Some of the fruit.”

12:10, 11. Quoted from Psalm 118:22, 23.

12:14. “poll-tax.” The Greek word is κῆνσος (κῆνσος; pronounced kane'-sos). In the New Testament it referred to the tax or tribute levied on individuals, and it was to be paid yearly. It is not an income tax, a property tax, or a toll. Since it is a tax on every adult we would call it a poll-tax or capitation tax. The Jews especially hated this tax, because it was seen as a specific sign of servitude to Rome, and therefore the Rabbis had many disputes among themselves and with others about paying it. This was a well thought through trap. It is recorded in three of the four Gospels: Matthew 22:15-22; Mark 12:13-17; and Luke 20:20-26. This event occurred in the last week of Jesus life, and especially in those latter days of Jesus life the authorities were actively seeking a way to discredit and arrest him, and the subject of taxes could provide a way for them to trap him.

Paying taxes was always a “hot topic,” and most people hated to pay them. To heighten the tension of the situation (and thus the chance of Jesus making a misstatement and being trapped) the Pharisees, who took issue with Rome on many issues, brought with them the Herodians, who were Jews who supported Rome and supported paying taxes to Rome (cp. Matt. 22:16; Mark 12:13). There was a natural animosity between these two groups, but it also seemed natural that they would ask Jesus, a teacher from Galilee with no party affiliation, about taxes, something that no doubt the Pharisees and Herodians argued about regularly. Thus, although the Jews were trying to trap Jesus by asking him the question, people in the crowd would not have thought it out of character for them to ask Jesus about paying the poll-tax.

They began the trap by flattering Jesus and telling him how they knew he only cared about teaching the true way of God (Mark 12:14; Luke 20:21). This was more than just flattery. It was designed to make sure that Jesus would not simply dodge the issue and refuse to answer the question. If he did not care about what people thought, and taught the way of God, he would answer clearly and directly—something basically guaranteed to get him in trouble either way he answered. If he answered it was lawful to pay, the people would have doubted his being a teacher from God. If he answered it was not lawful to pay, he would have been in trouble with the Roman authorities.

The Pharisees then asked Jesus if it was “lawful” to pay taxes to Caesar. The main idea behind the word “lawful” seems to be if paying the tax, and thus acknowledging Rome’s authority over people individually, broached God role as the sole true authority over the people. Jesus’ answer was godly and wise: the money belonged to Caesar, so give back to Caesar what was his. This answer, of course, amounts to paying the tax, but with a different emphasis. It is not that in paying the tax Jesus recognized the authority of Caesar over him, it was simply that the money was not his to begin with. It belonged to Caesar. Jesus demonstrated over and over in his ministry that if people would trust God, then God would take care of them. It was okay with God if people used money borrowed from Caesar to help make life easier, but God also could take care of people without borrowed money, something He did regularly, for example in multiplying food for hungry people.

There is quite a bit on paying taxes in the Bible, and Jesus addressed it on a couple different occasions. For example, besides this poll tax, he spoke of the half-shekel temple tax in Matthew 17:25-27. Never did Jesus support not paying taxes for the reason most people do not like to pay taxes—that the government wastes the money or spends it unwisely. The fact is that in biblical times the government was not answerable to the people. There were no elections, and certainly no promises of being “fair,” being “transparent” with the tax money, or using it for the good of the people and the education of children. The ruler used it any way he wanted, and that was the way it had always been. In biblical times people had no recourse from unfair taxes, they paid them or suffered. They could be sent to jail or sometimes be sold into slavery. Today taxes are as hated as they have ever been, but in many countries, such as the USA or Great Brittan, the people have the right to vote for representatives who will recognize their right to keep that which they have worked for. Sadly, the number of people who want a free ride on the backs of others keeps growing, so it is harder and harder to get a majority to vote to allow a person to keep the money he works for. The standard communist idea, “from each according to his ability, to each according to his need,” is more and more the global standard, which means that those people who work hard and should have more just have more taken away from them by those in power.

In spite of that, God’s way is not lying and cheating on taxes, but realizing that mankind does not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceeds from the mouth of God; and storing up treasure in heaven by living a holy lifestyle. Certainly there have been times in history when people revolted against their government and overthrew it, but that is totally different from an individual simply not paying taxes because he thinks they are unfair. Christians need to realize that this world will never be fair, just, or right, and the joy of life is in fellowship with God and Christ, and with likeminded believers.

12:19. Quoted from Deuteronomy. 25:5.
12:24. “Is not this.” This is the figure of speech Erotesis (rhetorical question).
12:25. “out from among the dead.” See Romans 4:24. (Cp. Wuest)
12:28. “What.” The Pharisee asks this question in a respectful manner, and it was an honest question, and designed to “test” Jesus. Jesus had just silenced the Sadducees on the topic of resurrection, which delighted the Pharisees. The Sadducees and Pharisees also were sharply divided over which commandments were important and which were not. The Sadducees asserted that a commandment had to be in the Torah, the first 5 books of Moses, while the Pharisees had a much broader interpretation. This Pharisee wanted to see how Jesus would answer, and whether it would support a Pharisaical position or not. “first.” The Greek word translated “first” is prōtos (#4413 πρῶτος), and it can mean first in time, first in place, first in rank, honor or power. Here it means first in rank. We would normally say, “most important.” “What is the most important commandment in the Law?” The answer is important, because it turns out that the most important commandment was not even one of the Ten Commandments, although it is certainly implied because if we have no other gods before God, and if we obey the Ten Commandments, then we clearly love God. Nevertheless, the statement that we love God with all our heart, soul, mind, and strength, was an amplification and a clarification of the rest of the Law.

12:29. Quoted from Deuteronomy. 6:4.

“Hear, O Israel!” The verb “hear” means not only to hear, but to pay attention and heed. Thus, some versions have, “Listen.” The verb “hear” is in the imperative mood, hence the exclamation point at the end of the phrase.

“Hear, O Israel! The Lord our God is Lord alone!” This verse is a quotation of Deuteronomy 6:4, and is most often translated something like this: “Hear O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord,” or “Hear O Israel, the Lord our God, the Lord is one.” However, in this article we will see that these translations are not the best, and can lead to false conclusions.

The Hebrew words Shema Yisrael (שְׁמַע יִשְׂרָאֵל “Hear, [O] Israel!”) are the first two words of Deuteronomy 6:4, and are the title of a prayer that serves as a centerpiece of the morning and evening Jewish prayer services (the title “Shema Yisrael” is often shortened to simply “Shema”). Observant Jews consider the Shema to be the most important part of the prayer service in Judaism. Originally the “Shema” prayer was only Deuteronomy 6:4, but in more modern Judaism it has been expanded to include other sections of the Torah as well. (In this article, we will sometimes refer to Deuteronomy 6:4 as the Shema).

The first thing we should say about the statement, “Hear, O Israel! The Lord our God is Lord alone!” is that, according to Christ, it was a part of the greatest commandment in the Law. Usually when someone asks, “What are the two greatest commandments in the Law?” the answer is “Love God, and love your neighbor.” But Jesus did not answer that way. Jesus included the Shema in his answer, and by doing so made a very important point: before we say that “Love God” is the first and greatest commandment, we should know who “God” is. The Shema shows us that we do not get to choose who “our God” is, Yahweh alone is God.

Most people think that the great commandment is just “Love God,” partly because the record in Matthew 22:37, which is the same event, does not include the Shema statement. However, it is common that when two or more Gospels record an event that they include different details. In this case, Mark gives the full account, and Matthew leaves out the Shema, which is understandable because the account in Matthew is much shorter than the account in Mark.

The Shema is widely understood by Christians to be about the nature of God and a confirmation of the Trinity and the compound unity of God, i.e., that God is “one,” and therefore He is one God made up of three persons. However, that is not at all what the verse is saying, as we will see by examining both the Old Testament and New Testament texts on the subject.

One thing should be clear to everyone who studies Mark 12:29: no matter how the Greek text of Mark is worded, it is a translation of the Hebrew, because to answer the Pharisee’s question, Jesus Christ would have quoted the Hebrew text of the Old Testament. Jesus would not have spoken Greek to him. Although we will see as the study develops that the Greek in Mark (and the Septuagint), can mean what the Hebrew OT says, the Hebrew wording is very dense and has a number of secondary meanings built into it, and so the full meaning of the Hebrew is difficult to capture in Greek.

To fully understand the dialogue between the Pharisee and Jesus in Mark 12:28-34, it is helpful to know it is the same record as Matthew 22:34-39, although each Gospel has details that the other Gospel does not include. The Pharisee, who was also a “scribe,” that is, an expert in the Law, asked Jesus what was the greatest commandment in the Law. The conversation that followed gives us a context that helps us properly understand and translate the Shema.

The Old Testament text, like the New Testament, is often used to support the Trinity. But that is not what the verse is saying. For one thing, the Jews do not now, and never have, believed in a Trinity, and yet they have used Deuteronomy 6:4 as the rallying call of the nation of Israel since long before the time of Jesus. Deuteronomy 6:4 can be, and should be, translated close to the way it is translated in a number of modern versions: “Hear, O Israel! The LORD is our God, the LORD alone” (NAB, NLT, NRSV, and the Tanakh; the JPS Bible). The Geneva Bible of 1599, which was the Bible of the Pilgrims and many of our founding Fathers is a translation generally recognized by scholars as a better translation than the King James Version, has: “Hear O Israel, the Lord our God is Lord only.” The Moffatt Bible has: “the Eternal, the Eternal alone, is our God.”

Rotherham’s Emphasized Bible correctly uses God’s proper name, “Yahweh,” instead of “LORD,” and has: “Hear, O Israel: Yahweh is our God—Yahweh alone.” We believe that using “Yahweh” instead of “LORD” is the most proper way to render the verse, and Rotherham’s translation is about as close as you can get to an English translation that captures the primary meaning of the verse.

Deuteronomy 6:4 is saying that Israel [and believers today] have only one God—Yahweh. That is why the verse says that Yahweh is “our” God.” Other people may have other gods, but the people of God are to have Yahweh alone as their God. This Old Testament truth is confirmed by Christ in Mark 12:29, and reconfirmed by Paul, who wrote that, “to us there is one God, the Father” (1 Cor. 8:6).

Although it is commonly believed that Deuteronomy 6:4 is a statement of “monotheism” and thus the “compound unity” of God, that is not what the verse is saying. Of course it is a statement about monotheism, that there is one God, but that is not its primary emphasis, as we will see below. Furthermore, it is not a statement about the compound unity of God for a number of reasons. First, because the compound unity of God does not appear in Scripture. Second, the Old Testament was given by God to the Jews so they could know and obey Him, and never in the more than 3500 years since the Shema was written have the Jews understood it to refer to a compound unity in God—quite the opposite. They took it to mean that there was only one God, and fiercely fought against polytheism throughout their history. So if the Shema was God’s attempt to reveal a compound unity in God, the attempt was an epic failure. It makes much more sense that God gave the verse to the Jews and intended it to mean what the Jews say it means.

Furthermore, the Jews did not take the Shema as their primary statement of monotheism because many other verses made that point (we will cover that shortly). Third, the context of the Shema in both the Old and New Testaments, backed by the Scope of Scripture, shows that the Shema is not saying “God is ‘one,’” but rather is saying that Yahweh “alone” is our God.

The context shows us that Deuteronomy 6:4 is using the Hebrew word ‘echad (#259 הֵחָד; “one, only, an, alone”) in the primary sense of “only” or “alone,” in contrast to the number “one,” and the context in Mark 12 confirms this. Note how Deuteronomy 6:4 and 6:5 flow together and thus make a major—and logical—point: “Yahweh is our God, Yahweh alone! And you must love Yahweh your God with all your heart, all your soul, and all your strength.” It is because Yahweh “alone” is God that we can worship him with “all” our heart, “all” our soul, and “all” our might. If we had more than one God, our worship would have to be divided between all the gods we served, and each god would get only “part” of our heart, soul, and strength. In fact, that is what happens with Trinitarians today: they divide their worship of God into the worship of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. But that division of worship is what is expressly forbidden by Deuteronomy 6:4 and Mark 12:29.

When Jesus was asked about the first commandment, he quoted both Deuteronomy 6:4 and 5. Interestingly, in both Hebrew and Greek (the Septuagint and Mark 12), these can be one sentence, the second starting with “and,” (or even “and so”). It is traditional to separate the “first commandment” into two sentences, but grammatically it can be one sentence and thus easily seen to be one commandment.

What should be clear is that Deuteronomy 6:4 is a statement about our personal relationship to God. He “alone” is God, so He is to be “our” only God and we must worship Him with “all” that we are and have. Deuteronomy 6:4 is not primarily a statement about monotheism, it is a statement about relationship. Stated another way, Deuteronomy 6:4 is not about the nature of God, it is about our relationship with God. Monotheism is important, and God had established that there was only one God earlier in Deuteronomy. Only about 50 verses before the Shema, God had twice stated that He was the only God. Deuteronomy 4:35 says, “Yahweh is God, besides Him there is no other.” Four verses later Deuteronomy 4:39 establishes that truth and says, “Yahweh is God in heaven above and on earth below. There is no other.” After establishing that there is only one God in chapter 4, Deuteronomy 6:4 then takes that truth and makes it personal: Yahweh who alone is God is to be “our” God, and we are to worship Him with “all” our heart, soul, and strength. Furthermore, after Deuteronomy 4:35, 39, and 6:4 have established that there is only one God, and thus Yahweh alone is to be “our God,” 6:13 then says that we should fear and serve Him, and swear oaths in His name.

The scope of Scripture also shows us that the Shema is about our relationship with God and not the singular nature of God. For example, Zechariah 14:9 uses the word ‘echad and speaks of the future, saying that Yahweh will be king over the whole earth. The last part of the verse says in that day, “Yahweh will be one [‘echad], and his name one [‘echad].” Here we see the same use of ‘echad that we see in the Shema. When Zechariah says that in that day Yahweh will be “one,” it is not making a statement about God’s nature, as if somehow His nature would become “one” in the future but is not “one” now. Rather, it is using “one,” (‘echad) as “alone,” just as in Deuteronomy 6:4. Zechariah is saying that in the future Yahweh will be “alone” and His name “alone,” not in competition with the names of other gods. Unlike today when many “gods” distract us from God, in the future all the competing gods will be cast away and Yahweh “alone” will be everyone’s God. Isaiah says, “On that day people will throw their silver and gold idols, which they made to worship, to the moles and the bats” (Isa. 2:20 HCSB).
Zechariah says, “‘And on that day,’ says the LORD of Heaven’s Armies, ‘I will erase idol worship throughout the land, so that even the names of the idols will be forgotten’” (Zech. 13:2 NLT). Isaiah 2:11 and 17 say that Yahweh alone will be exalted in that Day.

Also, the very first of the Ten Commandments fits with the Shema, saying that Yahweh alone is to be our God. The First Commandment is: “I am Yahweh your God, who rescued you from the land of Egypt, the place of your slavery. You must not have any other god but me” (Exod. 20:2, 3; NLT with Yahweh in place of “the LORD”). So the first commandment says in effect the same thing that the Shema says: God alone is to be our God, and we are not to have any other god but Him.

Having seen that the Shema is a statement about our relationship with God and that He “alone” is to be our God, we can now turn our attention to the New Testament text and Jesus’ words in Mark 12:29. As has been stated earlier, there is no doubt that Jesus would have quoted the Shema as it appears in the Hebrew text. He would not have been quoting it in Greek, even though the Gospel of Mark is written in Greek. But when we study the Greek word translated “one” in Mark 12:29, heis (εἷς; pronounced “hace”), we find that just like the Hebrew word ‘echad, can mean “one” or “alone,” so can the Greek word heis. In fact, we see heis being used in the sense of “alone” several times in the New Testament. The BDAG Greek English Lexicon lists Mark 2:7; 10:18; 12:29; Matthew 23:10; and Luke 18:19 as clear examples of heis meaning “alone.”

As has been stated above, the Hebrew text is very compressed and hard to translate. A common translation of the Greek is, “The Lord our God is one Lord.” However, a translation that reflects more of the meaning of the verse is, “Hear, Israel, The Lord our God is the only Lord” (that same basic translation appears in: The Geneva Bible; The New English Bible; Sir Andrews Norton’s, A Translation of the Gospels; The New Testament by William Barclay; and The Source New Testament by A. Nyland).

Another good translation is in the New American Bible (NAB), which follows its translation of Deuteronomy and has, “Hear, O Israel! The Lord our God is Lord alone!” Still another good translation is God’s New Covenant by Heinz Cassirer. He has: “Listen, Israel, the Lord our God is the one and only Lord.” Cassirer’s translation should catch our attention because he was born and raised Jewish and taught philosophy at Glasgow University and Corpus Christi, Oxford, and converted to Christianity due to his reading the Greek New Testament. Thus he brings a unique blend of Jewish heritage and a thorough knowledge of both Hebrew and Greek to his translation. He clearly understands that the Shema is making the point that God is the “one and only” God.

How do we know that when Jesus quoted the Shema that he quoted it with the same meaning it had in the Old Testament; that God “alone” was God? We know it by reading the whole account in Mark. We must pay attention to all the elements of the conversation: the question the Pharisee asked, Jesus’ answer, the Pharisee’s commentary on Jesus’ answer, and Jesus’ statement about what the Pharisee said.

First, the Pharisee’s question: “What commandment is the first of all?” We learn from Matthew 22:34 that the question was initially asked to test Jesus. It was a question that the Jews had asked and hotly debated among themselves for centuries, and was a question all the Jews were interested in. It seems clear the Pharisee legitimately wanted to know where Jesus stood on the issue.
Jesus answered the question by quoting both Deuteronomy 6:4 and 5, which shows that Jesus understood that it was not enough to just “love God,” in some generic sense, we must love the “right God,” the true God, the only God, who is Yahweh. Jesus then added the second commandment: love your neighbor as yourself. The Pharisee had not asked for that information, but we can see why Jesus added it: the Pharisees were well known for holding themselves aloof from others, and even the name “Pharisee” means “Separated one,” someone separated from the rest of mankind, who are then relegated by default to a lesser status. Jesus was trying to reach this Pharisee’s heart, and teach him that if he loved God, it would show itself through his love for others.

The Pharisee responded to Jesus’ answer in a way that showed he had grasped what Jesus said and had himself come to a similar conclusion about the central point of the Old Testament Law. The Pharisee started by acknowledging that Jesus’ statement was “well said,” and then he connected the Shema with Deuteronomy 4:35, that Yahweh is God and there is no other God but him. The Pharisee did not have any conception of a “compound unity” in God, but rather spoke back to Jesus the simple message of the Old Testament contained in the Shema: Yahweh alone is God and there is no other God, and that is why we can and must love God with “all” our heart, soul, and might. Furthermore, as the Pharisee acknowledged, loving God and our neighbor was more important that all other religious ceremonies and practices.

Jesus immediately recognized the heart of this Pharisee, and said to him: “You are not far from the Kingdom of God.” If the Shema was teaching the “compound unity” of God, and if Jesus was trying to communicate that to the Pharisee, he would have immediately recognized by the Pharisee’s answer that he did not “get it.” At that point Jesus should have further engaged the Pharisee so he could have a chance to understand the compound unity of God and the doctrine of the Trinity. Why didn’t he? The simple answer is that Deuteronomy 4:35 and 6:4 teach a simple truth: there is one God, Yahweh, and He alone is to be our God. That is the simple point that is being made in both the Old and New Testaments.

Having said that the most pertinent truth in the Shema is that Yahweh alone is to be our God, there are nevertheless some other basic truths that the wording of the Shema shows us. Although the primary meaning is, “Yahweh is our God, Yahweh alone,” the wording of the Hebrew text and the word ‘echad also allows for: “Yahweh is our God, Yahweh is unique.” Although not the primary meaning, if we read the verse that way, it is saying that Yahweh, who is “our God,” is unique among the gods, thus superior and worthy of our worship. The usage of ‘echad as “unique” is found in Song of Solomon 6:9, where the king speaks of his 60 queens, 80 concubines, and “young women without number,” but tells his new beloved that she is “unique” (Do you think she believed him?).

Another secondary meaning that can be seen in the very compact wording of Deuteronomy 6:4 is that there is “one” Yahweh. It was common in the cultures of the Middle East that several gods would be known by the same name, or the same god would be assigned different characteristics and worshipped differently in different places. Examples of gods like this include: Astarte, Baal, Cybele, El (a Canaanite god), Isis, Leviathan, Lilith, and Tammuz. In contrast to gods who, in different places had different characteristics and were worshipped differently, Yahweh was only “one” God and was to be known as the same and worshipped the same everywhere.
In the spiritual battle, Satan is always trying to distort God: His nature, His character, His love, and His actions, and God works to prevent that. After the birth of Christ, Satan has worked to distort Jesus too. Thus less than 30 years after Jesus gave his life for mankind, 2 Corinthians 11:4 speaks of those people who preach “another Jesus,” and Galatians 1:6-9 shows that people were perverting the Gospel, saying, “If anyone is proclaiming to you a Good News that is contrary to the one you received, let him be accursed.”

In closing, it is helpful to speak a few more words about why the Shema cannot be referring to a “compound unity” in God. If the Shema was making the point that God was a compound unity, then neither verse 4 nor verse 5 would fit with what the Bible actually says. The Old Testament never reveals that “Yahweh” was a compound deity, made up of separate “Persons.” Trinitarian theologians acknowledge that the Old Testament does not reveal the Trinity—a major reason the Jews never believed in one. In the Old Testament, “Yahweh” and the Son are always represented as two separate entities. “Yahweh” is the equivalent of the “Father” (or “God”) in the New Testament. Just as the Father and Son occur together many times in the New Testament and are clearly presented as two (Cp., “The testimony of two men is true: I bear witness about myself, and the Father bears witness of me”—John 8:17, 18), so the Old Testament presents Yahweh and the “Son” (also referred to as the “Lord,” “Servant,” or “anointed”) as two, not “one God” (Cp., Ps. 2:2, 7; 110:1; Isa. 42:5ff; 49:4, 5; 53:6, 10, 11).

Furthermore, it is clear in the Old Testament texts, such as those that call the Messiah the servant of Yahweh, and in the New Testament texts as well (Cp., 1 Cor. 15:28) that the “Son” is subservient to Yahweh. Given that, for the Shema to say that “Yahweh” is “one,” in contrast to many, does not make sense. If the verse were referring to a compound deity, it would have had to say that “Elohim” is one.

Furthermore, if the Shema were saying that “Yahweh” were “one” in the sense of a compound unity, then verse 5 would be incomplete and confusing, rather than helpful. If God were a compound unity, then what the Israelites would need would be instruction as to how to treat each “Person,” i.e., how to worship and serve each “Person” in this compound deity. But instead of offering instruction as to how to worship each “Person,” verse 5 contradicts the idea of multiple “Persons” in God and says to worship “Yahweh” with “all” your heart, soul, and might, clearly treating Yahweh as the one God whom we worship.

Also, Jesus’ answer to the Pharisee, that he was not far from the kingdom of God, shows us that a person does not have to believe in the Trinity to be saved. We can see from the way the Pharisee spoke to Jesus that he did not believe in the Trinity, but Jesus made no attempt to instruct him and instead said he was not far from the Kingdom. If a person had to believe in the Trinity to be saved, Jesus would have taught the Pharisee about it, and would never had said he was close to the Kingdom.

12:30. Quoted from Deuteronomy. 6:5.

“Therefore.” The Greek text has the conjunction kai, which is most often translated “and,” but which can have a number of meanings, depending on the context. One of those meanings is that it introduces a result from a preceding circumstance, thus can mean “and then” or “and so,” or as we would say, “so,” or “therefore” (see BDAG Greek-English Lexicon and Friberg’s Greek-English Lexicon). Rotherham has correctly picked up on the sense of the kai in this case, and seen that it makes a logical connection between the first quotation from the Old Testament and the second one, and translated it as “therefore” in The Emphasized Bible, and the Geneva Bible of 1599 also uses “therefore.” So translating the kai as “therefore” more clearly brings out the sense of what Jesus was saying and shows why he prefaced his quotation of Deuteronomy 6:5 by quoting Deuteronomy 6:4.

The original Hebrew phrase taken from Deuteronomy 6:5 also starts with the common conjunction that is most often translated “and” but has a number of different meanings, including “so” and “therefore” (Brown-Driver-Briggs Hebrew-English Lexicon), and the NAB says “therefore.”

The point that we must understand is that the “greatest commandment” is one single command, not two independent statements. Yahweh alone is God so we are to love Him with “all” we are and have. If Yahweh was not “alone” as God, we would have to divide our love between our different gods.

“love.” The verb “love,” agapao, (#25 ἀγαπάω) is in the future tense, indicative mood, which here is being used idiomatically as a present imperative (see Robertson, Grammar, p. 330). The expert in the Law had asked Jesus what was the greatest commandment, and Jesus gave him (and us), a complete answer. Jesus made it clear that since there is only one God, therefore you must love Him with everything you have: all your heart, soul, mind, and strength.

In the Greco-Roman culture surrounding the Jews, the people had many gods, and the people had to divide their love and worship between them. For that matter, many of the Jews had superstitions and regulations that had all but replaced a genuine relationship with the true God. Jesus made it clear that there is only one true God, and “therefore” we must love Him with “all” we have.

Given the implied “therefore,” and the fact that “love” is idiomatically an imperative, it would be correct to translate verses 29 and 30: “Jesus answered, ‘The first is, Hear, O Israel! The Lord our God, the Lord is one. Therefore you must love Him with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind, and with all your strength.’”

“and…and…and.” The elements in the command are each connected with “and,” which is the figure of speech polysyndeton (“many ands,” see Bullinger, Figures of Speech Used in the Bible). The figure polysyndeton places an “and” between each item in the list, and by that literary device emphasizes each thing in the list. Thus, when Jesus says we must love God “with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind, and with all your strength,” he is specifically emphasizing each point in the list. In normal grammar only the last item on the list has the “and.”

In contrast to the figure polysyndeton, which emphasizes each item in the list, the figure of speech asyndeton (“no ands”) does not have the word “and” at all, even between the last two items in the list. This means that nothing in the list gets specific emphasis, but the readers are meant to see that while the things on the list are important enough to mention, it is the conclusion that God wants to get the emphasis, and He lets us know that by the figure asyndeton. So while the figure polysyndeton emphasizes each item in the list, the asyndeton emphasizes the conclusion (a good example of an asyndeton is the fruit of the spirit in Galatians. See commentary on Galatians 5:22).

There are many good examples of polysyndeton in the Bible, although sometimes the translators do not accurately bring it from the Hebrew or Greek into the English. A good example is Ephesians 1:21, which says that Jesus is seated at God’s right hand, “far above all rulership, and authority, and power, and lordship, and every name that is named.” In Luke 14:21 there is a polysyndeton in Jesus’ parable, which emphasizes each category of people. The head of the house says, “Go out quickly into the streets and lanes of the city, and bring in here the poor and maimed and blind and lame.” In the same chapter, in Luke 14:13 and 14, Jesus was teaching and used an asyndeton to good effect. He said, “But when you make a feast, call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind, and you will be blessed, because they do not have the means to repay you, for you will be repaid at the Resurrection of the Righteous.” The asyndeton deemphasizes the categories of people and puts the emphasis on the conclusion, “and you will be blessed.”

12:32-33. Quoted from Deuteronomy. 6:4, 5; Deuteronomy. 4:35; Leviticus 19:18.

“by the holy spirit.” David spoke as God directed him to via the gift of holy spirit that was upon David (see commentary on Matt. 22:43). Even though the Greek has both articles with holy spirit, τῷ πνευματι τῷ ἁγίῳ (τῷ πνευματι τῷ ἁγίῳ), it seems to be more of a reference to the gift of holy spirit than it is to the Giver, God. There are many other times the gift of holy spirit has both articles (cp. Luke 3:22; John 14:26; Acts 2:33; 5:32; 10:44, 47; 11:15; 15:8; 19:6; Eph. 1:13; 1 Thess. 4:8). [For more information on the uses of “Holy Spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.]

12:37. “liked to listen to him.” The Greek we translate as “like to” is ἠδεῶς (#2234 ἠδεῶς; pronounced hay-de-ōs) and it means with pleasure, with delight, gladly. Some versions catch the sense by saying that the crowds “enjoyed” listening to him. We should not take this to mean that the crowds took to heart what Jesus said and then changed. In Mark 6:20 the same phraseology is used when Herod Antipas used to call for John the Baptist, and “heard him gladly.” Jesus taught openly, but still only had some 120 disciples gathered on the Day of Pentecost. If anything, this shows how people can hear the Word of God taught, even from the Master himself, enjoy it, but not have it change their lives.

12:40. “harsher punishment.” We have taken the sense of krima (#2917 κρίμα)—along with the KJV, NET, NIV, and HCSB translations—to indicate both the judgment and execution of the sentence (Cp. Lenski). Hence, krima becomes “punishment” rather than “condemnation;” and the comparative adjective perissoteros (#4055 περισσότερος) becomes “harsher” rather than “greater.”

12:42. “Two leptons.” The Greek says “lepta” which is the plural of “lepton.” The lepton was a small, common, brass coin minted by the Jews. According to this verse, two leptons = one quadrans (the Roman quadrans was the smallest Roman coin and was worth ¼ of an asssaron, which was 1/64 of a denarius. A denarius was a day’s wage for a common laborer, so if a laborer makes eight dollars an hour for eight hours, or sixty-four dollars a day, a quadrans was worth one dollar. Since two leptons equaled a quadrans, one lepton was worth about a half dollar.

Coins are one area where it is hard to translate. We feel that “penny” is misleading. For one thing, at the rates we assigned here, a lepton is worth $.50. Similarly, while “mite” communicates a small amount, it is unclear, and the reader may think that the Bible is making the point that the woman cast a small amount into the treasury and not realize that it points out exactly how much she cast in. It was a small amount, but it was exactly described in the Biblical text as being two leptons, not just “a small amount.” This is a case where the best solution is likely to keep the coin in the text and make a text note as to the amount it is worth.

13:9. “courts.” A good translation of the generic use of “Sanhedrin,” which was not the “great Sanhedrin” that convened in Jerusalem made up of 70 members, but the concept of “lesser Sanhedrin” that were the Jewish courts that met wherever Jews would be tried by other Jews.
13:11. “but the Holy Spirit.” “The Holy Spirit” is the name for God that emphasizes His power in operation. God is called “the Holy Spirit” in a number of verses in the NT, including Matthew 1:20; 12:32; and Hebrews 9:8. [For more information on the uses of “Holy Spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.]
   “standing where he should not be.” The translations differ as to whether the text should read, where “he” should not be, or where “it” should not be. Some translations support “he” (ASV; ESV; NAB; NLT), while others support “it” (CJB; HCSB; NASB; NET; RSV). The grammar can be argued either way, as anyone who reads a few commentaries on the verse will discover (cp. Lenski; The Interpretation of St. Mark’s Gospel, vs. Lane; The New International Commentary). Blass and DeBunner (A Greek Grammar of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, ¶ 134) point out that a masculine participle referring to a neuter noun can designate a person.
   Since the grammar can legitimately be “he” or “it,” the meaning of the verse must be interpreted from the scope of Scripture. The “abomination of desolation,” which is referring to an abomination that causes desolation, is not a statue, but a person. Furthermore, not a historical person such as Antiochus Epiphanes (although he may have been type for the Antichrist), but a person who will be manifested in the last days, whom we know as the Antichrist or Man of Lawlessness (2 Thess. 2:3ff), who goes into the Temple of God to show that he is a god.
13:27. “gather his elect.” This is the first resurrection, and includes both the elect on earth (cp. Matt. 25:32) and the dead who are righteous and who will live with Christ in the Millennial Kingdom (cp. Ezek. 37:12-14; John 5:28, 29; Rev. 20:4-6).
13:33. Some Greek texts add prayer to this verse, but it is omitted in some early and important witness, and therefore much more likely added to the text than omitted from it.
13:35. “at the evening watch.” At the time of Christ, in both Jewish and Roman reckoning of time, the “day” was divided into 12 hours (John 11:9, “Are there not twelve hours in the day?”). Also, both the Jews and Romans divided the night into four “watches,” each being three hours long. This was true even though the Jews started their new day at sunset, at the start of the first watch of the night, and the Romans reckoned their new day at midnight, at the start of the third watch of the night (our day beginning at midnight comes from the Romans).

The names of the four watches are named in Mark 6:48, and were “evening watch,” “midnight watch,” “cockcrowing watch,” and “morning watch.” Sometimes, however, the watches were just called by “first watch,” “second watch,” “third watch,” and “fourth watch.” [For more on time in the Bible, see commentary on Mark 6:48].

14:3. “over his head.” The record of Mary anointing Jesus occurs in Matthew 26:6-13; Mark 14:3-9; and John 12:1-8. Mark says the ointment was poured on the head, while John 12:3 says Mary anointed Jesus’ feet. The key is realizing that she had a lot of ointment, and put it on both Jesus’ head and feet [for more information, see commentary on Matthew 26:7].

14:4. “But there were some indignantly saying to one another…” This verse is hard to translate, and so the versions differ considerably. A literal rendition would be something like, “There were some being indignant with each other.” Of course, they were not being indignant with each other, they were indignant about what they considered a waste of money, and were commenting to each other about it. Some versions say they were indignant “within themselves,” or “said to themselves,” but that can be misunderstood. The ones who were indignant were saying things among themselves, i.e., among their little disgruntled group, but not within their own minds, as we say, “talking to themselves.” The Gospel of John (12:4) lets us know that this verbal poison started with Judas Iscariot, who was a thief and stole from the money that Jesus and the disciples received (John 12:6). From Judas this discontent spread through the room and infected some of the believers. Jesus cut it off quickly and decisively. “Let her alone…” etc. Christians need to learn from this record. A little evil (leaven) goes through the whole loaf of bread. We need to respond quickly to evil.

14:34. “soul.” See commentary on Matthew 26:38.

14:38. “spirit.” This is the use of spirit that refers to the action of the mind, i.e., attitudes and emotions. The Apostles had a willing attitude, but their flesh was weak and unable to stay awake. [For more on “spirit,” including a long list of the ways it is used in the Bible, see Appendix 6, “Usages of Spirit.”]

14:41. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (idōú), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

14:42. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (idōú), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).
14:49. “let the scriptures be fulfilled.” This is a command clause. In the original language this is composed of hina (#2443 ἵνα) and the verb for “fulfilled,” pleroō (#4137 πληρώω), in the subjunctive mood. See entry on John 9:3, “let the works of God be revealed in him.” It should not be translated as a purpose clause, “this has taken place to fulfill the Scriptures” (such as NASB; NET; NAB; ASV), but as a command clause: “Let the scriptures be fulfilled.” Reading it as a purpose clause requires the phrase “this has taken place” to be supplied in order to complete the thought, because it is not in the Greek. The fact that the hina with a verb in the subjunctive clause stands alone makes the command clause a less forced reading.

14:64. “defaming speech.” The Greek noun is blasphēmia (#988 βλασφημία; pronounced blas-fay-me’-ah), and was used of someone speaking against another. The primary meaning as it was used in the Greek culture was showing disrespect to a person or deity, and/or harming his, her, or its reputation. [For more on blasphēmia, see commentary on Matt. 9:3].

Chapter 15

15:1. “held a consultation.” The Greek is sumboulion (#4824 συμβούλιον), and it refers to a meeting or the decision that those in the meeting have reached. Hence some translations have “held a consultation” (ESV), while others have something like “formed a plan,” and Lenski has “having passed a resolution.” This was the morning trial of the Sanhedrin. Some of them had met the night before, first at Annas’ house (John 13:18-23) and then with Caiaphas (Matt. 26:57-75; Mark 14:53-72; Luke 22:54-62; John 18:24-27). However, the whole Sanhedrin was not present then, and besides, a night trial was technically illegal. Now, in the morning, the whole Sanhedrin is present to condemn Jesus, and they do condemn him (cp. Matt. 27:1; Luke 22:66-71). Therefore, it is true that the Sanhedrin both held a consultation, formed a plan, and reached a resolution as to what to do with Jesus, and then they took him to Pilate, who had the authority to execute him.

15:2. “It is as you say.” See Matthew 27:11 note on “It is as you say.”

15:14. “Crucify him.” This is not the same crowd that had said, “Hosanna,” and “Son of David” some days earlier. See commentary on Luke 23:21.

15:25. “third hour.” About our 9 AM. Both the Jews and Romans divided the day into 12 hours, starting at daylight, roughly 6 AM. [For the hours of the day and the watches of the night, see commentary on Mark 6:48].

15:28. Metzger, Textual Commentary: “The earliest and best witnesses of the Alexandrian and the Western types of text lack ver. 28. It is understandable that copyists could have added the sentence in the margin from Luke 22.37…”

15:33. “the sixth hour.” The sixth hour is noon our time. Both the Jews and Romans divided the day into 12 hours, starting at daylight, roughly 6 AM. [For the hours of the day and the watches of the night, see commentary on Mark 6:48].

15:34. Quoted from Psalm 22:1. [See commentary on Matthew 27:46].
“the ninth hour.” The ninth hour is 3 PM our time. [For the hours of the day and the watches of the night, see commentary on Mark 6:48]. According to the Hebrew text of Exodus 12:6, the Passover Lamb was to be slain “between the evenings.” The early evening started when the sun could clearly be seen to be falling and the day started to cool off, and the later evening was as the sun was going down or had just gone down. By the time of Christ, the Passover Lamb was slain at the 9th hour, about our 3 PM. Thus Jesus died at the same time the lamb was being slain in the Temple, just a few hundred yards to the west of the Mount of Olives where Christ was crucified.

15:35. “And some of those who stood by, when they heard it…” Christ was so beaten and swollen and so dehydrated from loss of blood that his enunciation was not clear and he was misunderstood by some of the crowd.

15:39. “Truly this man was the Son of God.” The claims of Jesus to be the Son of God would have been well known, as well as the miracles he did, and the fact that the religious leaders wanted him crucified because they envied him. Thus it is not hard to believe that the centurion, upon seeing the love of the Christ (Father, forgive them, etc.), his bravery, and all the miracles and signs that accompanied his death, would be convinced that this man was in fact who he claimed to be, and indeed, who the sign over his head said he was.

15:46. “laid him in a tomb.” This was just before sunset Wednesday evening. [For more information on a Wednesday crucifixion and burial, see commentary on Matthew 12:40].

15:47. “Mary Magdalene and Mary.” The women watched Joseph put Jesus in the tomb, close it, and leave, so they saw that Jesus’ body was not properly prepared for burial, which is why they went and bought spices themselves. See commentary on Matthew 27:61.

Chapter 16

16:1. “And when the Sabbath was past.” This is now Friday, the 16th day of the month Nisan, the day after the “Sabbath.” Mark 16:1 mentions the “Sabbath” being over, but the “Sabbath” in this verse was first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread. The Passover Lamb was sacrificed on the 14th of Nisan in the early evening, and at sunset the 15th of Nisan started, which was a “special” Sabbath, not the regular weekly Sabbath (Jewish days start at sunset). The 15th of Nisan was always a special Sabbath because it was the first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Lev. 23:7; John 19:31).

The women, having seen Joseph put Jesus in the tomb without properly preparing his body, now went to the market and bought and prepared spices. It is important to see the time break between Mark 15:47 when the women watched Joseph of Arimathea, and Mark 16:1, when they went and bought spices. The women had seen that Joseph of Arimathea did not bury Jesus properly, but they did not have time Wednesday night before the start of the Feast of Unleavened Bread to buy the spices because the Sabbath was so close (Luke 23:54). Even if the women had wanted to buy the spices at that time, the stores would probably have been closed that close to the Sabbath. So the first opportunity they had to buy and prepare the spices was Friday. Nevertheless, they could not take them to the tomb at that time because the tomb was sealed and guarded. The tomb was guarded for three days: Thursday was day one (this was the special Sabbath that started the Feast of Unleavened Bread); Friday was day two, and Saturday, the weekly Sabbath, was day three. That meant the first day the women could expect to get access to the tomb would be Sunday, which is when they went to the tomb with the spices (see commentary on Luke 24:1).

“bought spices.” The women bought the spices on Friday, the 16th of Nisan. See commentary on Matthew 27:58. Mark 16:1 and Luke 23:56 seem to contradict each other unless we recognize a couple things. First, there are two Sabbaths between the death of Jesus and the time the women took spices to the tomb on Sunday morning: the 15th of Nisan, the first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread, and the 17th of Nisan, the regular weekly Sabbath. Also, we must remember that “and” connects two events, but not necessarily immediately. There can be a lot of time between two phrases connected with “and.” In the record of Jesus, the women bought the spices after the Special Sabbath (Thursday, the 15th of Nisan), prepared them on Friday, the 16th of Nisan, rested on the weekly Sabbath, Saturday, the 17th of Nisan, and then took them to the tomb after sunrise on Sunday, the 18th of Nisan.

16:2. “And very early on the first day of the week.” This is Sunday, the 18th of Nisan, and the sun had just risen, although it says it was very early, and Luke 24:1 says it was “deep dawn,” that is, when the sun was just up. Mark 16:1 says the women bought spices after the Sabbath (the special Sabbath that was the first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread, which fell on Thursday that year). So the women bought the spices on Friday. Now in 16:2 it is Sunday morning just after sunrise and the women are coming to the tomb to properly bury Jesus. They did not know Nicodemus had come and done that already (see commentary on John 19:40). Mary Magdalene had come earlier, while it was still dark, seen the empty tomb, and left (see commentary on John 20:1 and Matt. 27:58). However, the events of the morning had altered Mary’s plans considerably. She did not expect to find an empty tomb and did not expect to meet the Lord. She left the area before these women arrived there.

These women arrived at the tomb “at early dawn” “when the sun had risen,” so they would have gotten together and prepared to go to the tomb at about the same time that Peter and John had seen the empty tomb with their own eyes (John 20:4-9). Had Peter and John come back to this group of women and reported that the tomb was empty, they would not have taken the spices to the tomb in the first place. Luke starts with “they” and does not mention Mary Magdalene at all. That “they” refers to the group of women apart from Mary Magdalene is clear from the fact these women were carrying the spices. There is not a problem with these women coming to the tomb and not meeting with Mary Magdalene, Peter, or the other disciple on their way back to Bethany. There were many footpaths on the Mount of Olives, and it would have been very easy to the women to take one while Mary, Peter, and the other disciple took another.

16:5. “young man.” The women bringing the spices saw an angel at the entryway of the tomb, but he appeared as a “young man,” so they did not realize he was an angel. It was common for tombs to have several rooms. There often is an opening room that is quite large, often with bench seats cut out of the rock, and this room is referred to as a “weeping chamber.” The weeping chamber has another room, or other rooms, that are attached to it, and these have benches or niches for the dead bodies. For example, the “Garden Tomb” in Jerusalem that many Protestants believe may be the actual tomb of Christ, has an opening room, the “weeping chamber,” and then a second room off of it in which to put the dead body. The women were alarmed when they saw this young man (angel), but he spoke to them and calmed them.

“overwhelmed and alarmed.” The Greek word is ekthambeō (#1568 ἐκθαµβέω; pronounced ek-tham-beh'-oh), and it expresses great emotion; to be alarmed, overwhelmed, astonished, amazed, perplexed. Even though it is only one Greek word, many English versions translated it by two, “amazed and alarmed,” or “utterly amazed,” “greatly alarmed.” The Amplified Bible says, “utterly amazed and struck with terror.” Nothing was “right” about what these women were experiencing. Why was the tomb open? Where was Jesus’ body? How did cloth with spices get in the tomb? And why was a young man sitting alone in the tomb? The women had both a mental and emotional reaction. Mark records more of the emotional reaction: that the women were overwhelmed and alarmed by what they were seeing. Luke records more of the women’s mental reaction, that nothing they saw made sense to them. They were perplexed.

16:7. “Galilee.” For more about Galilee, see commentary on Matthew 28:7. The mention of Galilee in this verse in Mark actually adds to the evidence that the ending of Mark, 16:9-20, is not original. When the angel and then Jesus tell the women that the disciples will see him in Galilee, the next record in Matthew is indeed in Galilee. In contrast, neither Luke or John mention Galilee, and they are the Gospels that have post-resurrection events in Jerusalem, such as Jesus’ meetings with Mary Magdalene, the men on the road to Emmaus, or with the disciples behind closed doors.

In contrast to the internal consistency of the other three Gospels, Mark says the angels tell the women Jesus will see the disciples in Galilee, but then, according to the verses we believe are added, he appears in Jerusalem to Mary Magdalene (v. 9); the two men on the road to Emmaus (v. 12); and to the Eleven (v. 14). This is more evidence that Mark 16:9-20 are not original.

16:8. This is the last verse in Mark that is part of the original texts. The women were understandably frightened and confused by the angel and by all the mysterious things they were experiencing, such as the open tomb, the missing body of Jesus, the unexplained grave wrappings with spices (the women did not know Nicodemus had wrapped Jesus’ body with spices), and Mary Magdalene being nowhere around (she had come to the tomb earlier and was either going to come back and join them or meet them at the tomb). They did what the angel commanded and hurriedly left the tomb and went to tell the disciples.

The apparent discrepancy between Matthew and Mark can be easily explained. While Matthew says that they were going to tell the disciples, Mark says that they did not say anything to anyone. The key to the apparent discrepancy is understanding that Mark is referring to talking to people that they met on the road. Especially since it was just after Passover season, and the day after a Sabbath, it is likely that the women passed many people on their way to tell the disciples what they had just seen, and it would be customary to do at least a cursory greeting to many of those people. Furthermore, ordinarily if a group of people saw an angel, they would be so excited that they would tell everyone they met. However, the terrible events involving Jesus’ arrest and crucifixion, combined with all the unexplainable things the women saw that morning, combined with the “unbelievable” news that Christ had risen from the dead, caused the women not to tell anyone on the road, but to wait until they got to the disciples. However, Luke 24:9 and 10 let us know that when the women did tell the disciples what had happened to them and that Jesus was raised, the news seemed so outlandish they did not believe the women. 16:9. When we look carefully at the last twelve verses of Mark (Mark 16:9-20), the evidence shows that they are not part of the original God-breathed text, but were added to the original text of Mark, nevertheless, we have made some commentary notes below because those verses are so well known. The Gospel of Mark portrays Jesus as the Servant of God (see commentary on Mark 1:1), and Jesus’ work as the Servant foretold by the OT prophets ended at his death. He was resurrected as “Lord,” and so it is appropriate that Mark does not portray Jesus in his resurrected state.

There are many lines of evidence that lead us to conclude that the ending of Mark that is found in almost every Bible is not original, but is a later addition. The evidence falls into two major categories: external manuscript evidence and internal evidence in the verses themselves. What we will see is that both the manuscript evidence, and the internal evidence shows that Mark originally ended with verse 8, and that short and abrupt ending fits with the rest of Mark and the scope of Scripture. All these points will be examined below.

The first line of evidence we must examine when considering whether or not the closing twelve verses of Mark are original is the external evidence of the ancient manuscripts. When we do this, what we find is that the Greek manuscripts have four major different endings to Mark (Bruce Metzger, Textual Commentary on the New Testament). Obviously, not all four of them can be original, and in fact the evidence shows that none of the four of them is original. While it is true that the majority of the manuscripts have the traditional ending of Mark, that is for a good reason. After it was added, the subsequent manuscripts included it. It is never the largest number of manuscripts that establishes which reading is original, but rather the date of the manuscripts, the manuscript families that include or exclude a text, and any historical evidence that shows us why a text was added or omitted. Hendriksen sums up the manuscript discussion: “It cannot be denied that ever so many Greek manuscripts do contain these words, but when the manuscript evidence is properly evaluated instead of merely counted, the balance swings heavily toward the omission of the contested verses (New Testament Commentary: Mark. Emphasis his).

In the case of the ending of Mark, not only do the earliest manuscripts of the different textual families not have the ending, but the theologians who lived back then testified that the manuscripts they were using did not have it either. The noted textual scholar Bruce Metzger writes:

The last twelve verses of the commonly received text of Mark are absent from the two oldest Greek manuscripts (8 and B), from the Old Latin codex Bobiensis (itk), the Sinaitic Syriac manuscript, about one hundred Armenian manuscripts, and the two oldest Georgian manuscripts (written AD 897 and AD 913). Clement of Alexandria [c. 150-215 AD] and Origen [Origen Adamantius of Alexandria, Egypt; 184-253 AD] show no knowledge of the existence of these verses; furthermore Eusebius [263-339 AD] and Jerome [347-420 AD] attest that the passage was absent from almost all Greek copies of Mark known to them. The original form of the Eusebian sections (drawn up by Ammonius) makes no provision for numbering sections of the text after 16:8. Not a few manuscripts that contain the passage have scribal notes stating that older Greek copies lack it, and in other witnesses the passage is marked with asterisks or obeli, the conventional signs used by copyists to indicate a spurious addition to a document. (Bruce Metzger, A Textual Commentary on the Greek New Testament pp. 102, 103.)

As was stated above, there are other endings to Mark besides the well-known one that appears in most Bibles. Sometimes the Greek manuscripts that have traditional long ending also have the most well-known short ending, but this short ending is rarely translated into our English Bibles. Since the short ending is not original, and since it is not usually included in our Bibles, it was never assigned a verse number. The Greek manuscripts that do have both the long and short endings usually place the short ending before the longer one, between verses 8 and 9, which is more evidence that both endings were added to Mark. The New American Standard Bible includes the short ending, but puts it at the end of Mark, after verse 20. According to the NASB, the short ending is translated as follows: And they promptly reported all these instructions to Peter and his companions. And after that, Jesus Himself sent out through them from east to west the sacred and imperishable proclamation of eternal salvation.

The reason that someone would write a “more complete” ending to Mark is clear: it seems to end abruptly. The note in the NIV Archaeological Study Bible says it well: “Most scholars believe that this [verse 8] is indeed the point at which the original Gospel probably ended and suggests that the other endings very likely developed during the second century, after the Gospel of Mark was read alongside the other Gospels and appeared, by comparison, to lack a satisfactory conclusion.” Actually, when we understand the purpose of Mark, we will see that its ending at verse 8 is perfectly satisfactory, a point we will make later.

Having examined the external manuscript evidence and seen that the evidence leads us to conclude the ending of Mark is not original, we now turn to the internal evidence of the passage. The internal evidence is in two broad categories: the grammatical and syntactical evidence, and the evidence of what the verses actually say. When it comes to the vocabulary, syntax, and grammar, of the last twelve verses of Mark, it is beyond the scope of this short work, and beyond the ability of most Bible students, to do a thorough study. That kind of evidence involves complex analysis of Greek vocabulary and grammatical patterns, and requires experts who thoroughly understand the Greek language. Thus, we will leave the more complete lexical analysis of the ending of Mark to other scholastic works. A few such works which cover the ending of Mark in much more detail are: B. F. Wescott and F. A. Hort, Introduction to the New Testament in the Original Greek, Appendix 1, pp. 29-51; Bratcher and Nida, A Translator’s Handbook on the Gospel of Mark, pp. 506-522; Roger Omanson, A Textual Guide to the Greek New Testament; William Lane, The New International Commentary on the New Testament: The Gospel of Mark.

For the purposes of this study we will only quote some of the scholars who study the grammar and syntax of the ending verses of Mark, and acknowledge that they testify that it is significantly different from the rest of Mark. For example, the text note in the NET First Edition Bible says of the closing verses of Mark: “Their vocabulary and style are decidedly non-Markan.” William Lane writes: “the form, language, and style of these verses militate against Marcan authorship” (The New International Commentary on the New Testament). Even scholars like Lenski, who defends the closing verses of Mark as probably original, admit that the grammar and syntax of the closing verses does differ from the rest of Mark. Thus the evidence of the vocabulary, grammar, and syntax, of the closing verses of Mark is in harmony with the manuscript evidence, which is that the ending of Mark was not written by the same person who wrote the rest of Mark.

The other category of internal evidence that the closing verses of Mark are not original is what the verses say; the information that the verses contain. What we find is that there are statements in the ending verses of Mark that contradict the other Gospels and the scope of Scripture. For example, Mark 16:13 says that the two men (Cleopas and another disciple) who met Jesus on the road to Emmaus went back to Jerusalem and joined the rest of the disciples, but the disciples “did not believe them” when they said Jesus was alive. This contradicts the Gospel of Luke. Luke is the Gospel that has the full account of the men on the road to Emmaus (Luke 24:13-32), and it says that when Cleopas and his friend arrived at Jerusalem, the apostles and disciples were already convinced Jesus was alive. In fact, before Cleopas and his friend could even tell the apostles about seeing the resurrected Lord, the apostles and disciples said, “It is true! The Lord has risen” (Luke 24:34). Only after the Apostles and disciples in Jerusalem told Cleopas and his friend that Jesus was alive did the two men get a chance to report their own experience with Jesus, confirming that Jesus was indeed alive. Thus Mark 16:13 and Luke 24:34, 35 blatantly contradict each other, and the best explanation for the contradiction is that Mark 16:13 is not original.

Similarly, Mark 16:14 seems to contradict the other Gospels, and is the only verse in which Jesus reproves his disciples when he first appears to them. This conflicts with Luke 24:36, which says that when Jesus appeared to the disciples he said, “Peace be with you.” By the time Jesus appeared to the disciples who were behind closed doors, they were already saying he had been raised, so why would he reprove them? Reproof certainly does not seem to be the tone of Jesus’ communication with the disciples according to Luke 24:36-49 and John 20:19-23. Again, the best explanation of the contradiction is that Mark 16:14 is not original. We should remember that as the orthodox Church developed, the loving Christ of the Gospels became a much more harsh and judgmental Christ (God suffered the same degradation), so a Jesus who would enter and reprove the disciples even though they believed in him and even though he had just said, “Peace be with you,” fits well later in Church history.

Still more evidence that the ending of Mark is not original is the unusual material about picking up snakes and drinking poison. The ordinary experience of Christians who are bitten by snakes or who drink poison is that it does hurt them. It is extraordinary and miraculous when it does not. However, as the Church developed, mystical statements and beliefs became more common. Two more good examples of mystical beliefs that developed in the Church are the belief that sex made a person less spiritual, which led to the celibate clergy of the Roman Catholic Church; and also the belief that the communion bread actually became the body of Christ, rather than just symbolized it. The fact that it is not experientially correct that a believer can be bitten by a snake or drink poison without being harmed, and it is also out of harmony with the general wisdom that is taught in Scripture, the material about snakes and poison can be seen to be an addition to the text.

The phrase about speaking in tongues also clearly seems to be an addition to the text. Jesus would have never mentioned that to his followers just before his ascension. They would not have understood what he was saying. But we can see why it would have been added by a scribe as the Church developed because speaking in tongues was part of the early Church.

Still more evidence that the ending of Mark is an addition is that it has an event that is out of chronological order. Sometimes a Gospel will have an event that is out of chronological order, that is true, but in the record of events after the death of Christ, Mark is the only Gospel that has any event out of order. While that in itself would not be conclusive, given all the other evidence that the last verses in Mark were added, the out-of-order verse in Mark is simply more evidence that the verses are not original. Mark 16:9 about Mary Magdalene chronologically comes before 16:2. It is almost as if the person who wrote the ending of Mark wanted to reintroduce us to Mary Magdalene even though he ends up bringing her into the record at the wrong time.

Also, Mark is the only Gospel that mentions anything that happens after the Day of Pentecost. Matthew ends with Jesus talking to the disciples before his ascension; Luke ends with the disciples waiting in the Temple before the Day of Pentecost; and John ends with Jesus speaking with Peter, and then a conclusion about Jesus’ works. In contrast, the traditional ending of Mark has information about the expansion of the Church and the Word being preached “everywhere,” which occurred many years after the Day of Pentecost.

When we remove the last twelve verses of Mark, and simply end Mark as the oldest manuscripts do, with verse 8, we have a very abrupt ending. Scholars are divided into several broad camps about the abrupt ending of Mark. Many assert that Mark simply ended at verse eight; some scholars think there was an ending to Mark that is now lost; and some scholars think that Mark was in the process of writing an ending but was interrupted by persecution or death and thus did not finish his Gospel.

Although we can see why people want a “better conclusion” to Mark than 16:8 seems to be, as we have seen, the evidence is that Mark ends with verse 8. There is no actual evidence that there ever was another ending that is now “missing.” Mark is like the book of Jonah, which ends in an abrupt manner. Both Jonah and Mark leave us wanting a “better ending,” but when we think about it, there are many things in the Bible we would like to have more information about. Some scholars have tried to say that Mark cannot end with verse 8 because the Greek syntax would then be unusual, but arguments such as those have been ably answered. (One person who does a good job answering that kind of argument is: Ned B. Stonehouse, The Witness of Matthew and Mark to Christ, pp. 86-118.)

It has also been asserted that Mark 16:8 cannot be the ending of Mark because it makes the women become disobedient to the angel’s command to go and tell the disciples. But it is speaking about the women as they left the tomb, and should not be extrapolated and made to imply that the women did not go tell the other disciples. Since the manuscript evidence, the grammatical and syntactical evidence, and the internal evidence from the verses themselves, all point to the fact that the Gospel of Mark does end with verse 8, is there evidence of God’s design in that abrupt ending? Yes, there is.
The abrupt ending of Mark fits with the subject of Mark, and it also parallels the beginning of Mark. Mark portrays Jesus as the Servant of God (see commentary on Mark 1:1). The Gospel of Mark begins with Jesus being baptized and starting his work as the Servant of God. There is no genealogy like Matthew and Luke have, no explanation of how Jesus was the plan of God, the logos becoming flesh, like John has. There are no accounts of his childhood as in Matthew and Luke, or introduction of his person, as in John (“Look!, the Lamb of God”). A good servant needs neither genealogy nor introduction; he is qualified by his obedience and the quality of his work.

Mark starts with Jesus getting immediately to his work. By the end of chapter one (45 verses), he has been baptized by John; tempted for 40 days in the desert; preached the Good News of the Kingdom; called some Apostles; delivered people from demons; healed people of diseases; showed his devotion to God by getting alone and praying; and healed a man of leprosy, which was both a disease and an Old Testament type for sin, thus showing his authority over sin and his ability to heal both the body and soul. In contrast to the fast-Servant-start of Mark, after the first 45 verses of Matthew, Jesus was still a baby; after the first 45 verse of Luke, Mary was still pregnant with Jesus; and after the first 45 verses of John, John the Baptist had pointed out that Jesus was the Lamb of God and Jesus had asked some men to follow him.

When Jesus gave up his life for mankind, that ended his ministry as the Servant of God. In his resurrected body he was no longer the suffering Servant foretold in the Old Testament, but had become the resurrected Lord. That is not to say that Jesus no longer serves God and people, for he certainly does, but he serves in his capacity as Lord.

Not nearly enough work has been done comparing the Old Testament prophecies of the Messiah as God’s “Servant” to Mark’s picture of Jesus Christ as that Servant. Part of the reason for that is the doctrine of the Trinity, which sees Christ as “eternal God of eternal God,” and never really recognizes Jesus Christ as the truly human servant of God. Zechariah 3:8 foretells that the “Branch” will be a servant, but the whole chapter of Zechariah 3 is typological of Jesus Christ, right down to the name of the High Priest, which is “Joshua,” the Hebrew name for Jesus.

Similarly, the four “servant songs” of Isaiah, the four well-known and specific prophecies of the Messiah as the Servant of God, are certainly fulfilled by the Servant-Messiah that Mark portrays (Isa. 42:1-9; 49:1-13; 50:4-11; 52:13-53:12). According to the prophecies, the Servant receives holy spirit; he does not raise his voice or cry out in the streets; he takes care of the bruised reeds and smoldering wicks (i.e., the weak and infirm); he is upheld by Yahweh; he gives sight to the blind and releases the captives from their prisons; he is a light to the nations; he gives his back to those who strike him; he does not hide his face from spitting and humiliation; his appearance is marred; he is a man of sorrows; he bears the sin of us all; and he is “cut off out of the land of the living.” That is a lot for any servant to bear, but Jesus knew it was coming (It is written!), and obeyed God to the end—his death on the cross.

Since Jesus completed his role of the “Servant” when he died, and in any resurrection appearance would no longer be in that role, it is appropriate that Mark ends with Jesus dying and being buried, then the announcement by the angel that he had risen from the dead and the traumatic effect that announcement had on the women. The Resurrection was not a carefully conceived plot by the disciples to deceive mankind, it was God Almighty breaking into history in a way that no one expected; an awesome and profound way that was both shocking and baffling. God showed His love for mankind by raising His Son from the dead and providing a way for all people to have everlasting life.

The commentary on Mark by David Smith also makes a good point. He says, “This ‘ending without an ending’ forces all readers to evaluate what they would do in a similar situation” (Mark: A Commentary for Bible Students). The very abruptness of the ending of Mark causes us to think about what happened. Like the women at the tomb, we have good evidence that Jesus has been raised from the dead. Will we believe it?

“after he rose, early on the first day of the week.” We believe this verse is not part of the original text [See commentary on Mark 16:9 above]. In spite of that fact, we have translated the Greek text of the ending of Mark because it is so well known. We believe the translation in the REV is the accurate way to translate the Greek because Jesus was raised from the dead Saturday evening before sunset.

Some versions of the Bible translate the verse as if the Greek text read: “When Jesus rose early on the first day of the week, he appeared first to Mary Magdalene,…” (NIV). Translating the Greek that way makes Jesus get up early Sunday morning, which is why many commentators say Jesus got up when there was an earthquake and an angel rolled the stone away from the tomb door. We know that Jesus was “three days and three nights in the heart of the earth” (Matt. 12:40, so he could not have been raised Sunday morning, especially if, as tradition says, he was buried Friday evening. Many commentators assert that bibliically, any part of a day is called a “day,” so they say Friday is day one, Saturday is day two, and Sunday is day three. While that way to count days would work if Jesus had just said he would be buried “three days,” it is not a proper understanding of how to count Jesus’ words, “three days and three nights.” There are not three days and three nights from Friday just before sunset to Sunday while it is still dark. We can reconstruct the chronology very accurately from the information in the New Testament. Wednesday was the 14th of Nisan, the day the Passover Lamb was killed, and thus the day Jesus died. Thursday was the 15th of Nisan, the first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread, always a Special Sabbath. Friday the 16th of Nisan fell between the Special Sabbath and the weekly Sabbath. Saturday, the 17th of Nisan was the weekly Sabbath, and Jesus was in the ground three days and three nights just before the sun set on Saturday, so his resurrection was on Saturday evening. Sunday, the 18th of Nisan was the first day of the week, and the day he appeared to Mary Magdalene and the rest of the Apostles and disciples.

The confusion about the burial of Jesus is due to the fact that the Bible makes it clear that Jesus was buried before the Sabbath. Not realizing that the “Sabbath” was a High Day, a Special Sabbath, the first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread (John 19:31), people assume Jesus must have been crucified on a Friday, and that is how the traditional account of the crucifixion got started.

When trying to translate and punctuate Mark 16:9, the Greek quite literally reads, “Having risen early on the first day of the week he appeared first to Mary Magdalene...” The question is whether the words, “early on the first of the week” refer to when he arose or when he appeared. The fact is that in the Greek text it could be either, so we need to discover the meaning from the scope of Scripture. One of the most, or perhaps the most, capable Greek grammarian in modern times is A. T. Robertson, who says, “It is probable that this note of time goes with ‘risen’ (αναστας), though it makes good sense with ‘appeared’ (εφανη)” (Word Pictures in the New Testament). There are cases in the NT where time phrases are unclear, so this is not solid proof that this verse is not original, however, if someone were to press the fact that the natural reading of the Greek made the resurrection on Sunday morning, then this verse would be one more piece of evidence that it was not part of the original text of Mark.

16:10. “mourned and wept.” Although it is likely that the disciples did mourn and weep, this seems to be more evidence that the end of Mark is fanciful and not original. No other Gospel mentions the disciples gathered mourning and weeping. Although they certainly missed Jesus, and were afraid and confused, they were caught up in the confusion about his death in light of the fact that they had been so sure he was the Messiah. The mourning and weeping is more like imagery from a later time, as if the disciples were saying, “They killed the Messiah.” Actually, they were saying, “They killed Jesus, who we thought was the Messiah, and now what are we going to do?”

16:14. “And afterward he appeared to the eleven themselves as they reclined to eat, and he rebuked them…” This verse contradicts Luke 24:34, because when Jesus appeared to the disciples behind closed doors, they were already saying he had been raised, so why would he reprove them? The disciples did not believe the women, that is true, but in the biblical culture the testimony of women was not allowable in court. The disciples did believe Peter and the two men on the road to Emmaus, so Jesus would not reprove the disciples for “not believing those who saw him after he was raised.” They did believe the three men whose testimony was credible in that culture. Furthermore, reproof certainly does not seem to be the tone of Jesus’ communication with the disciples according to Luke 24:36-49 and John 20:19-23. The best explanation is that the closing section of Mark is not original. (See commentary on Mark 16:9).

16:16. “He who believes and is baptized will be saved.” Mark 16:16 is the only verse in the New Testament that clearly says a person has to be baptized to be saved. Although some people say verses such as Acts 2:38, “repent and be baptized,” say the same thing, that is not actually the case. Acts 2:38 is simply saying if a person did repent and get baptized he would receive the holy spirit, which is true, but different from saying one had to do those things to get the holy spirit.

Salvation is the most serious subject in the Bible, and thus this verse requires our attention. However, studying it in light of the scope of the New Testament, it seems unreasonable that water baptism is necessary for salvation, but it is only mentioned here and not in any of the other clear verses about salvation. For example, Romans 10:9 says very clearly: “That if you confess with your mouth, ‘Jesus is Lord,’ and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved.” That fact, along with all the evidence that the closing section of Mark is not original, is very solid evidence that this verse is not original, but was added, and that makes sense because as Christianity developed in the decades after Christ’s ascension, the doctrine that water baptism was necessary for salvation became a part of Church doctrine, even though it had never been a doctrine before then.

If someone did want to insist that Mark 16:16 is original and a person had to be “baptized” to be saved, then the “baptism” in the verse would not refer to baptism in water but to baptism in holy spirit. In that case, the statement “Whoever believes and is baptized [in holy spirit] will be saved” would be true, because at the time a person believes, he is baptized in holy spirit, and then his salvation is assured. See commentary on 16:9.
16:17. “And these signs will accompany those who believe.” This verse was almost certainly added to Mark from a later time when speaking in tongues was better known and understood (see commentary on 16:9).

“speak with new tongues.” For an explanation of speaking in tongues, see commentary on 1 Corinthians 14:5.

16:20. “They went out and preached everywhere.” This verse is more evidence that the ending of Mark is not original. The other Gospels all end before the Day of Pentecost and the start of the Christian Church. However, this verse clearly ends later in Church history. Hendrickson writes that this verse is “a statement which one would naturally associate with a period of Church history considerably later than Pentecost” (New Testament Commentary: Mark). The actual fact is that, for years after the ascension, the Jews did not catch the vision of the Great Commission as this verse seems to imply.

First and foremost, the Jews did not really start to even minister to the Gentiles until the middle of Acts. Although Peter was told to go to the house of the Gentile soldier Cornelius in Acts 10, there is no record of Jews pointedly going to the Gentiles until Acts 11:20 when Jews talked to the Gentiles in Antioch of Syria. As importantly, the Jews took a long time to go “everywhere.” The Apostles stayed in Jerusalem and outreach much beyond that was very slow at first. Although a few of the Jews who came to the feasts at Jerusalem may have believed and taken that belief home with them, one of the first major outreach events occurred when Saul was persecuting the Church and “those who had been scattered [by the persecution] went around telling the Good News” (Acts 9:4). Thus, Mark 16:20 is more like a summary verse of Acts than a conclusion of the Gospel of Mark.

1:1. “compile an orderly account.” For why there are four Gospels, see commentary on Mark 1:1, “gospel.”

1:5. “priestly division of Abijah.” 1 Chronicles 24:1-19 recounts how King David organized the priests, the sons of Aaron, into 24 divisions. The eighth division was the division or “course” of Abijah (2 Chron. 24:10). Each division was on duty twice a year for a one-week period, and also served at the three major feasts of the year: Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles. After the Babylonian captivity only four divisions returned (Ezra 2:36-39), but these four were divided into twenty-four divisions, given the names of the original twenty-four, and then continued on with their duties according to the traditional timing (Hendriksen). The eighth division of Abijah that Zechariah was serving would have been the last week of May, 4 B.C.

1:6. “before God.” This phrase is an idiom where doing something “before the Lord” means to do something in service to him, to act as his servant. This can be seen when Elijah says, “As the LORD, the God of Israel, lives, before whom I stand, there shall be neither dew nor rain these years, except by my word” (1 Kings 17:1; cp. 18:15; 2 Kings 3:14; 5:16). Elijah is saying he stands in service to God. (For more examples see: Gen. 7:1; 17:1; 24:40; 37:10; Luke 1:6, 8, 15, 75; Acts 4:19; 8:21; 1 Tim. 5:4; Heb. 13:21).

1:7. “they both were advanced in their days.” The Levites could only work from 20 to 60, but the priests could work as long as they were able. There is a very good chance that both Elizabeth and Zechariah were over 60. It is almost certain that they both died before John started his ministry.

“barren.” In a culture in which children were considered the blessing of the Lord, and the death rate was so high that each couple had to have 5 children to keep the population number stable, being barren was considered a curse. In fact, the situation highlights the character of Zechariah, who was no doubt under pressure to divorce her. There were people who considered it a religious duty to divorce a barren wife (Edersheim, Life and Times, book II, p. 137).

“in his division’s turn.” See Luke 1:5 note on “priestly division of Abijah.”

1:9. “lot.” The priest who got the privilege of burning incense on the golden altar in the Temple was chosen by the casting of lots. The honor was so great that a person was only allowed to do it one time in his life, and after that he was called “rich” (Edersheim, Life and Times, book II, p. 134).

1:10. “of the people.” No Gentiles were allowed just outside the sanctuary, in what was called the court of men and women. The use of laos for “people” here refers specifically to the Jews. See entry on “the people” in Luke 2:10.

1:15. “in the sight of the Lord.” Biblical custom. The literal is “before the Lord” (ESV). This is an idiom where “before me” means “in my sight.” Just like “thou shalt have no other gods before me,” meaning I do not want to see any other gods in your life (Deut. 5:7, literally, “before my face”). For a sampling of OT examples of this custom see:

There is so much in this little phrase: “great in the sight of the Lord.” John’s life is mostly unknown, and his ministry was short. He died in prison as a result of having made enemies because he dared to speak the truth. So many people take pride in being great in the eyes of the world, but in the end that greatness will mean nothing. John’s light is still burning, although his life ended 2,000 years ago. Every Christian should strive to be great in the sight of the Lord.

“wine or beer.” John was to be a Nazarite, as was Samson. For the Nazarite vows and commitments, cp. Numbers 6. The Greek word translated “beer” is sikera (σίκερα). It was not a distilled beverage, like our whisky, rum, vodka, etc., today. Distilled liquor was unknown in the ancient world. It was a fermented drink, hence our translation as “beer.” The Akkadian word was sikaru, barley beer, from whence the Hebrew word shekhar almost certainly came, and the Greek word is obviously related.

Because “beer” does not occur in most translations of the Bible (although that is changing in some of the more modern versions; cp. HCSB, NET), it is worth saying something about it. Biblical Archaeological Review (Sept./Oct. 2010, Vo. 36, no. 5), has a very informative article by Michael Homan, titled, “Did the Ancient Israelites Drink Beer?” Homan writes:

In ancient Near Eastern cultures, beer was in many ways a super-food. By producing and drinking beer, one could dramatically multiply the calories in harvested grains while consuming needed vitamins; that alcohol was also effective at killing bacteria found in tainted water supplies. Given the difficulty of producing food in the ancient world, beer gave you a lot of nutritional bang for your buck.

…Nobody disputes the importance of beer in ancient Egypt and Mesopotamia, where it was the national drink. Beer was used to pay laborers and the fathers of brides. It was used medicinally for stomach ailments, coughs, constipation; an ancient Egyptian prescription calls for a beer enema. Hammurabi’s Law Code regulates the price and strength of beer. Many ancient temples had their own brewers. …Moreover, beer did not keep well, so it was made for immediate consumption.

The article goes on to discuss how beer was not made like we do it today with hops or carbonation, and that was often made from a mixture of things, including mixed grains instead of just one grain, and it could be sweetened with many different things, such as grapes, figs, honey, and fruit, and also spices may be added.

The Greek word refers to a fermented drink that was almost certainly some kind of beer, whether barley beer, date beer, mixed-ingredients beer, etc. In contrast, it does not refer to distilled liquor, which is what the English “strong drink” implies, so we did not use that term in the REV.

“filled with holy spirit.” No article “the”. This holy spirit was the gift of God that He gave to some believers before Pentecost. [For more information on the uses of “Holy Spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”]

1:17. Quoted from Malachi 4:6. The reference to the “spirit and power of Elijah” is a clear indicator that when Malachi 4:5 says that “Elijah” will be sent, it is the figure antonomasia, “name change,” where the name “Elijah” is put for someone who has many of the same characteristics as Elijah, in this case, John the Baptist. For example, in Revelation 11:8, the city of Jerusalem is called “Sodom” to make the point that it is full of ungodliness and immorality.

“their children.” Cp. NIV. In the text there is no word for “their,” however, the possessive is implied.

“good sense.” The Greek is phronesis (#5428 φρόνησις). This is not the Greek, sophia, wisdom, but rather “a word for practical intelligence” (Robertson, Word Studies).

1:18. “sign.” Literally, Zechariah says, “according to what will I know it?” This is to be understood as asking for a sign. As Lenski writes, “it asks for a norm or sign in accord with which the promise will be fulfilled.” This is the same phrasing that Abraham uses in Genesis 15:8. Interestingly, scripture says that “Jews ask for signs” (1 Cor. 1:22), as was the case with Abraham, Gideon, and Hezekiah when they were promised things from the Lord. The difference with Zechariah was that he asked out of unbelief—as verse 20 makes clear—while these others asked from a desire to strengthen the faith they had (See Hendriksen). One must be careful what one asks for, however, because the angel answered Zechariah’s unbelieving demand for a sign—he would be mute until the child was born.

1:20. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

“proper time.” Kairos (#2540 καιρός) can mean time in the sense of “proper, right, or appropriate time” (BDAG). Much like a parent might say to a fifteen year old, “you’ll be ready to date when it is time,” or “when it’s time, we’ll know.” In these cases “time” means, the right time, the appropriate time. The Greek word for “time” was also used in this sense.

1:26. “a city of Galilee named Nazareth.” The reason Luke says “a city named” Nazareth, is because the town was such that few people would have heard of it. No other extra-biblical work such as the Talmud mentions Nazareth. When Luke mentions well-known cities he just says the name—“Damascus” (Acts 9:19), “Iconium” (Acts 14:1)—rather than indicate the region and say “a city called.”

1:28. “Greetings.” The Greek is chairō (#5463 χαίρω) and in this context was a standard greeting of the Greeks just as we today say “Hi!” “Hail” persists in some versions, but is outdated, not being used as a greeting today, so “Greetings” as we have makes the meaning clear.

The KJV adds to this verse, “blessed art thou among women.” However, this phrase was not in the original text (Metzger, Textual Commentary).

“conceive in your womb.” The translation is correct, even though the Greek phrase sullēmpse en gastri (συλλῆμψεν ἐν γαστρί) can also be understood as an idiom and translated “become pregnant in your womb.” Genuine conception did occur in Mary. We know from many verses of Scripture that Mary had to contribute the egg and God fertilized the egg. There is no indication in Scripture that when Jesus was said to be of the line of David, that that just meant he was adopted into that line. To fulfill the prophecies he had to be born as a true descendant of David. Mary was not a surrogate mother, she was a real mother who made a real genetic contribution to Jesus Christ.
The prophecies were that Jesus was going to be a true lineal descendant of David. He was known as the “Son of David,” a title he recognized of himself, because he was a true descendant of David. Also, Psalm 132:11 says, “Yahweh swore an oath to David, a sure oath he will not revoke: “One of the fruit of your body I will place on your throne.” To fulfill that prophecy Jesus Christ had to be a genuine descendant of David, and he was not David’s descendant if he was God. Jesus Christ is the Son of his father, God, and his mother, Mary. Romans 1:3 is one of the many New Testament verses that speaks of Jesus being of the line of David. Most commentators ignore this clear truth in the Bible in order to maintain the tradition of the Trinity.

1:33. “he will reign over the house of Jacob forever.” This verse is a good example that just because something in scripture is said to last forever, doesn’t mean it starts immediately. Likewise, even though we have eternal life (John 3:15-16, 36), it does not mean it comes into effect immediately; because if the Lord tarries we will still die and need to be resurrected into that eternal life: “Everyone who looks to the Son and believes in him shall have eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day” (John 6:40, NIV).

1:35. “The Holy Spirit.” “The Holy Spirit” (capital “H,” capital “S”) is a name used for God when His power is in operation. In a very Hebraic way, this verse equates the Holy Spirit with “the power of the Most High.” The angel was speaking to Mary, a young Hebrew woman, in terms she could understand. It was common in the Hebrew language to say something and then repeat it in different words so the meaning would be clear. This occurs throughout the Hebrew Old Testament, and can especially be seen in books such as Proverbs in which something is stated and then restated using different words.

Since Mary told the angel she was not having sexual relations with human men, and knew she would then have to be impregnated by God, she would naturally understand “the Holy Spirit” to be the name of God which emphasized His invisible power in operation. God has many names in the Bible, and “the Holy Spirit” is one of them. It is easy to tell that in this case “the Holy Spirit” is a name of God because Jesus is called “the Son of God” and “the Son of the Father” (2 John 1:3), but he is never called “the Son of the Holy Spirit.” Mary understood that “the Holy Spirit” was another name for God, and thus she told her cousin Elizabeth that she rejoiced in God, and that “the Mighty One” (another name for God) had done great things for her (Luke 1:47-49). [For more information on the uses of “Holy Spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.

1:37. “For nothing will be impossible with God.” Zechariah and Elizabeth are being paralleled with Abraham and Sarah. Here we have a direct allusion to Genesis 18:14, “Is anything impossible for the LORD? At the appointed time I will come back to you, and in about a year she [Sarah] will have a son” (HCSB). Earlier in the chapter we saw how Zechariah employed the same question as Abraham (see entry on “sign” in Luke 1:18), and now this phrase originally regarding Sarah is applied to Elizabeth, who is barren and past fertile years. Like Sarah, she too will miraculously have a child. In Genesis the phrase was put as a question (expecting a negative answer), “Is anything impossible with the LORD?” (μὴ ἀδύνατει παρὰ τὸ θεόν ῥῆμα). Here in Luke it is as though the angel replies, answering in the future tense, “Nothing will be impossible with God” (οὐκ ἀδύνατησαι παρὰ τοῦ θεοῦ πάντα ῥῆμα). This allusion would have been a great faith booster for Mary, who was about to have a child without sexual intercourse with a man.
Only the ASV prefers the translation, “For no word from God shall be void of power.” This is grammatically possible, and perhaps implied as a double meaning. Rather than simply “word,” the Greek word rhema (#4487 ῥῆμα) also means “thing, object, matter, event” (BDAG). Luke uses rhema to mean “thing” elsewhere: Luke 1:65; 2:15; 2:19; 2:51; Acts 5:32; 10:36.

1:38. “Lo!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”). Although most usually translated “Look!” in the REV, in this context that made it seem like Mary may have been rude to the angel, which was certainly not the case. We went with “Lo,” like Rotherham and Young’s Literal Translation.

1:39. “a city of Judah.” The Greek word translated Judah comes from Iouda (#2448 Ἰούδα). A number of versions have “Judah” (NASB; ESV; HCSB; ASV; NET; NAB), and a few versions say “Judea” (NIV; YLT). But Judea is incorrect from the Greek, as Lenski writes, “When Luke refers to the province he writes Ἰούδα [not Ἰουδά] (10 times in the Gospel, 12 times in the Acts).” “Judea” is the territory ruled over by Herod, while “Judah” refers to the ancient area of the tribe of Judah. Lenski also makes the point there may have been a city we know nothing about called “Judea,” which could be the case but is less likely.

1:41. “filled with holy spirit.” There is no definite article. This holy spirit is the gift of God. (cp. Matt 3:10). [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’.”]

1:44. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

1:45. “from the Lord.” The phrase “from the Lord” could also be translated “by the Lord.” In either case the preposition para (#3844 παρά) is to be understood in the sense of expressing source [see Appendix 11: “Greek Prepositions”]. These were words that originated in and were spoken from the Lord.

1:46. “My soul magnifies the Lord.” Similar to Psalm 34:2a. The “soul” here refers to the emotions, feelings, attitudes, and even thoughts. Mary is magnifying the Lord with all that is within her. [See Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’.”]

1:47. “my spirit has rejoiced in God my Savior.” This is a powerful verse because it shows Mary’s deep trust in God. On the surface she seemed to have many problems at this time, chief among them being that she was pregnant before having sex with her husband in a culture that was scandalized by that. Even Joseph had thought about divorcing her. Only a few people knew of her divine conception, and since no one was expecting a virgin birth she could not have convinced them of it anyway. In spite of her difficult circumstances she rejoiced in God, and thus has set a wonderful example for us and how we should rejoice even in our difficult circumstances.

There are Trinitarians who believe that, because this verse calls God “Savior,” and Jesus is also called “Savior,” that Jesus must be God in the flesh. However, that belief is not correct. There are many references to God the Father being called “Savior.” That makes perfect sense because He is the author of the plan of salvation and is also very active in our salvation. For example, God, the Father, is called “Savior” in Isaiah 43:11, 1 Timothy 1:1; 2:3; 4:10; Titus 3:4, 25. In contrast, Jesus Christ is called “Savior” because he is the agent who carried out God’s plan, and without whom it could not have come to pass.
The term “savior” is used of many people in the Bible. This is hard to see in the English versions because, when the word “savior” is used of people, the translators almost always translated it as “delivered.” This in and of itself shows that modern translators have a Trinitarian bias. The only reason to translate a word as “Savior” when it applies to God or Christ, but as “delivered” when it applies to men, is to make the term seem unique to God and Jesus when in fact it is not. This is a good example of how the actual meaning of Scripture can be obscured if the translators are not careful when they translate the text.

God’s gracious provision of “saviors” who help God’s people is not recognized when the same word is translated “Savior” for God and Christ but “delivered” for others. Also lost is the testimony in Scripture that God works through people to bring His power to bear. Of course, the fact that there are other “saviors” does not take away from Jesus Christ, who is the only one who could and did save us from our sins and eternal death.

If all the great men and women who were “saviors” were openly portrayed as such in the English versions, the grace and mercy God demonstrates in saving His people by “saviors” He has raised up would be openly displayed. Furthermore, we believe no reader would confuse the true God with the people He was working through. A good example that shows God raising up “saviors” to rescue Israel through history occurs in Nehemiah in a prayer of confession and thanksgiving to God. The Israelites prayed, “But when they [Israel] were oppressed they cried out to you. From heaven you heard them, and in your great compassion you gave them deliverers [saviors], who rescued them from the hand of their enemies” (Neh. 9:27 NIV84). Some other examples of men designated as “savior” are in 2 Kings 13:5; Isaiah 19:20 Obadiah 21. It is incorrect to say that because Christ and God are both called “Savior,” they are one and the same, just as it would be incorrect to say that the “saviors” God raised up throughout history were also God in the flesh or even the same individual as Jesus Christ. 1:48. “because he has looked upon the low estate of his servant.” God does look upon the lowly and humble (Ps. 138:6). In this sentence, “looked upon” is used in an idiomatic or “pregnant” sense, because it means much more than just “look at,” it means to see and do something about it.

The words for “look at” or “see” (a common Hebrew word for “see” is ra‘ah (#7200 רָאָה)) are sometimes used in an idiomatic or “pregnant” sense that means “to look with favor upon,” “to accept,” “to notice and do something about.” Example of this idiom occur in both the Old and New Testaments, and include: Genesis 29:32, Exodus 4:31; 1 Samuel 1:11; 9:16; 2 Samuel 16:12; Job 40:12; Psalm 9:14; 10:11; 31:7; Habakkuk 1:13; and Luke 1:48. In contrast, to “not see” something was to ignore it, to not pay attention to it, to not care about it or look at it with any favor. Thus when Joseph ran the prison in Egypt, the jailer did “not see” anything under Joseph’s authority; he paid no attention to it (Gen. 39:23).

Sometimes the idiom of “see” goes a step beyond just “look upon with favor” or “accept,” and means, “to choose for oneself” “to provide for oneself,” or “to choose” (cp. Gen. 22:8 (God will ‘see’ a lamb for Himself); 41:33; Deut. 33:21; 1 Sam. 16:1; 2 Kings 10:3; Esther 2:9 (the girls were “chosen” or “selected” to be with Esther).
The word “see” is also used the way we use it in English as “to visit” someone, to “go see them” (cp. 2 Sam. 13:5; 2 Kings 8:29; 9:16; Ps. 41:6; 2 Chron. 22:6).

It is also used as “to know” or “to understand,” and can be just a mental knowing or a knowing through experience, if the emphasis is on experience, it might even be translated “experience.” This is similar to the way we use it in English when we say, “I see what you mean,” or “I am going to see for myself,” which often mean experience it myself (cp. Ps. 16:10; 27:13; 34:13; 60:5; 71:20; 89:49 (Heb. 11:5); 90:15; Jer. 5:12; Jer. 20:12; Lam. 3:1). [For more information on the idiomatic uses of “see,” see commentary on John 1:18, and also the commentary on Romans 8:29, “foreknew”].

“Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

1:49. “because the Mighty One has done great things for me…” Almost 1000 years earlier, King David had noted the same thing, that God has done great things (Ps. 71:19).

“holy is his name.” The Psalmist says, “holy and awesome is his name” (Ps. 111:9).

1:50. “his mercy is on those who fear him.” God refers to his love and mercy extending for generations in Exodus 20:6 and Psalm 103:17.

1:52. “mighty.” The word for “mighty” is dunastes (#1413 δυνάστης). It denotes “rulers, officials, or potentates” (cp. Acts 8:27; 1 Tim. 6:15).

1:54. “He helped his servant Israel.” “The middle voice of antilambano means to take hold of something or somebody and in that way to help, and, like the verbs of touch, it is constructed in the genitive,” (Lenski).

“to remember mercy.” Figure of speech, Metonymy (cp. Bullinger; Figures of Speech). “Mercy” is put for the act of mercy, being merciful. God “took hold of Israel his servant to help them,” in order to remember to be merciful to Abraham and his seed. In other words, God helped Israel in order to fulfill the promise He made to Abraham and his seed, a promise that they did not deserve, which is the point of saying that God remembered “mercy.”

1:67. “filled with holy spirit.” There is no definite article. This holy spirit is the gift of God. (cp. Matt 3:10). [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”].

1:68. “Praise the Lord.” This phrase is often translated as “blessed be the Lord.” However, the sense is best captured by “praise the Lord.” It is a verbal adjective; as Lenski writes, “Thus ‘blessed’ means: ‘let all men bless God,’ i.e., speak well of him.” Translating it “praise the Lord” carries this sense of the command: “let all men bless God.” On the other hand, to say “blessed be the Lord,” just states the simple fact that the Lord is well spoken of.

“visited.” Episkeptomai (#1980 ἐπισκέπτομαι) has the sense of “looking favorably upon with an intent to help.” Cp. NET translation, “he has come to help.” The rest of the verse explains the help provided by the Lord, He has “brought about redemption for his people.”

1:70. “from ancient times.” For this translation compare NJB and HCSB. The literal reading is “from of ages.” Hence, “from of old” would be a good alternative translation.

1:72. “our fathers.” These are the “fathers” of Israel, namely, the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob—who worked so hard but did not see the promises fulfilled. It is not speaking of the immediate biological fathers, as the next verse makes clear by referring to “Abraham.”

1:76. “prepare the way for him.” The Greek word that is translated “way” is hodos (#3598 ὁδὸς) in the plural, and the Greek is etoimazo hodous outou (ἐτοιμάζω ὁδοὺς αὐτοῦ), which would be more literally translated as, “prepare his roads.” Hodos refers to a road, a path, or a way something is done. In this context, the phrase “prepare his roads,” refers to a well-known biblical custom. Inside the city of Rome, or other large cities, and on some major thoroughfares such as the “Appian Way” (Appian Road), the road was paved and maintained by slaves, road crews, and the army. However, for most of the Roman Empire, and certainly for most of the ancient Middle East, roads were just dirt roads, and frankly, most often, not even what we would classify as a “dirt road” today—they were actually just dirt paths. These dirt roads and paths did not specifically belong to anyone unless they were main roads and government maintained or unless they belonged to a landowner if the path went through his specific piece of property. No one really was considered to “own” the roads through wilderness and woods except the kingdom in general, and thus no one kept them repaired or travelable. Over time they became filled with ruts and holes (that were often just mud holes), washed out, overgrown by brush and overhung by any nearby trees.

Furthermore, since no one really owned the path, nearby farmers would throw stones from their fields onto them, so a road with lots of stones was not uncommon. After a while, the “roads” of the Middle East became very difficult to travel. When royalty or a powerful dignitary was going to travel to a certain place, the call would go out to “prepare the roads.” The ruler would usually send someone out to make sure that work was being done. This is the custom that is referred to in this verse. John the Baptist was sent to “prepare the roads” that Jesus Christ would travel on spiritually. He preached the Good News, confronted sinners, offered baptism for repentance, and raised everyone’s expectation for the Messiah, the laces of whose sandals he was unworthy to unloose.

1:77. “by the forgiveness…” The versions differ, some having “by” (KJV, NASB, RSV, Rotherham, etc.) some “through,” some “in,” and Lenski has “in connection with.” The point is that, in having their sins forgiven, people really have a sense of their salvation, especially before the Church Age. Christ knew this, and often told people their sins were forgiven.

1:78. “Rising Sun.” This is a title of the Lord Jesus Christ. It comes from the word anatole (#395 ἀνατολή), which is used to describe the dawn, “a change in darkness to light” (BDAG). This leads naturally into verse 79, where Christ is said to “give light to those who sit in darkness.” The verb form of anatole occurs in the LXX translation of Malachi 4:2, describing the rise of the Sun of Righteousness. Here, the Rising Sun is said to visit us “from on high,” the same Greek phrase found in 1 Samuel 22:17, Psalm 18:16, 102:19, 144:7, and Luke 24:49. These passages in 1 Samuel and Psalms show that rescue from one’s enemies is said to come “from on high”—this theme comes up in Zechariah’s prophecy, especially verses 71 and 74.

1:79. “into.” Rather than solely expressing motion “into,” the preposition eis (#1519 εἰς) can also have the sense of “in” [See Appendix 11: “Greek Prepositions.”]. Here it includes both the meanings of guiding us “into” the way of peace and also the notion of guiding along, “in,” the road while actually on the path. Christ leads us both ‘into’ and ‘in’ the road of peace.

Chapter 2

“inhabited world.” In the time of the first century the Roman Empire was the entire known “world.”

2:5. “had been betrothed.” Matthew 1:20, 24 make it clear that by this time Mary was already Joseph’s wife. Why then does the text emphasize the betrothal here and not the marriage? The answer is because the couple’s union had not yet been consummated; they had not as yet had sexual intercourse (Matt. 1:24-25) (Hendriksen).

This verse highlights a biblical custom that is hard to see in English. The Greek verb mnesteuo (μνηστεύω) is in the perfect (past) tense, passive voice. In the ancient Near East, betrothal, the promise of marriage, usually was a contract between the parents of the groom and the parents of the bride. Marriages were arranged, and often many years before the couple was of marriageable age. The perfect tense, passive voice verb shows that the betrothal, the engagement, was something that happened to Mary, not something she did. She did not “get engaged,” her engagement happened to her. This is a much different picture than modern western courtship. The problem with the English translation “had been betrothed” (or “had been engaged”) is that is what we say when someone “had been” betrothed, but is no longer; the engagement was broken off. Thus it is very hard to produce the truth that is in the Greek text into English without giving the wrong idea. On balance, we decided that communicating that Joseph and Mary were betrothed at the time was more important than trying to produce the custom that the engagement had happened to Mary in the past but risk people thinking they were not still engaged.

“was pregnant.” The Greek word is egkuos (#1471 ἐγκύος), a compound word from the preposition en, “in” and the word kuo, the womb. It literally means, “to have in the womb” (Louw-Nida). It simply refers to being pregnant. It does not refer to how far along the pregnancy was. The King James Version and a couple other English versions support the traditional Christmas story by translating egkuos as “great with child.” That is an unwarranted translation, because the Greek word simply means, “to have in the womb,” “to be pregnant.” It shows us Mary was pregnant, but does not tell us how far along she was. Joseph was a wise man, and wisdom would dictate that he would not travel with her when she was on the verge of giving birth. While it is true that at that time it was difficult to tell exactly when a woman would give birth, if she gave birth on the road that would be exceedingly difficult for the family, so if she had started early contractions, or Braxton-Hicks contractions, it is unlikely Joseph would have traveled with her. Actually, since both Joseph and Mary knew the Messiah had to be born in Bethlehem to fulfill the prophecy, and since they had relatives in Bethlehem and were both a “royal” couple who would have been gladly received by many homes, they almost certainly would have allowed plenty of time to be in Bethlehem.
2:6. “while they were there.” The Greek is more literally, “in their being there.” This is well translated as, “while they were there,” which is the translation in most English versions. Note that this verse makes it clear that they had not just arrived that day. The specific Greek phrase occurs in three other verses besides this one, and it does not refer to just arriving or just starting something—it refers to being “in” the middle of something. In Luke 5:12 Jesus was visiting a town when a man came to him to be healed. He had not just arrived at the town, he was “in” it. In Luke 9:8 the disciples came to him “while” he was praying. He had not just started, he was in the midst of prayer. Similarly, in Luke 11:1 Jesus was “in” prayer, and when he had finished a disciple asked a question. The point is that Joseph and Mary had not just arrived in Bethlehem, as the traditional Christmas story teaches. They had been in Bethlehem a while, but the Bible never says exactly how long.

2:7. “no space for them in the guestroom.” The Greek is: διότι οὐκ ἦν αὐτοῖς τόπος ἐν τῷ καταλύματι. [διότι (because) οὐκ (not) ἦν (there was) αὐτοῖς (for them) τόπος (a place) ἐν (in) τῷ (the) καταλύματι (guest room)]. Young’s Literal Translation, which is similar to our own, reads, “there was not for them a place in the guest-chamber.”

The traditional story of the birth of Christ has Joseph and Mary arriving in Bethlehem late in the day or perhaps even at night, desperately seeking lodging, only to find there are no vacancies in the inn. Upon receiving no help from the people of Bethlehem they retire to a stable (some tradition says a cave), where Mary gives birth and Jesus is placed in the manger from which the animals eat. However, this understanding of the nativity stems largely from extra biblical works and tradition imported into the gospels, rather than study of the biblical record itself. Much misinformation about the birth of Christ came from a document that was widely circulated in Christian circles in the early centuries of the Christian era. It is referred to by scholars as the Protevangelium of James, and it is likely from the third century AD, although it is possible, but not likely, that it dates as early as 150 AD (see Wilhelm Schneemelcher, editor, New Testament Apocrypha, The Protevangelium of James, pp. 370-388). This is the first document scholars are aware of that refers to Jesus being born close to Mary’s arrival in Bethlehem, although in the Protevangelium, Jesus is born in a cave before Joseph and Mary even reach Bethlehem.

The Bible, however, makes it clear that they were in Bethlehem for some number of days before Mary gave birth. Luke 2:6 (KJV) says: “And so it was, that, while they were there, the days were accomplished that she should be delivered.” R. C. H. Lenski writes: “This was not the day of Joseph’s and Mary’s arrival, several days had already passed (“while they were there”) (see R. C. H. Lenski, The Interpretation of St. Luke’s Gospel, p. 126). If that is the situation, why was it that “there was no room for them in the inn”? Surely Mary and Joseph could have found a suitable place to give birth to the Messiah in their days in Bethlehem—and they did.

Before we look at the mistranslations of “room” and “inn,” however, let us look at some reasons Joseph and Mary could have found a place to stay. (These reasons are enumerated in: Kenneth Bailey, Jesus Through Middle Eastern Eyes, p. 25, 26) First, Joseph was returning to his town of origin. Historical memories are long in the Middle East, and family support is very strong. For example, Paul knew he was a descendant of Benjamin, who was the son of Jacob, the son of Isaac, the son of Abraham, but Benjamin had lived more than 1500 years earlier. Once Joseph announced that both he and Mary were descendants of families from Bethlehem, many homes would be open to them.

Second, both Joseph and Mary were “royals,” from the royal line of David. David is so famous in Bethlehem that it is called, “the city of David” (Luke 2:4). Being from that famous family would have meant that most homes would open their doors to him. Third, in every culture women about to give birth are given special help. As Kenneth Bailey puts it: “Was there no sense of honor in Bethlehem: Surely the community would have sensed its responsibility to help Joseph find adequate shelter for Mary and provide the care she needed. To turn away a descendent of David in the city of David would be an unspeakable shame to the entire village.” (see Kenneth Bailey, Jesus Through Middle Eastern Eyes, p. 26.)

Joseph and Mary were not rejected by a local hotel that had its “no vacancy” sign turned on. The phrase “no room in the inn” is a mistranslation that continues to support a very serious misunderstanding about the birth of Christ. Two words we must understand to properly interpret the biblical account are topos (#5117 τόπος) and kataluma (#2646 κατάλυμα), usually translated as “room” and “inn,” respectively. The word topos occurs more than ninety times in the New Testament, and does not refer to “a room,” but simply a place, or space in a given area, and in this case there was no space available for Joseph and Mary in the kataluma. What is the kataluma? It does not refer to a commercial lodge, or inn, but simply means a “lodging place” or “guest room.” Bauer’s Greek-English Lexicon says of kataluma: “lodging place. The sense inn is possible in Luke 2:7, but in 10:34 Luke uses pandocheion, the more specific term for inn. Kataluma is therefore best understood here as lodging or guest-room.”

To properly understand the birth narrative of Jesus Christ, it is vital that we understand that the normal Greek word for “inn” is pandocheion (#3829 πανδοχεῖον), and it refers to a public house for the reception of strangers (caravansary, khan, inn). Pandocheion was not only used by the Greeks, but was used as a loan-word for “inn” or a commercial lodging place in Hebrew, Arabic, Armenian, Coptic, and Turkish. Pandocheion is the word Luke uses in the parable of the Good Samaritan when he wanted to refer to a public inn (Luke 10:34).

In contrast to the public inn, both Mark and Luke use kataluma in their Gospels as “guest room” (Mark 14:14; Luke 22:11). When finding a place to eat the Last Supper with his disciples, Jesus tells them to say to the owner of the house, “The Teacher asks: Where is the guest room [kataluma], where I may eat the Passover with my disciples?” (Luke 22:11). So in both Mark and Luke, the kataluma is a room in a man’s house. Luke also uses the verb form of kataluma, which is kataluo (#2647 κατάλυω), and means “to find rest or lodging.” In the record of Jesus and Zacchaeus, Jesus goes “to be the guest” at Zacchaeus’ house, not at a public inn (Luke 19:7). So Luke also uses the verb such that “to stay in the kataluma” indicates lodging at someone’s house.

There are a couple features of common houses in the Middle East that we must understand to understand the birth of Jesus. The first is that it was very common for houses in the Middle East to have a guest room where guests, and even strangers, could stay. Showing hospitality to strangers has always been a huge part of Eastern life, and shows up in the Bible as well as the modern Moslem culture, where one of the five pillars of the Moslem faith it to be quick to entertain strangers. Several Biblical records show strangers being given hospitality, such as Lot taking in two strangers (Gen. 19:1-4) or the man in Gibeah taking in strangers (Judges 19:19-21). Giving hospitality is a command for Christian leaders (1 Tim. 3:2). The Shunammite woman so wanted to show hospitality to Elisha that she had a guest room built on her roof just for him (2 Kings 4:10).

The second thing we must understand is that it was common for people to bring their animals into their houses at night. They did this to keep them from being stolen, and to protect them from harm. Usually, the floor of the family dwelling was raised up somewhat, and the animals were in an area that was a little lower (see Fred Wight, Manners and Customs of Bible Lands, p. 34; Kenneth Bailey, Jesus Through Middle Eastern Eyes, p. 28-33). John Nolland writes: “…it is best to think of an overcrowded Palestinian peasant home: a single-roomed home with an animal stall under the same roof (frequently to be distinguished from the family living quarters by the raised platform floor of the latter).” (John Nolland, Word Biblical Commentary, p. 105.)

When Joseph and Mary arrived in Bethlehem they were taken into one of the local homes, most likely of a relative. However, there was no space available for them in the kataluma, the guest chamber. Therefore, the family made room for Joseph and Mary in their own living quarters, and the baby Jesus was placed in a manger in the home, which would have been filled with clean hay or straw and would have been the perfect size for him.

The fact that the record says there was no room for them in the guestroom does not mean that Joseph and Mary had just arrived. Lots of people would be traveling to Jerusalem for the registration, and even more if this was around the time of Rosh Hashanah and the Feast of Tabernacles, which we think it was. Many scenarios are possible. One is that the guest room had been occupied for weeks, which at that time of year would not have been out of the ordinary. Another is that when other people arrived for the registration or the feast, that Joseph and Mary moved from the guestroom into the main house because they were closer relatives or to better care for Mary. The Bible is simply letting us know that Jesus was placed in the manger in the house because the family guestroom was occupied.

Understanding the birth narrative in this way highlights another important aspect of Eastern hospitality. In the East, guests were given special treatment of all kinds, including behavior that seems very extreme to us. For example, in the record of Lot and the two strangers, Lot would have handed over his own daughters to the mob before surrendering his guests (Gen. 19:8). The people whom Joseph and Mary stayed with would not displace their guests from the guest room, but instead inconvenienced themselves, because no male would be allowed in the house as Mary was giving birth. The husband and any sons would have left their own house to give Mary the privacy she needed during the birth of Jesus.

Thus, the birth narrative of Jesus is considerably different than what is commonly taught. It is not that Bethlehem was full of cold-hearted townspeople who would not take special care of a family about to give birth. Joseph and Mary arrived in Bethlehem some days before she gave birth. The guest room of the people who gave them lodging was full, so the family opened their own home to them and took them into their living quarters. When Mary gave birth, in the late evening or the night some days later, the men left their own home to accommodate her and give her privacy, and no doubt baby Jesus was born in quite usual circumstances, most likely with the village midwife and no doubt helped by the women of the family. Shortly after, the new baby Jesus was wrapped in swaddling clothes, dedicated to God, and placed in a perfect spot, the manger in the home. That same night the angels announced to shepherds in nearby fields that the Christ had been born, and they came and saw the baby, and announced his birth to the whole village.

2:9. “frightened with great fear.” Figure of speech polyptoton (Cp. Bullinger, Figures of Speech).

2:10. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

“the people.” Often the Greek word laos (#2992 λαός) is used to designate specifically the Jewish people. This is the case here; laos is to be understood to mean the people of Israel (Cp. Lenski). If God had wanted to refer to the Gentiles and everyone he could have used the plural, “the peoples” (e.g. Luke 2:31; Rom. 15:11), or “all nations” (panta ta ethne: Matt. 28:19). For scriptures where “the people” clearly refers to the Jews, see: Matthew 13:15; Mark 7:6; Luke 1:68; 2:10; John 11:50; 18:14; Acts 3:23; 7:17; 13:17; 13:24; 13:31; 21:28; 7:11; 7:27; 9:7; 9:19; 11:25.

Here in Luke 2:10, by extension this announcement is good news to all people everywhere (2:31-32), and the future “will be” is prophetic to this effect, but here the angel is speaking to the shepherds in a way they would understand, of Israel’s long awaited messiah (cp. Luke 1:68).

2:11. “this day.” The Jewish day began at sunset; hence the angel was telling them what had happened sometime after sunset that evening.

“the Savior.” We have translated this with “the,” although the Greek lacks the definite article. As Lenski says, “The relative clause [“who”] makes ‘Savior’ definite.”

“Christ and Lord.” These words function like adjectives in the Greek, describing the Savior (Cp. Lenski). These adjectives are descriptive of the baby, showing that he has both the properties of being Christ and Lord. To translate the phrase as, “who is Christ the Lord,” misses this point.

2:12. “the sign.” It was not “a” sign, as though there were many signs, but “the” particular sign given the shepherds by the angel. In verse 16, this finds its fulfillment when the shepherds find the baby in “the” manger. Cp. Lenski.

2:14. “highest.” The Greek is hupsitos (#5310 ὑψίστος), and it is an adjective describing the highest place, or the highest rank. Here the grammar would naturally refer to the highest place, heaven. Thus “glory to God in the highest heaven” would refer to the glory to God that is given by the exalted spiritual beings who dwell in the highest heaven, or rather in the highest part of heaven. The “highest heaven” in this phrase is contrasted with the earth, a lower place, in the next phrase. Thus, in heaven, glory, and on earth, peace….

The birth of the savior was a cause for the spiritual beings of the highest heavens to glorify God, because the savior is not only the redeemer of mankind, but of the very universe itself, which is under bondage and decaying (Rom. 8:20-23). This same phrase, “in the highest heaven,” is also used in Luke 19:38.

2:15. “thing.” From the Greek rhema (#4487 ῥῆμα), which can mean, “a word or message,” or “the event that the word describes, a thing or event” (BDAG). Here in verses 15, 17, and 19 it refers not to the words themselves but the whole event.
surrounding the message. The shepherds wanted to go see the event the angel’s message described, not go see the words. Likewise, in verse 17 the shepherds speak “about” (Greek: peri #4012 περί) the rhema, which shows that they were not just making known the message’s content, but “told the whole story” (Lenski), they made known “about” the message, i.e., all about the angels, the sign, and having found the child. Lastly, in verse 19 Mary does not just store up the angel’s words about the child in her heart, but pondered the entire event.

2:17. “it.” Literally, this verse reads “having seen, they made known.” Some versions supply “it” (ESV; KJV) or “this” (NRSV; NASB), while other versions supply “him” (NIV; NET) or “them” (HCSB). The difference in translation effects whether they saw the fulfillment of the sign of the child lying in the manger (“it” or “this”), or they simply saw the child and his parents (“him” or “them”). It is clear from the context that “it,” meaning the fulfillment of the sign, is what the shepherds saw and this made them go and make it known. For verse 16 employs the definite article “the,” indicating that they found “the” manger, namely, the one just foretold by the angel in verse 12, and having seen it they went and made the event known.

E. Martin, in The Star that Astonished the World, does an astronomical calculation of the time of day Jesus was born using the astronomical material in the Bible and especially in Revelation 12. If he is correct, the shepherds would be spreading the news of Jesus’ birth not too long after sundown, so most of the town would still be awake. There is nothing in the text to indicate that the shepherds had to wake the townspeople up in the middle of the night.

“about.” For the significance of peri, see entry on “thing” in Luke 2:15.

“message.” From the Greek rhema (#4487 ῥῆμα), see entry on “thing” in Luke 2:15.

2:21. “eight days.” The eight days required by Genesis 17:12. The child had to be circumcised on the eight day, which is precisely the day when the clotting factor prothrombin is the highest in a newborn baby. Until the eighth day Vitamin K levels, which produces prothrombin, are insufficient and any surgery before this could produce hemorrhaging. Out of love, our God ordered that the circumcision rite be done precisely on the eighth day, the only time in a baby’s life when prothrombin levels are above 100%.

“We should commend the many hundreds of workers who labored at great expense over a number of years to discover that the safest day to perform circumcision is the eighth. Yet, as we congratulate medical science for this recent finding, we can almost hear the leaves of the Bible rustling. They would like to remind us that four thousand years ago, when God initiated circumcision with Abraham..... Abraham did not pick the eighth day after many centuries of trial-and-error experiments. Neither he nor any of his company from the ancient city of Ur in the Chaldees ever had been circumcised. It was a day picked by the Creator of vitamin K.” (Dr. S.I. McMillen, None of These Diseases, p. 93.)

2:23. “will be called holy to the Lord.” This command to consecrate the firstborn male was from the Mosaic Law. Quoted from Exodus 13:2, 12.
2:24. “A pair of turtledoves.” Quoted from Leviticus 12:8. This verse contains important information concerning the timing of the events of the birth of Jesus. According to Leviticus 12:8, a woman was only allowed to bring a pair of turtledoves or two young pigeons as a sacrifice after childbirth if she could not afford a lamb. Mary’s cleansing and the presentation of Jesus in the Temple would have been 40 days after the birth of Jesus (Lev. 12:2-4). Mary and Joseph would have made the 7 mile walk with Jesus from Bethlehem to the Temple in Jerusalem to present Jesus only because Bethlehem was so close to the Temple. Women were not expected to travel far after childbirth. After presenting Jesus and making the sacrifices, they went back to Bethlehem, where Joseph had no doubt found work. The Magi would arrive on the scene almost two years later. Had they already come and been with the shepherds at the manger, as tradition teaches, then the gold, frankincense, and myrrh, that they brought would have made Joseph and Mary far too wealthy for her sacrifice of the doves or pigeons to be accepted by God. The idea that Joseph and Mary would not have brought a lamb because Jesus was the lamb cannot be substantiated. They, of all people, would have kept the Levitical Law.

2:25. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

“deeply religious.” The Greek is eulabes (#2126 εὐλαβής); see discussion on “godly man” in Acts 10:2.

“comforting.” Cp. Young’s literal translation. Paraklesis (#3874 παράκλησις) has a large semantic range including “encouragement, exhortation, appeal, and comfort.” Most translations go with “consolation.” In this situation, however, “comforting” seems to get more at the heart of it. In the harsh reality of Roman control, Simeon was waiting for all that the Messiah would bring: plenty of food, peace, protection from enemies, etc. This would come as great comfort to a hurting nation.

“holy spirit was upon him.” There is no definite article. This holy spirit is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.

“holy spirit.” The context shows that this refers to the gift of holy spirit rather than the Father who is the Giver. For in the verses before and after, “holy spirit” is clearly referring to the gift. Further, although the Greek has the articles “the’ spirit ‘the’ holy” there are instances where having both articles can refer to the gift (Mark 12:36; Luke 3:22; 10:21; John 14:26; Acts 2:33; 5:32; 10:44; 10:47; 11:15; 15:8; 19:6). [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.

“Messiah.” The Greek word is christos, which is usually translated as “Christ” but also can mean “anointed one” or “messiah.” Here we translated it “messiah” because Simeon was a Jew looking forward to the comforting of Israel, which would mean, in part, that he was looking forward to the coming Jewish messiah and messianic age.

2:29. “Master.” The Greek is despotēs (#1203 διστόπτης) meaning master or lord, and it refers to someone who has legal control and authority over others, such as subjects or slaves (cp. 1 Tim. 6:1; Titus 2:9). Thayer points out that it was “strictly the correlative of “slave” doulos, and hence denoted absolute ownership and uncontrolled power” (Thayer’s Greek-English Lexicon). It also refers to someone who controls a thing, hence, an “owner.” It is used both as a title for God (Luke 2:29; Acts 4:24), and a title for Jesus.
Christ (2 Pet. 2:1; Jude 1:4). Whereas despotēs denoted absolute power and control, kurios, “lord,” has a more general meaning applicable to the various relationships in life, which is why we see kurios used even as a term of address equivalent to our polite way of addressing strangers as “Sir” (cp. KJV Matt. 13:27; John 4:11; John 5:7; etc.).

“according to your word.” The word spoken of in v. 26, that he would not see death until he had seen the messiah.

2:34. “Take notice!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

“appointed.” The Greek is keimai (#2749 κεῖµαι), which has a number of meanings, including, to be set in place, thus to lie, or be set; to be placed on something; to exist or have a place; to occur, appear, or be found; to be appointed or destined. Although some translations go with “destined,” we did not feel that was the correct meaning, and is very close to “predestined.” Jesus was human, and as a human could have failed in his mission. God “appointed” him as Messiah, but Jesus had to rise to the occasion, and walk out his appointment and calling. So does each Christian.

“to cause.” The eis (#1519 εἰς) in this verse has a causal meaning. Compare NIV and HCSB translations.

“falling and rising.” These are translated from the Greek words ptosis (#4431 πτῶσις) and anastasis (#386 ἀνάστασις). Louw-Nida translates ptosis—usually rendered “falling”—as “to suffer destruction or ruin, with the implication of having formerly held a position of eminence.” Anastasis is used everywhere else in the New Testament, 39 times, to indicate “resurrection.” We were sorely tempted to translate it thus here as well, but did not because the word can also mean “rising,” and is used that way in the LXX, and because the anastasis here seems to include a broader sense of “rising” than just resurrection; although we are quick to add that resurrection is clearly implied here by Simeon. Hence, a narrower translation would be “for the destruction and resurrection of many in Israel.”

The Greek is ambivalent to whether it is the rise of some and the fall of some, or whether everybody falls and then rises. The greater scope of scripture points to the former. However, due to the ambiguity of the Greek, there is the implication that many will fall before they rise, as is the case with the Apostle Paul who first stumbled because of the Lord, then rose up to seize eternal life.

“that will be continually opposed.” “Will be” is supplied because it is a prophecy regarding the future. “Continually” (cp. Williams) comes from the present tense of the verb, in this case a durative present indicating continual action (See commentary on 1 John 1:7 for more on this usage of the present). The Greek is antilegō (#483 ἀντιλέγω). It has two distinct meanings: to be spoken against, or to be opposed. Both fit here, and thus the Greek gives a fuller sense than can be given in English. Christ will be spoken against, but more than that, he will be opposed in general in every way. Jesus is, and always has been, opposed and spoken against by those who will not submit to God’s rule and rules. Robertson (Word Pictures in the New Testament) writes: “Spoken against (antilegomenon). Present passive participle, continuous action. It is going on today. Nietzsche [the German philosopher who was known for the phrase, “God is dead”] regarded Jesus Christ as the curse of the race because he spared the weak.”
There is certainly a sense in which the entire life of Christ was a sign. Jesus Christ himself is a sign that is continually opposed. The sign also can refer to the resurrection of Christ. As Christ told the Pharisees who were asking him for a sign:

Matthew 12:39-40

An evil and adulterous generation seeks for a sign, but no sign will be given to it except the sign of the prophet Jonah. For just as Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of the great fish, so will the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth.

The sign of Jonah was to be the sign for that generation, and this sign was opposed by the Jews (e.g., Matt. 16:21-22; 27:62-64); it makes sense then that the resurrection of Christ was partly what Simeon was referring to.

If the resurrection was the sign, then this verse indicates Christ was “appointed” beforehand for this, which is why God could not take “this cup” from him in Gethsemane (Matt. 26:39; Mark 14:36; Luke 22:42). Having been appointed for this, Christ was the “Lamb that was slain from the creation of the world” (Rev. 13:8 NIV).

2:35. “broadsword.” An unusual word for “sword,” occurring only here and in the book of Revelation (Rev. 1:16; 2:12, 16; 6:8; 19:15, 21). The Greek is rhomphaia (#4501 ῥομφαία). It has several meanings. It was a large sword, usually two edged, which was used by non-Greek-speaking peoples, especially the Thracians. We can rightly refer to it as a “broadsword.” Also, rhomphaia was used of a long Thracian javelin, and also a kind of long sword usually worn on the right shoulder. The word appears very often in the Septuagint, and was the word used for the sword of Goliath. This long, broad, two-edged sword would pass through Mary’s soul as the life of her son developed. The fact that it can refer to a Thracian spear also points to one of the final acts of violence towards her son when the Roman soldier pierced Christ’s side with a spear (cp. Thayer; BDAG).

“soul.” The Greek word often translated “soul” is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoo-kay’), and it has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person or animal; an individual person; or attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. Here it refers to the thoughts, feelings, and emotions of Mary. With all that happened to Jesus in his life, she would feel as if she had been pierced by a sword. [For a more complete explanation of “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’”].

2:36. “Anna.” It is an amazing demonstration of the love God has for His people that He would reveal to both Simeon and Anna that the Christ was in the Temple. The Temple was very segregated, with courts for the men, and courts for the women. The only way to get the word effectively to both groups was for God to tell both a respected man and a respected woman that the Christ was there.

“from when she was a virgin.” Stating it this way emphasizes the purity of Anna’s life, and simultaneously shows that this was her first husband. She lived with this man seven years, until he died and she became a widow; she did not take another husband, but remained a widow until she was 84 here at the temple scene. See entry on 2:37 for controversy regarding Anna’s age.

2:37. “as a widow until the age of eighty-four.” There are differences among commentators and translators as to whether Anna was eighty-four years old, or was a widow for eighty-four years on top of her seven years of marriage and the time before she was married. The Greek can be understood either way. It reads literally, “and she a widow up to eighty-four years,” which could mean she was a widow for eighty-four years or she lived as a widow up to her eighty-fourth year. On the former view, if she was married at age 14 then she would be 105 (14+7+84=105) (Hendriksen). KJV and HCSB go with the interpretation of an older Anna: e.g., “and was a widow for 84 years” (HCSB). However, we have sided with translations such as ESV and NIV, which suppose the younger age. Hendriksen provides a good summary of the arguments and sides with our translation. As he points out, verse 37 portrays Anna as being very active, daily in the temple performing the service of religious duties, praying, and fasting. This is much more likely to be the case if she were 84 rather than 105.

2:39 “And when they had completed everything required by the law of the Lord.”

This is one of the very many places where the word “and” does not indicate that the two events connected by the “and” happened in immediate succession; the “and” simply continues the narration. Another thing that had to be completed after the offering for sin was Jesus’ trip to Egypt. When we put the events of the other Gospels together with this verse, we can see that Joseph and Mary stayed in Bethlehem after Jesus was born until they went to Egypt, and they went from there to Nazareth.

Jesus was born in Bethlehem (Luke 2:4, 11). Joseph and his family still would have been there forty days later when they had to travel the seven miles (11.2 km) north to Jerusalem to present Jesus in the Temple and offer a sacrifice (Luke 2:21-24; Lev. 12:1-8). They were still in Bethlehem when the magi arrived eighteen months to two years later (Matt. 2:8). There is simple no evidence that they left Bethlehem and went back to Nazareth then went back to Bethlehem again in that time, and no reason for them to have done so. After the magi left Bethlehem, Joseph took Mary and Jesus and went to Egypt (Matt. 2:14). He stayed there until Herod was dead and then went back to Nazareth (Matt. 2:15, 23).

A major key to the chronology of the birth of Christ is the phrase in this verse, “when they had completed everything required by the law of the Lord.” The word “law” is the general use of “law” meaning the whole Old Testament, and thus “everything required by the law” refers to all the things in the Old Testament spoken about the Christ, whether it was in the Torah (the five books of Moses), the prophets, or the writings. The Greek phrase kata ho nomos, often translated “according to the law,” in this context refers to the things in the law, or things required by the law (cp. BBE, CEB, CJB, NIV, NJB, NLT, NRSV, and see commentary on Galatians 3:29). Part of what was in the law that had to be fulfilled by the Messiah was that he had to be called out from Egypt (Matt. 2:15; Hos. 11:1). Remembering that, we can see that Luke 2:39 is a kind of summary verse that mentions the trip to Egypt simply by saying they fulfilled everything required by the law.

In summary, Jesus was born in Bethlehem, and his parents stayed there for perhaps as long as two years after he was born, then they went to Egypt to escape Herod. They left Egypt when Herod was dead, and settled in Nazareth.

2:41. “the feast of the Passover.” Passover is one of three feasts—Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles—that required all adult Jewish males to go to Jerusalem (Exod. 23:14-17; 34:22, 23; Deut. 16:16). The imperfect tense of “went” shows they habitually went; compare Hendriksen’s translation: “His parents were in the habit of going to Jerusalem.” Since only males “of mature age” were required to go, that Mary also attended shows us Mary and Joseph were a devoted couple (See Hendriksen).
Luke 2:42. “according to the custom.” For explanation of customary trips to Jerusalem, see entry on 2:41.

Luke 2:43. “of the feast.” There is a question as to whether this phrase belongs in verse 42, “according to the custom of the feast,” or in verse 43, “completed the days of the feast.” The Greek could be read either way; NRSV, NASB, HCSB, KJV, and ASV go with “custom of the feast,” while NIV, ESV, and NET take it to go with verse 43. We believe it should be taken with verse 43 because if left as “custom of the feast” then there is no genitive subject to complete the genitive absolute started in verse 43. Further, it strikes us less likely that they would be said to go to Jerusalem according the “custom of the feast” when in reality it was the Mosaic Law that dictated customary visits to Jerusalem, not “festival custom” (NAB translation).

Luke 2:44. “diligently searching.” The Greek word is anazeteo (ἀναζητέω), comprised of the word for seeking, zeteo (ζητέω), with the intensifier ana. Louw-Nida translates anazeteo as, “to try to learn the location of something by searching for it (presumably somewhat more emphatic or goal-directed than in the case of ζητέω).” We have brought out the intensified meaning of the Greek by the translation “diligently searching.” This seems especially justified here given the situation of a missing child, and Mary’s admission to being “greatly distressed” in verse 48.

Luke 2:48. “Look here!” The Greek word is idou (ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

Luke 2:49. “Why….” These are the first recorded words of Jesus.

Luke “must be.” Jesus, as the Messiah, “must be” in his Father’s house, where he would learn about his Father.

Luke “in my Father’s house.” This is a common Greek idiom, and does not mean “about my Father’s business” which has been popularized by the KJV. The Greek is en tois tou patros mou (ἐν τοῖς τοῦ πατρός μου), which literally translates as “in the of Father of me,” The phrase is an idiom; it does not make sense literally, and idiomatically it means “in my Father’s house.” At 12 years old, Jesus knows he is the promised Messiah and the Son of God, and he told his parents that he “must be” in his Father’s house, the Temple. He was surprised that they would think he would be anywhere else. This verse shows a little of the workings of the mind of a 12 year old who is the sinless Son of God. As a 12 year old, he is appropriately disconnected from the pain his absence would cause his parents, but as the Son of God he already felt the mission of God working inside him and knew he must be in the Temple, and he was sitting at the feet of the great teachers there listening to them, asking them questions, and learning from them (cp. A. T. Robertson, Word Pictures in the New Testament).

Chapter 3
3:1. “Pontius Pilate.” Pontius Pilate was the Roman governor of Judea from 26 to 36 AD. [For more on Pilate, see commentary on Matt. 27:2].

3:4. “Make ready the way of the Lord! Make his paths straight!” This quotation in Luke, which comes from Isaiah 40:3-5 (and the quotation in Matthew 3:3 and Mark 1:3) is from the Septuagint, the Greek Old Testament. The vast majority of scholars believe that the New Testament was written in Greek, and there are many reasons for that. A primary one is textual.

There are simply no extant manuscripts of the NT in Hebrew, and the manuscripts in Aramaic (Syriac) do not seem to be the autographs from which the Greek texts came. Similarly, however, the Greek of the New Testament is so markedly stylistically different from book to book that it does not seem possible that there is an underlying Aramaic text. Although there are some stylistic differences in Aramaic writings, the Aramaic texts we have today would not have led to the stylistic differences that we see in the different books of the Greek New Testament.

There is research that indicates that Hebrew was spoken in the first century more than was believed in the past, and this has led a few scholars to conclude that the original texts of the New Testament were written in Hebrew or Aramaic. The argument is that the texts were written by Jews for Jews, and thus would have not been written in Greek but in a native Jewish tongue. However, that misses the point. The focus of the New Testament documents was the Christian Church. They were not written in Israel and they were not written exclusively to the Jews.

There were many Jews, especially in the diaspora, who spoke Greek. When Stephen addressed the Jews in Jerusalem in Acts 7 (likely less than ten years after the death of Christ), he was speaking Greek and quoting from the Septuagint version of the Old Testament. Stephen’s dispute had begun with, among others, Jews from Alexandria Egypt, which is where the Septuagint was written (Acts 6:9). When he was brought before the Sanhedrin, he quoted from the Septuagint, not the Hebrew Bible. One way we know that is while the Hebrew Bible says Jacob’s family who went to Egypt was 70 people, the Septuagint text says 75, and Stephen said 75 (Acts 7:14).

By the time much of the NT was written, God had already moved away from the Jews and was ministering to the Gentiles. It was not so much that God wanted to abandon the Jews and minister to the Gentiles, but when He began to include the Gentiles, and wanted His People to do the same, they resisted. Many Jews resisted God’s Messiah (Rom. 10:1-4), but it seems even the majority of the Jews who believed in the Messiah wanted to bring them under the Law, rather than accept that God had a new program of grace for all people and had moved away from “the yoke of bondage.” We know from the New Testament that Paul was continuously persecuted by Christian Jews.

So the claim that the NT was written by Jews for Jews is not correct. In fact, it seems that the only book of the New Testament that was written in Israel was James. Even Peter wrote from Babylon (or Rome). By the time Paul visited Jerusalem the year he was arrested, none of the original apostles were listed as being there (Acts 21:17ff). Although we do not know the reason the original Apostles likely left Jerusalem, they may have left with the persecution of Acts 12, and not come back, perhaps in part because the Christian Jews in Jerusalem were rejecting the revelation of the New Testament.
James, who was leading the church at Jerusalem at that time, was not the Apostle James, but James the brother of Jesus. It is worth noting that James did not believe that his half-brother Jesus was the Messiah until sometime after the resurrection. He did not believe by the Feast of Tabernacles, less than a year before Jesus’ death (John 7:5), and the evidence is that he still did not believe when Jesus was dying on the cross, which is why Jesus told John to take care of Jesus’ mother Mary (John 19:27). It seems that after his resurrection, Jesus appeared to his family and convinced them he was alive, because “his brothers” were with the disciples in Acts 1:14. However, there is no mention of James until Acts 12:10, during the persecution of Herod Agrippa, when the Apostles apparently were forced to leave Jerusalem. Apparently in their absence, James took over as an elder in the church and by Acts 15 seems to be the leader of the congregation in Jerusalem.

As we can see from Acts (and Galatians), the Christian Jews in Jerusalem completely ignored the revelation that Paul got that was codified in the books of Romans, Corinthians, and Galatians (see commentary on Galatians 2:2). The fact that Paul was ministering to Jews and Gentiles living outside of Israel, is good evidence that he would have written in Greek. Similarly, by the time the Four Gospels were written the majority of the Church was centered outside of Israel, and that goes for the writing of Hebrews, Peter, Jude, and the writings of John as well. Thus it makes sense that the original texts were in Greek, and that is also perhaps why many of the New Testament quotations of the Old Testament are from the Septuagint, as we see here in Luke 3:4.

3:7. “wrath.” This is the wrath associated with the Day of the Lord (see commentary on Matthew 3:7 and Revelation 6:17).

3:8. “Come now.” For this translation compare Anchor Bible Commentary (Joseph Fitzmyer). NASB, HCSB, and KJV translate the oun (#3767 οὖν) as “therefore.” But “therefore” normally indicates the practical application of that which came before, which makes no sense in this context; rather, this is a continuation of narrative, a logical connection, not properly the practical application. “Come now” captures this sense well.

3:9. “is cut down.” The Greek is the present perfect form of the verb ekkopo (#1581 ἐκκόπω), and “is cut down” is a good translation in this context, which involves “trees.” This verse can be confusing because the present tense of the verb “is cut down,” makes it seem like the cutting is being done now, when in fact the cutting is actually future, at God’s Judgment. This is clear even from the first part of the verse which notes that the cutting has not begun, but the axe has been placed down near the root of the trees in preparation for the cutting.

Translators recognize the confusion that the “is” can cause, and thus some versions actually transpose the present tense to a future tense in their translations, using “will be cut down” (HCSB; NIV; NJB; Moffatt). Although the present tense verb is used, the cutting will be done in the future. This is the idiom some scholars refer to as the “prophetic present,” and it takes an event that is future but certain to happen and coming soon, and treats it as if it is present. The present tense verb being used for an event that is future is also referred to as the futuristic present (Wallace, Greek Grammar Beyond the Basics, p. 535-36). Writing in the prophetic present typically emphasizes either the certainty and inevitability of something happening in the future, or the fact that the event will occur very soon. Other examples of the prophetic present include Matthew 3:10; 17:11; Mark 9:31; 1 Corinthians 15:26; 16:5; 2 Corinthians 13:11; 1 Thessalonians 2:9, 11. The prophetic present idiom is closely related to the prophetic perfect idiom (see commentary the prophetic perfect on Eph. 2:6).

“trees” is the figure of speech hypocatastasis for people (Bullinger, Figures), and is often used for the powerful people in the society (Judges 9:8-15; Song of Solomon 2:3; 7:8; Isa. 56:3; Ezek. 17:22-24; Dan. 4:10, 22; Zech. 4:3-14; Rom. 11:16-24). There are times when a tree is used for a nation (Ezek. 31:2-9), but that is not the case in this context, because nations are judged by God by what happens in and to them, but only people are judged in the future Judgment. For an explanation of hypocatastasis, see commentary on Revelation 20:2.

3:14. “extort money from anyone by threats.” The Greek is διασείω (#1286 διασείω). Robertson (Word Pictures in the New Testament) writes: “Here only in the N.T., but [it is] in the LXX [the Septuagint] and is common in ancient Greek. It means to shake (seismic disturbance, earthquake) thoroughly (dia) and so thoroughly to terrify, to extort money or property by intimidating... It was a process of blackmail to which Socrates refers (Xenophon, Memorabilia, ii. 9, 1).” This was a constant temptation to soldiers. Might does not make right with Jesus.

3:16. “in holy spirit.” There is no definite article. This holy spirit is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.

3:18. “exhorting.” The Greek is parakaleō (#3870 παρακαλέω), and can mean exhort, encourage, etc. It is a verb (participle present active nominative masculine singular) and as such should not be translated as “exhortations” in the sense of a noun. John preached the good news, and one of the ways he did so was by speaking up about many (polus) and various (heteros) subjects, just as he had done in verses 10-14. To say “many others” rather than “many” and “varied” takes some of the emphasis away from the number and variety of subjects that John must have covered in his teaching. Bible teachers should make note of John’s teaching. The Good News is not always proclaimed by teaching about the death of Jesus. We also have to tell people how to live righteously before God. For a similar translated structure to the REV, cp. Lenski.

3:22. “the holy spirit.” There is no definite article. This holy spirit is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.

3:23. “about thirty.” According to the Law of Moses, no one could enter Priestly Service as a Levite until 30 years old, and then they served from 30 to 50 years old (Num. 4:3, 23, 30, etc.). King David changed the age a Levite or priest could serve from thirty years to twenty years old (1 Chron. 23:24-27). However, it is important to note that the Word of God does not say that David spoke by revelation when he made the change. In fact, it is noteworthy that the Bible says that the Levites were counted from 20 years old and older “by the last words of David,” as if this were a decree David made, and thus “his words,” not “God’s word.” Jesus started his ministry when he was “about 30” (Luke 3:23), but would have turned 30 before he carried out his duties as both priest and sacrifice, dying for our sins and interceding for us before God. Jesus began his ministry when he received holy spirit when he was baptized by John (Matt. 3:13-17; John 1:32-34). In the spring of his 29th year he went to Passover at Jerusalem (John 2:23). That fall, we believe Tishri 1, he would have turned 30 [For a Tishri 1 birth, see: Wierwille, Jesus Christ Our Promised Seed; Earnest Martin, The Star that Astonished the World]. The next Passover he would have been crucified, when he was 30 years old.
“thirty.” Thirty?! What happened to the years of his childhood and adolescence, and his life as a young adult? Where are the records that fill in the gap in his life from age 12 (Luke 2:42) to adulthood? The Gospels give us little information about Jesus before he started his ministry. Edersheim writes: “We feel that the scantiness of particulars here supplied by the Gospels was intended to prevent the human interest from overshadowing the grand central Fact, to which alone attention was to be directed. For the design of the Gospels was manifestly not to furnish a biography of Jesus the Messiah, but, in organic connection with the Old Testament, to tell the history of the long-promised establishment of the Kingdom of God upon earth” (Edersheim, Life and Times, book II, p. 145). What we do know is that Jesus was the son of a carpenter, and as the custom of the time was, was trained as a carpenter and became one himself (cp. Mark 6:3).

All the stories about Jesus going to India and studying to become a yogi, or going to some other place to study ancient mystic ways, are erroneous assumptions. In fact, the people of his own hometown Nazareth had witnessed him growing up and quietly doing his work, learning as he went. The prophecy was that Jesus would be quiet and orderly: “He will not cry out or shout or make his voice heard in the streets” (Isa. 42:2 HCSB). He lived the way the New Testament tells us to live: “Now we…command and exhort such people to be busy working in a quiet fashion, and to eat their own bread” (2 Thess. 3:12). Jesus never flaunted his knowledge and led a quiet and obedient lifestyle, growing up in the builders’ trade of his father, which is why he is called both “the carpenter’s son” (Matt. 13:55) and “the carpenter” (Mark 6:3). Jesus’ quiet and unassuming early years is why the people of his hometown were so surprised when he suddenly showed up with great knowledge and power. According to Matthew 13:54 they exclaimed: “Where did this man get this wisdom, and these mighty works?” Had Jesus been gone for some 20 years, and studied mystic ways in some far off place, they would have not been surprised at his knowledge. In fact, Jesus had been studying all along, learning the Word, being obedient to it, and preparing his heart for his ministry.

“the son (as it was assumed) of Joseph.” Luke contains the genealogy of Joseph, tracing his ancestry through David via David’s son Nathan. In contrast, Matthew contains the genealogy of Mary and traces her ancestry through David via David’s son Solomon. Nathan and Solomon were full brothers, both being the sons of David and Bathsheba (1 Chron. 3:5; cp. 2 Sam. 5:14; 1 Chron. 14:4). The Gospel of Luke never mentions Mary for the simple reason that it is not her genealogy. Similarly, Matthew never mentions Joseph, the husband of Mary, because it is not his genealogy (the Joseph in Matthew 1:16 is the father of Mary, see commentary on Matthew 1:16).

Once we realize that Matthew has Mary’s genealogy and does not mention Joseph at all, and Luke has Joseph’s genealogy and does not mention Mary at all, two things happen: the genealogies makes sense (one genealogy for Mary and one for Joseph), and also many fanciful explanations for the two genealogies is eliminated. For example, some commentators have concluded that both genealogies belong to Joseph, saying that by custom Joseph had two different fathers, a real father, Jacob, and a levirate father, Heli. But that is clearly an assumption to solve a problem that does not actually exist, and it creates another and larger problem: it would mean that Joseph has two genealogies while Mary has none.

Most of the commentators who say that Matthew is Joseph’s genealogy and Luke is Mary’s genealogy realize that each parent should have a genealogy. However, they anchor their argument in their belief that Matthew 1:16 is referring to Joseph the husband of Mary (but it is not!), and based on that they say Matthew’s genealogy has to be about Joseph and Luke’s about Mary, even though Luke does not mention Mary. They answer the objection that Luke’s genealogy does not mention Mary by saying it does not have to since Luke chapter 1 made it clear that Mary was the mother of Jesus. Our rebuttal is that both Matthew and Luke make it clear that Mary is the mother of Jesus, but in the actual genealogical list, Matthew mentions only Mary while Luke mentions only Joseph.

Defenders of the position that Luke has Mary’s genealogy point out that the Talmud says Heli was the father of Mary, not Joseph, and therefore Luke must contain Mary’s genealogy. Our rebuttal to that line of reasoning is that the Talmud was written centuries after Christ, and the animosity between the Jews and Christians had been going on for years. It is well known that in the centuries after Christ the Jews did many things to try to prove that Jesus was not the Christ. As late as when the Gospel of Matthew was written (likely 50-65 AD; more than 20 years after Jesus was crucified) the Jews were still aggressively promoting that Jesus was not the Christ, which is why Matthew says that it was “assumed” he was the son of Joseph. The Jews did not believe he was the Son of God. The Jews also promoted that Jesus’ body was stolen from the grave by his disciples (Matt. 28:15-17). They also discounted many of the Messianic prophecies so that Jesus could not be said to have fulfilled those prophecies. For the Jews, whether accidentally or on purpose, misunderstanding the genealogy in Luke would be just one more way to show the New Testament was confusing and erroneous. It should be recognized that believers such as Sextus Julius Africanus (c. 230), who predates the Talmud, wrote that Luke gave Joseph’s genealogy, and so did a number of the Church Fathers.

Despite all the rhetoric (some of it quite ungodly, even involving name-calling) about the genealogies in Matthew and Luke, the solution is quite simple. God gave us a mathematical key in Matthew that, along with the Aramaic text, makes it clear that Matthew has Mary’s genealogy, which is why Matthew mentions Mary and not Joseph. Luke, on the other hand, mentions Joseph and not Mary because it is Joseph’s genealogy.

3:36. “the son of Cainan.” The name Cainan does not appear in any Hebrew manuscript, but appears in the Septuagint, the Greek translation of the Hebrew. The Septuagint added to the Old Testament in other places, and this is very likely an addition, for no one earlier than Augustine mentions Cainan. Also, some early Greek manuscripts omit the name in Luke, while others have a different form of it. It is almost certainly an addition to the Septuagint, which then was brought into some early manuscripts of Luke.

4:1. “full of holy spirit.” There is no definite article. This holy spirit is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.]

“in the desert.” Matthew 4:1 and Mark 1:12 clearly tell us that the spirit led, or drove, Jesus into the desert: Greek, eis (#1519 εἰς). Luke, however, emphasizes that Jesus was being led (imperfect tense) by the spirit while in the desert, using the Greek word en (#1722 ἐν) rather than eis. Some later texts changed the reading to eis to harmonize with the other gospels, and this explains the KJV’s translation “into the wilderness.”
4:2. “the Slanderer.” “Slanderer” is the literal meaning of the Greek diabolo [6183, διάβολος]. The Bible never gives a proper name for the Devil, although it seems clear that at one time he had one. It is fitting that God does not glorify the Devil by telling us what his original name meant. It likely contained inherent honor and blessing that he now no longer has or deserves. [For more information on the characteristics inferred by the names and appellations of God’s archenemy, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”.

4:3. “the Slanderer.” Slanderer” is the literal meaning of the Greek diabolo [6183, διάβολος]. The Bible never gives a proper name for the Devil, although it seems clear that at one time he had one. [See Appendix 14, “Names of the Slanderer”.

4:4. Quoted from Deuteronomy 8:3.

4:5. Showed him all the kingdoms. Matthew and Luke both record the 3 temptations that the Adversary tempted Jesus with, but worded slightly differently and in a different order. Commentators differ as to whether Matthew or Luke has the order of events as they actually happened. We believe Luke has the order correct because Luke says he recorded things “in order” (Luke 1:3). Furthermore, another reason we believe Luke has the correct order is that to the Devil, the most desirable outcome would be to have Jesus worship him, but if he could not accomplish that, to kill Jesus and be done with him. The order of temptations in Luke accomplishes that goal. The second temptation would result in Jesus worshipping the Devil, and if that failed the third temptation would have resulted in Jesus’ death.

4:6. “inhabited world.” There are different words translated “world” or “earth,” and the differences in the meanings are important. Unfortunately, most versions translated both oikoumene and kosmos as “world,” leaving the English reader with no way to see the differences. The Greek word in Luke 4:5 is oikoumene (#3625 οἰκουµένη), and it means 1. The earth as inhabited area, exclusive of the heavens above and nether regions, the inhabited earth, the world. 2. The world as administrative unit, the Roman Empire (in the hyperbolic diction commonly used in reference to emperors, the Roman Empire equaled the whole world). 3. All the inhabitants of the earth, then, figuratively humankind (cp. Acts 17:31; Luke 2:1, 4). When it means the whole world so far as living beings inhabiting it, it seems to include the realm of transcendent beings as well. The inhabited world is different from kosmos, the world as a creation.

The Greek world kosmos (#2889 κόσμος) has several different definitions (from BDAG). The basic idea is one of order or orderliness. 1. That which serves to beautify through decoration, adornment, adorning (1 Peter 3:3). 2. Condition of orderliness, orderly arrangement, order. 3. The sum total of everything here and now, the world, the (orderly) universe (John 17:5). 4. The sum total of all beings above the level of the animals, the world (1 Cor. 4:9). 5. The planet earth as a place of inhabitation, the world, the world in contrast to heaven. 6. By metonymy: humanity in general, the world. 7. The world, and everything that belongs to it, appears as that which is hostile to God. 8. Collective aspect of an entity, totality, sum total the tongue becomes (or proves to be) the sum total of iniquity (James 3:6).

In Matthew 4: 8 the Slanderer showed Jesus the kingdoms of the kosmos, in Luke, the Slanderer shows Jesus the kingdoms of the oikoumene. Putting the two together shows that the Devil was offering Jesus everything in his dominion, the physical earth and the inhabitants of it.
   “glory.” The word also has the meaning of “praise,” “honor” (Cp. Acts 12:23; 2 Cor. 6:8; 8:19, 23). The world praised the Adversary. We Christians praise God. If Jesus was looking for the praise of men, he could have had it then and there.
4:10-11. Quoted from Psalm 91:11-12.
4:12. Quoted from Deuteronomy 6:16.
4:18-19. Quoted from Isaiah 61:1, 2.
4:23. Capernaum. Jesus made his home in Galilee in Capernaum. [For more information on Capernaum, see commentary on Mark 2:1].
4:33: “spirit (that is to say an unclean demon).” This construction in Greek is the genitive of apposition (Cp. Lenski). The literal Greek, “a spirit of an unclean demon,” means, “a spirit, that is to say an unclean demon,” or “a spirit; an unclean demon,” or even, “a spirit; an unclean demon.”
4:34. “Ha!” An exclamation that combines many elements, and is therefore hard to translate. It can include the emotions of surprise, indignation, fear, and dismay.
   “What do we have in common with you?” See commentary, Matthew 8:29.
4:35. “And Jesus subdued him, saying, “Be bound!” and “Come out of him!” The first half of verse 35 is worded exactly like Mark 1:25. The sentence uses vocabulary that has a technical sense. For example, in this case “subdue” is the Greek word epitimaō (#2008 ἐπιτιµάω) and it is used in this verse as it was used in Greek religion of gaining control over a spirit, a demon. See commentary on Mark 1:25.
   “Be bound.” The Greek word was used in magic to denote binding a person with a spell. Jesus “bound” the demon with his word. See commentary on Mark 1:25.
4:39. “subdued.” The Greek word translated “subdued” is epitimaō (#2008 ἐπιτιµάω), and this is the technical sense of the word as it was used in Greek religion for taking control over a spirit. Robert Guelich (Word Biblical Commentary: Mark) notes that epitimaō is “a commanding word uttered by God or by his spokesman, by which evil powers are brought into submission.” Jesus subdued the fever by the power of God, which was expressed in words. See commentary on Mark 1:25.
4:41. “subduing.” See commentary on verses 35 and 39, and also Mark 1:25.

Chapter 5

5:12. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).
5:18. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).
5:21. “defaming words.” The Greek noun is blasphēmia (#988 βλασφημία; pronounced blas-fay-me'-ah), and was used of someone speaking against another. The primary meaning as it was used in the Greek culture was showing disrespect to a person or deity, and/or harming his, her, or its reputation. See commentary on Mark 2:7. [For more on blasphēmia, see commentary on Matt. 9:3].
5:23. “Which is easier?” Which is easier to say and accomplish, declaring someone’s sins are forgiven, or divine healing? They are equally easy. They both require authority from God and the faith to walk out on the revelation God gives. The Pharisees did not see this simple truth. They believed in divine healing but did not believe a person could have the authority to forgive sins. But God gives authority to do both.

5:27. “Levi.” This is the Apostle Matthew.

5:29. “And Levi made him a great feast in his house.” This verse makes it clear that the dinner associated with the calling of the Apostle Matthew was held at Matthew’s house. The Gospel of Matthew and Mark are not clear, and only say, “his” house (Matt. 9:10; Mark 2:15). See commentary on Matthew 9:10.

5:35. “But the days will come.” To be properly understood, this sentence fragment needs to be completed, finishing the thought of the previous sentence (v. 34). Thus the full thought is, “But the days will come, when the bridegroom is not with them.” This is not the figure of speech ellipsis, which is most usually the omission of a word in the middle of a sentence. Nevertheless, it is elliptical, in the sense that the reader must fill in what is missing.

Chapter 6

6:23. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

6:27. “love your enemies.” The word “love” is the verb agapaō (#25 ἀγαπάω; the more familiar noun is agapē). In this context, to love one’s enemy does not mean to “feel good” about them, but rather to act toward them in a loving manner. To better understand what God is telling us when He says, “love your enemies,” see the commentary on John 21:15, “I am your friend.” The second phrase of the verse, “do good to those who hate you,” explains agapaō in this context.

“Do good to those who hate you.” This teaching is profoundly wonderful and the highest sense of morality was taught by our Lord. This can especially be seen when comparing this with the teachings of the Greeks at the time, who proclaimed that one ought to harm their enemies in order to be just. In the Republic, Plato’s interlocutors have the following exchange:

“Should one also give one’s enemies whatever is owed to them?"
“By all means, one should give them what is owed to them. And in my view what enemies owe to each other is appropriately and precisely—something bad."
“...To treat friends well and enemies badly is justice?"
“I believe so” (Republic, 332b, d).

6:28. “bless those who curse you.” The word “curse” is kataraomai (#2672 καταράω), and it means to curse, to call down evil upon. A genuine curse is not just “hate language,” it has spiritual power. People can curse using the power of the Devil or the power of God. When we curse using the power of God, it is always by revelation, as God directs us to, and it is very rare. Jesus cursed the fig tree in Mark 11:14 (Peter correctly called what Jesus did a curse in 11:21). When wicked people curse, they are using the Devil and his demons to accomplish the curse. Someone saying something bad about someone else is not a curse, but conscripting the power of the Devil to accomplish something spoken is a curse. Witches’ “spells” are curses.

This commandment requires much from the Christian, because personal attacks always hurt us emotionally. We have to understand that if we are blameless in God’s eyes, the curses of the enemy cannot hurt us. Proverbs 26:2 (NET): “Like a fluttering bird or like a flying swallow, so a curse without cause does not come to rest.” In other words, an undeserved curse will have no effect.

Christians have to be so secure in who we are in Christ and that we will be blessed by God that we can bless those people who curse us. The reason that it can be so difficult to ignore curses is that they are often very personal in nature. They often come from people whom we care about, and/or can be very personal in nature. The ancient Romans and the people of the biblical culture often called on the gods to curse and harm people, and curses can have spiritual power and cause genuine damage if one is not protected by God and godliness. One curse tablet that now is in the City Archaeological Museum of Bologna reads: “Destroy, crush, kill, strangle Porcello and his wife Maurilla. Their soul [life], heart, buttocks, liver…. A curse directed at a Roman senator reads: “Crush, kill, Fistus the senator... May Fistus dilute, languish, sink, and may all his limbs be dissolved” (Archaeology Magazine, Sept/Oct 2012; “Curses,” p. 16).

Especially in the biblical world where almost everyone believed in the power of curses to harm them, knowing about God’s protection and desiring to help the misguided person who cursed others by blessing him back, was an act of great love and faith.

Luke 6:29. “To whoever strikes you on the one cheek, offer the other also.” This verse is not talking about the death penalty or any other type of civil crime or punishment for crimes, although many Christians think it does. Interestingly, people who quote this verse as if it were saying there should not be a death penalty do not seem to grasp that the verse is saying there should not be any kind of retribution at all. If this verse were applied universally to the criminal justice system, it would mean no fines, no jails and not even any community service. If applied in a criminal context, it would read something like, “If someone steals one of your cars, give him the keys to your other car. Surely even the most liberal of people do not believe that we can have a safe society if we do not enforce any laws or have any kind of penalties for breaking laws.

Why would Christ say something like “turn the other cheek?” What did he mean? In the culture of the Bible, touching or striking someone on the cheek was an insult. It was the equivalent of calling someone a dirty name today. Jesus knew that his disciples would be insulted, and that it is a waste of time and energy to try to get “satisfaction” for an insult. So he instructed people to “turn the other cheek,” i.e., ignore insults, and by showing the other cheek, show that you are firm in your beliefs and actions even if it means you will be insulted again.

There are other Bible verses that show that slapping someone on the cheek was an insult: Lamentations 3:30: “Let him offer his cheek to one who would strike him and let him be filled with disgrace.” Job 16:10: “Men open their mouths to jeer at me, they strike my cheek in scorn.” Isaiah 50:6: “I offered my cheeks, I did not hide from mocking and spitting.”

A good example of slapping on the face as an insult occurs in 1 Kings. The Israelite king, Ahab, was trying to convince the Judean king, Jehoshaphat, to join forces with him and fight the Arameans. Ahab brought out an impressive number of prophets who all foretold success in the mission. However, there was no prophet of the true God represented in the group. Jehoshaphat insisted on hearing from one, and at last Ahab found a prophet of Yahweh, a man named Micaiah, who insulted the other prophets by first mocking what they had said, and then giving a contradictory prophecy—one that came true, by the way. One of the false prophets, a man named Zedekiah was incensed: “Then Zedekiah, son of Kenaanah, went up and slapped Micaiah in the face” (1 Kings 22:24). This was not an attack on Micaiah’s life or body. Zedekiah was insulted by Micaiah’s words, and he insulted Micaiah back in a way that was perfectly understood in the culture. Micaiah, as if following the words of Jesus spoken some 800 years later, ignored Zedekiah’s insult and simply kept on speaking the words God gave him to speak.

Christians need to follow the advice of the Lord and learn to ignore insults without burning in anger. We also need to know the culture and customs of the Bible so that we can correctly interpret such verses. The command to “turn the other cheek” has no bearing on the criminal justice system and the justice exercised by the government in the defense of society, and neither does it have anything to do with self-defense or war.

Chapter 7

7:12. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).
7:14. “bier.” The Jews carried the bodies of their dead to the grave on something that resembled a stretcher. It was flat and open. “Coffin” gives the wrong impression, because the bier had no sides, but was simply a platform on which the body was laid. In the biblical culture, people were buried the same day they died, before the body started to decay (See Zondervan Pictorial Encyclopedia).
7:16. “God has visited his people.” This verse can be confusing to some people who do not realize that God usually “visits” us, or works around us, through other people. Occasionally, Trinitarians will cite this verse as proof that Jesus is God, because it says that God visited His people. However, that phrase in no way proves the Trinity. Any word or phrase in Scripture must be interpreted in light of both its immediate and remote contexts. In this case, the immediate context alerts us to the truth being presented. The people called Jesus “a great prophet,” which tells us right away that they did not think he was God.

God “visits” His people by sending them some blessing. This is clear from verses like Ruth 1:6, “Then she [Naomi] arose with her daughters in law, that she might return from the country of Moab: for she had heard in the country of Moab how that the LORD had visited his people in giving them bread.” In the Book of Ruth, Yahweh “visited” His people by sending them bread, but even that did not mean that God gave them the bread.
directly, like He had done with the manna at the time of Moses. God “visited” the people by ending the famine and allowing the ground to produce grain again, but the people were the ones who plowed, sowed, weeded, and harvested. God simply provided the fertility, but without His blessing nothing would grow. So God “visiting” His people, in that case, was simply Him putting His blessing on the soil. In a similar fashion, in the Gospels, God visited His people by sending them “a great prophet” who raised a widow’s son from the dead.

A lesson we should learn from this verse and others like it is that God works through His people. When He does, He often gets the credit even when people do the actual work. When God works through people, the Word records things like, “God visited His people” (Luke 7:16) and “God has done great things” (Luke 8:39). Americans today use the same language. If an acquaintance gives you some money when you need it and says, “The Lord put it on my heart to give this to you,” you might well say to someone else, “The Lord really blessed me today.” Neither you nor any other person would believe that you were saying that the person who gave you money was “the Lord.” Everyone understands that the Lord works through people, and so our language, like biblical language, reflects that knowledge. For more information on this, see Charles Morgridge, True Believer’s Defense Against Charges Preferred by Trinitarians, p. 118.

7:19. “Are you the Coming One.” See the commentary on Matthew 11:3.

“another one.” The Greek word “another” is allos (#243 ἀλλος), here meaning another of the same kind; a second one. In other words, “Are you THE one, or is there a second one?” (Or perhaps, “Is there someone else?”) This record has a different emphasis than the record in Matthew 11:3, which uses the Greek word heteros (#2087 ἴτερος), referring to someone of a different quality. See commentary on Matthew 11:3.

7:27. Quoted from Malachi 3:1.

“road.” See commentary on Mark 1:3.

7:29. “declared God righteous.” This seemingly difficult phrase is very powerful. The idea being portrayed is that God is on trial. Is He a righteous God? Has he provided a way for mankind to repent, have forgiveness of sins, and thus have salvation? Yes, He has. The jury of the people has spoken. God is righteous, and has provided for mankind. However, the religious leaders rejected God’s provision (verse 30), to their own doom. It is important to realize that the tax collectors and sinners did not “declare” God to be righteous with their mouth, although they may have done that too, but by their actions.

7:34. “See!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

7:37. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδοû), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).
8:4. The Parable of the Sower. It is perhaps more accurately named, “The Parable of the Soil.” It is also in Mark 4:3ff. See commentary on Matthew 13:3.

8:8. “Anyone who has ears to hear had better listen!” This is the same Greek phrase as occurs in Mark 4:9 (see commentary there), and almost the same Greek phrase as occurs in Matthew 11:15. For an explanation of the exclamation, see the commentary on Matthew 11:15. This verse is longer, reading, “Anyone who has ears to hear had better listen,” while the occurrences in Matthew read, “Anyone who has ears had better listen!”

“sacred secrets.” We translate the Greek word musterion (#3466 μυστήριον) as “sacred secret” because that is what musterion actually refers to: a secret in the religious or sacred realm. [For more information on the “Sacred Secret” and the Administration of Grace, see Ephesians 3:9.]

“so that…” For this quotation from Isaiah and the purpose of parables, see commentary on Matthew 13:13. The “so that” is a hina with a verb in the subjunctive mood purpose-result clause: see entry on Matthew 2:15, “resulting in…what was spoken being fulfilled.” To fully understand this passage, we must see how Matthew’s record portrays the human side of the events, John’s the spiritual side, and Mark and Luke’s records combine the two into one.

8:12. “the Slanderer.” This is “the Devil.” The Greek is diabolos (#1228 διάβολος). The Greek word diabolos means “slanderer,” the one who slanders others, and that is a primary characteristic of the Devil. He has no regard for a person’s reputation or the illicit means he uses to discredit and destroy people. Slander is a primary tactic of the Devil. [For information on the names of the Devil, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”].

“cannot believe.” The verb “believe” is in the subjunctive mood, thus many versions have “may” not believe, but the Greek conjunction hina (#2443 ἧνα) earlier in the sentence is the reason the verb is subjunctive, and therefore in these cases we must get the sense of the verb from the context. In this case, the Devil does not take the word from people so they “may” not believe, his intention is that with no word in their heart, they “cannot” believe (see J. B. Phillips, The New Testament in Modern English. The translations by N. T. Wright and A. Nyland, say “won’t” believe).

8:19. “his mother.” Jesus’ family had come to take control of him, because they thought he had gone insane (There is no mention of Joseph; he had apparently died. See commentary on John 19:27).

8:24. “subdued.” The Greek word translated “subdued” is epitimaō (#2008 ἐπιτιμάω), and this is the technical sense of the word as it was used in Greek religion for taking control over a spirit. Robert Guelich (Word Biblical Commentary: Mark) notes that epitimaō is “a commanding word uttered by God or by his spokesman, by which evil powers are brought into submission.” Jesus subdued the storm, which was no doubt caused by a demon, by the power of God that he wielded, which was expressed in words. The power came from God and was used by Jesus. Jesus did not gain control over the storm by some “magic words” or formula that he used. “It is not a magical incantation...it is powerful Word of the Son” (Gerhard Kittel, Theological Dictionary, ἐπιτιμάω Vol. 2, p. 626). For more on epitimaō, see commentary on Mark 1:25.

8:27. “in the tombs.” Inside them, not “among” them. See commentary on Mark 5:3.

“torment me.” See commentary on Matthew 8:29.

8:40. “returned.” The Greek word is hupostrepho (♯5290 ὑποστρέφω) and it means, to return, to turn back. In this case, the parallel record in Mark 5:21ff makes it clear Jesus “returned” to a city back across the Sea of Galilee, most likely to Capernaum. The main reason there can be confusion about this word “return” and whether it refers to returning back to Capernaum or returning again to where the demon-possessed men were, is that Luke 8:37 says that Jesus, “got into a boat and returned (to Capernaum).” However, a careful reading of the context reveals that is a summary statement, not strictly in chronological order, because verse 38 shows the man who had been delivered still talking with Jesus, so Jesus had not in fact left yet. He actually left in verse 40. The reason this is important is that verse 40 says the people welcomed Christ, and were expecting him. That was certainly true of Capernaum. Capernaum was Jesus’ home (see commentary on Mark 2:1), and where he lived, so the people expected him to come home periodically. In contrast, there is no indication Jesus said he would return to the area where the demon-affected man lived.

8:41. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (♯2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

8:47. “she came trembling, and falling down before him.” The record of the woman who had the issue of blood for twelve years occurs in Matthew 9:20-22; Mark 5:25-35; and Luke 8:43-48. Each record has some of the same information, but each record includes different details as well. In this case, there are too many matching details for the records not to be of the same event, and there are no contradictory details—they all fit together to make a singular picture of the event. Mark and Luke include many details that are left out of Matthew. Matthew does not record the power that came from Jesus, or how Jesus then searched for the person who touched him. The focus in Matthew is on the woman’s need, her King meeting that need, and Jesus focusing on her faith. Like a benevolent King, he tells the woman to “Be of good cheer,” because her faith had healed her. Mark and Luke include many more details, and it seems almost like some kind of professional courtesy that it is Mark, not Luke (Luke was a doctor!) who says she suffered many things from many doctors and instead of getting better got worse (Mark 5:26). Mark and Luke record Jesus having to be persistent to find the person who touched him, including having to ignore his close disciples who thought it was incredulous that he would even ask who touched him in that large crowd. Because the Gospel of Mark focuses on Jesus as a servant, and Luke on Jesus as a man, a human being (see commentary on Mark 1:1), it seems to make sense that Jesus would have to fight with more circumstances to find out what happened to him, whereas it makes sense that as the King, Jesus would simply see the woman and address her.

8:52. “sleeping.” The Greek verb is katheudō (♯2518 καθεύδω). Sleep is used as a euphemism and metaphor for death. See commentary on Acts 7:60.

Chapter 9
9:3. “staff.” The Gospel of Mark says to take a staff. For information on the apparent contradiction, see commentary on Matthew 10:10.

9:7. “out from among the dead.” See Romans 4:24. Wuest: “out from amongst those who were dead.”

9:18. “alone.” In this case, “alone” means apart from the huge crowd mentioned in the previous verses.

9:19. “Elijah.” For information on why the people thought that Elijah would come, and why John the Baptist was called “Elijah,” see commentary on Matthew 17:10.

9:20. “life” (2x). The Greek word is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoo-kay’), often translated “soul.” The Greek word has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person or animal; an individual person; or attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. Here it refers to the physical life of the body, which is why most versions translate it “life,” which is accurate in this context. [For a more complete explanation of psuchē, “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’.”]

9:25. “life.” The Greek word is psuchē, as in verse 24. It is used twice in verse 24 of the life of the body, and it is expanded in this verse to be life in general, both here and the hereafter, which is why many versions translate it “life” in verse 24 but “soul” in verse 25. We felt it was better to translate the word the same way in both verses and point out that “life” can be just our physical life or our physical and everlasting life [For a more complete explanation of psuchē, “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’.”].

9:26. “ashamed.” Most Christians do not understand the Day of Judgment or the Kingdom of Christ on earth, so these words do not make sense to them. Although unbelievers may well be ashamed of the words of Christ, many believers are too, and they show it by not boldly standing on what Jesus said, often never mentioning Jesus or his teachings, but instead trying to “blend in” to the people around them. [For more on the Kingdom being on earth, see Appendix 2: “Life in the Age to Come”; for more on rewards and punishments on the Day of Judgment, see commentary on 2 Cor. 5:10, “good or worthless.”]

“of the holy angels.” This is a simple and well stated truth: when Jesus comes back, it will be in his glory, and the Father’s, and the holy angels. There is no mention of the “Person,” the Holy Spirit, because there is no such “third person of the Trinity.” See, Graeser, Lynn, Schoenheit, The Gift of Holy Spirit: The Power to Be Like Christ.

9:28. “went up onto the mountain.” For an explanation of this event, which is referred to as “The Transfiguration,” see commentary on Matthew 17:2.

9:29. “the appearance of his face became different.” For more on this event, which is referred to as “the Transfiguration,” see the commentary on Matthew 17:2 and 3.

9:30. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἴδον), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

9:38. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἴδον), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

9:39. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἴδον), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

“made him have convulsions.” It is possible that the demon threw the boy to the ground, as some translations say. But there are other translations that say the demon tore the boy, and that seems to be in accord with the Greek which seems to be much stronger than simply throw on the ground. The word we translate as “tore” is regnumi, and means “To cause to come apart or be in pieces by means of internal or external force, tear in pieces, break, burst (burst the wine-skins: Mk 2:22; cp. Mt 9:17; Luke 5:37). Passive = be torn, burst. Of ferocious animals tear in pieces w. their teeth” (from BDAG). If a demon has to leave someone, because of its evil and hateful nature, it will do everything it can to hurt the person by tearing flesh, nerves, or anything else it can as it leaves. In this case, the demon saw Jesus coming, and was going to hurt the boy as much as possible before he left, tearing the boy and convulsing him. (Cp. the record in Mark 9:20).

9:45. “so they did not perceive it.” This is a result clause in Greek. It was not hidden from them in order that, for the purpose of, the disciples not perceiving Christ’s meaning. Rather, the disciples’ own preconceived notion of the Messiah and his role concealed this meaning from their understanding, “so they did not perceive it.” It does not make sense to say Jesus concealed it because he precedes the saying with, “let this sink into your hearing.” Nor does it make sense that God would be at odds against Christ, causing them to be blinded to it, when the Lord desired the disciples to understand.

9:48. “Indeed.” This is the “confirmatory” use of the Greek gar, not the causal use in which it is usually translated “for.” Some grammarians refer to it as the “confirmatory gar.”

Chapter 10

10:3. “Pay attention.” The Greek word is idou (#2400 Ἰδοὺ), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!). Evangelism is a serious work, difficult in itself due to the fallen nature of man and mankind’s general resistance to godliness. Adding to that difficulty, however, is the spiritual battle that always rages around any outreach work. Thus it is understandable that the Lord would start instructing us about it with, “Pay attention.”

10:4. “greet no one.” This does not mean to be unfriendly. The oriental greetings were long and involved, and Jesus wanted his disciples to go with haste.

10:18. “the Adversary.” The Greek word for Adversary is Satanas (#4567 Σατανᾶς), which has been transliterated into “Satan” in most versions. This causes the meaning of the word, which is important, to be lost. For more information on it, see the note on Mark 1:13. [For more information on the names of the Devil, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”].

This verse is a vivid testimony to the problems that believers can cause in the Adversary’s kingdom when they teach the truth, heal the sick, and cast out demons. The Devil spends much of his time in heaven, where he constantly makes accusations against God’s people (Job 1:6, 7, 12; 2:1, 2, 7; Rev. 12:10). However, he comes to the earth when he needs to, as he did when he appeared to Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden (Gen. 3), or when he personally tempted Jesus Christ in the desert (Matt. 4:1-11; Luke 4:1-13). The book of Revelation shows us that in the future the Devil will be cast out of heaven and no longer allowed access to God (Rev. 12:10).

In Luke 10 Jesus sent out the 72 (or 70; the Greek texts are divided) with the authority to heal and cast out demons. They were very effective in helping God’s people, because they came back to Jesus amazed at the deliverance they were able to accomplish.
through the power of God. They said, “Lord, even the demons are subject to us in your name.” This was great news for God’s people, but terrible news for the Devil and his kingdom. Before Christ’s time, no one had effectively delivered people from demonic power. Now Jesus, the Twelve, and the 72, were casting demons out of people and destroying the oppressive system the Devil had carefully built.

The Devil could not just stand by and watch this happen. He came to earth to personally intercede, and try to minimize the damage that the disciples were doing, as well as try to cause them problems in any way he could. Thus, just as he left heaven to tempt Adam and Eve (Gen. 3), and to tempt Jesus (Matt. 4; Luke 4), he quickly left heaven to support his demonic army on earth. God showed Jesus the Devil’s rapid descent from heaven in a revelation vision. Thus, when the disciples joyfully exclaimed that even demons were subject to them in Christ’s name, Jesus supported their faith by telling them that they had such a powerful and damaging effect on Satan’s kingdom that Satan had quickly, like lightning, come down from heaven.

The Greek word translated “fall” in Luke 10:18 is πίπτω (#4098) and is a general term for all types of falling or downward motion, including falling off of things, throwing oneself down before dignitaries, falling down dead, lightning falling from the sky, being ruined personally (“falling” from grace), and even the heat of the sun “falling” upon people. Thus, the exact meaning of πίπτω has to be taken from the context, and the context of Luke 10:18 is the disciples causing a disturbance in the Devil’s kingdom, so he “fell” (traveled quickly downward) from heaven to correct it.

Some Christians teach that when Jesus said he saw Satan fall from heaven, he was saying that he existed in the beginning and saw when Satan and his demons rebelled against God and were cast out of heaven. That interpretation does not fit the context of the verse. What difference would it make in the context of Luke 10 that Jesus had seen Satan’s rebellion and fall? Such a statement would not have supported the 72, and in fact would have confused them. Furthermore, it is not the kind of statement that Jesus would make, because it would be pointing to something he had done ages before that was completely removed from the situation he was in. It would almost seem like bragging. The Trinitarian explanation of this verse is incorrect, and takes away the powerful meaning of the verse, which is the damage we disciples can do to Satan’s kingdom if we walk in the power that God has given us.

“falling.” The Greek is πίπτω (#4098), and it means to fall, or “to move with relative rapidity in a downward direction” (BDAG). It is not that Satan “fell,” as if he tripped and fell, or that he was thrown down, so he fell. He moved with great rapidity, like lightning, traveling in a downward direction from heaven to earth.

10:19. “Look!” The Greek word is ιδού (#2400), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

10:21. “in the holy spirit.” There is no definite article. This holy spirit is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.

10:22. This verse is very similar to Matthew 11:27, see commentary there.

10:25. “Look!” The Greek word is ιδού (#2400), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

10:28. “live.” This is one of the many places where “live” is used idiomatically for “live forever,” and sometimes “life” is used in the same way: idiomatically for everlasting life.

The idiom is very ancient, and is why Ezekiel 33:12-20 is very clear that if a “righteous” person becomes unrighteous he will “die” (i.e., “die” forever, sometime after he is judged on the Day of Judgment), while if a wicked person repents and becomes righteous he will “live,” (i.e., live forever). It is why Habakkuk says that righteous will “live” (i.e., live forever) by their faithfulness (Hab. 2:4). There are many other uses of the idiom, and there are cases where, although the primary meaning of “live” is “live forever,” there are undertones of also “live to the fullest.” For “live” meaning “live forever,” see, John 5:25; 6:57; 11:25; 14:19; Rom. 6:8; 2 Tim. 2:11; Heb. 12:9. For “life,” meaning “everlasting life,” see, Matt. 7:14; 18:8, 9; 19:17; Mark 9:43, 45; John 3:36; 5:40; 20:31; Acts 11:18; Rom. 5:18; Gal. 3:21; 2 Tim. 1:1; 1 John 3:14; 5:12.

Just as “live” or “life” can refer to everlasting life, “die” and “death” could refer to everlasting death (see commentary on John 8:51).

10:31. “he passed by on the other side.” The man who was mugged was an Israelite. So why would the priest and Levite not help him? It is not that they were “bad people.” They had their priorities wrong. The man was half dead, and could have died at any time. If the priest or Levite was helping the man, and he died, then they would have been unclean for 7 days (Num. 19:11-16) and would not have been able to “spiritually minister” to others. Thus, these men put their “spiritual duties” above helping their fellow-man. They should have known from the law that God desires mercy, not sacrifice (Matt. 12:7; Hos. 6:6; Micah 6:6-8). This happens far too often in Christianity. Our families get ignored while we do “spiritual things” for the Body of Christ. Or we ignore the cries of other humans while we take care of spiritual responsibilities. The lesson that the Lord is teaching us from the parable of the Good Samaritan is that we are to love our neighbor, and when we do, it is spiritual service.

10:42. “but one thing is necessary.” This is one of the many places where the verse should have been started in a different place for clarity. The sentence reads, “you are anxious and troubled about many things, but one thing is necessary….” When the sentence is broken in the middle by the “42,” it can be difficult to see what it means.

11:6. “just come.” The verb is in the aorist tense. The guest had just arrived and caught the host off guard, with nothing to feed him.

11:9. “keep asking.” This verb is in the continuous present tense. See commentary on John 16:24, “keep asking.”

11:11. This verse has several textual variants. The one in the REV reflects the Nestle-Aland 27 Greek text (cp. Metzger, Textual Commentary).

11:13. “give holy spirit.” There is no definite article. This holy spirit is the gift of God, which was poured out on the day of Pentecost. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’.”]
11:14. “mute demon.” Since the textual evidence favors the omission of “and it was,” and since the word “mute” is an adjective, it makes sense to say “mute demon,” i.e., a demon that causes muteness.

11:15. “Beelzebul.” The Greek is Beelzeboul (#954 Βεελζεβούλ), which gets put into English as “Beelzebul.” He is called the “prince of demons” in Luke 12:10. “Beelzeboul” is “lord of the dunghill.” This comes from the Hebrew zebul (dung, a dunghill). [For more on this name and the other names of the Slanderer (the Devil), see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”.

11:18. “And also.” Similar structure to the New Jerusalem Bible.

“the Adversary.” The Greek word for Adversary is Satanas (#4567 Σατανᾶς), which has been transliterated into “Satan” in most versions. This causes the meaning of the word, which is important, to be lost. For more information on it, see the note on Mark 1:13. [For information on the names of the Devil, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”.

“Beelzebul.” See commentary on 11:15.

“sons.” Not the literal sons, but the disciples of the religious leaders. [For more information on “sons” being disciples, see commentary on Matthew 12:27.]

11:21. “in peace.” Other versions read “safe.” Christ, who spoke Hebrew (or Aramaic), would have used the word for peace, shalom, which indicates a state of wellbeing. But shalom would have been translated into the Greek eirene, which is the Greek word for peace, although it lacks the full sense of the Hebrew shalom. This is an excellent example of how meaning can be lost in translation going from the Semitic languages of Hebrew or Aramaic to Greek and then to English.

11:24. “the unclean spirit.” Jesus had been talking about demons and had cast out a demon (cp. v. 14), and the subject never changed, so it is “the” unclean spirit, that is, like the ones he had been referring to.

“a resting place.” The Greek is anapausis (#372 ἀνάπαυσις), and it can either mean “rest” or “a resting place” (see BDAG Greek-English lexicon; cp. The New English Bible; The Kingdom New Testament by N. T. Wright; The Kingdom of God Version by R. Faircloth). Here, the better translation is “a resting place,” that is a place to settle in and use as a base for causing trouble and harm. The demon does not “rest” in the person or animal it occupies, it goes about its demonic activity.

11:31. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

11:32. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

11:34. “lamp.” The eye is the “lamp” of the body. The eye is not the light, but the lamp that allows the light to shine. A poorly cared for lamp (the lamps of the time were oil lamps, usually made of clay) would not allow the light to shine well. Similarly, if one's “eye” was impure, the light of God would not shine well, or shine at all, in the body.

“single.” The Greek word translated “single” is haplous (#573 ἕπλοῦς), and means “single,” therefore “unmixed.” The key to this saying about the “single” eye and the “evil eye,” in this context of wealth, is to realize they are Semitic idioms. In this context the “single eye” is the generous eye, it is unmixed with worldly desires for wealth and possessions, and it therefore generous towards others. In contrast, the “evil eye,” is used idiomatically in the Semitic languages for a person who is greedy, covetous, and envious.

In Western cultures, the “evil eye” was a look or glance that meant harm and brought harm. Although this use of the “evil eye” may have existed in ancient Judaism, there is no reason to think it is used in Matthew or Luke. The Semitic idiom of the “good” or “single” eye being generous, and the “evil eye” being greedy, covetous, and stingy, holds true throughout the Bible. The “good eye” of Proverbs 22:9 is generous, and the “evil eye” of Deuteronomy 15:9; 28:54, Proverbs 23:6 and 28:22 refers to someone who is greedy and stingy. See commentary on Matthew 6:22.

11:41. “see!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

11:42. “necessary.” The Greek word is dei (#1163 δεῖ; pronounced “day”), and it refers to what is necessary, what one must do, or has to do. In today’s English it seems to be watering down the meaning to translate it as “should” or “ought,” because there are many things we “should” do that are not actually a necessity. But love and justice are not just things we “should” do, if we are going to obey God, they are necessities. R.C. H. Lenski, in his translation, says, “But these it was necessary to do, and those not to dismiss.” John Nolland (Word Biblical Commentary: Luke 9:21-18:24), also uses “necessary” and has, “[if you were to do the will of God] it would be necessary to…..” The verb tenses in the phrase are somewhat idiomatic, the infinitives acting more like aorists (Lenski), and being “difficult to catch precisely in translation” (Nolland), which explains why the versions word the last phrase in the verse somewhat differently from one another.

11:50. “that.” The Greek preposition hina (#2443 ἴνα) here is used as introducing a result clause. God did not send prophets with the purpose of them being slain so He could punish a generation; He sent them to turn people from sin and call them back to Him. The fact that the prophets were killed “resulted” in a generation that will experience the wrath of God. Of course, God also realized that His prophets would be mistreated and killed, but He still sent them to help people, and their sacrificial death became part of the necessary redemptive process, God fully knowing that the final outpouring of His wrath would be the precursor to the Messianic Kingdom on earth. God gives people every chance to change, but also acts in a way that His judgment is just. The two processes are inextricably linked.

12:5. “Gehenna.” See commentary on Matthew 5:22. [For more information on annihilation in the lake of fire, see Appendix 5: “Annihilation in the Lake of Fire”].

12:6. “assaria.” 1/16th of a denarius, which was a day’s wage for a laborer. If we were to use the time value of money based on today’s work day, one assarion would be worth one-half hour of work and so two worth about one hour’s work, but in biblical times a laborer’s work day was often longer than 8 hours, and lasted from shortly after sunup to sundown. See commentary on Matthew 10:29.

“the Holy Spirit.” “The Holy Spirit” is the name for God that emphasizes His power in operation. God is called “the Holy Spirit” in a number of verses in the NT, including Matthew 1:20; 12:32; and Hebrews 9:8. [For more information on the uses of “Holy Spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’.”]

12:12. “the Holy Spirit.” “The Holy Spirit” is the name for God that emphasizes His power in operation. God is called “the Holy Spirit” in a number of verses in the NT, including Matthew 1:20; 12:32; and Hebrews 9:8. [For more information on the uses of “Holy Spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’.”]

12:19. “soul” (2x). The Greek word often translated “soul” is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoo-kay'), and it has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person or animal; an individual person; and attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. Here psuchē is used of the person himself. Thus, the NIV says, “And I’ll say to myself, “You have plenty….,” [For a more complete explanation of “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’”].

“is being demanded.” The Greek word is apaiteō (#523 ἀπαίτεω), which means to demand or ask for something back or to demand something that is due; to ask or demand with some urgency. Here it is in the present tense, active voice, so it has the essence of, “is being demanded from you.” The present tense is sometimes used in a general way to express something that will happen in the future, and so some versions have a future tense (“this night your soul will be demanded from you”). However, it is likely that the present tense subtly portrays the spiritual battle that is always going on behind the scenes. Satan stands before God day and night accusing people (Rev. 12:10), and he certainly demanded to have Peter, who, like all of us, had sinned (Luke 22:31).

12:22. “life.” The Greek word is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoo-kay'), often translated “soul.” The Greek word has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person or animal; an individual person; or attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. Here it is broadly used as the person and his life. It could be translated, “Do not be anxious about your life,” or “Do not be anxious about yourself.” [For a more complete explanation of psuchē, “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’”].

12:35. “Your.” In talking to his disciples, the Lord’s words become emphatic to them (partly from the imperative mood of the associated verb). No matter what others do, the disciples of Christ must be focused on obeying him.

“must be.” The verb is imperative. Sometimes the imperative mood can mean an encouragement, as in, “Let your,” but that is not the case here. The Lord will come, and his servants must be ready for him. We dare not treat the commands of the Lord as if they are just suggestions. God created us to do good works (Eph. 2:10), and there are rewards for those who do, and punishment for those who do not.

12:54. “in the west.” That would be over the Mediterranean Sea. Wind from the sea brought rain, while wind from the south, from the Sinai, or from the east, Arabia, brought dry uncomfortable heat.
12:58. “For example.” Jesus was very aware of the times and the importance of being able to serve God rather than be sidelined by tricks and traps of the Adversary (cp. 12:45), so he gave this example.

Chapter 13

13:6. “And he spoke this parable.” If we are going to understand the parable, we have to understand its context, and the context is that people must repent of their sin and live godly lifestyles before God. Life can end shortly, and waiting for one reason or another before turning to God is foolish. Like the unfruitful tree in the parable, they may have a few more years (or maybe not), but that time will come to an end, because everyone dies eventually.

13:7. “See.” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”). Usually translated “Look,” that seemed too strong in this direct address. The vinedresser was not being condescending to the owner in any way. We might have used “Lo.”

“use up.” The Greek word katargeō (#2673 καταργέω) means to use up, to waste, so it is unclear whether the landowner in the parable thought the unfruitful tree was actually depleting the soil or just taking up space that could have been used more productively. The phrase “use up” covers both possibilities, and points to the fact that the landowner would have realized that the tree required precious moisture from the ground that could have helped other plants to be fruitful. The parable makes a very powerful point: “unfruitful” people are just not unfruitful themselves, but they use up resources that keep others from being fruitful. Nevertheless, the vinedresser had a heart for this unfruitful tree and wanted to save it. This too, is like life. Often people take an interest in helping others who are unfruitful. But, like this compassionate vinedresser, even they must realize that if the people they try to help remain unfruitful month after month, there comes a time when they have to be let go.

13:9. “soon after.” The Greek phrase, eis to mellon is idiomatic, but mellon most often refers to something that is about to happen, not something that is far off. The point the gardener was making was that once the tree was fertilized he and the owner should start to see positive changes very quickly, and realize there would be a good chance the tree would bear fruit next season. Although some versions use “next year” as a translation of the phrase eis to mellon, there is no reason to think the gardener was thinking about a time that far off. The point of the parable, and something we should keep in mind when working with people, is that if we give them the attention they need, we should start to see some results fairly quickly. While it is true that there are people who do not change for years and then suddenly change, we are not to spend an inordinate amount of time trying to help those people. When we say “Yes” to helping one person, we are saying “No” to other opportunities and serving the Lord in other ways. We are not called just to use our time for the Lord, but rather to make the best use of our time for him (Eph. 5:16).

13:11. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

13:16. “the Adversary.” The Greek word for Adversary is Satanas (#4567 Σατάνافق), which has been transliterated into “Satan” in most versions. This causes the meaning of the word, which is important, to be lost. In this case, the Adversary has used his power to cripple this believing woman. For more information on it, see the note on Mark 1:13. [For information on the names of the Devil, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”].

“Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἴδον), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

“eighteen years!” We pick up the exclamation from idou, (“Look!”). Jesus was talking with great force and passion, and “woke up” the minds of his audience, which is why those who suggested that this woman not be healed after eighteen years of torment were put to shame.

13:19. For more information on this parable, see commentary on Matthew 13:32.
13:22. “through.” The Greek is kata, used in the distributive sense (cp. Lenski; Hendrickson). Lenski translates this as: “city by city and village by village.”
13:30. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἴδον), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).
13:32. “fox.” This is the figure of speech, hypocatastasis. A study of the word “fox” in the biblical culture reveals that Jesus was calling Herod a destructive nuisance. The meaning of the word “fox” when used in figures of comparison has changed over time. In the United States today it usually refers to a beautiful woman, whereas fifty years ago it usually referred to someone who was sly and/or sneaky. In biblical times “fox” referred to a destructive nuisance, something that could be dangerous, but not as dangerous as a wolf, bear, or lion. For an explanation of hypocatastasis, see commentary on Revelation 20:2.

“Take notice!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἴδον), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

Chapter 14

14:2. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἴδον), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).
14:5. “son.” The oldest texts read “son.” It seems that reading was unsettling to copyists, who at some point changed ous (son) to onos (donkey). There would be no reason to change “donkey” to “son.” Some manuscripts have all three: donkey, son, and ox, the copyists not being able to decide how to correctly copy the text.
14:14. “resurrection of the righteous.” In the future the dead will be raised at different times. Dead Christians will be raised at the Rapture, which is immediately before the Great Tribulation. Those people who are righteous will be raised at the resurrection of the righteous (Luke 14:14; Acts 24:15), also called the first resurrection (Rev. 20:5, 6), and “the resurrection of life” (John 5:29), and people in that resurrection are part of the Messianic Kingdom on earth. [For more on the Rapture and the resurrections, see commentary on Acts 24:15].
14:15. “Blessed is anyone who will eat bread in the Kingdom of God!” There is a lot in this statement. The exclamation point comes from the tone of the sentence, not from an imperative verb. The man, hearing Jesus speak about the Resurrection of the Righteous, correctly understood that anyone who was part of that resurrection would be a part of the Messianic Kingdom on earth.

It was “a prevailing Jewish idea, a great and long-continued feast will be held when the Messianic kingdom is established on earth after the resurrection [of the Righteous]” (N. Geldenhuys, The New International Commentary on the New Testament: The Gospel of Luke). It is clear that the man who spoke up, likely a Pharisee or expert in the Law, did not think that the Kingdom of Heaven was currently going on, but was future (the verb “will eat” is in the future tense). [For more on the kingdom on earth, see Appendix 3: “Christ’s Future Kingdom on Earth”]. The man’s statement is clearly true: anyone who is in the Resurrection of the Righteous (or in the Rapture) and gets to take part in the Messianic Kingdom on earth is indeed blessed.

The belief in a Messianic Kingdom on earth was prevalent among the Jews, but so was the belief that “good” Jews like the Pharisees would certainly be a part of it—a belief that Jesus took some pains to dismantle at various times in his teachings (cp. Matt. 5:20; 21:31). So it was that after the man made his statement, that Jesus took time to correct him, albeit in a manner that set forth the truth in a way that was not directly confrontational and one that invited the dialogue, “What did that parable mean?” Those who were self-absorbed or arrogant would never see the point Jesus was making, while the humble would either see it or ask about it.

14:23. “will be filled.” The verb is subjunctive, hence many translation say “may” be filled, but the Greek preposition hina that starts the phrase requires the verb to be subjunctive. Thus the verb has to be translated from context. Here the Lord wanted the servants to bring people in so his house “will” be filled.

14:26. “life.” The Greek word is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoo-kay'), often translated “soul.” The Greek word has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person or animal; an individual person; or attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. Here it is broadly used as the life of the person.” [For a more complete explanation of psuchē, “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’”].

14:35. “Anyone who has ears to hear had better listen!” This is the same Greek phrase as occurs in Mark 4:9 (see commentary there), and almost the same Greek phrase as occurs in Matthew 11:15. For an explanation of the exclamation, see the commentary on that Matthew 11:15. This verse is longer, reading, “Anyone who has ears to hear had better listen,” while the occurrences in Matthew read, “Anyone who has ears had better listen!” Jesus has just taught about the cost of being a disciple, and he gives this stern warning and exhortation to people so they will not take it lightly.

Chapter 15

15:1. “kept drawing near.” The Greek is eggizō (#1448 ἔγγιζον), to come near or close, but the real meaning here is expressed by the fact that it is a present participle, active voice. The action was going on and on. The sinners did not just “come,” they “kept coming.” This makes a sharp contrast with the religious leaders in verse two who do not just grumble, they keep grumbling.

15:2. “kept grumbling to each other.” The Greek is diagogguzō (#1234 διαγογγύζω), and it means to murmur among a crowd or to each other (gogguzō without the dia prefix is used of just murmuring). It is “always used of many indignantly complaining” (Strong’s). Here it occurs in the indicative imperfect active, meaning that the action was ongoing. The sinners kept coming, and the religious leaders kept grumbling among themselves.

“This man.” The Greek is just “This” or “This one,” used derisively. They scorned Jesus with their words.

15:4. “does not leave.” No shepherd would leave a flock of sheep unattended in the wilderness. This is one of those places where we have to understand the ancient customs as well as Jesus’ audience did to have the parable make sense. Rarely if ever would a flock of one hundred sheep be watched by one person. There would be an owner, or a main shepherd, and then some helpers. But the owner cares deeply for his flock, and would leave the 99 with the hired help while he searched for the lost sheep. This is part of the parable, that the owner cares so much for the sheep that he would search for one that is lost, not just hope it came home somehow. God is constantly searching for the lost, and we should be too.

15:5. “lays it on his shoulders.” Shepherds have reported that sometimes sheep that have been lost are so scared and disoriented that they will not walk, and even if they would they would probably walk too slowly to suit the shepherd. So the shepherd does the hard work of carrying the sheep. This is a wonderful illustration of how just “finding” the lost person is not enough. We then have to carry that person until they are “with the flock” and can stand strongly on their own.

15:8. “drachma.” The drachma was a Roman coin made of silver. Although it varied in value over the course of the Roman empire, during the time of Christ it was apparently equivalent to a Greek denarius, which was worth a day’s wage for a laborer (cp. Matt. 20:2).

15:15. “hired himself out to.” The Greek phrase is literally, “joined himself to,” which is an idiom for beginning to work for someone, to hire oneself out to someone else (cp. NET First Edition text note).

15:18. “before you.” The Greek is enōpion (#1799 ἐνώπιον). The word has several meanings, and thus the meaning must be determined from context. Its primary meaning is literal, “before” and it pertains to a position in front of an entity, before someone or something. Thus it also pertains to being present or in view, in the sight of, in the presence of, among, and it also pertains to value judgment, thus, “in the opinion of; in the judgment of.” It also has special uses, such as in this verse when it is combined with “sin.” In this case it means more than just in your sight or judgment, but “against you” (cp. BDAG; Friberg).

The word is a good one for the son to use; it reveals his humility at this point in his life. He says he has sinned against God (“heaven” is used as a euphemism for “God,” God being sometimes considered too holy to say politely) and “against you,” which includes the fact of the sin being against his father, but also recognizing that it was “in your opinion,” thus recognizing that the father was aware of the sin and personally hurt by it.
15:29. “Lo.” The Greek word is idou ( defaultProps), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

Chapter 16

16:9. “make friends for yourselves by means of unrighteous wealth.” The answer to this difficult verse lies in understanding that only God and Christ can receive anyone into “the tents in the Age,” i.e., the dwellings in the Millennial Kingdom and beyond. How does the believer “make friends” with wealth? By using it to help and bless others. Matthew 25:40 notes that what we do for the least of the believers we do for Christ himself. When we use our wealth properly, we make friends of God and Christ, who then help us, just as the unrighteous house-manager made friends who later helped him when he was in need. For “mammon” see commentary on Matthew 6:24.

“in the Age to come.” This is the new Messianic Age, the Millennial Kingdom. [See commentary on this phrase in Appendix 2: “Life in the Age to Come”.]

16:11. “And if you have not been faithful...” This verse contains the figure of speech Hyperbaton (Bullinger; Figures of Speech) and more literally reads, “If, then, you have not been faithful in the unrighteous wealth, the true riches—who will entrust them to you?”

16:13. “No servant is able to serve two masters.” See commentary on Matthew 6:24.

16:19–31. “a certain rich man.” This record of the rich man and Lazarus is a parable, not a literal portrayal of events that were actually occurring. Jesus spoke the parable to the Pharisees who believed that every person had a soul that lived on after the person died, and the souls of evil people were tormented, while the souls of good people were not. By wording the parable the way he did, Christ was “becoming a Pharisee to win the Pharisees,” (cp. 1 Cor. 9:19–22). The parable makes a couple of very profound points. Perhaps the most important one is the way he ended the parable, that if hardhearted and rebellious people would not believe Moses and the prophets, they would not change their mind and believe, even if someone rose from the dead (Luke 16:31). This was shown to be absolutely correct when both Lazarus and Christ rose from the dead and yet the religious leaders did not believe.

Another point of the parable was that the ways a person deals with his wealth and earthly possessions will directly affect what happens to him on Judgment Day. Luke chapter 15 has three parables that show how valuable people are and how they should be loved and cared for. Those three parables are then followed in Luke chapter 16 by two parables about how important it is for people to properly steward their material possessions. Luke 16:14 points out that the Pharisees, who were listening to Jesus, “loved money.” The parables in Luke 16 were stern warnings to these greedy Pharisees that their selfishness would have severe consequences.

In spite of the fact that the record is a parable, just as in every parable, there is some truth in it. Scholars debate exactly how much truth is in the parable. For example, some scholars believe in disembodied souls, while others do not. Of those that do, some believe those souls have fingers that can be dipped in water, while others do not. Some scholars point out that it is very unlikely that Abraham would have the authority to allow someone from Paradise to return to earth to warn the unsaved, so the rich man asking that of Abraham would not be literal. Other scholars doubt that unsaved people in torment can speak to the saved people in Paradise.

When it comes to determining what is true about things such as life after death, our only reliable source is the Bible, and conclusions must be drawn from the entire scope of Scripture, not just individual sections. It is not good exegesis to use a parable as a primary source of doctrine about what happens to people when they die, especially when that parable contradicts other clear verses of Scripture. We know from many other verses of Scripture that when a person dies their soul does not live on, but the person is dead in every way until the Rapture or one of the resurrections, which is a point we will expand upon later.

One thing that is true in the parable is that some people will not die immediately in the lake of fire, but will be in torment for a period of time as a retribution for their sins. This conclusion can be drawn from many verses of Scripture, and thus the clear message of the Bible is that unless people get forgiveness for their sins they will be punished for the evil they have done (cp. Ps. 62:12; Ecc. 11:9; Jer. 17:10; Ezek. 33:20; Matt. 16:27; 2 Cor. 5:10; Rev. 2:23). Romans 2:5 says of stubborn people, “you are storing up wrath against yourself for the day of God’s wrath.” Just as godly people by their good works store up treasure for the life to come, wicked people store up wrath for themselves.

It is important to realize that although many Bible teachers use this parable to teach that there is everlasting torment for the unsaved, the parable itself never says that. Nowhere in the parable is it stated or implied that the rich man’s torment will go on forever. The parable simply portrays him being in torment, and a period of torment for the unsaved is expected, based upon the Scripture. However, from the scope of Scripture we learn that the unsaved in the lake of fire eventually die and are consumed, a point we will make again later.

People who assert that the record about Lazarus is factual and not a parable argue that Jesus did not say it was a parable and furthermore, no other parable contains a proper name. While it is true that Jesus did not say he was speaking a parable, it is also true that many parables start without Jesus saying he is speaking a parable. A few examples from Matthew include the parable of the Workers in the Field (20:1–16), the Two Sons (21:28–31), the Wise and Foolish Virgins (25:1–13), and the Talents (25:14–30; this is a different parable from the parable of the Minas in Luke 19:11–27 which is specifically said to be a parable).

We have just seen that many parables in Luke open with “a certain man.” What is just as important is that none of Jesus’ other teachings, only his parables, open that way. Going through all the different teachings of Jesus in Luke shows us that when he started speaking, using the phrase, “a certain man” or “a certain one,” he was speaking a parable.

In answer to the assertion that no parable contains a proper name, we must realize that there is no rule that says a parable cannot have a proper name. Furthermore, actually, it is not true that parables do not contain proper names. For example, the parable of the Good Samaritan mentions both Jerusalem and Jericho. While these are not names of people, they are proper names. Also, it is generally acknowledged that Ezekiel 23 is an allegory or parable about Israel and it contains the proper names “Oholah” (“my tent”) and “Oholibah” (“my tent is in her”). While it is true that these are names assigned by God to Samaria (Israel) and Judah to make the point that He had been personally involved with them, it is also true that “Lazarus” (“whom God has helped”) is a name Jesus could assign to show that no one gets to Paradise without God’s help. So it is not actually true that no parable in the Bible contains proper names, and many of them contain very specific other details, such as amounts of money or goods, or times of the day.

There are many things besides the way the parable opens and its context that shows this record about the rich man and Lazarus is a parable. As we have already pointed out the most major one is that the scope of Scripture reveals that once a person dies, he is dead in every way—body and soul—until he is raised at one of the Judgments. No one is alive in heaven (or Paradise) or hell immediately after they die. Of course, someone reading this parable and thinking it is literal would take the position that this parable proves that theology false, but every text of Scripture must fit into the scope of the rest of Scripture. Scripture teaches via many clear verses that dead people are dead and in the grave, not alive in heaven or hell (see Is There Death After Life? by Graeser, Lynn, Schoenheit). For example, Ecclesiastes 9:10 says, “…for in the grave, where you are going, there is neither working nor planning nor knowledge nor wisdom.” Yet the rich man and Lazarus had knowledge and wisdom despite the fact that they were “dead.” Luke 16 and Ecclesiastes 9 cannot contradict one another, because they are both God’s Word, and, as we have said, there are many other clear verses in the Bible that, like Ecclesiastes, teach that when a person dies he is dead in every way until he is raised.

What happens to dead people is that they will be raised in one of the resurrections (while dead Christians will be raised in the Rapture). Dead people who are resurrected in the “first resurrection” (Rev. 20:5, 6), also called the “Resurrection of the Righteous” (Luke 14:14; Acts 24:15), and “the resurrection of life” (John 5:29), will live forever with Jesus. Dead people who are resurrected in the second resurrection, the Resurrection of the unrighteous (Acts 24:15) and who are judged unworthy of everlasting life will be thrown into the lake of fire. The lake of fire is the second death (Rev. 20:14) and people thrown into it will die and their bodies will be totally consumed [For more on people not “burning in Hell” forever, see Appendix 5: “Annihilation in the Lake of Fire,” and Matthew 5:22, “Gehenna”. For more on the Rapture and the resurrections, see commentary on Acts 24:15].

Another reason to view this record as a parable is that it is set with four other parables, and it flows well with them. Still another reason is that the information in this parable was not the kind of factual information that Jesus could have known. How could Jesus have known about a conversation that was going on between two dead people? The traditional answer is that Jesus was God so he knew everything, or he could have known it by revelation. However, Jesus was speaking to the Pharisees, and if they thought he was recounting to them an actual incident of a man who had brothers living among them, and that somehow Jesus knew who had gone to Paradise and who had gone to Gehenna, and furthermore he knew what these dead people were saying to each other, they would have thought he was insane or had demons, and he would have had no credibility with them whatsoever. In contrast, by presenting his teaching as a parable with a valid point, he had the opportunity to make a big impact on the Pharisees, who already believed the basic premises in the parable.

Another reason to believe that the record is a parable is that it seems inconceivable that saved people could enjoy everlasting life if they were hearing the cries and pleas of people in torment. Could it really be that right now, today, people in everlasting torment are begging people in Paradise for water but are being ignored? And could it be that saved people who were merciful and loving throughout their earthly life and took care of the poor, wretched, and needy, are in their perfected state more hardhearted than they were in their sinful earthly state? While it is true that God is a God of justice, it seems hardly possible that the everlasting joy that is promised to those who are saved could include purposely ignoring tormented people crying out for help and relief, especially since according to orthodox teaching, those cries of pain go on for eternity. It fits the scope of Scripture, and makes much more sense, that this is a parable and Jesus was speaking it to the Pharisees who loved their money and believed in a destiny similar to that which Jesus portrayed in the parable.

A large number of conservative and orthodox biblical scholars believe that the record of Lazarus and the rich man is a parable. An exhaustive list is not possible, but the commentators represent many different theological backgrounds and denominations. Bibles and Study Bibles include: The Catholic Study Bible edited by D. Senior and J. Collins; The Companion Bible by E. W. Bullinger; The ESV Study Bible by Crossway Bibles in Wheaton Illinois; The MacArthur Study Bible edited by John MacArthur; The NIV Study Bible edited by K. Barker.

Some of the other specialty books that recognize the record as a parable include: The Greek Testament by Henry Alford; The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church edited by Cross and Livingstone; The Fire that Consumes by Edward Fudge; All the Parables of the Bible by Herbert Lockyer; The Expositor’s Greek New Testament by W. R. Nicoll; Notes on the Parables of Our Lord by R. C. Trench; and The Parables of Jesus in the Light of the Old Testament by Claus Westermann.

Many of the authors listed above believe in the everlasting torment of the unsaved, so the fact that they consider Luke 16:19-31 to be a parable is important support for its being a parable. Many unsaved people will spend time in torment in the lake of fire as a retribution for their sins. That point is well made in the parable. This wonderful parable makes many good points, not the least of which is that we need to take our lives seriously. Our life is a gift to us, and God holds us responsible for living in a way that brings glory to Him. If we are disobedient or rebellious, and squander the life He has given us, there will be serious consequences.

17:2. “hung around his neck.” For information on millstones, see 17:35.
17:3. “Watch yourselves.” The need for people to forgive others cannot be overstated. Unforgiveness is a sin against God (Eph. 4:32), and it also is very harmful to one’s health, both mentally and physically, as even modern medical research shows. Furthermore, Jesus taught that if we do not forgive those who sinned against us, neither would God forgive us (Matt. 6:15). Thus, this verse, speaking about forgiving others, is set in the context of taking heed to ourselves.

17:6. “trust as a grain of mustard seed.” A mustard seed looks small to the world, but it has total trust that it can do what God designed it to do, and we, too, should have total trust that we can do what God has called us to do. Some versions such as the HCSB, NIV, and NRSV, add to the Greek text a reference to size (for example, the NIV says “as small as a grain…”), and this reverses the meaning of the parable and makes it nonsense. Small faith will not get us much, but total faith can move mountains. [For more information on the mustard seed and having faith like a mustard seed, see commentary on Matthew 13:32 and Matthew 17:20].
17:11. “on his way to Jerusalem.” This makes it seem like Jesus is traveling south to Jerusalem, but actually he is traveling north. Between verse 10 and this verse (11), Jesus went to Bethany and healed Lazarus (John 11). While he was there, the religious leaders made plans to kill him (John 11:53), so he left and traveled north. He went to the city of Ephraim (John 11:54), which is about 13 miles (21 km) NNE of Jerusalem. The Bible does not say how long he stayed in Ephraim, but it was from there he went on this final itinerary. The fact that this verse places him at the border between Samaria and Galilee means that he had already traveled north from Ephraim through Samaria. That he was already through Samaria and in Galilee is clear in the following verses, because one of the ten lepers that were healed was a Samaritan (v. 16). If Jesus was still in Samaria, we would expect all, or most, of the lepers to be Samaritans, but the fact that only one of them was shows us that Jesus was now in Galilee. From Galilee he traveled across the Jordan River to the territory known as Perea. Both Matthew 19:1 and Mark 10:1 say that Jesus was in the area of Judea beyond the Jordan. Although Perea was not technically part of Judea, the territory ruled by Herod the Great had included both regions, and so Perea became commonly called a part of Judea. Thus for Jesus to come to Jericho (Matt. 20:29; Mark 10:46; Luke 18:35), he had to cross the Jordan River again. He arrived in Bethany six days before Passover (John 12:1, 2).

“the border.” The Greek text can be confusing here if the reader does not have a knowledge of the geography of Palestine at the time of Jesus. The Greek text reads that Jesus passed through the “midst” of Galilee and Samaria. That makes it sound like Jesus walked south through both areas. However, Galilee was the area to the north, and Samaria the area to the south, and the midst of them was the border between them, sort of like in a figure 8, the place in the midst of the upper and lower circle is also the border between the two circles.

17:20. “The Kingdom of God does not come accompanied with observation.” The Kingdom of God does not come as a spectacle that people will sit by and watch. It is not at all a kingdom that will come in that way.

17:21. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

“take notice.” The Greek word is idou (ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

17:22. “The days will come when you will long to see one of the days of the Son of man, and you will not see it.” Jesus was teaching his disciples about the terrible times ahead. During those difficult times, disciples would long for even a temporary rest, even just one day from the “days of the Son of man” (i.e., one of the days in the Millennial Kingdom, not just one of the happier days when Jesus walked the earth with them), but there would not be any rest. Thus this teaching is similar to Jesus’ teaching in Matthew 24:4-25. The tribulation will be a terrible time for people on earth.

17:26. “days of Noah.” For an explanation of why Jesus used the illustration of Noah, see commentary on Matthew 24:40. Noah’s ark and the Flood are described in Genesis 6 and 7.

17:28. “days of Lot.” For an explanation of why Jesus used the illustration of Lot and Sodom, see commentary on Matthew 24:40. The record of the destruction of Sodom is in Genesis 18:20-33; 19:1-29.

17:35. “There will be two women together grinding grain.” A biblical custom. One of the ways to grind grain was with a grinding mill of a lower millstone and an upper millstone. These stone wheels were mostly 18-24 inches in diameter and 2-4 inches thick. A hole in the center of each stone allowed a stick to pass through them so the top one would stay on the bottom one while they turned. Then another hole was put into the top one, and a stick inserted as a handle. The women would sit on opposite sides of the stone, each taking a grip on the handle. In this manner, the two women could put grain between the stones, and then turn them to grind it, each pulling and pushing opposite the other to help each other. The big hole in the middle made carrying the stone from place to place easier, and also, a rope could be run through it and tied around things, such as a person’s neck in order to drown him (cp. 17:2).

17:36. This verse, as it appears in some manuscripts of the Western Text, and thus got into the KJV, does not appear in the oldest and best Greek manuscripts, but was almost certainly added here to harmonize with Matthew 24:40.

18:3. “kept coming to him.” In the Ancient Near East, the officials were appointed by the King or ruler and were answerable to him, not to the public. In fact, often they were related in some way to the ruler. One of the reasons people would give their daughters to a man like Solomon, who had 1,000 wives and concubines, was so they could gain political appointments. The judges and magistrates, then, were not voted in and could not be voted out, so many of them felt no compulsion to be helpful. The usual way to get their assistance was that they could be threatened by someone with equally powerful contacts, or they could be bribed or offered some benefit for giving their assistance. Alas, the only resort of the poor was to become such a bother that eventually the judge might actually be helpful.

In 1853 the oriental scholar, Richard Burton, made a secret pilgrimage to Mecca (at that time, any Western Christian discovered there would shortly be killed). One thing he needed to start his journey was a certain passport. Burton went to the gate of the building of the Governor of Alexandria, where he sat without being helped for over three hours until someone finally bothered to tell him he was in the wrong place. The next day he went to the Palace. He writes:

The first person I addressed was a Kawwas, or police officer, who, coiled up comfortably in a bit of shade fitting his person like a robe, was in full enjoyment of the Asiatic “Kayf” [a state of relaxation]. Having presented the consular certificate and briefly stated the nature of my business, I ventured to inquire what was the right course to pursue for a visa.

…”Don’t know,” growled the man of authority, without moving anything but the quantity of tongue absolutely necessary for articulation. Now there are three ways of treating Asiatic officials,—by bribe, by bullying, or by bothering them with a dogged perseverance into attending to you and your concerns. The latter is the peculiar province of the poor. Moreover, this time I resolved, for other reasons, to be patient. I repeated my question in almost the same words. Ruh!, “Be off,” was what I obtained for a reply. But this time the questioned went so far as to open his eyes. Still I stood twirling the paper in my hands, and looking very humble and very persevering, till a loud, “Ruh ya kalb,” “Go, O dog.” At that point Burton left, fearing that the next thing would be a lash from the hippopotamus hide whip the policeman had. Burton goes on to say, “I tried a dozen other promiscuous sources of information,—policemen, grooms, scribes, donkey-boys, and idlers in general,” but he got no help (Richard Burton, Personal Narrative of a Pilgrimage to Al-Madinah & Meccah, Vol. 1, pp., 20, 21). Finally, his patience wore out and he bribed a soldier with some tobacco and money, and met with success.

Thus the parable that Jesus told about the poor woman whose only recourse to get help was to pester the judge was something his audience was all too familiar with. Without explaining all the reasons why we on earth have to pray and pray to get success, which is not due to God’s not caring but due to the intensity of the spiritual battle raging in the universe, Jesus effectively made the point that if we want to get things from God, we have to persevere and pray until we get them.

18:11. “took a stand.” Robertson (Word Pictures in the New Testament) writes: “Stood (statheis). First aorist passive participle of histemi. Struck an attitude ostentatiously where he could be seen. Standing was the common Jewish posture in prayer (Matt 6:5; Mark 11:25).” Lenski writes, “He took a stand right up front, next to the stone balustrade which divided the priest’s court from that of the men.”

“went on praying these things.” The imperfect tense tells us that he, like many other Pharisees, made long prayers.

“for himself.” The Greek is pros eautou (πρὸς εαυτοῦ). Lenski writes: “The phrase is to be construed with the verb (not with the participle) and means that he prayed these things “for himself,” “in favor of himself,” using the pros of direction, which may be either hostile (‘against’) or friendly or neutral; here it is the second.” The Pharisee prayed on his own behalf, which is not wrong if that is only a part of one’s prayer life and it is done with the right heart. However, the picture here is an ostentatious Pharisee who stands right up front where everyone will see him, keeps on praying on his own behalf, and even thanks God that he is not like other men, whom, instead of helping or blessing, he looks down upon.

18:17. “like a little child.” With the same attitude a child would have: humility, openness, innocence, excitement, and joy. Expecting to receive and live in harmony, not to control or be someone important.

18:20. Quoted from Exodus 20:12-16.

18:25. “Indeed.” The Greek conjunction gar (#1063 γάρ) usually expresses a reason and is translated “for.” But occasionally it expresses a continuation of the thought and is sometimes then referred to as a “confirmatory gar,” and can be translated, “indeed,” “yes,” etc. Here the camel reference is elucidating the point Jesus just made about the difficulty of getting into the Kingdom of God.

“camel.” There has been much discussion about this verse. The Greek and Aramaic texts read “camel,” and that does not seem too extreme given the fact that Jesus, and Orientals from that era in general, were fond of hyperbole (cp. Luke 6:41, a person having a “beam” in his eye). Origen referred to a reading that said “rope,” but it has little support. In the fifteenth century AD, it was postulated that the “needle’s eye” was a small gate that the camel had to crawl through, but that view has now mostly lost scholarly support. For one thing, historically the explanation was developed centuries after the biblical era, and also there is no epigraphical or archaeological support that there was any such practice in biblical times of trying to get a camel thorough a small door. As the “gnat” in Matthew 23:24 is a real hyperbole, so also is the camel.

18:28. “See.” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἴδοù), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

18:30. “life in the Age to come.” This is new Messianic Age, the Millennial Kingdom. [See Appendix 2: Life in the Age to Come”.

Luke
18:31. "Take notice!" The Greek word is idou (♯2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 ("Look!").

18:34. "they did not comprehend the things that he said." Once the disciples realized that Jesus was the Christ, the Son of God (Matt. 16:13-17; Mark 8:27-30; Luke 9:18-21), he began to tell them that he must suffer, die, and be raised from the dead. In spite of his clear teaching about it, however, they did not understand what he meant.

Jesus taught about his suffering, death, and resurrection many times. He taught about it right after the disciples recognized him as the Christ (Matt. 16:21; Mark 8:31, 32; Luke 9:22). Then he taught about it again immediately after the Transfiguration (Matt. 17:9-12; Mark 9:9-13); then again when he was in Galilee shortly after the Transfiguration (Matt. 17:22, 23; Mark 9:31, 32; Luke 9:43-45), then again at the Feast of Tabernacles (John 8:21, 28); then again while he was going up to Jerusalem for the Passover, at which time he would be killed (Matt. 20:17-19; Mark 10:32-34; Luke 18:31-34); and then again when he was in Jerusalem for the Passover (Matt. 26:2; cp. John 12:7).

The fact that the disciples never understood what Jesus meant, even though he clearly taught that he would suffer, die, and be raised from the dead, gives us some very important insights. For one thing, it shows us how the Jews at the time of Jesus viewed their Messiah, and for another it shows us that once someone has a firmly embedded preconceived idea about what the Bible says, he can look at very straightforward verses and misunderstand them.

As to what the Messiah would do when he came, just as the Jews never expected a virgin birth (note Mary’s reaction to the angel’s message, and see commentary on Luke 1:34), they never expected their Messiah to suffer and die. The common teaching at the time of Christ was that there were two great ages, the present, evil age, and the wonderful Messianic Age to come, and that the Evil Age would end, and the Messianic Age start, during the time of the Messiah. This teaching was so imbedded in the minds of the Apostles that they could not understand Jesus’ teaching that he would suffer and die.

The death of the Messiah was so contrary to their understanding that even though Jesus said it plainly over and over, they did not really get it until they saw him personally after his resurrection (this should also give us some insight into why it was so difficult to make converts—trying to get the Jews to believe in a crucified-then-resurrected Messiah required the signs, miracles, and wonders prevalent in the early years of the Church!).

Even after his death and resurrection, upon seeing the empty tomb, the disciples did not understand what had happened (John 20:9). It took Jesus personally appearing to a number of people for the disciples to believe he had been raised from the dead. Jesus first appeared to Mary Magdalene (John 20:16), then to the women who came to the tomb (Matt. 28:9), then to Peter (this appearing is not recorded in Scripture; we are only told that it happened; Luke 24:34; 1 Cor. 15:5); then to the two men on the road to Emmaus (Luke 24:31), then to the disciples as a group (Luke 24:36ff). Even with all this evidence, Thomas, who was not with the disciples when Jesus appeared, still did not believe until he had personally seen the resurrected Lord (John 20:26-28). Ultimately, it took both understanding the Scriptures and seeing the resurrected Christ to fully confirm their belief in the resurrected Christ (Luke 24:45).

And just as they were not able to understand the death and resurrection of Jesus before it happened, they did not understand what he was saying to them when he spoke of his ascension into heaven (John 14:5; 16:17-19). Even after his death and resurrection, the disciples did not understand the ascension. Very close to his ascension the disciples asked him if he was going to restore the kingdom to Israel (Acts 1:6). They understood the prophecies of the restored earth ruled by the Messiah, and thought that he would use his spiritual power to conquer Jerusalem and the world. They did not realize Jesus had to ascend into heaven. Jesus’ ministry from heaven became clear to them over time. When the ascension happened, the Apostles kept looking into heaven, as if he would come right back down, and had to be told by two angels that suddenly appeared that he would come back down in the future, something that became much more clear as year after year as the books of the New Testament were written and Jesus did not come back and establish his kingdom.

18:39. “but he cried out all the more.” There are many lessons that we learn from Scripture about things that help us get what we want in life. One of them is being doggedly determined, and this is an example of it. You would think that the crowd would want to help a blind man see, but, alas, often people do not have the best interest of others at heart. In this case the crowd likely has some “religious reason” for supposedly protecting the sanctity of Jesus, and not let him be disturbed from his goal of reaching Jerusalem. Not deterred by the false religious scruples of the crowd, the blind man knew what he wanted and knew what it took to get his petition to Jesus—by yelling loud enough Jesus could hear him—and he yelled until he was heard, at which point he could bring his petition directly to Jesus, who in typical loving and compassionate form, saw the man’s trust and determination and healed him.

19:2. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

Luke 19:5. “I must stay at your house.” Jesus spent the night at Zacchaeus’ house. The trip from Jericho to Jerusalem was over 15 miles (24 km), all uphill, and so he would have started out on the next day, probably in the late morning, and arrived before supper. When he arrived in Bethany, the people there made him a supper. The trip to Jerusalem took place six days before Passover (John 12:1, 2).

19:8. “See.” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

19:9. “he also is a son of Abraham.” Instead of speaking directly to Zacchaeus, Jesus spoke about him and his salvation to those who were present.

19:13. “minas.” The Greek is mna (#3414 μνᾶ), which we translate as “mina.” The mina was a Greek monetary unit worth 100 denarii (also 100 drachmae), and a denarius was worth one days wage for a fieldworker or soldier, or what we today would roughly call “minimum wage.” If a worker makes $8 an hour or $64 per day, in 100 days he makes $6,400 dollars. One hundred days work is roughly 1/3 of a years working days, so a mina was worth about 1/3 year’s wage for a worker.

19:20. “see.” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).
19:24. This verse demonstrates clearly that the wisdom of the world is foolishness with God (1 Cor. 3:19), and the world does not understand the wisdom of God. The world takes from the rich (often by excessive taxes) and gives to the poor. But the poor have demonstrated their inability to manage what they have, and despite hundreds of years of various welfare programs in different countries and different cultures (from the “grain dole” in the Roman Empire to the welfare system in the United States), the poor almost always stay poor. Furthermore, by taking away from the rich both the building power of their money and their incentive to work hard, the rich are made poorer and the poor are reduced to the point of being almost destitute. Christ demonstrates the wisdom of God and the way economies should work. The poor lose what they have but can work if they wish to survive, and the rich have plenty to use to build an economy that supplies jobs because they have full control of their own money and plenty of incentive for making more.

19:25. “Lord, he has ten minas.” The people in the parable, not the crowd listening to the parable, speak this. The crowds were used to listening to parables and would not have expressed such surprise by something said in a parable, even if it seemed unusual. On the other hand, Jesus knew the parable reflected the reality of what will happen on the Day of Judgment, and that some people will be very surprised at God’s justice, and thus he builds that surprise into the parable. It is both wise and just to give more things to manage to people who have demonstrated the ability to well manage what they have. There are some commentators who see this statement as part of the crowd listening to Jesus rather than the crowd in the parable, which is why some versions such as the KJV have the verse in a parenthesis.

Luke 19:28. “And when he had said these things, he went on ahead.” Jesus had spent the night at Zacchaeus’ house in Jericho (19:5). It was over 15 miles (24 km) from Jericho to Jerusalem, all uphill, so he would have gotten up and gotten a start by the laste morning, and sometime after he arrived in Bethany at the house of Lazarus, Mary, and Martha (John 12:1, 2), they made him supper.

19:30. “colt.” This “colt” is not a young horse, but a young donkey (Matt. 21:2-5).

19:37. “as he was drawing near.” This verse is in contrast with verse 41, which states “when he drew near.” As Jesus left Bethany for Jerusalem, he would be going up the east slope of the Mount of Olives, from which Jerusalem could not be seen. However, “as he was drawing near Jerusalem,” at the start of the downward slope of the west side of the Mount of Olives, the first glimpses of Jerusalem would be visible. The full panorama of Jerusalem, including of the City of David (south of the Temple Complex), the Temple Complex, and the city of Jerusalem, were not yet be visible (cp. v. 41), because it would have been obscured by houses and perhaps even by part of the Mount of Olives itself. Nevertheless, parts of Jerusalem did start to come into view. Upon seeing Jerusalem, the huge crowd became filled with emotion and began to shout and praise God because of all the miracles they had seen, and because their expectation was that someone who could heal the blind and raise the dead would be able to deliver them from the Romans and issue in the Messianic Kingdom.

Jerusalem.” Jerusalem, and what he would accomplish there, had been the object of his travels for months now. Even before the Feast of Tabernacles the year previous, he “set his face to go to Jerusalem” (Luke 9:51). We must note that this phrase is eschatological, not geographical; it points to the end of his life and what he will accomplish. From a purely historical/geographical point of view, Jesus would go to Jerusalem one more time before he went there at Passover (when he was crucified), and that time was for the Feast of Dedication in the winter (John 10:22). As the months drew closer to his crucifixion, the Word tells us more and more he was going to Jerusalem. Luke 13:22 says Jesus traveled through the cities and villages, heading for Jerusalem. Later, as he headed for Jerusalem, he took the apostles aside and told them he would suffer and die there (Matt. 20:17-19; Mark 10:32-34; Luke 18:31-33). After leaving Jericho, he made the steep climb up the out of the Great Rift Valley and up the east slope of the Mount of Olives, heading for Jerusalem (Luke 19:28). Now at last he drew near the city. The verse is not simply stating that what he drew near to was the west slope of the Mount of Olives, although the Greek can be translated that way. No, he drew near Jerusalem. How near? He was already at the west slope of the Mount of Olives, on the verge of entering the city. We believe the Expositor’s Greek New Testament correctly notes that, “Luke is thinking of Jerusalem = when he was nearing the city. The next clause, πρὸς τῇ καταβάσει, is added to define more precisely the point reached = at the descent of the mount.”

“the whole multitude.” This multitude consisted of the crowds who had followed Jesus from Jericho, where Jesus had performed miracles such as healing blind Bartimaeus and his blind companion (Matt. 10:29-34; Mark 10:46-52; Luke 18:35-43), and was greatly swelled by the people in Jerusalem who heard he was approaching and went out to see and welcome him (John 12:12-18; note that John 12:17 and 18 mentions two crowds).

19:41. “drew near and saw the city.” Jesus had come up from Jericho and stayed in Bethany (John 12:1-12). Bethany is on the east slope of the Mount of Olives, but houses continue up the slope and cover the top of the mountain. Thus in verse 37, as the procession reached the top of the Mount of Olives, the whole city of Jerusalem was still not in view. However, the Mount of Olives is steep, and as Jesus and the crowd descended the Mount of Olives and came closer to Jerusalem, the whole city became visible before them. Upon seeing it, Jesus became overcome with emotion and burst into tears.

“burst into sobs.” The Greek is klaio (κλαῖω; pronounced klī'-ō), and it means to weep, cry, mourn, lament. It is used of crying from pain and grief. In this verse the verb is an ingressive aorist which means the crying happened suddenly: “burst into tears” (A. T. Robertson, Word Pictures in the New Testament; Hendrickson, New Testament Commentary: Luke; Charles Williams, The New Testament). Lenski writes, “burst into sobs.” Robertson notes that Jesus probably cried audibly, while Vincent (Word Studies) asserts Jesus did weep out loud. H. A. W. Meyer writes, “Observe, further, the audible weeping of Jesus at the view of Jerusalem, not the silent δακρύω, as at the grave of Lazarus (John 11:35)” (Meyer’s Commentary). It is a normal human emotion that when we are faced with difficult circumstances such as a death or separation that we can control our emotions much of the time, but are sometimes overcome with a wave of grief or sadness that causes us to burst into tears. That is what happened to Jesus. He knew the Jews in Jerusalem rejected him, and he knew that most of the people in the crowd that surrounded him, although they were saying, “Blessed is the King who comes in the name of the Lord,” in their hearts they did not really want the Messiah that he was. They wanted political deliverance; they wanted the peace of the Messianic Kingdom; they wanted an easy life; they did not want to repent and change themselves. That is why, when Jesus was arrested and did not give the people what they wanted, they quickly changed what they were shouting, and shouted, “Crucify him!” (Mark 15:11-14). Jesus knew all this already, and had been dealing with it emotionally. However, upon getting a clear view of Jerusalem he was overcome by a wave of emotion and burst into audible crying, sobbing over the wasted lives, the pride and selfishness, the unbelief, and the untapped potential of the people, as well as over the destruction he foresaw of the people and city that he loved. (for his more silent crying, see commentary on John 11:35).

19:42. “would bring.” The Greek preposition pros means “to” or “toward,” and the idea is that the things that would lead to or would bring peace. The hardness of Jerusalem and its leaders no doubt fueled Jesus’ emotion, but that was exacerbated by the people around him shouting, “Blessed is the King....” He knew that they wanted a Messiah, yes, but the kind they wanted, not the kind he was. They wanted political deliverance, wealth and health, and would not settle for less. Thus, it was only a few days later when they realized Jesus would not bring them what they wanted, they shouted, “Crucify him” (23:21).

“peace...” This is the figure of speech, aposiopesis, or “sudden silence” (Bullinger, Figures; Robertson, Word Pictures in the New Testament). Jesus, overcome with emotion or seeing no point to it, did not finish his sentence. Some versions end the phrase with an exclamation point, as if Jesus was showing great emotion, perhaps anger or frustration. There is no imperative in the Greek text and Jesus is crying over the lost potential: “If only you had known...” and he let his voice drop off. Then he restarted with the actual situation, “But now they have been hidden from your eyes.”

“have been hidden.” The Greek is krupto (#2928 κρύπτω), to conceal or to hide, and it is in the passive voice. This verse is not saying that God hid what the people of Jerusalem needed to see, but rather just makes the statement that they have been hidden. When a person stubbornly refuses to acknowledge the truth, over time one’s understanding becomes darker and darker. This was the situation with Jerusalem. The leaders and the people had refused to believe Jesus over and over, and eventually their eyes could not see.

19:46. Quoted from Isaiah 56:7 and Jeremiah 7:11.

19:48. “hanging upon what he said.” A very graphic idiomatic saying. A more literal, but also more confusing, translation is that all the people “were hanging on him, listening” (cp. YLT). But the people were not literally “hanging on him,” they were hanging on every word he spoke. The Jewish leaders hated Jesus, but the crowds loved him.

Chapter 20

20:7. “they did not know where it was from.” The religious leaders lied to Jesus. They were convinced, wrongly, that John’s baptism was from men, but they lied about it to protect themselves. They would not tell where they thought it was from, so Jesus said he would not tell them where he got his authority.

20:8. “Neither will I tell you.” Jesus was not fooled by the Jews saying they did not know. They knew exactly what they believed, but those hypocrites and cowards were afraid to say it. Jesus had said if they would tell him about John’s baptism, he would tell them about the source of his authority. Since they would not tell him, he kept his word and would not tell them.

20:9. “And he began to speak to the people this parable.” This parable is a clear reference to the parable of the vineyard in Isaiah 5:1-7, except in Isaiah the vineyard is itself Israel, and is wicked, while in Jesus’ parable the vineyard is God’s and it is the people who are hired to tend it who are evil. Jesus was using thinly veiled language to speak of the leaders of the Jews, who had been entrusted by God to take care of His vineyard, i.e., His people, but were evil. The Jews got his point (v. 19), and wanted to arrest him but were afraid of the people. This parable appears in Matthew 21:33-46; Mark 12:1-12, and Luke 20:9-19.

20:14. “will be.” The Greek verb is subjunctive, but that is due to the hina (#2443 ἓνα) that starts the phrase and demands a subjunctive verb, and in these cases the tense of the verb must be translated from context. The renters thought if they killed the heir, the vineyard would be theirs.

20:16. “May it not be!” Literally in the Greek, “May it not be.” This is an idiom that reflects revulsion at the thought. Perhaps, “Perish the thought” would be good. “God forbid,” which is employed in many versions, is not bad, and carries the sense, but it is so different from the Greek text that it is better in this case to translate the idiom more literally.

20:34. “people of this age.” The Greek literally reads, “the sons of this age,” but that is the standard Semitic idiom where a “son” of something refers to someone who is somehow associated with it, for example, a “son of disobedience” is a disobedient person. Thus a “son of the resurrection” (Luke 20:36) is a person who is resurrected.

20:35. “out from among the dead.” See Romans 4:24. Wuest: “out from among those who are dead.” This verse in Luke is referring to the first resurrection, the resurrection of the righteous, which is at the start of the Millennial Kingdom, Christ’s 1000 year reign (Rev. 20:4). The second resurrection is the resurrection of the unrighteous (Acts 24:15; Rev. 20:5, 11-14). [For more on the resurrections, see commentary on Acts 24:15].

“But that the dead are raised.” The Greek verb, egeirō (#1453 ἐγείρω), is in the present tense, not to say that they are being raised as they die (the dead bodies were obviously in the ground), but rather as a contrast to the Sadducees’ claim that the dead do not rise.

20:38. “for all live for him.” This verse makes the point that God created people to live for him (cp. Eph. 2:10), and it will not do to have His beloved be dead in the ground. His purposes, as accepted by those who believe in Him, will be fulfilled, they will live for him. The key to understanding the phrase, “for all live for him,” lies in knowing that the Sadducees said there was no resurrection, while Jesus said there was a resurrection (cp. Luke 14:14; 20:35, 36). Neither the Sadducees nor Jesus was espousing that the dead were actually alive. Rather, the issue was, did people die and then stay dead, or did they die and then later, at the resurrection, get raised back to life? Since the Sadducees only accepted the Torah (the Five Books of Moses) as the Word of God, and considered the rest of Scripture to not have divine authority, Jesus, to help them understand, quoted from the Torah. Other Scriptures perhaps more clearly prove the resurrection, such as Peter used (Acts 2:25-36), or Paul (Acts 13:33-35), and there are other verses such as some in Isaiah 53 that are not quoted in Scripture, but clearly refer to the resurrection of Christ. Translating the Greek as “for to him everyone is alive,” as the NIV does, misses the point and clouds the issue. Not everyone is alive, and God knows this, which is why He fights for His people to stay alive. All through the Bible He rescued His people from death. Dead people cannot praise God (Isa. 38:18).

20:39. “you have well spoken.” The experts in the law who made that statement would have been Pharisees, and they believed in the resurrection (cp. Acts 23:6-9), but had never managed to silence the Sadducees like Jesus had just done.

20:40. “For they did not dare to question him any more.” After Jesus silenced the Sadducees, they did not question him any more.

20:46. “experts in the law who desire.” The English versions are divided as to whether the meaning is, “Beware of the experts in the law. They desire to walk in long robes…” or “Beware of the experts in the law who desire to walk in long robes.” The Greek text can be punctuated either way. If there is a period (or even a comma) after “law,” then Jesus is warning the people about all the experts in the law. If, on the other hand, there is no punctuation between “law” and “who,” then Jesus is only warning people about those experts who are self-seeking. It is a difficult choice. On the one hand, the Bible testifies that there were some experts in the law who were godly, and Jesus surely knew that, and so could have made a simple literal statement. On the other hand, it is common to exaggerate that kind of statement; they did it in biblical times and we do it today. We might say, for example, “Lawyers are greedy,” and our audience would know that not every lawyer is greedy, but many of them are.

So was Jesus making a literal statement, or was he exaggerating to make a point? We may never know, but for translation purposes, given the fact that only a few verses earlier there were some apparently godly experts in the law (Luke 20:39), in our opinion, it is clearer to translate the statement in a way that expresses literal truth. We feel that makes it much easier for the English reader to believe what Jesus said—that only some experts in the law were to be avoided. Also, it avoids the possibility that someone would think that Jesus said every expert in the law was an ungodly person, something clearly not true.

Chapter 21

21:6. “one stone on another.” The Greek is literally, “a stone upon a stone that will not be thrown down.”

21:15. “a mouth.” Figure of speech metonymy, the mouth being put for the words that will come from it.
21:19. “souls.” The Greek word is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoo-kay'), and it has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person or animal; an individual person; or attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. Here it refers to the physical life of the body, which is why some versions translate it “life.” However, since in this context Jesus is not referring to temporal life, but everlasting life, “soul” seemed a better choice than “life.” By staying faithful to the end, believers gain everlasting life. [For a more complete explanation of “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’”].

21:23. “distress…wrath.” This is the wrath of God associated with the Day of the Lord (see commentary on Revelation 6:17).

Chapter 22

22:3. “the Adversary.” The Greek word for Adversary is Satanas (#4567 Σατανᾶς), which has been transliterated into “Satan” in most versions. This causes the meaning of the word, which is important, to be lost. For more information on it, see the note on Mark 1:13. [For more information on the names of the Devil, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer.”]

22:4. “Temple commanders.” The Greek word is strategos (#4755 στρατηγός), and it is only used in the New Testament in the books written by Luke: the Gospel of Luke and Acts. The “commander” was the highest official in a Greco-Roman city (thus we have translated it “magistrate” in Acts 16:20, 22, 35, 36, 38). The Greek word strategos is also used of the commander of the Temple police in Jerusalem. The “commander” was the top man in charge of the police force that governed the Temple. Then there were officers of various ranks under the commander. In the Jewish writings the commander of the Temple is called, “the man of the Temple Mount.” The Temple police were a large number of hand-picked Levites who kept order at the Temple, which was a huge complex, covering more than 37 acres, and was sometimes filled with tens of thousands of people. The Temple police were empowered by the Romans and the Sanhedrin (the Jewish ruling council of 70) to maintain order, and insure that the laws of Israel were being kept. They had the power to arrest people, which is what they were sent to do to Jesus but were unable to do (John 7:30, 32, 45). There were many specific rules and regulations concerning the Temple that needed to be enforced. These included insuring that the boundaries of the various courts (court of the Gentiles, court of the women, court of the men, etc.) were respected, the purity laws kept such that no unclean people approached the holy places, and that the many other rules were kept as well.

At night the Temple police were placed in twenty-four stations around the Temple and its compound. Twenty-one of the stations were occupied by Levites, while three were occupied by both Levites and priests. There were ten men at each station except for the three innermost to the Sanctuary, which had ten Levites and ten priests. Thus, there were 240 Levites and thirty priests on guard in the Temple every night.

This verse mentions the “commanders” of this police force, as does verse 52, while Acts 4:1; 5:24, 26 mention the top commander (using the word in the singular).

22:10. “Listen!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ιδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).
“a man carrying a pitcher of water.” This would be very unusual. The customary practice for millennia was that women carried the water.

22:15. “eagerly desired.” The Greek is the figure of speech polyptoton, and reads, “with desire I have desired,” meaning with great desire, or eagerly desired.

22:19. “This is my body.” This is the figure of speech metaphor. In the Bible, there are many uses of the three common figures of speech of comparison, which are simile, metaphor, and hypocatastasis. These three figures are commonly used in English speech as well, but only simile and metaphor are generally known by name.

A simile is a comparison by resemblance, usually using “like” or “as.” If a person is a sloppy and noisy eater, someone might say, “You eat like a pig.” Psalm 1:3 uses a simile when it says a righteous person is like a tree planted by the water. Proverbs 11:22 (HCSB) says, “A beautiful woman who rejects good sense is like a gold ring in a pig’s snout.” Jesus effectively used the figure simile when he said, “Woe to you, teachers of the law and Pharisees, you hypocrites! You are like whitewashed tombs” (Matt. 23:27).

More intense than a simile is the figure metaphor, a comparison by representation. In a metaphor, one noun represents another. In the pig example above, a metaphor would be, “You are a pig.” Jesus used a metaphor when he said to his disciples, “I am the vine; you are the branches…” (John 15:5 NIV).

Even more intense than metaphor is the figure hypocatastasis, which is a comparison by implication. This figure is very common, but not well known by name. In the pig example, instead of comparing the messy eater with a pig by saying he is “like” a pig, or even that he “is” a pig, in hypocatastasis the comparison is just implied. One person says to the other, “Pig!” and the meaning, although just implied, is effectively communicated. [For more on hypocatastasis, see commentary on Rev. 20:2].

There are many metaphors in both the Old Testament and the New Testament. Genesis 49:14 says, “Issachar is a strong donkey.” Deuteronomy 33:22 says “Dan is a lion’s cub.” Job 25:6 says, “man...who is a maggot.” Psalm 18:2 says, “The Lord is my rock,” and Psalm 84:11 says, “For the LORD God is a sun and shield.” God is not literally a “sun” but He does provide warmth and what is needed for life and growth. Neither is He literally a “shield,” but He does protect us from much harm. Psalm 60:7 (ESV) says, “Ephraim is my helmet; Judah is my scepter.” Jeremiah 50:17 says, “Israel is a scattered flock....” Hosea 10:1 says, “Israel was a spreading vine; he brought forth fruit for himself.”

New Testament metaphors include: “You are the salt of the earth” (Matt. 5:13), “I am the bread of life” (John 6:48), “I am the door of the sheep” (John 10:7), and says, “you are a letter from Christ” (2 Cor. 3:3).

The danger with the figures metaphor and hypocatastasis is that the reader may not realize that a figure is being used and mistake the figure for a literal statement. That is what has happened with Jesus’ statement, “This is my body.” The early Christians understood the metaphor that Jesus used when he said, “This is my body. “There is no evidence that the apostles or anyone in the early Church misunderstood what Jesus was saying was a metaphor or ever even considered the idea of what is now called “transubstantiation.”

The doctrine of transubstantiation, in which the bread (“host”) is said to become the actual body of Christ developed very late, more than 1000 years after Christ. The Internet encyclopedia Wikipedia says, “The earliest known use of the term ‘transubstantiation’ to describe the change from bread and wine to body and blood of Christ was by Hildebert de Lavardin, Archbishop of Tours (died 1133), in the eleventh century and by the end of the twelfth century the term was in widespread use. In 1215, the Fourth Council of the Lateran spoke of the bread and wine as ‘transubstantiated’ into the body and blood of Christ.” (This information from the Internet can be confirmed in books such as Walter Elwell, ed., Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, under “Transubstantiation”).

22:20, “which is being poured out for you.” The last phrase in this verse has been translated in two different ways.

(REV) “This cup is the new covenant in my blood, which is being poured out for you.”

(ESV) “This cup that is poured out for you is the new covenant in my blood.”

The question is: is the verse saying that it is the literal cup of wine that is being poured out, or is it saying that Jesus’ blood is being poured out? This has to be a reference to Jesus’ blood being poured out. His sacrifice had begun. He was at the Last Supper and Judas had already left to betray him (22:4). Lenski writes: “Jesus means that this pouring out of his sacrificial blood has now begun. And he has, indeed, truly entered upon his sacrifice.” Jesus was beginning the sacrifice of his life for the salvation of mankind, hence the present participle, “being poured out.” To make the verse say that the cup of wine was being poured out is only to state the obvious, and misses the point that the pouring out of Jesus’ life had started in a very real and powerful way.

22:21. “look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

22:31. “take notice!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

“the Adversary.” The Greek word for Adversary is Satanas (#4567 Σατανᾶς), which has been transliterated into “Satan” in most versions. This causes the meaning of the word, which is important, to be lost. For more information on it, see the note on Mark 1:13. [For more information on the names of the Devil, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer.”]

22:34. “the rooster will not crow this day, until you have denied three times that you know me.” This was revelation, and convicted Peter when the rooster crowed. There is a teaching in some Christian circles that Jesus was not referring to a rooster, but rather to the priest who opened the Temple doors first thing in the morning. According to the Jewish writings, at first light the priest who opened the Temple doors would cry three times, “All the priests prepare to sacrifice. All the Levites to their stations. All the Israelites come to worship.” Because of his crying out at dawn, this priest was referred to as the “rooster.” The idea that Jesus is referring to the “rooster” priest, and not a real rooster, is supposedly bolstered by the fact that because of their habit of getting into places where they are not wanted, and because the priests did not want them getting into the Temple, roosters were not allowed inside the walled city of Jerusalem. However, a careful study of the Bible and roosters will show that the “rooster” mentioned by Jesus was a real rooster. The rooster that crowed after Peter had denied Jesus did not crow first thing in the morning. It crowed after Jesus had only been at the High Priest’s house for no more than a couple hours (Luke 22:57-60). This alone rules out the possibility that the rooster was the priest who opened the Temple gates. Anyone who owns roosters will tell you that the common belief that roosters crow only at dawn is simply not true. Roosters crow throughout the day and even the night. Furthermore, in the cold night air of the Passover season, their crows can be clearly heard for more than a mile across the hills of Judea. The city of Jerusalem in Christ’s time was only about a square mile, so it would not be impossible that a rooster on the Mount of Olives could be heard by most of Jerusalem, for example. And from what we know of the layout of the Jerusalem in Jesus’ time, the High Priest’s house was next to, or at least close to, the wall of the city. Therefore, a rooster outside the city could be heard very clearly in his courtyard.

22:37. Quoted from Isaiah 53:12.

“is being fulfilled.” “Is being” is the translation of echō (#2192 ἔχω), “to have” or “hold,” in the present tense. Literally it reads, “has fulfillment.” But in English we would say “is being fulfilled,” not “it has its fulfillment,” which could give the false impression of past tense. The present tense shows that the fulfillment is going on; the prophecy is presently being fulfilled.

22:38. “see.” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

22:43, 44. There are a number of reasons for believing that these verses are an addition to the text and are not original. They are absent from the earliest Greek manuscripts, but also from manuscripts of diverse text types. Also, some of the manuscripts that do contain them have scribal marks indicating that although the scribe copied them into the text, they were not original. Also, they are not in the same place in every ancient manuscript. In some manuscripts they occur in Matthew, after Matthew 26:39. This fact is very telling, because if a text is original and gets accidentally removed, it is always in the same place in the manuscripts that have it. However, if a verse is added, sometimes scribes add it in different places, which is what happened with these verses. Also, the verses contain vocabulary that occurs nowhere else in Luke, which, on its own does not carry much weight, but when combined with the other evidence is noteworthy. While it is still possible that the verses are original (some early manuscripts contain them while others do not, and some Church Fathers quote them while others omit them), the weight of the evidence leads us to believe they were added to the text.

One thing to keep in mind is that, although it sometimes happens that a section of scripture this long is added or deleted by accident, it is far more likely that this section, as complete as it is, was added or omitted on purpose. That being the case, and since we can construct from the manuscripts that this addition or deletion occurred sometime in the second century after Christ, why would the change occur? The most likely reason for the change would have been as an effort to combat one of the “heresies” of the early church: Docetism. The label “Docetism” came from the Greek word dokein, “to seem,” and it was the belief of the docetics that Jesus was not human, but only seemed human. The debate over whether Jesus was human or merely some sort of phantom raged hot and heavy in the second century and was firmly condemned at the Council of Nicaea in 325 AD. Thus, given the time period and the evidence of the text itself, it seems likely that in order to have a text that “proved” Jesus was human, these verses were added to the text of Scripture.

Even if the verses were added to the text, that does not mean the event did not happen. It is possible that Jesus really did pray so hard he sweat drops of sweat, and this was part of the oral tradition that was passed down about Jesus by the members of the early Church. Then, especially considering the controversy about the humanity of Jesus, it was added to the text by scribes anxious to defend Jesus’ humanity. For more information, see Metzger, Textual Commentary, and Ehrman, Orthodox Corruption of Scripture.

22:58. “someone else.” In verses 56 through 60, Peter is accused of being associated with Jesus three times by three different people, and three times here he denies the Lord. We know the first accuser is female, because it specifically says she was a “servant girl” in verse 56, and Peter replies with the appellation, “woman” in verse 57. The second two accusers were males, which we can tell from the Greek words heteros and allos, and the fact Peter changes his address to “man,” in verses 58 and 60.

After the servant girl accuses Peter, the Greek says “another” saw him and addressed him, using the word heteros (♯2087 ἕτερος). This word means, “another of a different kind.” In this case, the first “kind” was a female, then by using heteros in the masculine, Luke is telling us the second questioner was a male. Hence Peter changes his appellative to “man” here in verse 58. Then in verse 59 we are told still “another” addressed Peter, but this time the Greek is allos (♯243 ἄλλος), meaning “another of the same kind”—since the last questioner was male, another of the same kind would also be a male, hence Peter also uses the appellative “man” in verse 60. This record is an excellent example of how the words heteros (“another of a different kind”) and allos (“another of the same kind”) can help to understand a passage.

Reading this record in the KJV can be confusing, because heteros and allos are both simply translated “another.” It says a “maid” first talks to Peter, then “another,” then “another,” leaving the impression it is another maid—but Peter switches his replies from “woman” to “man.” To avoid this confusion and bring out the full meaning of the Greek, we translated heteros as “someone else” in verse 58.

22:65. “insulting him.” The Greek verb blasphēmeō (♯987 βλασφημέω) is transliterated (not translated) from the Greek into English as “blasphemy.” In English, “blasphemy” is only used in reference to God. However, in Greek, blasphēmeō and blasphēmia (the noun) did not have to refer to God or a god, although they could, but were common words that were used of someone speaking against another. The primary meanings were showing disrespect to a person or deity, and/or harming his, her, or its reputation. In this case, the people at the trial of Jesus were insulting and defaming him. [For more on blasphēmeō, see commentary on Matt. 9:3].

22:70. “You say correctly that I am.” See Matthew 27:11 note on “It is as you say.”

Chapter 23

23:3. “It is as you say.” See Matthew 27:11 note on “It is as you say.”

23:9. “questioned him at some length.” The Greek reads, “was questioning him with many words,” but the phrase means “questioned him at some length,” just as many translations have. Herod questioned Jesus at some length, but there is no evidence of a trial. Herod wanted to have his curiosity satisfied, and did not really care whether or not Jesus got justice in his court.

“but he did not answer him.” It is certainly understandable that Jesus did not answer Herod Antipas. First and foremost, there was no profit in it. For him to die in Jerusalem he would have to be tried before Pilate, who had the authority there. He had no desire to be taken under arrest back to Galilee. Further, he would provide no satisfaction to Herod, who had killed his friend and cousin John the Baptist. Neither was he interested in giving any satisfaction to Herod’s court, which included his murderous wife Herodias, or his dancing step-daughter Salome. He could have told them that soon he would be their judge and condemn them to a second death, but that would have only made him the butt of their jokes.

“mocked.” The Greek word translated “mocked” is empaizo (#1702 ἐμπαίζω), and means “mock,” “make fun of,” “ridicule.” See commentary on Matthew 27:29.

“sent him back to Pilate.” Herod Antipas was no doubt embarrassed by his failure to get Jesus to talk to him, so he mocked Jesus, treated him badly, and sent him to Pilate. He could have taken Jesus back to Galilee and tried him there, but since he was already feeling a lack of support from his subjects for killing John the Baptist, he would not take Jesus back to his area of strongest support and execute him when he could simply send him back to Pilate, who would then have to deal with him.

23:12. “friends.” Pilate and Herod Antipas had been hostile to each other, deeply disliking one another. Herod had even sent a letter about Pilate to the Roman Emperor Tiberias about his not respecting Jewish customs (see commentary on Pilate on Matthew 27:2.) Pilate’s sending Jesus to Herod, even though Pilate could have tried the case himself, was viewed by Herod as a personal and professional courtesy, both in recognizing his rank as Tetrarch of Galilee, but also in allowing him to see Jesus, something that Pilate likely knew Herod wanted.

23:13. “Pilate called the chief priests and the rulers and the people together.” This was now close to noon on Tuesday (John 19:14), and the start of Jesus’ second trial before Pilate. In Luke 23:1, the Jews brought Jesus to Pilate; he did not have to call them together (cp. Matt. 27:1; Mark 15:1; John 18:28).

23:14. “Take notice!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

23:15. “see” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

23:17. This verse is an addition to some Greek texts, from whence it was translated into some versions. It was apparently added, based on Matthew 27.15 and Mark 15.6. See Metzger, Textual Commentary.

23:21. “Crucify! Crucify him!” The majority of this crowd was probably Jewish leaders, followers of the Jewish leaders, Temple police, etc. There is a lot of traditional teaching about the fickle crowd who shouted “Hosanna” as Jesus rode into Jerusalem, but shouted “crucify him” only a few days later, but the real situation was different than that. To be sure, there would have been people who, seeing Jesus humbled and beaten by the Jewish rulers and the Romans would have thought he was a deceiver who misled and tricked them, and they would have changed their mind perhaps to the point they wanted Jesus crucified. However, the Gospel records make it plain that there were always people who doubted Jesus. This second trial before Pilate had not been advertised (Pilate had to gather the Jewish leaders back together after Herod returned Jesus to Pilate; Luke 23:13), but when the Jewish leaders were summoned before Pilate, no doubt they quickly spread the word to gather their supporters, who would have made up this crowd before Pilate. The followers of Jesus made up the crowd that followed him and were mourning (see commentary on Luke 23:27).

23:27. “a great multitude.” This shows that there was a huge crowd of people who did follow Jesus Christ, and did not agree with his crucifixion. It shows that the people in Jerusalem were divided into two camps: the group of people who shouted “Hosanna” and “Son of David” when Jesus entered Jerusalem some days earlier (Matt. 21:9; Mark 11:9; John 12:13), and the group of people who had shouted “Crucify him” (Matt. 27:23; Mark 15:14; Luke 23:21; John 19:15). The great multitude who was following Jesus seemed to genuinely sympathize with him, but it was to the women who were so emotional that he addressed himself.

“the People.” In this context “the People” refers to the people who were Jews (see commentary on Matt. 2:4).

“were beating themselves on the chest.” The Greek is koptō (#2875 κόπτω), and it means, to cut, strike, smite, or to beat one’s breast for grief.

23:29. “take notice!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

23:34. “And he said.” This verse is omitted in some early manuscripts, and therefore scholars have debated long and loud about whether it was or was not original. We believe it was original (Cp. Ehrman, Misquoting Jesus; Alford; The Greek Testament). If it was original, it would have been removed by those who were so biased against the Jews that any thought of them being forgiven by Jesus was repugnant (and had they believed it, they would have had to markedly change their attitudes towards the Jews). On the other hand, that Jesus would utter a prayer of forgiveness from the cross after some 40 hours of inhuman and merciless torture is so astounding and such an amazing act of grace that we dare say no human would have thought to add it. We believe any addition of that kind would have been immediately rejected by peers as absurd, and the saying would have never made it into the textual tradition.

23:39. “hanged.” The Greek is kremannumi (#2910 κρεμάννυμι), and it means, to hang, to hang up, to suspend, and it was also used of hanging or suspending someone on a cross, just as we used the word “hang” in reference to the cross, and say, “Jesus hung on the cross.”

“kept insulting.” The Greek verb blasphēmeō (#987 βλασφημέω) means showing disrespect to a person or deity, and/or harming his, her, or its reputation. [For more information on blasphēmeō, see commentary on Matt. 9:3].

23:42. “remember me.” This is the “pregnant sense” of remember, when the word remember is used idiomatically to mean more than just remember, it means to pay special attention to. For a more complete explanation, see commentary on Romans 8:29.

23:43. “I say to you today, you will be with me...” This verse is one of the demonstrations of Jesus’ great love for people. The malefactor on the cross had no assurance of salvation, and in fact may have been fairly certain of his own doom. Yet in a last act he reached out to the Messiah, and Jesus promised him life in Paradise. Jesus never turns away those who come to him for salvation.

What Jesus said in Luke 23:43 to the criminal on the cross has been quoted to prove that when a person dies, he goes immediately to Heaven or Hell, but it does not have to read that way. Admittedly, the way that this verse is punctuated in almost every English Bible, it does say the criminal was going to go to Paradise that day. However, there was no punctuation in the original text (in fact, there were not even spaces between the words). All punctuation was added by translators, and they added it in a way that fit their theology and made sense to them. Thankfully, most of the time the translators have done a good job with the punctuation, and it is correct and helpful. However, in this verse almost every English Bible puts the comma in the wrong place, creating a false and misleading reading.

We believe that the comma should be after the word “today,” not in front of it. That way, the verse reads: “And he [Jesus] said to him [the criminal], ‘Truly, I say to you today, you will be with me in Paradise.’” Thus Jesus did not say the criminal would be in Paradise that day, but rather made the point that today he was saying the criminal would be in Paradise in the future.

Placing the comma after “today” makes the verse fit with both the scope of Scripture and the immediate context. From the scope of Scripture we learn that when a person dies he is dead; not alive in any form (see commentary on 1 Cor. 15:26). The comma being after “today” also fits with the immediate context. To see this, we must remember what the criminal said to Jesus in the previous verse, Luke 23:42: “Remember me when you come into your kingdom.” The criminal was speaking about the “kingdom.” The “kingdom” is not “heaven,” and it is future, it is not available now, which is why the criminal said, ‘when you come into your kingdom.’ The kingdom is the Messianic Kingdom that Jesus will set up on earth after he fights the Battle of Armageddon and conquers the earth. The Bible has a lot to say about the Messianic Kingdom: there will be peace, justice, and safety on earth. Jesus will rule from Jerusalem, everyone will worship in the Temple (Ezek. 40-44), and the lion will eat straw like the ox (Isa. 11:7). Also, everyone will be healthy and have plenty to eat. [For more information about the Millennial Kingdom see commentary on Matt. 5:6, “the meek will inherit the earth,” and John Schoenheit, The Christian’s Hope: The Anchor of the Soul].

The criminal did not doubt that the Messianic Kingdom was coming, but he likely doubted whether he would be allowed into it. So in an unassuming, pleading way, he requested, “Remember me when you come into your kingdom.” In other words, the criminal said to the Lord that he would like to be in the first resurrection, the Resurrection of the Righteous, and get to enter the Kingdom and be saved. It was a wonderful act of love for Jesus to say, “you will be with me in Paradise.”

Why did Jesus use the word “today?” In many languages, including Greek, Hebrew, and English, words that we normally think of as being “time words” are often used for emphasis. This happens with the English word “now” all the time. A teacher might say, “Now class, make sure you sign your test.” The purpose of “Now” in that sentence is not time, but emphasis, and that can be the case in both Hebrew and Greek as well (cp. Luke 11:39, Acts 13:11; 15:10; 22:16; 1 Cor. 14:26; James 4:13).

In Hebrew, the word “today,” or “this day” was also used for emphasis, and it is used that way many times in the Old Testament. “I call heaven and earth to witness against you today,...” (Deut. 4:26); “know therefore today,...” (Deut. 4:39); “And these words, which I command thee this day,...” (Deut. 6:6). “I testify against you this day, that you shall perish” (Deut. 8:19). A use that is very similar to Luke 23:43 is Deuteronomy 30:18, “I declare to you today, that you shall surely perish.” There is very little difference between, “I say to you today” (Luke 23:43) and “I declare to you today” (Deut. 30:18). Deuteronomy 9:1 says, “Hear O Israel today you are going to cross over this Jordan (P. Craigie; The New International Commentary on the Old Testament, without punctuation). It is vital that we understand that Israel did not cross Jordan “that day,” and in fact did not do so for another couple months. So “today” did not mean that very day, but was used for emphasis. Bullinger, Companion Bible, notes the punctuation of Deuteronomy 9:1 should be: “Hear O Israel today, you are...,” which is very similar to Luke 23:43. Other uses, just in Deuteronomy, that include the word “today” more for emphasis than for time, include 4:40; 5:1; 7:11; 8:1, 11, 19; 9:1, 3, 10:13; 11:2, 8, 13, 26, 27, 28, 32, 13:18; 15:5, 15; 19:9; 26:3, 16, 17, 18; 27:1, 4, 10, 28:1, 13, 14, 15; 30:2, 8, 11, 15, 16, 18, 19; 32:46.

Joshua 23:14 is another verse that uses “today” for emphasis, not time. As it is punctuated in the NASB, it reads, “Now behold, today I am going the way of all the earth.” But Joshua did not die that day, which we can see by just reading the last two chapters of the Book of Joshua. Thus Joshua 23:14, Luke 23:43 and other verses we have seen should have the comma put after the word “today,” not before it.

Neither Jesus nor the criminal went to “Paradise” that day (see commentary on “Paradise” in Luke 23:43).

“Paradise.” The Greek text actually reads, “the Paradise” (tō paradeisō), that is, the well-known one that the prophets had been speaking about for centuries. Jesus was not speaking about “a” paradise,” but “the Paradise” that will be on earth when he conquers the earth and sets up his kingdom.

The English word “paradise” comes from the Greek word paradeisos (#3857 παράδεισος; pronounced pā-rā-day-sos). “Paradise” was, and will again be, a place on earth. God’s plan was that mankind would live on earth, and so He put Adam and Eve on earth in the Garden of Eden. God’s plan for mankind to live on a wonderful earth was temporarily spoiled by sin, but God will bring His plan to fulfillment. When Jesus Christ conquers the earth at the Battle of Armageddon and sets up his Messianic Kingdom, mankind will again live in “Eden,” in Paradise (Rev. 2:7).

The Hebrew word eden (#5731 עֵדֶן) means “delight, or pleasure.” When God created Adam and Eve, He loved them and so He put them in the “Garden of eden;” the “Garden of Delight” (Gen. 2:15). It is unfortunate that the translators decided to transliterate the word eden into “Eden” instead of translate it into “Delight.” The phrase “Garden of Eden” does not mean anything to most English readers except that it was a physical place on earth. In contrast, had the translators decided to say, “Garden of Delight” instead of “Garden of Eden,” we would still know it was a place on earth, but God’s love and purpose in putting people in a wonderful place would have been revealed.

When the Greeks living in Egypt translated the Hebrew Old Testament into Greek around 250 BC and made the Septuagint version, they translated the phrase “garden of eden” as “paradeisos” (pronounced par-a-day’-sos). Actually, paradeisos was not a Greek word, but was a loan-word from the Persian language and meant “pleasure garden.” It referred to the lush, protected pleasure gardens that oriental rulers and powerful men kept for their enjoyment. The English word “paradise” comes from the Greek word “paradeisos.” That the Greek speaking Jews translated the “garden of eden” as “paradeisos” was a good choice, because the Garden of eden was indeed a garden of delight, a paradise. By the time of Christ, paradeisos (Paradise) was one of the terms used for the Millennial Kingdom of Christ on earth, as we can see from 2 Corinthians 12:4 and Revelation 2:7.

We do not know for sure what language Jesus spoke when he spoke to the criminal on the cross because we do not know the nationality of the criminal, but Jesus did know because he heard the criminal speak. If Jesus spoke Hebrew, what he said would be in essence, “You will be with me in Eden.” If he spoke Greek, he would have used the word paradeisos.

The criminal on the cross asked to be remembered when Jesus came into his Kingdom, which will be on earth, and Jesus responded and comforted the man by saying he would indeed be in Eden, or Paradise, which will be on earth. When Jesus said, “You will be with me in Paradise,” Jesus was promising the man he would be in the resurrection of the righteous (Luke 14:14; Acts 24:15), also called the first resurrection (Rev. 20:5, 6); and “the resurrection of life” (John 5:29), and people in that resurrection then get to be part of the Messianic Kingdom on earth. [For more information on the resurrections, see commentary on Acts 24:15].

Neither Jesus nor the criminal went to “Paradise” that day. When Jesus Christ died, Scripture universally testifies that he was in the grave and not in Paradise. In fact, Paradise (the Messianic Kingdom on earth) has still not come—we are still awaiting the resurrection of the dead and the Messianic Kingdom on earth. But the fact that Jesus said, “You will be with me in Paradise” is a beautiful expression of Christ’s heart for mankind. He could have looked at the criminal and said, “Okay, I will remember you.” But by saying “You will be with me in Paradise,” Jesus gave the man strength and hope to be able to endure his last few hours of tremendous suffering on the cross. The man was in excruciating pain, but he had a hope that burned with a fire that must have kept his heart warm until his dying breath. [For more information on the Kingdom of Christ being on earth, see commentary on Matthew 5:5; the meek will inherit the earth].

It is sometimes taught that “Paradise” is an intermediary state that existed for righteous people before they could go to heaven. There is no direct scriptural support for such a place, but it is assumed to exist due to some false assumptions.

The first false assumption is that the soul is immortal, and therefore has to live somewhere. However, there is no Scriptural support for the soul being immortal. In fact, just the opposite. The soul can and does die (cp. Matt. 10:28). The reason that people need to be “raised from the dead” is because the “person” is dead, not just the body. If the person’s soul was alive somehow, it could be judged without the body being present, but Scripture never teaches that. Furthermore, when it speaks of resurrection, it speaks of the “person” being raised. There is no verse about a living soul rejoining a dead body. [For more information on this topic, see Appendix 4: The Dead are Dead].

Having made the false assumption that the dead person is actually alive and has to live somewhere, theologians then drew another false conclusion based on the first one. First, they correctly realized that if the person died before the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, the person’s soul could not go to “heaven.” If a dead person could go to heaven before Jesus died for his sin, then anyone could go to heaven before Jesus, and thus Jesus would not really have needed to come at all. So theologians invented a place where the souls of good people could go while they waited for the savior to save them and open the way to heaven. This “place” does not exist in the Bible, so it needed a name, and therefore some theologians call it “Paradise.”

The simple, biblical truth is that when a person dies, he is dead until God raises him from the dead, and the three major times that happens in Scripture are the Rapture of the Church, the First Resurrection (or Resurrection of the Righteous), and the Second Resurrection (or Resurrection of the Unrighteous). Jesus and the malefactor both died on the cross that day. God raised Jesus from the dead three days later and Jesus is now in heaven ruling as Lord and Christ. The malefactor is still in the grave, dead and completely unaware of the passage of time. But Jesus will be good for his promise, and on Resurrection Day that man will hear the shout of the Son of Man and come out of the tomb (John 5:25-29; Ezek. 37:12-14).

23:44. “sixth hour…ninth hour.” This is about our noon to 3 PM. Both the Jews and Romans divided the day into 12 hours, starting at daylight, roughly 6 AM. [For the hours of the day and the watches of the night, see commentary on Mark 6:48].

23:46. Quoted from Psalm 31:5.

“Father, into your hands I commit my spirit.” Jesus, speaking to his Father, God, committed the ultimate act of trust by giving up his life. The word “spirit” is translated from the Greek word pneuma (#4151 πνεῦμα), which has many meanings, and refers to things that are invisible and immaterial, yet often exert a force or influence that can be seen. Pneuma is also translated “spirit,” and we need to be aware that “spirit” itself has many meanings, including God (John 4:24); Jesus (2 Cor. 3:17; Rev. 2:7); angels (Heb. 1:14); demons (Matt. 10:1), “attitude” (Matt. 5:3; 26:41; Mark 14:38; Acts 18:25), and the natural life of the body, which is immaterial and thus in the realm of “spirit” (Luke 8:55; Acts 7:59; James 2:26). The natural life of the body (sometimes referred to as “soul”) is by nature “spirit,” and therefore is sometimes referred to as “spirit.” Examples include Luke 23:46, Matthew 27:50, Luke 8:55; and James 2:26. Here in Luke 23:46, Jesus committed his “life” to his Father, God, trusting that God would give him life again by raising him from the dead. [For more on the uses of pneuma (spirit) in the Bible, see, Graeser, Lynn, Schoenhut, The Gift of Holy Spirit: The Power to be like Christ, Appendix B, “Usages of ‘spirit’ in the New Testament”. For more on spirit, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”].

23:50. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

“there was a good and righteous man named Joseph.” Joseph is mentioned in all four Gospels. For the relationship between Joseph and Nicodemus, see commentary on John 19:39.

The death and resurrection of Christ is the pivotal point in the history of mankind. Each of the Four Gospels describes the event, but describes different aspects of it. It takes some effort to make all the pieces on the subject fit together. To be sure, the central message is crystal clear and stands on its own in every Gospel—God raised Jesus from the dead and the tomb is empty. However, when just read side by side, the Gospels have apparent contradictions. But the fact that we must piece the records together to get the actual history of the account is the same thing we have to do in many other places in the Bible in order to understand the more intricate information God has for us in His Word.
Just because the Four Gospels do not read the same way about an event does not mean they contradict each other. In order for each Gospel to portray its own unique picture of the Messiah, it has to have information that the other Gospels do not have, or omit information that they do have [For the four unique Gospel portraits of Jesus Christ, see the commentary on Mark 1:1].

We must keep in mind that even when a record in one Gospel seems to flow smoothly from one event to another, words such as “and,” “now,” or “but,” can represent a break in time and do not necessarily occur immediately after the phrase before it. For example, there are a large number of verses that start with “and,” which read as if they followed immediately after the previous verse, when actually we can see from the scope of Scripture that there was both time and other events that occurred between the verses.

The only way to properly construct the chronology of the Four Gospels is to be willing to split the seeming flow of events in a Gospel when there is good evidence from the other Gospels that there are intervening events. By reading each Gospel quickly, and simply noticing what is included or excluded, the unique emphasis of each Gospel is more easily seen. In contrast, by reading the record of Jesus’ life event by event in all four Gospels, we get the composite historical account of what happened.

In fitting the records together we can see that sometimes large periods of time occur right in the middle of a verse, and only by splitting a verse into two parts can we reconstruct a proper chronology. It would have been helpful if the men who invented the verse divisions had started a new verse each time there was a break in the chronology of Christ’s life. However, because the verse divisions are man-made (in fact, the modern verse divisions we use today were not put into the New Testament until the mid-1500’s), they are not always put in the best places. They are good for reference, but unfortunately sometimes they conceal the true chronology of the biblical text rather than help us understand it.

The study below lists the verses in chronological order. Commentary on the individual verses can be looked up under that specific verse reference. As we do our study, it is helpful to overview the chronology:

- Wednesday, Nisan 14. Jesus was crucified, died, and buried.
- Thursday, Nisan 15. The first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread, which was a Special Sabbath. The people rest. The religious leaders ask Pilate for a guard to watch the tomb for three days, which would be Thursday, Friday, and Saturday.
- Friday, Nisan 16. The women get spices to properly bury Jesus but they do not go to the tomb because they knew a guard had been placed there for three days.
- Saturday, Nisan 17. The weekly Sabbath. The people rest. Jesus gets up from the tomb just before sunset, “three days and three nights” after he was placed in the tomb, fulfilling his prophecy of Matthew 12:40 that he would be “in the heart of the earth” for three days and three nights.
- Sunday, Nisan 18. Jesus appears to Mary Magdalene, then the other women, then the men on the road to Emmaus, then Peter, then the disciples behind locked doors.
- Sunday, Nisan 25. Jesus appears to the disciples and Thomas behind locked doors.

Wednesday, 14th of Nisan: close to sunset

Luke 298
[For information on the events of the last week of Jesus’ life, see commentary on John 18:13. For a more detailed explanation of the Wednesday crucifixion and Jesus’ three days and three nights in the grave, see commentary on Matthew 12:40].

23:52. “This man went to Pilate, and asked for the body of Jesus.” Joseph of Arimathea went to Pilate to ask for the body of Jesus. See commentary on Matthew 27:58.

23:54. “and the Sabbath was beginning.” The Greek word translated “was beginning,” is epiphōskō (#2020 ἐπιφώσκω), and it literally means, to grow light. Thus it was used of “dawn,” or also idiomatically as “beginning.” Thus literally, “the Sabbath was dawning.”

This phraseology can be confusing to us Westerners because the Jewish Sabbath began at sunset, not dawn. The Jews, however, used the phrase idiomatically for the beginning of something. We could translate the verse as, “the Sabbath was dawning,” and understand it idiomatically, just as they did, but a less confusing way to translate the phrase is “the Sabbath was beginning.” We must remember that they did not have the kind of accurate clocks we do today, so they had to pay attention to the sun in the sky to know exactly when the Sabbath started. However, if there were clouds on the horizon, or if they were in a valley or alleyway, the exact time the sun went down and the Sabbath began might not be exactly clear. They could only tell when the time for the Sabbath was drawing close. [For more information on epiphōskō see commentary on Matt. 28:1.]

We must also keep in mind that according to Jewish reckoning of time, the sunset started the new day. So here in Luke 23:54, Wednesday the 14th of Nisan, the day Jesus Christ was crucified, was ending, and Thursday, the first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread, was starting. Often the Passover sacrifice so dominated the events that the whole time period was just referred to as “Passover.” The Sunset after the Passover lamb was sacrificed started the 15th of Nisan and the new day, which was always a Sabbath, no matter on which day of the week it occurred (Lev. 15:7). Since the Law of Moses decreed that the 15th of Nisan was a special Sabbath, Luke 23:54 says the “Sabbath” was beginning. We need to be clear on the fact that the “Sabbath” in Luke 23:54 is not the weekly Sabbath, Saturday, but Thursday, the 15th of Nisan. This point is made again in John 19:31, which tells us specifically that this Sabbath was a “high day,” meaning a special Sabbath, not the regular weekly Sabbath. Most Christians do not realize that when the Bible says Jesus was crucified the day before the “Sabbath,” it does not mean the regular weekly Sabbath, but the Sabbath that starts right after the Passover sacrifice and starts the Feast of Unleavened Bread, the 15th of Nisan.

Because it was so close to the Sabbath and the start of the Feast of Unleavened Bread, the women did not have time to buy and prepare the spices, so they went home (Luke 23:56). Friday, the 16th of Nisan, they bought and prepared the spices, but likely did not go to the grave because they knew it was guarded for three days. Saturday, the weekly Sabbath, they rested (Luke 23:56). Then, early Sunday morning, they went to the tomb with the spices. Sunday was the fourth day, and they had good reason to believe the guards would be gone by then.

23:55. “And the women who had come with him out of Galilee, followed after.” The women saw that Joseph had not prepared Jesus’ body, so they thought they had to prepare him themselves. See commentary on Matthew 27:58 and commentary on Matthew 27:59.

23:56. “prepared spices and ointments.” The women did this on Friday, the 16th of Nisan. (See commentary on Matt. 27:58 and see commentary on Mark 16:1).
“rested on the Sabbath according to the commandment.” The women rested on the Sabbath according to the commandment, and although they would have rested on both the Special Sabbath and the regular weekly Sabbath, because of the chronology we can tell that this verse in Luke refers to the regular weekly Sabbath. Mark 16:1 makes it clear that the women bought the spices after the Sabbath, but in this verse they had already bought the spices when they rested on the Sabbath, so this Sabbath is the regular weekly Sabbath, Saturday the 17th of Nisan (see commentary on Mark 16:1).

The commandment in the Law of Moses about resting on the weekly Sabbath is Exodus 20:8-10, and about resting on the first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread is Leviticus 23:4-8. According to the Law of Moses, walking was not considered work so the women could have walked to the tomb on the Sabbath without breaking the Sabbath. However, by the time of Jesus, Jewish traditional law had imposed limits on how far a person could walk on the Sabbath without it being work. The limit was called “a Sabbath day’s journey” and was 2000 cubits, or just over one half mile (see commentary on Acts 1:12). So the women still could have “rested” on the Sabbath but still walked to the tomb (see commentary on Matt. 28:1).

Jesus’ resurrection, which would have occurred between 23:56 and 24:1, is not specifically recorded.

Chapter 24

24:1. “at early dawn.” Literally, at “deep dawn.” We know from Mark 16:2 that this was when the sun had just come up (see commentary on Mark 16:2).

24:4. “perplexed.” The Greek is diaporeō (#1280 διαπορέω), to be perplexed, greatly perplexed, bewildered, totally at a loss. (See commentary on Mark 16:5).

“Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

“two men stood by them.” The record of the women seeing two angels occurs only in Luke. Although the Bible calls these angels, “men,” that is only so we know the form they appeared in. When the women entered the tomb and saw one “young man” sitting there, they did not know he was an angel. Then, however, “two men” suddenly appear out of nowhere in the tomb with the women, and these angels were wearing gleaming clothing (the only other use of this word “gleaming” in the NT refers to the gleam and flash of lightning). There was now no doubt in the minds of the women that they were in the presence of angels, so they became frightened and bowed down in reverence.

“gleaming clothing.” The Greek is astraptō (#797 ἀστράπτω), and it means “to light up,” thus, to gleam or to flash. In Luke 17:24 it is used of the flash of lightning. The young man (the angel) the women first met when going into the tomb was in a white robe, but that would not have been uncommon. However, when these two angels suddenly appeared, their clothing gleamed like lightning. The women were frightened by these angels that appeared.

24:5. “the men.” The Greek reads “they” spoke to the women, but the REV and many other English versions have “the men” because the text says “men” in 24:4, and it avoids the ambiguity in “they said to them,” which is the reading of the Greek. From comparing the verses that have this record (Matt. 28:5; Mark 16:6) it seems clear that only one angel did the actual speaking, the others were in agreement with what he said, and thus the “they” in the verse.

The record of these two angels appears only in the Gospel of Luke, but it is vital because according to the Law of Moses there had to be two witnesses for something to be considered true, but now we can see that there were three angels who witnessed to the fact that Jesus had been raised from the dead (Matt. 28:6; Mark 16:6; and Luke 24:6).

Once the angel reminds the women that Jesus said he would rise from the dead, they remember that he said that (Luke 24:8).

24:6. “has been raised.” The Greek is egeirō (#1453 ἐγείρω), and it is in the passive voice, so it is not “he is risen,” or “he has risen,” but rather “he was raised,” or “he has been raised.”

24:8. “And they remembered his words.” Luke, written from the perspective of the Lord as a human being, has more about women than any of the other three Gospels [For the reason for Four Gospels, see commentary on Mark 1:1]. Luke is the only Gospel that specifically credits the women with remembering the words of Jesus. Matthew says the women had “great joy” (Matt. 28:8).

24:9. “and they told all these things to the eleven, and to all the rest.” The “they” in this verse is all the women who came to the tomb with spices after the sun had risen (Luke 24:1, Mark 16:2). It does not include Mary Magdalene, who had gone on her own very early to the tomb (see commentary on John 20:1). Mary had seen the open tomb before these women, met the Lord before these women did (cp. Matt. 28:9), and reported back to the disciples separately, before these women did (John 20:18).

Luke is the only Gospel that records the women actually returning and telling “the Eleven” (Judas had already hanged himself) and the disciples that Jesus was raised from the dead. Matthew 28:8 says the women left the tomb to go tell the disciples, but never says they actually told them. Mark 16:7 implies they were going to tell the disciples as the angels told them to, but Mark, like Matthew, never specifically says the women told the disciples. Luke, however, specifically says the women told the disciples. It is possible that because a woman’s testimony was not allowable in a court of law in the ancient Jewish culture, that Matthew and Mark omit this detail, but Luke, written from a human point of view, includes it and gives the women credit for their faithfulness to follow through with what the angels and Jesus said to do.

24:10. “told these things to the apostles.” This verse is a summary verse. It mentions all the women who reported to the apostles that Jesus was raised from the dead. The subject of the verse is what the various women said to the apostles, and this is the key to understanding the verse. All of these women had seen Jesus alive (Matt. 28:9; John 20:16), and testified to that fact, but the disciples did not believe any of them. These verses are not saying that Mary Magdalene was physically with the women when they carried the spices to the tomb. It is saying that all the women had the same testimony about Jesus being alive. Mary Magdalene’s testimony agreed with the testimony of the women who went to prepare the body of Jesus.

24:12. “Peter arose and ran to the tomb.” Luke 24:12 is omitted in some early manuscripts but contained in others, so there is a chance it is not original. However, overall the evidence supports its being original. It seems much more likely that a scribe wanting to protect Peter’s reputation would omit the verse than that a scribe would simply invent this story about Peter. Veneration of Peter started very early, and so there would have been a lot of reason to omit things that tended to lessen his status in the eyes of the Church. That Peter would question his first trip to the tomb and make a second trip, but still not believe in the resurrection was a very human thing to do, especially given Peter’s strong-willed nature. However, for people who were venerating Peter as the leader of the apostles, one can see how there would have been a temptation to omit the verse. The NASB puts the verse in brackets to indicate that it is doubtful.

Sometime after the women reported that they had seen the Lord, but before Cleopas and the other disciple returned from seeing the Lord on their trip to Emmaus (Luke 24:13-35), the Lord appeared to Peter. There is no verse in the Gospels that describes the meeting of the Lord and Peter, but it is clear that there had to be a time on Sunday when Peter was alone, apart from the other disciples. By the time Cleopas and his friend, who saw the Lord on the road to Emmaus, join the apostles and the others, “Simon,” a common name for Peter, had already seen the Lord (Luke 24:34). Furthermore, 1 Corinthians 15:5 says that the Lord appeared to Peter and then to the apostles. If this verse is original, it is Peter’s second trip to see the empty tomb and would have been an excellent time for Jesus to appear to Peter alone.

“stooping down.” The Greek word is parakuptō (#3879 παρακύπτω), and it means to stoop towards something in order to look at it (see commentary on John 20:5).

“two of them were going.” Jesus Christ appeared to two disciples, Cleopas and an unnamed disciple, as they walked to Emmaus, which is about 7 miles (11 km) from Jerusalem (the location of Emmaus is unknown, but Luke 24:13 lets us know it was about a seven miles from Jerusalem). When Jesus made his identity known to them, they hurried back to Jerusalem.

“about seven miles.” The Greek text reads “60 stadia.” The identification of Emmaus is unknown, and has been made more uncertain because a few ancient texts read, “160 stadia,” but that seems very unlikely, especially since the disciples, after realizing they had met Jesus, went back to Jerusalem and seemed to have gotten there fairly soon (even if they walked, they would have walked the sixty stadia in about two hours). A “stadion” was a measurement used by the Greeks and then the Romans, and was roughly equal to 600 feet (in ancient times, the stadion varied slightly from city to city). Thus sixty stadia was some 6.8 miles (about 11 KM).

24:21. “it is now the third day since these things came to pass.” Jesus died on the day of the week we call Wednesday (the Jews would simply say the fourth day of the week). These disciples were speaking to Jesus in the afternoon of the “first day of the week” (Luke 24:1), which we call Sunday. At first glance, and according to many translations, if these two disciples said that it was now the third day since “these things have happened,” that would make Jesus crucified on Friday, or the earliest Thursday. But Jesus was crucified Wednesday, was buried just as Wednesday became Thursday (the Jews started their day at sunset, not midnight), and Jesus was in the grave “three days and three nights” (Matt. 12:40). Wednesday sunset to Thursday sunset is one day and one night, Thursday to Friday is two, and Friday to Saturday is three, and Jesus got up as night fell on Saturday. When Sunday morning came, all the angels said was, “He is not here, he is risen,” but they did not say how long he had been up. Mary Magdalene came to the tomb while it was still dark and he was already up.
Given that information, how do we understand what these men were saying? The answer is provided in the fact that they were speaking Aramaic, not Greek. In 1851 James Murdock did a translation of the New Testament from the available Aramaic text which reads, “But we expected that he was to deliver Israel. And lo, three days [have passed], since all these things occurred.” Then in 2006 Janet Magiera did a translation from the Aramaic and arrived at basically the same translation: “But we had hoped that he was going to deliver Israel and behold, three days [have passed] since all these [things] happened.”

If Jesus was not buried until the end of Wednesday, then three days passed (Thursday, Friday and Saturday.) and the disciples spoke to Jesus on Sunday, which is exactly what the Scripture records. The mention of the three days is important, because it is a logical question to ask, “Why didn’t the disciples simply say that these things happened five days ago?” The mention of three days is important because Rabbinic literature from after the time of the New Testament shows that the rabbis taught that the soul hung around the body for three days looking for an opportunity to re-enter it, but when decomposition set in on the fourth day, the soul left (cp. Leviticus Rabba (Rabbinical commentary) 18.1 (Leviticus 15:1)). Although that particular rabbinical commentary post-dates the New Testament, it is common knowledge that Jewish traditions were very stable and lasted for centuries. The fact that we have Rabbinic literature about the soul staying around the body for three days before leaving, taken together with evidence from the New Testament such as this verse in Luke and the record of Lazarus in John 11, is excellent evidence that the belief existed at the time of Christ.

The men on the road to Emmaus had already heard from the women that Jesus was alive (24:23), but left Jerusalem, believing he was dead in spite of their report. But it seems likely that if Jesus had not been dead for a full three days and nights, these disciples might have believed there was a chance that Jesus was alive after all, and have stayed in Jerusalem. In telling this stranger on the road that three days had passed since Jesus’ death, they were in part explaining why, even though they had hoped that Jesus was the Messiah, they were giving up on that vision and going home.

Even the Greek text can be understood to read in such a way as three days had passed since “all these things happened.” For example, The Holy Bible: The New Berkeley Version in Modern English, Revised edition (Gerritt Verkuyl, Zondervan Publishers, 1969), reads: “...Moreover, three days have already passed since all those things occurred.” The point is that, by Sunday, three whole days (Thursday, Friday, and Saturday) had passed since Jesus had been buried at nightfall Wednesday night.

24:31. “and they recognized him.” Jesus Christ appeared to two disciples, Cleopas (v. 18) and an unnamed disciple, as they walked to Emmaus, which is about 7 miles (11 km) from Jerusalem. When he made his identity known to them, they hurried back to Jerusalem, only to find the disciples saying that the Lord had also appeared to Simon (Luke 24:34).

24:34. “has appeared to Simon.” Jesus Christ first appeared to Mary Magdalene close to where he was buried (John 20:16). Then he appeared to the rest of the women who had come to wrap his body with spices (Matt. 28:9, 10). Then later that day, but before he appeared to the two men on the road to Emmaus (who knew the tomb was empty; Luke 24:24), Jesus appeared to Peter. None of the Four Gospels record this meeting, but the disciples spoke of it (Luke 24:34), and 1 Corinthians 15:5 mentions it also.
There is an apparent contradiction between Mark 16:13 and Luke 24:34. Mark says that when the Cleopas and his friend came to Jerusalem and told the apostles and disciples, they did not believe. Luke, however, says that when they came and reported, the disciples already believed because the Lord had appeared to Simon (Peter). Some have tried to solve this by saying that the “Simon” is the name of the other disciple that was going to Emmaus, but the proper reading of the Greek text makes that impossible. The better solution is that the last twelve verses of Mark are not original, and the “apparent contradiction” is caused by adding the verses in Mark to the text (see REV commentary on Mark 16:9).

24:35. “related.” The Greek is exēgeomai (ἐξηγέομαι) and means in secular Greek, to lead out, be the leader, or go before. In the Bible it is used as to lead out or unfold a narrative, to relate or set forth in detail. Thus it means unfold, relate or set forth in detail, expound, describe, recount.

24:45. “Then he opened up their minds.” Jesus taught about his suffering, death, and resurrection many times. He taught about it right after the disciples recognized him as the Christ (Matt. 16:21; Mark 8:31, 32; Luke 9:22). Then he taught about it again immediately after the Transfiguration (Matt. 17:9-12; Mark 9:9-13); then again when he was in Galilee shortly after the Transfiguration (Matt. 17:22, 23; Mark 9:31, 32; Luke 9:43-45), then again at the Feast of Tabernacles (John 8:21, 28); then again while he was going up to Jerusalem for the Passover, at which time he would be killed (Matt. 20:17-19; Mark 10:32-34; Luke 18:31-34); and then again when he was in Jerusalem for the Passover (Matt. 26:2; cp. John 12:7). In spite of all his teaching, the disciples never really understood what Jesus meant until after his resurrection when he opened up their minds to understand the Scriptures. [For more information on the disciples understanding Christ’s suffering and death, see commentary on Luke 18:34].

24:46. “out from among the dead.” See Romans 4:24. Wuest: “out from among those who are dead.”

24:49. “take notice!” The Greek word is idou (ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

“are clothed with power from on high.” Jesus is here referring to the gift of holy spirit that will be poured out on the Day of Pentecost, which will begin the Christian Church. The Apostles already had the gift of holy spirit that was available in the Old Testament, and had been on people such as Moses, Miriam, David, and Deborah (Judges 4). The holy spirit that was poured out on the Day of Pentecost did not exist before that day (John 7:39), but it was “promised” (Joel 2:28; John 16:13; Eph. 1:13). Although the Christian Church was a Sacred Secret, it was known that the holy spirit would be poured out in the Millennial Kingdom, and by this time after his resurrection Jesus knew it would be given before then (The Gift of Holy Spirit: The Power to be Like Christ).

24:52. “having paid homage to him.” See commentary on Matthew 2:2. It should be noted that this phrase is omitted in many excellent Greek texts; however, it is possible that it was accidentally dropped from those rather than being added by a later scribe. Textual critics are divided over the issue. Whether the phrase is original or not, it seems likely that it would have been cultural for the disciples to pay some kind of homage to Jesus in these end moments, so we felt the phrase was best left in this verse.

1:1. “In the beginning.” There are elements of John 1:1 and other phrases in the introduction of John that not only refer back in time to God’s work in the original creation, but also foreshadow the work of Christ in the new administration and the new creation. Noted Bible commentator F.F. Bruce argues for this interpretation:

It is not by accident that the Gospel begins with the same phrase as the book of Genesis. In Genesis 1:1, ‘In the beginning’ introduces the story of the old creation; here it introduces the story of the new creation. In both works of creation the agent is the Word of God. (F.F. Bruce, The Gospel of John, pp. 28 and 29).

The Racovian Catechism, one of the great doctrinal works of the Unitarian movement of the 14th and 15th centuries, states that the word “beginning” in John 1:1 refers to the beginning of the new dispensation and thus is similar to Mark 1:1, which starts, “The beginning of the Gospel about Jesus Christ.”

In the cited passage (John 1:1) wherein the Word is said to have been in the beginning, there is no reference to an antecedent eternity, without commencement; because mention is made here of a beginning, which is opposed to that eternity. But the word beginning, used absolutely, is to be understood of the subject matter under consideration. Thus, Daniel 8:1, “In the third year of the reign of king Belshazzar a vision appeared to me, even unto me Daniel, after that which appeared unto me AT THE FIRST.” John 15:27, “And ye also shall bear witness because ye have been with me FROM the beginning.” John 16:4, “These things I said not unto you AT the beginning because I was with you.” And Acts 11:15, “And as I began to speak the Holy Spirit fell on them, as on us AT the beginning.” As then the matter of which John is treating is the Gospel, or the things transacted under the Gospel, nothing else ought to be understood here beside the beginning of the Gospel; a matter clearly known to the Christians whom he addressed, namely, the advent and preaching of John the Baptist, according to the testimony of all the evangelists [i.e., Matthew, Mark, Luke and John], each of whom begins his history with the coming and preaching of the Baptist. Mark indeed (Chapter 1:1) expressly states that this was the beginning of the Gospel. In like manner, John himself employs the word beginning, placed thus absolutely, in the introduction to his First Epistle, at which beginning he uses the same term (logos) Word, as if he meant to be his own interpreter [“That which is from the beginning…concerning the Word (logos) of life.” 1 John 1:1]. (The Racovian Catechism; Reprinted by Spirit & Truth Fellowship, pp. 63 and 64).

While we do not agree with the Catechism that the only meaning of beginning in John 1:1 is the beginning of the new creation, we certainly see how the word beginning is a double entendre. In the context of the new creation, then, “the Word” is the plan or purpose according to which God is restoring His creation.

the word. “Word” is translated from the Greek word logos (#3056 λόγος). It is important that Christians have a basic understanding of logos, which is translated as “Word” in most versions of John 1:1. Most Trinitarians believe that logos refers directly to Jesus Christ, so in most Bibles logos is capitalized as “Word” (some versions even put “Jesus Christ” instead of “Word” in John 1:1). However, a study of the Greek word logos shows that it occurs more than 300 times in the New Testament, and in both the NIV and the KJV it is capitalized only 7 times (and even those versions disagree on exactly when to capitalize it). When a word that occurs more than 300 times is capitalized fewer than 10 times, it is obvious that when to capitalize and when not to capitalize is a translators’ decision based on their particular understanding of Scripture. Below are five points to consider.

I. In both Greek literature and Scripture, logos has a very wide range of meanings that fall into two basic categories: one is the mind and products of the mind like “reason,” (the word “logic” is ultimately from the root logos), and the other is the expression of that reason in language or life: thus, “word,” “saying,” “command” etc. The Bible itself demonstrates the wide range of meaning of logos. Some of the ways it is translated in English versions of the Bible are: account, appearance, book, command, conversation, eloquence, flattery, grievance, heard, instruction, matter, message, ministry, news, proposal, question, reason, reasonable, reply, report, rule, rumor, said, say, saying, sentence, speaker, speaking, speech, stories, story, talk, teaching, testimony, thing, things, this, truths, what, why, word and words. Although the word logos appears over 300 times in the Greek text, it is only translated “word” about 175 times in the King James Version, and 125 times in the NIV 84.

Any good Greek lexicon will also show the wide range of meaning of logos. The definitions below are from the BDAG Greek-English lexicon (Arndt and Gingrich, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature; University of Chicago Press, 1979). The words in italics are translated from logos:

- Speaking; words you say (Rom. 15:18 NIV84, “what I have said”).
- A question (Matt. 21:24 NIV84, “I will also ask you one question”).
- Preaching (1 Tim. 5:17 NIV84, “especially those whose work is preaching”).
- Command (Gal. 5:14 NIV84, “the entire law is summed up in a single command”).
- Proverb; saying (John 4:37 NIV84, “thus the saying, ‘One sows, and another reaps’”).
- Message; instruction; proclamation (Luke 4:32 NIV84, “his message had authority”).
- Assertion; declaration; teaching (John 6:60 NIV84, “this is a hard teaching”).
- The subject under discussion; matter (Acts 8:21 NIV84, “you have no part or share in this ministry.” Acts 15:6 NASB, “And the apostles... came together to look into this matter”).
- Revelation from God (Matt. 15:6 NIV84, “you nullify the Word of God”).
God’s revelation spoken by His servants (Heb. 13:7 NIV84, “leaders who spoke the Word of God”).

- A reckoning, an account (Matt. 12:36 NIV84, “men will have to give account” on the Day of Judgment).
- An account or “matter” in a financial sense (Matt. 18:23 NIV84, “A king who wanted to settle “accounts” with his servants”).
- A reason; motive (Acts 10:29 NASB), “I ask for what reason you have sent for me”).

The above list is not exhaustive, but it does show that logos has a very wide range of meanings. With all the ways logos can be translated, how can we decide which meaning of logos to choose for any one verse? How can it be determined what logos refers to in John 1:1? Any occurrence of logos has to be carefully studied in its context in order to get the proper meaning. We assert that the logos in John 1:1 cannot be Jesus. Please notice that “Jesus Christ” is not a lexical definition of logos. This verse does not say, “In the beginning was Jesus.” “The Word” is not synonymous with Jesus, or even “the Messiah.” The word logos in John 1:1 refers to God’s creative self-expression—His reason, purposes and plans, especially as they are brought into action. It refers to God’s self-expression, or communication, of Himself. This has come to pass through His creation (cp. Rom. 1:19 and 20), the heavens being one example the Word points out to us (cp. Ps. 19). It has also come through the spoken word of the prophets and through Scripture, the written Word. Most notably and finally, it has come into being through His Son (Heb. 1:1 and 2). The renowned Trinitarian scholar, John Lightfoot, writes:

The word logos then, denoting both “reason” and “speech,” was a philosophical term adopted by Alexandrian Judaism before St. Paul wrote, to express the manifestation of the Unseen God in the creation and government of the World. It included all modes by which God makes Himself known to man. As His reason, it denoted His purpose or design; as His speech, it implied His revelation. Christian teachers, when they adopted this term, exalted and fixed its meaning by attaching to it two precise and definite ideas: (1) “The Word is a Divine Person,” (2) “The Word became incarnate in Jesus Christ.” It is obvious that these two propositions must have altered materially the significance of all the subordinate terms connected with the idea of the logos. (J. B. Lightfoot, St. Paul’s Epistles to the Colossians and Philemon, pp. 143 and 144. Bold emphasis ours, italics his).

It is important to note that it was “Christian teachers” who attached the idea of a “divine person” to the word logos. It is certainly true that when the word logos came to be understood as being Jesus Christ, the understanding of John 1:1 was altered substantially. Lightfoot correctly understands that the early meaning of logos concerned reason and speech, not “Jesus Christ.” Norton develops the concept of logos as “reason” and writes:

There is no word in English answering to the Greek word logos, as used here [in John 1:1]. It was employed to denote a mode of conception concerning the Deity, familiar at the time when St. John wrote and intimately blended with the philosophy of his age, but long since obsolete, and so foreign from our habits of thinking that it is not easy for us to conform our minds to its apprehension. The Greek word logos, in one of its primary senses, answered nearly to our word Reason. The logos of God was regarded, not in its strictest sense, as merely the Reason of God; but, under certain aspects, as the Wisdom, the Mind, the Intellect of God (Andrew Norton, A Statement of Reasons for Not Believing the Doctrines of Trinitarians, p. 229).

Norton postulates that perhaps “the Disposing Power of God” would be a good translation for logos (p. 235). Buzzard sets forth “plan,” “purpose” or “promise” as three acceptable translations. Broughton and Southgate say “thoughts, plan or purpose of God, particularly in action.” Many scholars identify logos with God’s wisdom and reason.

The logos is the expression of God, and is His communication of Himself, just as a “word” is an outward expression of a person’s thoughts. This outward expression of God has now occurred through His Son, and thus it is perfectly understandable why Jesus is called the “Word.” Jesus is an outward expression of God’s reason, wisdom, purpose and plan. For the same reason, we call the Bible the “Word” of God, and revelation “a ‘word’ from God.”

If we understand that the logos is God’s expression—His plan, purposes, reason and wisdom—it is clear that those things were indeed with Him “in the beginning.” Scripture says that God’s wisdom was “from the beginning” (Prov. 8:23). It was very common in Hebrew writing to personify a concept such as wisdom. The figure of speech “personification” occurs when something is given human characteristics to emphasize something. Psalm 35:10 portrays bones talking. Psalm 68:31 portrays Ethiopia as a woman with her hands outstretched to God. Isaiah 3:26 says the gates of Zion will lament and mourn. Isaiah 14:8 says the cypress trees will rejoice. 1 Corinthians 12:15 portrays the foot talking. The Bible has many examples of personification, and wisdom is personified in Proverbs. Nevertheless, no ancient Jew reading Proverbs would think that God’s wisdom was a separate person, even though it is portrayed as one in verses like Proverbs 8:29 and 30: “…when He marked out the foundations of the earth, I [wisdom] was the craftsman at His side.” Similarly, the logos was with God in the beginning, because God’s plan, purpose, and wisdom were with Him, but we should not think of these as a separate person.

2. Most Jewish readers of the Gospel of John would have been familiar with the concept of God’s “word” being with God as He worked to bring His creation into existence. There is an obvious working of God’s power in Genesis 1 as He brings His plan into concretion by speaking things into being. The Targums are well known for describing the wisdom and action of God as His “word.” This is especially important to note because the Targums are the Aramaic translations and paraphrases of the Old Testament, and Aramaic was the spoken language of many Jews at the time of Christ. Remembering that a Targum is usually a paraphrase of what the Hebrew text says, note how the following examples attribute action to the word (from Dr. John Lightfoot, A Commentary on the New Testament from the Talmud and Hebraica, Vol. 3, p. 238).

- And the word of the Lord was Joseph’s helper (Gen. 39:2).
- And Moses brought the people to meet the word of the Lord (Exod. 19:17).
- And the word of the Lord accepted the face of Job (Job 42:9).
- And the word of the Lord shall laugh them to scorn (Ps. 2:4).
- They believed in the name of His word (Ps. 106:12).

The above examples demonstrate that the Jews were familiar with using the idea of God’s “Word” to refer to His wisdom and action. This is especially important to note because these Jews were fiercely monotheistic, and did not in any way believe in a “Triune God.” They were familiar with the idioms of their own language, and understood that the wisdom and power of God were being personified as “word.”

Like the Aramaic-speaking Jews, the Greek-speaking Jews were also familiar with God’s creative force being called “the word.” J. H. Bernard writes, “When we turn from Palestine to Alexandria [Egypt], from Hebrew sapiential [wisdom] literature to that which was written in Greek, we find this creative wisdom identified with the Divine logos, Hebraism and Hellenism thus coming into contact” (The International Critical Commentary: St. John. Vol. 1, p. cxxxix).

One example of this is in the Apocryphal book known as the Wisdom of Solomon, which says, “O God of my fathers and Lord of mercy who hast made all things by thy word (logos), and by thy wisdom hast formed man…” (9:1). In this verse, the “word” and “wisdom” are seen as the creative force of God, but without being a “person.”

3. The logos, that is, the plan, purpose and wisdom of God, “became flesh” (came into concretion or physical existence) in Jesus Christ. Jesus is the “image of the invisible God” (Col. 1:15) and His chief emissary, representative and agent. Because Jesus perfectly obeyed the Father, he represents everything that God could communicate about Himself in a human person. As such, Jesus could say, “If you have seen me, you have seen the Father” (John 14:9). The fact that the logos “became” flesh shows that it did not exist that way before. There is no pre-existence of Jesus in this verse other than his figurative “existence” as the plan, purpose or wisdom of God for the salvation of man. The same is true with the “word” in writing. It did not pre-exist in any form in the distant past, but it came into being as God gave the revelation to people and they wrote it down.

4. It is important to understand that the Bible was not written in a vacuum, but was recorded in the context of a culture and was understood by those who lived in that culture. Sometimes verses that seem superfluous or confusing to us were meaningful to the readers of the time because they were well aware of the culture and beliefs of those around them. In the first century, there were many competing beliefs in the world (and unfortunately, erroneous beliefs in Christendom) that were confusing believers about the identities of God and Christ. For centuries before Christ, and at the time the New Testament was written, the irrational beliefs about the gods of Greece had been handed down. This body of religious information was known by the word “muthos,” which we today call “myths” or “mythology.” This muthos, these myths, were often mystical and beyond rational explanation. The more familiar one is with the Greek myths, the better he will understand our emphasis on their irrationality. If one is unfamiliar with them, it would be valuable to read a little on the subject. Greek mythology is an important part of the cultural background of the New Testament.

Although the myths were often irrational, they nevertheless had been widely accepted as the “revelation of the gods.” The pervasiveness of the muthos in the Greco-Roman world of the New Testament can be seen sticking up out of the New Testament like the tip of an iceberg above the water, and archaeology confirms the widespread presence of the gods in the everyday life of the Greek and Roman people of New Testament times. The average Greek or Roman was as familiar with the teachings about the adventures of the gods as the average school child in the United States is familiar with Goldilocks and the Three Bears or Snoopy and Charlie Brown. Thus, when Paul and Barnabas healed a cripple in Lystra, the people assumed that the gods had come down in human form (Acts 14:11), and no doubt they based their assumption on the legend that Zeus and Hermes had once come to that area in human form. While Paul was in Athens, he became disturbed because of the large number of idols there that were statues to the various gods (Acts 17:16). In Ephesus, Paul’s teaching actually started a riot. When some of the locals realized that if his doctrine spread, “the temple of the great goddess Artemis will be discredited, and the goddess herself, who is worshiped throughout the province of Asia and the world, will be robbed of her divine majesty” (Acts 19:27). There are many other examples that show that there was a muthos, i.e., a body of religious knowledge that was in large part incomprehensible to the human mind, firmly established in the minds of some of the common people in New Testament times.

Starting several centuries before Christ, certain Greek philosophers worked to replace the muthos with what they called the logos, a reasonable and rational explanation of reality. It is appropriate that, in the writing of the New Testament, God used the word logos, not muthos, to describe His wisdom, reason and plan. God has not come to us in mystical experiences and irrational beliefs that cannot be understood; rather, He reveals Himself in ways that can be rationally understood and persuasively argued.

5. In addition to the cultural context that accepted the myths, at the time the Gospel of John was written, a belief system called Gnosticism was taking root in Christianity. Gnosticism had many ideas and words that are strange and confusing to us today, so, at the risk of oversimplifying, we will describe a few basic tenets of Gnosticism as simply as we can.

Gnosticism took many forms, but generally Gnostics taught that there was a supreme and unknowable Being, which they designated as the “Monad.” The Monad produced various gods, who in turn produced other gods (these gods were called by different names, in part because of their power or position). One of these gods, called the “Demiurge,” created the earth and then ruled over it as an angry, evil and jealous god. This evil god, Gnostics believed, was the god of the Old Testament, called Elohim. The Monad sent another god, “Christ,” to bring special gnosis (knowledge) to mankind and free them from the influence of the evil Elohim. Thus, a Gnostic Christian would agree that Elohim created the heavens and earth, but he would not agree that He was the supreme God. Most Gnostics would also state that Elohim and Christ were at cross-purposes with each other. This is why it was so important for John 1:1 to say that the logos was with God, which at first glance seems to be a totally unnecessary statement. The opening of the Gospel of John is a wonderful expression of God’s love. God “wants all men to be saved and to come to a knowledge of the truth” (1 Tim. 2:4). He authored the opening of John in such a way that it reveals the truth about Him and His plan for all of mankind and, at the same time, refutes Gnostic teaching. It says that from the beginning there was the logos (the reason, plan, power), which was with God. There was not another “god” existing with God, especially not a god opposed to God. Furthermore, God’s plan was like God; it was divine. God’s plan became flesh when God impregnated Mary.

“and what God was, the Word was.” Although almost every English Bible translates the last phrase of John 1:1 as, “and the Word was God,” it should not be translated that way. To understand that, we first should be aware of how the Greek text of the New Testament was written and how the Greeks used the word theos, “God” or “god.”

Although we make a distinction between “God” with a capital “G” and “god” with a lower case “g,” the original text could not do that. The original text of the New Testament was written in all capital letters, so both “God” and “god” were “GOD” (ΘΕΟΣ; THEOS). This meant the person reading the Scripture had to pay close attention to the context. When our modern English versions mention “the god of this age” (2 Cor. 4:4), we know that the word “god” refers to Satan because it is spelled with a lower case “g.” But if our versions read in all capitals like the ancient Greek text and said, “THE GOD OF THIS AGE,” how would we know who this “GOD” was? We would have to discover who he was from the context. The people reading the early Greek texts had to become very sensitive to the context. An unintended consequence of modern capitalization, punctuation, and spacing in the text has made the modern reader less sensitive to the context.

What the word “GOD” referred to was further complicated by the fact that, as any good Greek lexicon will show, the Greek word theos (#2316 θεός) was used to refer to both gods and goddesses, or was a general name for any deity, or was used of a representative of God, and was even used of people of high authority such as rulers or judges. The Greeks did not use the word “GOD” like we do, to refer to just one single Supreme Being with no other being sharing the name. The Greeks were polytheistic and had many gods with different positions and authority, and rulers and judges who represented the gods or who were themselves of high authority, and theos was used of all of those. Some of the authorities in the Bible who are referred to as ΘΕΟΣ include the Devil (2 Cor. 4:4), lesser gods (1 Cor. 8:5) and men with great authority (John 10:34 and 35; Acts 12:22).

When we are trying to discover what GOD (ΘΕΟΣ; THEOS) is referring to in a verse, the context is always the final arbiter. However, we do get some help in that it is almost always the case in the New Testament that when “GOD” refers to the Father, the definite article appears in the Greek text (this article can be seen only in the Greek text, it is never translated into English). Translators are normally very sensitive to this. The difference between theos with and without the article occurs in John 1:1, which has 2 occurrences of theos: “In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with the theos, and the Word was theos.” Since the definite article (“the”) is missing from the second occurrence of “theos” (“God,”) the most natural meaning of the word would be that it referred to the quality of God, i.e., “divine,” “god-like,” or “like God.” The New English Bible gets the sense of this phrase by translating it, “What God was, the Word was.”

James Moffatt, who was a professor of Greek and New Testament Exegesis at Mansfield College in Oxford, England, and author of the well-known Moffatt Bible, translated the phrase, “the logos was divine.”

A very clear explanation of how to translate theos without the definite article can be found in Jesus As They Knew Him, by William Barclay, a professor at Trinity College in Glasgow:

In a case like this we cannot do other than go to the Greek, which is theos en ho logos. Ho is the definite article, the, and it can be seen that there is a definite article with logos, but not with theos. When in Greek two nouns are joined by the verb “to be,” and when both have the definite article, then the one is fully intended to be identified with the other; but when one of them is without the article, it becomes more an adjective than a noun, and describes rather the class or sphere to which the other belongs.

An illustration from English will make this clear. If I say, “The preacher is the man,” I use the definite article before both preacher and man, and I thereby identify the preacher with some quite definite individual man whom I have in mind. But, if I say, “The preacher is man,” I have omitted the definite article before man, and what I mean is that the preacher must be classified as a man, he is in the sphere of manhood, he is a human being.

[In the last clause of John 1:1] John has no article before theos, God. The logos, therefore, is not identified as God or with God; the word theos has become adjectival and describes the sphere to which the logos belongs. We would, therefore, have to say that this means that the logos belongs to the same sphere as God; without being identified with God, the logos has the same kind of life and being as God. Here the NEB [New English Bible] finds the perfect translation: “What God was, the Word was” (William Barclay, Jesus as They Knew Him, pp. 21 and 22).

Daniel Wallace is a Trinitarian and a scholar of Greek grammar. After examining the grammatical possibilities in John 1:1 and whether the last theos in John 1:1 is indefinite (“a god”), definite (“the God”), or qualitative (that the logos has the qualities of God; the noun logos is being used to function like an adjective and give qualities to the noun logos), he concludes, “The most likely candidate for theos is qualitative. …Possible translations are as follows: ‘What God was the Word was’ (NEB)…The idea of a qualitative theos here is that the Word had all he attributes and qualities that ‘the God’ (of 1:1b) had” (Wallace, Greek Grammar Beyond the Basics, Zondervan, 1996, p. 269).

We agree with Wallace and the (NEB, i.e., New English Bible), that the word theos is being used in a qualitative manner and telling us that the Word has the qualities of God, but we do not agree with Wallace that the Word had “all” the attributes and qualities of God. It is not the point of the qualitative use of a noun to confer every single attribute of the adjectival noun to the receptor noun. Wallace is trying to be honest grammatically that the word “God” is being used to function like an adjective while still defending the Trinity, i.e., that Jesus and the Father are co-equal and co-eternal. But the regular qualitative use of a noun does not demand that “all” the qualities of the adjectival noun are being assigned to the receptor noun, it is enough that many major qualities are being assigned. So, for example, both God and the logos are true, holy, righteous, life-giving, etc. We do not believe that John 1:1 is setting forth the doctrine of the Trinity, but the truth that the logos (which includes the Word in every form, written and in the form of Jesus Christ) has the attributes of God.

As we said above, however, although the wording of the Greek text of John 1:1 certainly favors the translation, “and what God was, the Word was” over the translation “the Word was God,” the context and scope of Scripture must be the final arbiter. In this case we have help from the verse itself in the phrase “the Word was with God.” The Word (logos) cannot both be “with” God and “be” God. That is nonsensical. It is similar to us being able to discern that Jesus Christ is not God from reading 2 Corinthians 4:4 and Colossians 1:15, which say that Jesus is the image of God. One cannot be both the image of the object and the object itself. We Christians must become aware of the difference between a genuine mystery and a contradiction. In his book, Against Calvinism, Roger Olson writes: “We must point out here the difference between mystery and contradiction; the former is something that cannot be fully explained to or comprehended by the human mind, whereas the latter is just nonsense—two concepts that cancel each other out and together make an absurdity” (Roger Olson, Against Calvinism, p. 105). Richard Daane uses the term “verbalism” which he applied to certain aspects of Calvinism, but we feel it is appropriate when applied to many of the explanations of the Trinity. He wrote: “...verbalism, a theoretical game in which words really carry no ascertainable sense and phrases no ascertainable meaning.” Richard Daane, The Freedom of God, p. 71). Most Trinitarians assert that the Word being with God and also being God is a mystery. We assert it is a plain contradiction, a verbalism, and the truth in the verse is actually simple: the logos, the plan, purpose and wisdom of God, was with God, and what God was (i.e., holy, true, pure, righteous, etc.) his logos was too.

1:3. “All things were made through it.” The pronoun refers to the logos, which is an “it” not a “him.” Because historically, Trinitarians have thought of the logos as Jesus Christ, they have translated the pronoun as “him,” but not every version does that. The first English translation from the Greek text was done by William Tyndale (1494-1536; John Wycliffe translated into English earlier, but used the Latin as his base text). He translated the pronoun as “it,” not “him.” In 1537, the Matthew’s Bible, translated by John Rogers using the pseudonym “Thomas Matthews,” used “it,” not “him.” In 1539, the Great Bible, a revision of Matthew’s Bible, had “it.” This was important because the translation was overseen by Miles Coverdale, and in the Coverdale Bible of 1535, done some years earlier and based on the Latin, Coverdale used “him,” not “it,” but in this later version he apparently switched his preference and used “it.” When Queen Mary forbade the printing of the English Bible, translation moved to Geneva, and the Geneva Bible of 1560 became the household Bible of the English speaking people. It was the Bible used by Shakespeare, as well as the Puritans who settled New England. Under Queen Elizabeth the English Bible was once again printed in Great Britain, and the Bishop’s Bible was published in 1568. It used “it,” not “him” in John 1:3 and 4, but was never popular with the people. The major change came with the King James Bible, which used “him,” not “it” in the opening of John, and most English versions since then have done the same. Nevertheless, we should be aware that the translation “it” has good literary foundation and a solid Christian history.

1:4. “In it was life.” The pronoun refers to the logos, which is an “it” not a “him.” See commentary on verse 3.

1:5. “And the light shines in the darkness.” The word “shines” is the Greek verb phainō (#5316 φαίνω) and is in the present tense, active voice, and refers to continuing to shine. The darkness tried to overcome it, but the light continues to shine in spite of the opposition.

“and the darkness did not overcome it.” The words “did…overcome” are from the Greek verb katalambanō (#2638 καταλαμβάνω), which can refer to “overcome; conquer,” or “comprehend; grasp.” Thus the phrase can be translated either as “the darkness did not understand it,” or “the darkness did not overcome it.” C. K. Barrett comments: “Kathlambanein, ‘to seize,’ may mean ‘to overcome’ or, especially in the middle [voice], ‘to grasp with the mind’, ‘to understand.’ Here it seems probable that John is (after his manner; see on 3:3) playing on the two meanings…. Since the Greek word itself bears both meanings… The darkness neither understood nor quenched the light.” (The Gospel According to St. John, second edition, p. 158. Cp. also Sanders and Mastin, The Gospel According to John).

We agree that both meanings of the word katalambanō are true and important in this verse making it a use of the figure of speech amphibologia (double entendre).

However, of the two meanings, “understood” or “overcome,” given the conflict between good (light) and evil (darkness) that has occurred since Genesis, and since the Devil had been trying to overcome the light since before the creation of man, “overcome” was the meaning we went with in the REV.

Another thing worth noticing in the verse is that the verb “shines” is present tense, active voice, indicating that the light continues to shine on, while the verb “overcome” is in the aorist tense, active voice, referring to an event that happens in a specific time. The darkness made an attack and an attempt to quench the light, but the light continues to shine.

1:7. “for testimony.” Most versions translate this phrase, “He came as a witness, to testify.” However, this does not bring out the emphasis in the Greek. The Greek phrasing here is eis marturian, composed of the preposition eis (#1519 εἰς), which here means “for the purpose of,” and marturia (#3141 µαρτυρία) meaning “testimony,” or “confirmation based on personal knowledge” (BDAG). John came for the purpose of testimony, that he may testify. To say that John came “as a witness” places emphasis on the personhood of John as the one giving testimony, when the emphasis in the Greek is on the purpose of John’s coming. He came “for testimony, so that he may testify.” (The repetition of both noun and verb forms together is the figure of speech polyptoton [Bullinger, Figures of Speech]. See also 1 John 5:10).

1:10 “and the world was made through him.” This is a wonderful verse telling us how much God cares for His creation, and highlights how God keeps on loving and giving to His creation and His people despite the fact that they are not thankful for it. Many Trinitarians think this verse refers to Jesus Christ, and use it to try to support the doctrine of the Trinity, but the verse is about the Father, not Jesus Christ.

A study of the context reveals that this section opens in verse 6 by telling us, “There came a man who was sent by God.” We are told, “God is light,” and that God’s light shown through Jesus Christ and made him “the light of the world.” Though God was in the world in many ways, including through His Son, the world did not recognize him. He came unto his own by sending Jesus Christ to them, but even then they did not receive God, in that they rejected His emissary. The fact that the world did not receive Him is made more profound in the context as Scripture reveals how earnestly God reached out to them—He made his plan and purpose flesh and shined His light through Christ to reach the world—but they did not receive Him, even though He was offering them the “right to become children of God” (v. 12).

Some scholars think the phrase, “the world was made by him,” is a reference to the new creation only (cp. Col. 1:15-20 and Heb. 1:1,10), but if it is, then it is only so as a double entendre referring to both the original and the new creations. For more...

1:12. “name.” See 1 John 3:23 note “on the name of his son Jesus Christ.”

1:13. “who was born…of God.” This verse is speaking of the birth of Jesus Christ, not the new birth of Christians (see footnote on John 1:13 in The Christian’s Hope: The Anchor of the Soul).

“not of bloods.” The only time in the NT that blood is used in the plural. Jesus was not born of the mixture of two human “bloods,” i.e., the contribution of two humans. God contributed the sperm (via creation) that impregnated Mary. Although many Christians believe that Jesus Christ was “incarnated” into the flesh, in other words, placed in Mary as a complete baby at some form of development, that is not what happened. The Bible makes the case that Mary was the true mother of Jesus Christ, not just a surrogate mother for God. How could Jesus be a true descendant of David if there were no actual genetic link to the line of David? Furthermore, what would be the point of the genealogy in Matthew? The link between Mary and Jesus in Matthew 1:16 would not be a genetic link at all. If God simply had Mary “carry” Jesus, then his only genealogy is 100% from God, not at all from David.

“the desire of the flesh.” The word “desire” is the same word as “will” in “will of man” in the next phrase, but the flesh does not “will” so much as it “desires.” We are well aware of the “desires” that our flesh has for sleep, food, sex, etc. Christ was not born “accidentally” as it were, because of the “desire of the flesh.”

“the will of man.” Man’s will did not bring the Messiah.

1:14. “And the word became flesh.” The key to understanding this verse is realizing that “the word” is the wisdom, plan or purpose of God, just as it was in John 1:1 (see commentary on John 1:1). The word, the plan and purpose of God, “became flesh” as Jesus Christ. Thus, Jesus Christ was “the Word in the flesh,” which is shortened to “the Word” for ease of speaking. Scripture is also the Word, but it is the Word in writing. Everyone agrees that the “Word” in writing had a beginning. So did the Word in the flesh. In fact, the Greek text of Matthew 1:18 says that very clearly: “Now the beginning of Jesus Christ was in this manner.” Some ancient scribes were so uncomfortable with the idea of Jesus having a “beginning” that they tried to alter the Greek text to read “birth” and not “beginning,” but they were unsuccessful. The modern Greek texts all read “beginning” (genesis) in Matthew 1:18 (see commentary on Matthew 1:18).

In the beginning, God had a plan, a purpose, which “became flesh” when Jesus was conceived. To make John 1:14 support the Trinity, there must first be proof that Jesus existed and was called “the Word” before he was conceived in Mary. We do not believe that such proof exists. There is a large body of evidence, however, that shows that Jesus was foreknown by God. Furthermore, the use of logos to refer to a plan or purpose is also well attested. We contend that the meaning of John 1:14 is straightforward. God had a plan (the Word) and that plan became flesh when Jesus was conceived. Thus, Jesus became “the Word in the flesh.”

It is important to ask why John would say, “the Word became flesh,” which is a statement that seems so obvious to us. Of course Jesus Christ was flesh. He was born, grew, ate and slept, and Scripture calls him a man. However, what is clear to us now was not at all clear in the early centuries of the Christian era. The Bible must be understood in the context of the culture in which it was written. At the time of John’s writing, the “Docetic” movement was gaining disciples inside Christianity (“Docetic” comes from the Greek word for “to seem” or “to appear”). Docetic Christians believed Jesus was actually a spirit being, or god, who only “appeared” to be human. Some Docetics did not believe Jesus even actually ate or drank, but only pretended to do so. Furthermore, some Jews thought that Jesus was an angel. In today’s theological literature, theologians refer to this as “angel-Christology.” John 1:14 was not written to show that Jesus was somehow pre-existent and then became flesh. It was to show that God’s plan for salvation actually became “flesh,” that is, Jesus was not a spirit, god or angelic being, but a real flesh-and-blood human being. A very similar thing is said in 1 John 4:2, that if you do not believe Jesus has come “in the flesh,” you are not of God. For more on this, see J. S. Hyndman, Lectures on The Principles of Unitarianism, 1824, p. 113, and the Racovian Catechism, pp. 117-119 (both available from Spirit & Truth Fellowship).

“lived in his tent.” The Greek verb is skenoō (#4637 σκηνόω), and it literally means “to live in a tent” or “to pitch a tent.” In fact, a very literal translation of John 1:14 would simply be that Jesus “tented” among us. It can refer to living in a place temporarily, although by New Testament times it also seems to refer to living in a place somewhat permanently. It is used five times in the New Testament (John 1:14; Rev. 7:15; 12:12; 13:6; 21:3).

John 1:14 is making a comparison between Jesus Christ and the Tent of Meeting (“Tabernacle”) in the wilderness. The verb most English versions translate as “dwelt” or “lived,” is skenoō (#4637 σκηνόω; pronounced skay-nah'-ō), which literally means to set up a tent or live in a tent. Our human bodies are sometimes referred to as “tents” (skēnos) in the Bible, because our body is our temporary dwelling while we live on earth (cp. 2 Cor. 5:1, 4; 2 Pet. 1:13, 14). Similarly, many verses refer to Moses’ Tent of Meeting as a “tent” (skēnē, cp. Exod. 40:2, 5, 6, etc.) because it was a large tent.

Jesus’ body is specifically referred to as a “tent” in John 1:14 so the glory of God that shone in Jesus’ life can be compared to the glory of God that shone in the Moses’ “tent” in the wilderness. The glory of God was associated with the Tent of Meeting (cp. Exod. 40:34; Lev. 9:23; Num. 14:10). When Moses set up the Tent of Meeting it was filled with the glory of God (Exod. 40:34), and then the glory of God was upon the tent as a pillar of cloud during the day, and a pillar of fire during the night (Num. 14:14). So God “tented” among the people in the Old Testament and they gazed upon His glory, and when Jesus Christ came, he also tented among the people who gazed at the glory of God that was so evident in his life. It was at the Tent of Meeting that God met Moses and His people. Similarly, it was in Jesus Christ that people met God. Jesus said, “Whoever has seen me has seen the Father” (John 14:9).

“gazed upon.” The Greek word is theaomai (#2300 θεαομαι; pronounced theh-ah'-om-eye), and it means to see, to look upon, view attentively, contemplate, to learn by looking, to see with the eyes, to perceive. Although it can in some contexts simply mean “to see,” it often has a much deeper meaning, which it does in John 1:14. Hendriksen (New Testament Commentary; Baker Academic) writes: “It refers, indeed, to physical sight; yet, it always includes a plus, the plus of calm scrutiny, contemplation, or even wonderment. It describes the act of one who does not stare absent-mindedly nor merely look quickly nor necessarily perceive comprehensively. On the contrary, this individual regards an object and reflects upon it. He scans it, examining it with care. He studies it, viewing and considering it thoughtfully (1:32; 4:35; 11:45; Acts 1:11). In this prologue of

John, Jesus is being compared to Moses’ Tent of Meeting (Tabernacle), and just as the Israelites no doubt looked and looked at the Tent of Meeting and the glory of God associated with it, so John says they looked at Jesus and saw the glory of God.

1:15. “has advanced in front of me.” John the Baptist set a wonderful example for all believers in that, as great as he was, he consistently pointed people to the Messiah. Furthermore, he recognized and humbly accepted that Jesus was his Lord, openly pointing out that Jesus was more important that he was. The words “has advanced in front of me,” points out that Jesus’ ministry had, even in this early stage, well surpassed John’s and John was pointing to Jesus and saying he was the Messiah. The Greek uses the perfect tense of the verb ginomai, “to become,” and the word emprosthen, which means “to be before, ahead of, or higher in position or rank than someone.” “To become” of a higher rank than someone is to “advance in front of someone” or to surpass him, thus, “has surpassed me” (NIV84) is a good translation. No one argues that Jesus had surpassed John the Baptist in every way.

“because he ranks ahead of me.” The simple truth is that the Messiah does, and always did, rank ahead of John. This verse, and John 1:30 are sometimes used to support the Trinity because the verse can be translated, “because he [Jesus] was before me” [John], and it is assumed that the verse is saying that Jesus existed before John the Baptist. In fact, a number of modern versions translate the last phrase something like, “because he [Jesus] existed before me.” However, there is no reason to bring the Trinity into this verse, and there are very good reasons that it does not refer to the Trinity in any way.

It is clear from the scope of Scripture and social context that John was not teaching the Trinity. There is no mention of the Trinity in the context, and had John mentioned it his disciples would not have understood what he was talking about (in fact, there is no biblical proof that John even knew of anything such as the Trinity). The Messiah the Jews were expecting was not “God in the flesh,” but a man sent from God. The Jews firmly believed in one God, and were not expecting the Messiah to be God in the flesh.

There are scriptures that we today know are prophecies of the Messiah that the Jews in the time of Christ did not apply to the Messiah. However, we also know that the ancient Jews had a lot of expectations about their Messiah that were based on Scripture. The Messiah the Jews were expecting was to be a descendant of Eve (Gen. 3:15), and descendant of Abraham (Gen. 22:18), from the tribe of Judah (Gen. 49:10); a descendant of David (2 Sam. 7:12, 13; Isa. 11:1), that he would be a “lord” under Yahweh (Ps. 110:1), that he would be the servant of Yahweh (Isaiah 42:1-7), he will be “one of their own” and will be able to draw near to Yahweh (Jer. 30:21), and he will come out of Bethlehem (Micah 5:2).

This expectation perfectly fit John’s teaching his disciples that Jesus was the “Lamb of God” (John 1:29; i.e., the Lamb sent from God) and John’s statement that Jesus was “the Son of God” (John 1:34). If John had told his disciples that Jesus literally existed before he did, they would not have understood what he was saying, which would have engendered a big discussion and explanation of the doctrine of the pre-existence of the Messiah. There is no such discussion or explanation for the simple fact that John was not saying Jesus literally existed before him. John was not teaching, nor did he mention, the Trinity in this context.
Many versions have the translation that Jesus “was before” John. In that translation, the Greek word translated “was” is the verb ēn (ἦν), which is in the imperfect tense, active voice of eimi, (εἰμί) the common word for “to be” (which occurs more than 2000 times in the New Testament). In this context it is vital that we understand that the force of the imperfect tense is, “he was and continues to be.” Then comes the Greek word protos, which means “first.” It can refer to being “first” in time, and thus be translated “before,” or it can mean first in rank, and be translated “chief,” “leader,” “greatest,” “best,” etc. There are many examples referring to people being protos where protos refers to highest in rank or importance (cp. Matt. 19:30, 20:27; Mark 6:21; 9:35; 10:31, 44; Luke 19:47; Acts 17:4; 25:2; 28:17; and 1 Cor. 12:28). Similarly, protos is used of things that are the best or most important. For example, the “first” and great commandment was the first in importance, and the “first” robe was the “best” robe (Luke 15:22).

Given the mindset of the disciples and the fact that John was not teaching them about the pre-existence of the Messiah, but rather was trying to point out that Jesus was the Messiah, it seems that John was making the simple statement that Jesus had always been ahead of him in rank, going back long before they started their ministries. John’s statement that Jesus “was before” him does not have to mean that Jesus is God or even be a reference to all the prophecies of the Messiah in the Old Testament going back to Genesis 3:15. Before John or Jesus was born, when Mary came to visit Elizabeth, John leapt in the womb for joy upon being close to his savior. To John, Jesus had always been ahead of him in rank.

Of course it is possible, but there is no way to prove it, that when John said Jesus was before him, he also had in his mind all the prophecies of the Messiah in the Old Testament, and that Jesus had been in the mind of God for millennia. The existence of Christ in the mind of God is so clear that it need not be disputed. Before the foundation of the world he was foreknown (1 Pet. 1:20); from the foundation of the world he was slain (Rev. 13:8); and before the foundation of the world we, the Church, were chosen in him (Eph. 1:4). The certainty about the Messiah that is expressed in the prophecies about him definitively reveal that all aspects of his life and death were clearly in the mind of God before any of them occurred. If John did have the prophecies of the Messiah in mind when he made this statement, then it would be similar to when Jesus himself said that he was “before” Abraham (see commentary on John 8:58).

By translating John’s statement as, “…he ranks ahead of me,” we catch the essence of the verse without much ambiguity. It is clear in the context that the primary reason for John’s statement was to magnify Jesus Christ in comparison to himself, and “ranks ahead of me” does that. Furthermore, “he ranks” is timeless. The Messiah has always ranked ahead of the other prophets.

1:16. “grace in place of grace.” The Greek is charis anti charis, literally, “grace instead of grace,” or “grace for grace,” or “grace in place of grace.” There has been much theological debate about exactly what John meant by that phrase, but we find the argument by D. A. Carson to be convincing: “…it appears that the grace and truth that come through Jesus Christ is what replaces the law; the law itself is understood to be an earlier display of grace” (The Pillar New Testament Commentary: The Gospel According to John; note on John 1:17). We believe that Carson has put his finger on the primary meaning of the phrase, and we also believe that a secondary meaning, which is reflected in the many modern translations that have “grace upon grace,” is that God’s grace is continually flowing. The grace of God is not a one-time event, but rather something that flows continually from the fullness of God. We see no need to pick one of these two meanings to the exclusion of the other, but see that in the wording of the verse God has included both meanings, and both are true, which is a reason for the continual scholarly debate about them.

There had been grace in the Old Testament before Christ came, and with the coming of Christ God has given us more grace in place of the grace we already had. However, because we have received this grace “from his fullness,” the Greek phrase also includes the idea that the grace is flowing from God and one grace follows quickly upon another grace, thus the translation in some Bibles, “grace upon grace.” The word “grace” can be used of a gift of grace, so the translation “blessing” (NIV) or “gracious gift” (NET) both are good translations.

1:18. “seen God.” In this case, “seen God” refers to knowing Him for who he really is, not seeing Him with the eye. In many languages, “to see” is a common idiom for “to know.” In the Hebrew language, one of the definitions for “see” (Hebrew = ra’ ah) is “see, so as to learn, to know.” Similarly, the Greek word translated “see” in verse 18 (horaō) can be “to see with the eyes” or “to see with the mind, to perceive, know.” Even in English, one of the definitions for “see” is “to know or understand.” For example, when two people are discussing something, one might say to the other, “I see what you mean.”

The usage of “see” as it pertains to knowing is found in many places in the New Testament. Jesus said to Philip, “Anyone who has seen me has seen the Father” (John 14:9). Here again the word “see” is used to indicate knowing. Anyone who knew Christ (not just those who “saw” him) would know the Father. In fact, Christ had made that plain two verses earlier when he said to Philip, “If you really knew me you would know my Father as well” (John 14:7).

Further evidence that “see” means “know” in John 1:18 is that the phrase “no man has seen God” is contrasted with the phrase “has made Him known.” So from the context and vocabulary in John 1:18, we can see that it is not talking about “seeing” God with one’s eyes; it is saying that the truth about God came by Jesus Christ. Before Jesus Christ came, no one really knew God as He truly is, a loving heavenly Father. For more information on the idiomatic uses of “seen,” see commentary on Luke 1:48; for more information on the idiomatic uses of “seen” and people who saw God, see commentary on and Acts 7:55].

“only begotten son.” There is a huge controversy about the original reading of this verse. As it stands, some Greek texts read “God” and some read “Son.” At some point in time the Greek text was changed, and either “Son” or “God” is original. The manuscript evidence is divided. Much has been written on this subject, and readers are invited to read some of the more scholarly books and commentaries that go deeply into the arguments.

We have concluded to our satisfaction that “only begotten son” was more likely the original text in John 1:18 based on the evidence. We will summarize some of the important arguments and why we have decided “Son” was likely the original reading. First, our study of the scope of Scripture reveals that Jesus is not God. That is the plain reading of dozens of verses of Scripture. There is no description of the Trinity anywhere in Scripture, or of the “hypostatic union,” or of the “incarnation,” and the fact is that every single “Trinity proof text” can be explained from the position that Jesus is the Son of God, not God. In contrast, there are dozens of points of logic that cannot be explained if the Trinity is true, such as why, after his resurrection, Jesus spoke of having a “God.” God does not have a God—He is God.

Second, and very importantly, there is no other reference anywhere in the Bible to the “only begotten God,” while there are other Johannine references to the “only begotten son” (John 3:16; 18; 1 John 4:9). To fully understand that argument we must recognize that John 3:16, 3:18, and 1 John 4:9 have “son,” not “God” and there is no textual disagreement. So while the Bible has only begotten “Son” three times (four including John 1:18), the reading “unique God” in John 1:18 would be the only occurrence of that reading in the Bible, and we find that very unlikely.

Also, going along with the point just stated above is the fact that the Gospel of John closes with, “these are written so that you believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and so that by believing you will have life in his name” (John 20:31). It would be strange indeed if John chapter one said Jesus was God, but the Gospel closed by saying it showed that Jesus was the Son of God. That would be even more strange—frankly too strange for us to believe—if Jesus were God and a person had to believe he was God to be saved. In that case, the Gospel of John should have plainly said that “these are written so that you believe that Jesus is God and so that by believing you will have life in his name.” If a person cannot be saved by just believing that Jesus is the “Son” of God, then John 20:31 should not have said so.

We also concur with Bart Ehrman that the textual evidence supports the word “Son,” not “God” in John 1:18. Although the reading theos (God) appears in the Alexandrian texts, which are earlier than the Western and Byzantine texts and therefore most often considered by scholars to represent the original reading in disputed verses, there are times when the Alexandrian readings are not original. Many factors must be considered. For one thing, the Alexandrian readings are earlier because they survived in the sands of Egypt, whereas the Western texts had to be copied more often. But that does not, in and of itself, make the Alexandrian texts more accurate. Other things have to be considered. Besides, there are some Alexandrian texts that read “Son.” Also, if “God” were the original reading, it seems, especially given the desire among third century Christians to support the Trinity, that the Western, Cesarean, and Byzantine text families would have more than a few manuscripts that read “God,” after all, that is what those theologians believed, but the reading “God” is almost totally absent from those text families. Bart Ehrman writes:

“This is not simply a case of one reading supported by the earliest and best manuscripts and another supported by late and inferior one, but of one reading found almost exclusively in the Alexandrian tradition and another found sporadically there and virtually everywhere else” (The Orthodox Corruption of Scripture, p. 79).

Furthermore, “Son” predominates not only in the Greek manuscripts, but in the Latin and Syriac (Aramaic) manuscripts as well, and also is predominnatt in the writings of the Church Fathers (although some have “God” as well).

Another reason for believing that “Son” is original is the word monogenēs (“only begotten,” actually referring to “one of a kind,” some say “unique”). The fact is that monogenēs can mean “only begotten,” and that usage fits perfectly with Jesus Christ as the Son of God. There is a sense that the verse could read “unique Son,” but to what purpose? Just because a word can mean something does not mean that definition should be used. Occam's razor, that simpler theories are the most satisfactory unless a more complex theory has greater explanatory power, applies here. Why create the difficult phrase “unique Son” when the translation “only begotten Son,” which occurs three other places in John’s writings, is understandable and biblical? Yes, Jesus was unique, but as the Son (not as “God,” because if Jesus, as part of the Trinity, was unique, then so are the Father and Holy Spirit, which would make three unique Gods, and defeat the purpose of using “unique” in the first place).

Another argument against the reading “God” in John 1:18 is that fact that there is no evidence that anyone in the culture of the time John was writing would have understood the concept of a “begotten God.” What would “monogenēs God” mean to the Jews and Greeks John was writing to? We should remember that, although John certainly wrote for Christians too, he was writing to unbelieving Jews and Greeks. We know this because John concludes his Gospel by saying, “But these are written so that you believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God” (John 20:31). So what would “monogenēs God” mean to those unbelieving Jews and Greeks? Certainly not “begotten.” What is a “begotten God?” But “unique” is no better. The Jews already had their One God (Deut. 6:4), who by definition would have been unique.

It is worth noting that by the time of the great Christological arguments and the development of the doctrine of the Trinity there were ways that theologians could explain Jesus as a “unique God” but there is no reason to assume that when John wrote anyone would think that way. This adds to the evidence that “God” was the later addition, and “Son” was original.

Some modern Trinitarians skirt this issue by claiming that monogenēs inherently has the meaning of sonship (thus the NIV2011: “the one and only son, who is himself God”). The problem with that is it not a legitimate translation, but an interpretation due to bias. There is nothing inherently in the word monogenēs that demands sonship. It is used in Greek writings of both animate and inanimate objects. Translations such as the NIV2011 are only giving voice to their theology, not translating the text.

Other Trinitarian scholars try to claim that the phrases in John 1:18 are a series of appositions, which would read something like: “the unique one, God, who is in the bosom of the Father.” That translation also has problems. Again, how could Christ be “unique” and “God” at the same time? It would just mean that there were three unique Gods, which defeats the purpose of “unique.” It seems that theologians only suggest that the adjectives are substantives because they are trying to make the simple statement, that Jesus is the “only begotten Son,” fit with their theology that Jesus is God and there is a trinity.

Another reason for favoring “Son” over “God” is that the verse is about God being revealed by Jesus (John 1:17), because the verse started with the phrase, that no one had ever seen “God.” To call Jesus in that context “the only begotten God” (or the “unique God”) would set up an inherent contradiction. If you cannot see God, how could you see “the unique God?” If, on the other hand, you could see “the unique God,” why could you not see “God” too (especially since, by the definition of “unique” being used, God the Father is unique too)? The simple answer in the verse is that the Son is not God, and so while we cannot see God, we can see the only begotten Son who has made God known. The fact is that the reading “the only begotten Son” is textually substantiated, fine from a translation standpoint, and makes perfect sense in the context, even to Trinitarians.

It has been argued the “God” is the likely reading because in trying to reconstruct the original text, scribes usually emended a harder reading so it read more easily. Thus, a scribe reading “God” would change it to “Son” because “Son” was the easier reading, and thus the reading “Son” was created. While the principle that the more difficult reading is usually original is often correct, in this case that principle would not apply because scribes had a theological reason for changing “Son” to “God” and creating the more difficult reading—their belief in the Trinity. Verses were sometimes amended to support the Trinity, as almost all modern scholars admit happened to some manuscripts of 1 John 5:7 and 8, and may have purposely happened in 1 Timothy 3:16.

1:19. “Jews.” The Greek word is Ioudaios (#2453 Ἰουδαῖος, pronounced ē-oo-day'-os) and it has two different meanings in the Bible. One way the word “Jew” is used in the New Testament is to describe those people who are of Jewish heritage and religion—the Jewish people in general. The other way the word “Jew” is used is to refer to the Jews, especially the rulers of the Jews, who were evil and opposed Jesus, and are thus associated with evil, hate, and ungodly religious practices. It is very important to differentiate between these two uses of the word “Jew” to properly understand the New Testament. For example, the vast majority of the time the Gospel of John refers to “the Jews,” it is the second meaning, referring to the rulers of the Jews who opposed Jesus. That is the case in John 1:19.

When it comes to the more general use of the word “Jew,” by New Testament times, Ioudaios (Jew) had acquired a more generalized meaning than it had in parts of the Old Testament. In the Old Testament, it had mostly referred to the people of the tribe of Judah, or to the people living in the land area of the tribe of Judah or the southern kingdom of Judah. By the first century AD, people from the kingdom of Judah had been scattered across the Middle East, Turkey, and Europe and were known as the diaspora (pronounced dee-ass'-por-a; it means “the dispersion”). Peter wrote his first epistle to the diaspora, which the ESV translates as “the Dispersion:”

“Peter, an apostle of Jesus Christ, To those who are elect exiles of the Dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia,” (1 Peter 1:1 ESV).

Strictly speaking, it was hard to exactly define the word “Jew” back then, just as it is today (disputes in modern Israel over who is, and who is not, a Jew, are a regular occurrence). The term “Jew” included religious, ethnic, geographical, and political elements, but in general it was used to define someone whose ancestry was from the tribe of Judah, the kingdom of Judah, or the broader understanding of “Judea,” and who was associated with the Jewish religion. This is supported by texts such as Acts 2:5, which says, “Now there were dwelling in Jerusalem Jews, devout men from every nation under heaven” (ESV). The term “Jew” is used 196 times in the New Testament, but it is not evenly distributed, because 148 of those occurrences are in John and Acts.

The general use of “Jew” is always used in Matthew, Mark, and Luke (except perhaps Luke 7:3). That situation changes dramatically in John, where the word “Jew” occurs 70 times and is mostly used in its more restricted sense, meaning the rulers of the Jews and those who opposed Jesus Christ and are associated with evil (cp. John 1:19; 2:18; 2:20; 5:10, 15, 16, 18; 6:41, 52; 7:1, 11, 13, 15, 35; 8:22, 48, 52, 57; 9:18, 22; 10:19, 24, 31, 33; etc.). There are however, some uses of “Jew” in John that are the more general meaning (cp. John 2:6; 4:9, 20, 22; 5:1, etc.). The book of Acts usually uses “Jew” in the more general sense, but sometimes uses it in the more restricted sense (cp. Acts 12:3; 13:45, 50; 14:19; 17:5; 18:12; etc.). The Apostle Paul occasionally used the word “Jew” in its more restrictive sense (cp. 1 Thess. 2:14; 2 Cor. 11:24), but usually used it in its general sense. The two uses of “Jews” in the book of Revelation use the word in its general sense.

It is important to understand the two uses of “Jew” and differentiate the “average Jew” from the “evil Jewish rulers” as we read the New Testament, because there were many good people who were Jews (including the Apostles and the majority of the early Church), and they should not be vilified for what “the Jews,” meaning the evil religious leaders, did to Jesus and God’s people.

1:21. “Elijah.” For information on why the people thought that Elijah would come, and why John the Baptist was called “Elijah,” see commentary on Matthew 17:10.

1:23. Quoted from Isaiah 40:3.

1:25. “Elijah.” For information on why the people thought that Elijah would come, and why John the Baptist was “Elijah,” see commentary on Matthew 17:10.

1:28. “Bethany.” This site is unknown, and its location has been the source of much scholarly discussion. Nevertheless, it seems clear that it was within a day’s walk from Bethany near Jerusalem, and likely would have been close to directly east of Jerusalem, thus explaining its name as “Bethany beyond Jordan.” When two towns are quite far apart, there is usually no such description: people simply recognize that the towns cannot be the same due to the distance they are separated from each other. It seems clear the messengers that came to tell Jesus that Lazarus was dead could make the journey in a day (see commentary on John 11:6). The Church Father Origen (184/185 – 253/254) went to Palestine and said that he could not find any town named Bethany, and so concluded that Jesus must have been at Bethabara (actually, there is a large variation in the manuscripts, apparently in some measure due to Origen’s report). Origen did say “We are aware of the reading which is found in almost all the copies, ‘These things were done in Bethany.’” However, when Origen is studied, it seems he did not go beyond the Jordan himself, but relied on what people said. R. D. Potter writes, “How did the name disappear in 100 or 150 years? The answer is that Origen, despite his pious assertion about visiting the scenes of Redemption, had never been there. He is reporting hearsay…. He never discovered Bethany beyond Jordan because he never went to look.” (Potter and Origen quoted in Leon Morris, The Gospel According to John).

One of the arguments that “Bethany” is the original name, besides the fact that Origen said most of the manuscripts available to him read “Bethany,” is that John 10:40-11:18 seems to make some effort to make sure the reader understands that the Bethany where Lazarus was buried was not the place where Jesus was when he got the message about Lazarus. This would support that Jesus was at “Bethany” and then traveling to “Bethany.” R. Brown (The Anchor Bible) notes the pilgrim tradition says that Jesus was baptized by John close to where Joshua crossed the Jordan, and while tradition cannot be relied on, the location seems to fit what we know about the geography.
It is sometimes argued that Jesus would not have stayed across the Jordan from Jerusalem because that was Perea, the tetrarchy of Herod Antipas, who had executed John the Baptist. However, it is logical that the death of John the Baptist had caused no small stir and would have made Herod quite unpopular, and he would have had no desire to complicate matters further, especially when Jesus had not done anything to threaten his rule. When Jesus was brought before him in Jerusalem he could have executed him, and Pilate would have been thankful to have that task taken from him, but instead Herod sent Jesus back to Pilate.

1:31. “I did not know him.” John almost certainly knew Jesus as a person, but what he means here is that he did not know Jesus as the Coming One. Even if he had a personal opinion based on the testimony of his parents—and it seems certain he would have their testimony since his mother was the one whom Mary visited when both women were pregnant and John leapt in Elizabeth’s womb—he still had no divine confirmation on his own until the baptism. In this phrase, the “I” is emphatic in Greek.

“but for this purpose I came baptizing in water: in order that he might be revealed to Israel.” Here we see one of the great purposes for John’s baptism, and Jesus was revealed to Israel though it in many ways. One was the direct testimony of John, an eyewitness of the holy spirit lighting as a dove upon him. John’s testimony had great weight, as we briefly glimpse in John 1:35-37. Another was that John’s baptism prepared the hearts of people to see the Messiah. John’s baptism was specifically a baptism of repentance, that is, a baptism that symbolized the repentance of the people, who confessed their sin before being baptized. The confession, repentance, and baptism gave John the perfect platform to speak of the Messiah and reveal him to Israel, because it was the Messiah, not the baptism, that could really cleanse a person from sin. People who have repented of their sin and are desirous of everlasting life always wish to see, and emulate their Savior, thus many believed when they were around Jesus—their hearts had been prepared to see and receive him (cp. John 2:23).

1:33. “in holy spirit.” There is no definite article. This holy spirit is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.
1:38. “What are you seeking?” The question is a deep one. It can have the essence of the NET translation: “What do you want?” But it also asks them the deep question of the heart: What is it that they really wanted in life? Were they in touch with the deep needs of their life? It is a question we should all ask ourselves: What are we really seeking in life?
1:39. “it was about the tenth hour.” The figure of speech, Epitrechon (see Bullinger, Figures), is a type of parenthesis.

The “tenth hour” is 4 o’clock in the afternoon. Both the Jews and Romans divided the day into 12 hours, starting at daylight, roughly 6 AM. [For the hours of the day and the watches of the night, see commentary on Mark 6:48].
1:41. “first.” The word “first” is debated in the text. Lenski does a good job with it. Andrew was the first of the two disciples of John to find his brother. The other disciple of John, the one not mentioned by name, would have been either James or John (the author of John), and he also found his brother, thus being the “second” to bring his brother, Andrew being the “first.”
1:47. “truly.” This is the adverb alethōs (#230 ἀληθῶς), truly. Although some versions have translated it as if it were an adjective (cp. “Here is a true Israelite” HCSB) the more likely explanation is not that Jesus is saying Nathaniel was a “real” Israelite; lots of Jews from Galilee were likely “real” Israelites. The adverb likely modifies the whole phrase, “an Israelite in whom is no guile.” Finding a truly honest person who had no guile was certainly more difficult than finding a real Israelite, and Jesus opened his conversation with Nathaniel by commenting on his character, something Nathaniel would certainly have recognized, and something that ties in with John 2:25 which says that Jesus knew what was in people, i.e., in their hearts.

1:51. “you all.” The you is plural.

“ascending and descending on.” This is the literal reading of the Greek text, and is designed to vividly call to mind the record in Genesis 28:12 where Jacob saw a great staircase going to heaven with angels going up and down on it (it was not a “ladder” as we know it today, even though many versions use “ladder.” It was a staircase, as per the HCSB, NAB, NET, NIV, etc.).

Although the Greek uses “on” (the preposition epi), the Apostles would have understood what he meant, that it was “on” him, idiomatically meaning due to who he was, that the angels were ascending from, and descending to, him. As the Son of God, Jesus was now the focal point on earth for the angels who were coming from and going back to God.

2:4. “Woman, what is that to me and to you?” This puzzling verse is explained well by Lenski. Of course Jesus’ mother is putting pressure on him to do something in the situation, but as it is in English the verse seems to make Jesus disrespectful and uncaring of the situation entirely. This verse has both Greek idiom and the figure of speech ellipsis. This makes it difficult to translate the Greek into English in an understandable way without taking serious liberty with the text.

Keys to the meaning can be found in the context, especially verse 5. Not only is Mary not upset with Jesus’ response to her, but she expects Jesus will do something to help the situation. Jesus’ statement, “what is that to you and me” is not an insult to Mary, or a statement of disregard of the situation. Rather it is a statement that Jesus himself is Messiah and Lord, and that he and Mary are not a team. The verse should be read something like: “what is that to you and me, I will deal with it alone.” He alone would take care of the situation now, just as he alone would take care of the situation when “his hour” had come, at the time of his torture and death. Mary understood his communication, and went to the servants and told them that whatever “he” said, do it.

2:6. “stone water jars.” These jars were very hard to make and expensive, since they were made of stone, not clay. The reason for the stone was that clay would absorb a little of what was put in it, and so clay vessels became unclean very easy and could not be cleansed once they were unclean. Stone, on the other hand, was harder to make permanently unclean because it could usually be cleansed by washing.

2:12. “down.” This is literally true. Capernaum was on the Sea of Galilee, which is about 700 feet below sea level, while Cana is in what is known as the Upper Galilee, which is well above sea level.
“Capernaum.” Jesus made his home in Capernaum after he left Nazareth (Luke 4:29-31). [For more information on Jesus’ move to Capernaum, see commentary on Mark 2:1].

“a few days.” The Greek literally says, “not many days,” but the idiom means a few days. Jesus moved permanently to Capernaum, but at this time his family, his disciples, and he only stayed in Capernaum for a few days is explained in the next verse, that the Passover was near and everyone went to Jerusalem to celebrate it.

2:15. “drove them all out of the temple, also the sheep and the oxen.” This is Jesus’ first appearance in the Temple after starting his ministry, and he is already demonstrating the fact that he is the representative of his Father, and actively judging, and correcting, right from wrong and dismantling the oppressive systems the world uses to keep God’s people in bondage. The wrath that he showed in his Father’s house will be mirrored and magnified at the Judgment, when sinners will be excluded, not just from an earthly Temple, but from the Kingdom of Heaven itself. When Jesus saw the evil merchants, he acted quickly and decisively, as is indicated by the fact that the four verbs in the verse, “made...drove...poured out...overturned” are all in the aorist tense.

Making the whip would be relatively easy. There was constant buying and selling of animals and many of them would have been tied up in the immediate area at any given time. No doubt there would be unused pieces of rope and chord tied to posts or pillars, or lying around. Although some people have suggested that Jesus did not use the whip on the merchants themselves, but only on the animals, the Greek text does not support that supposition. The text says that Jesus drove them “all” out of the temple, and the word “all” is masculine, agreeing with the “sellers” (τοὺς πωλοῦντας) and the “moneychangers” (τοὺς κεραματίστας) of the first part of the sentence, which is in verse 14. It is also quite likely, although not specifically stated, that Jesus repeated his actions at the Passover just before his crucifixion, likely only a year later. The records of Matthew 21:12, 13; Mark 11:15-17; and Luke 19:45-48, show that Jesus did indeed “drive” the dishonest merchants from the Temple, not just drive the animals from it. Although those records do not state that Jesus made a whip, it is likely that he used more than words to get the merchants to abandon their lucrative business.

It has been correctly pointed out by commentators that is was not the physical whip that drove out the moneychangers, but Jesus’ intensity and the fact that what he was doing was righteous, and at some level, at least, they knew that. Even though they themselves were caught up in the system and may not have thought they could change it, they still would have been aware to some degree that what they were doing was wrong, and so yielded to Jesus without a fight.

2:16. “Stop making.” The verb “making” is poieō (#4160 ποιέω), which means to do or to make. In this verse, it is in the present tense, imperative mood. The present tense indicates the action is ongoing. If we translate the verse “Do not make,” it repeats the verb into “do, make,” and it also loses the force that this was something they had been doing and were continuing to do. The imperative mood also is the reason for the exclamation point at the end of the sentence.

2:18. “Jews.” This is the restricted use of the word “Jews,” referring only to the religious leaders of the Jews and those who oppose God and Christ. [For more information, see commentary on John 1:19].
2:19. “Destroy this sanctuary, and in three days I will raise it up.” This was a very fitting answer to the question the Jews were asking, which was basically, “What sign are you going to show us that proves you have the authority to do what you are doing?” Jesus had the authority to cleanse the Temple because he was the Messiah, but what sign showed he was the Messiah? The Resurrection! Jesus made this clear when he said that no sign (that is, no clear incontrovertible sign) would be given to that generation except the resurrection (Matt. 12:40). Furthermore, in his teaching on the Day of Pentecost, Peter made it clear that it was the resurrection that absolutely showed that Jesus was Lord and Christ (Acts 2:36).

The obvious problem in the verse is that Jesus said “I” will raise up this sanctuary, but he was dead. What did he mean? Many verses plainly state that it was God who raised Jesus (cp. Acts 2:32; 4:10; 5:30; Rom. 10:9; 1 Cor. 6:14; Gal. 1:1; 1 Thess. 1:9, 10). This is the only verse that implies Jesus raised himself, and so it is very unusual. What did Jesus mean when he said that he would raise up “this sanctuary?”

Jesus was speaking to the Jews after he turned over their tables and drove their animals out of the Temple (this was the first of the two times when he did that; he did it again at the end of his ministry, cp. Matt. 21:12; Mark 11:15; Luke 19:45). The Jews were angry and unbelieving, and Jesus was speaking in veiled terms, so much so that the Gospel of John adds, “but he was speaking of the temple of his body,” so that people reading the Gospel would understand what he said. Since Jesus was standing in the actual Temple when he said, “Destroy this sanctuary,” the natural assumption would be that he was speaking of the Temple where he was standing at the time, and indeed, the people listening to him thought he was speaking of destroying the physical Temple he was standing in.

The fact that Jesus was speaking in veiled terms to an unbelieving audience should make us hesitant to build a doctrine on this verse and say that Jesus somehow raised himself, especially when the other verses about the resurrection say “God” raised Jesus. Tempers were flaring and the Jews were against Jesus anyway. It was common for Jesus to speak in ways that unbelievers did not understand. Even a cursory reading of the Gospels will show a number of times when Jesus spoke and the unbelievers who heard him (and sometimes even the disciples) were confused by what he said.

In what sense could Jesus say “I” will raise “this sanctuary?” He was referring to the fact that he was to a degree responsible for his resurrection, just as we are for our salvation. How so? We are responsible for our salvation because we must accept the Lord Jesus in order to be saved. In a similar way, Jesus was responsible to keep himself “without spot or blemish” and to fully obey the will of the Father in order to be able to be resurrected. Jesus was the sacrifice for the sins of mankind, and a sacrifice that was blemished was unacceptable to the Lord (Lev. 22:17-20; Mal. 1:6-8). Since this event in John was at the start of his ministry, Jesus knew he had a long and hard road ahead and that obedience would not be easy. If he turned away from God because he did not like what God said to do, or if he sinned, his sin would have been a “blemish” that would have disqualified him as the perfect sacrifice. Then he could not have paid for the sins of mankind, and there would have been no resurrection. Jesus did not go into the Temple and turn over the money tables because he “just felt like it.” Scripture says he was fulfilling the Old Testament prophecy and the will of God, which he always did. Had he not fulfilled this prophecy, he would not have fulfilled all the law and would have been disqualified from being able to die for the sins of mankind. Thus, his destiny was in his own hands, and he could say, “I will raise it up.”

It is common in speech that if a person has a vital part in something, he is spoken of as having done it. An example from ordinary life would be if a homeowner hires a worker to remodel his kitchen. In conversation about it he would ordinarily say, “I remodeled my kitchen last year,” even though he only paid to have it done by someone else. The Bible uses that same kind of language. For example, the Gospels say that Roman soldiers crucified Jesus (Matt. 27:35). Yet Peter said to the rulers of the Jews, “you” crucified the Lord (Acts 5:30). Everyone understands that the Jews played a vital part in Jesus’ crucifixion, so there really is a sense in which they crucified him, even though they themselves did not do the dirty work. An example from the Old Testament is in 2 Samuel 5 and 1 Chronicles 11. David and his men were attacking the Jebusite city of Jerusalem. The record is very clear that David had sent his men ahead into the city to fight, and even said that the first one into the city would be the general. Yet the record says, “David captured the stronghold of Zion,” because David played a vital role in the capture of Jerusalem. This same type of wording that is so common in the Bible and indeed, in all languages, is the wording Jesus used. He would raise his body by virtue of the fact that he would play a vital part in it being raised.

2:20. “Jews.” This is the restricted use of the word “Jews,” referring only to the religious leaders of the Jews and those who oppose God and Christ. [For more information, see commentary on John 1:19].

“it has taken forty-six years to build this sanctuary, and will you raise it up in three days?” The Temple, and the complex around it, took many years to build. Then it stood in its completed form for less time than it took to build because it was destroyed in 70 AD. The saying in Jewish tradition was, “He that has not seen the Temple of Herod has never known what beauty is” (Edersheim, Life and Times, Book II, p. 120).

2:22. “out from among the dead.” See Romans 4:24. Wuest: “out from among those who are dead.”

“believed the scripture.” What scripture? Very likely Psalm 16:10, as per Acts 2:31 and 13:35, but they also may have believed Isaiah 53, Psalm 22, etc.

2:23. “Now.” This verse should have been grouped with the Nicodemus record, and therefore numbered “3:1” instead of “2:23.” A huge key to understanding why Jesus spoke to Nicodemus the way he did was that Jesus “knew what was in man” (2:25). Verse 23 tells us when and where the Nicodemus record occurred. Nicodemus was a member of the Sanhedrin, the Jewish ruling council, so he would have lived somewhere in or very close to Jerusalem.

“signs.” The miracles that Jesus did are called “signs” (simeion; #4592 σημεῖον) in the Gospel of John. A “sign” is something that points to something else, just as a road sign points to something coming up in the road or a condition the traveler needs to know about. In John, the miracles that Jesus did are called “signs” and pointed to him being the Messiah.

“Passover.” One of the three major feasts in the Jewish calendar that every male was to attend (Exod. 23:14-17; Deut. 16:1-17; 2 Chron. 8:13). This is the first of the two Passovers that Jesus attended during his ministry. At the second he was arrested and crucified.
“believed in his name.” This means that people were believing that Jesus was the Messiah. What is not stated, but is very important, is that the people back then thought very differently about the Messiah than we do. We, with 20-20 hindsight, know about his suffering and death, his two comings (one to suffer and die; one, still future, to conquer and set up his kingdom), etc. In contrast, the people of Jesus’ day believed that as the Messiah he would simply come and at some point muster an army, overthrow the Romans and other governments of the world, and set up his kingdom on earth. Even his closest men, the Apostles, did not understand about his death and resurrection until after he was raised and had appeared to them (Luke 24:45-48). So when the Scripture says the people believed “in his name,” they “got” that Jesus was the promised Messiah, but they did not “get” what that meant as far as how Jesus would have to live out his life. For more on the custom of “the name” and “the name of Jesus Christ,” see commentary on 1 John 3:23.

2:24. “Jesus did not trust himself to them.” Even though Jesus was surely glad that people were recognizing that he was the Messiah, he did not trust himself to them. He knew that they did not really understand what the Messiah would do. Even his mother Mary came to believe he was out of his mind (Mark 3:21). See commentary on John 2:23, “believed in his name.”

“because he knew all people.” This statement shows how much revelation the Father gave to His Son, Jesus. It is not that Jesus inherently knew every person, but rather that God told him what he needed to know about people, and this sentence sets the stage for John 3:1, when Jesus meets Nicodemus.

It is obvious from Scripture that Jesus did not know everything, for he grew in wisdom (Luke 2:52), and he did not know certain things (Matt. 24:36). Whenever the word “all” is used, the student of Scripture must be careful to ascertain from the context whether it means “all” in a totally inclusive sense, or whether it means “all” in a more limited sense (see note # 5 on Col. 1:15-20). For example, 1 John 2:20 says of Christians, “you know all things.” Surely there is no Christian who actually believes that he knows everything. The phrase is taken in a limited sense of “all” according to the context.

This verse puts Trinitarians in a difficult situation, because they usually explain it by saying that Jesus was God and therefore he knew all people. But then they explain the verses that say Jesus did not know certain things by saying that those refer to his human side. We think it is reasonable to assert that you cannot have it both ways. Either the person who walked the earth as Jesus Christ, our Messiah, did not know everything, or he did. It makes no sense that he “went back and forth” between the two natures. That would have been very confusing both for his human side and those around him. There are very clear verses that say he did not know everything, and no verse that actually says that Jesus did know everything the same way God does. When a verse seems at first to say Jesus “knew all men,” it should be understood in a limited sense according to the context, just as when Scripture says Christians “know all things.”

Jesus Christ was “made like his brothers in every way” (Heb. 2:17). Yet we are not “part God, part human,” or “fully God and fully man.” In order for the integrity of Scripture to be preserved, Jesus must actually be like we are, i.e., fully human.

There is no place in Scripture where the doctrine of the “dual nature” of Christ is actually stated. It is an assumption based on piecing verses together. What the Bible does say in a straightforward manner is that Jesus was flesh and bone, not spirit; that he was a man, and that he partook in our humanity. Also, the very concept of the dual nature of Christ involves a self-contradiction. God is infinite and man is finite, and so Christ would have to be a finite-infinite being, which we believe is inherently impossible. That is not the Jesus described to us in the Bible. No wonder Tertullian, an early Trinitarian, said, “Credo quia impossibile est” (I believe because it is impossible). We realize it is not only “impossible,” but also unscriptural, so unlike Tertullian, we choose not to believe it.

Jesus needed to hear from God to know how to judge (John 5:30), and he knew all men the same way—by hearing from God. In saying that Jesus knew all men, the Bible was confirming that Jesus was in touch with God just as were the prophets of old (but of course, much more intimately). Charles Morgridge writes: “It was an opinion prevalent among the Jews, that prophets knew the thoughts and characters of those with whom they conversed. Luke 7:39: “Now, when the Pharisee which had bidden him, saw it, he spake within himself, saying, “This man, if he were a prophet, would have known who, and what manner of woman this is that toucheth him” (The True Believer’s Defence (sic) Against Charges Preferred by Trinitarians, pp. 124-126). Furthermore, it is substantiated in Scripture that God did show prophets what people were thinking. Nathan knew of David’s secret sin (2 Sam. 12:7). Ahijah knew what the wife of Jeroboam wanted, and who she was, even though he was blind and she was wearing a disguise (1 Kings 14:4, 6). Elijah knew that Ahab had committed murder by framing Naboth (21:17-20), and he knew the information that the king of Israel wanted to know (2 Kings 1:1-4). Elisha knew that Gehazi was lying and knew of the greed in his heart (2 Kings 6:19-27). Daniel knew Nebuchadnezzar’s dream, even though Nebuchadnezzar had not revealed it to anyone (Dan. 2:5,28ff). By saying that Jesus knew all men, Scripture confirms that he was, like the prophets of old, in communication with God.

2:25. “he did not need anyone to testify about man.” This statement sets up the record of Jesus and Nicodemus, which starts, “There was a man of the Pharisees, named Nicodemus.” Because Jesus did not need anyone to testify about people, and knew what was in people, when Nicodemus came to him he already knew what Nicodemus wanted and needed. That explains why Jesus so abruptly spoke into Nicodemus’ life, saying, “Truly, truly, I say to you, unless someone is born from above, he is not able to see the Kingdom of God” (John 3:3).

3:1. “one of.” A partitive genitive. Nicodemus was “of” the Pharisees, meaning he was one of them. Some versions simplify the verse and just have, “Now there was a Pharisee named Nicodemus.” That is certainly what the text means.

“Pharisees.” The Greek word is Pharisaios (#5330 Φαρισαῖος), a transliteration of the Aramaic word perishaya, from the Aramaic word that means “separated.” The Pharisees separated themselves from things that made them unclean or were ungodly, and also separated themselves from others who they considered not godly. Our knowledge of them is limited by the sources we have. The Greek term is found for the very first time in the New Testament and it occurs in Josephus, but not in any other Jewish or Greco-Roman writings of the New Testament era. The group no doubt existed before the time of Christ, which is why it was so influential in the New Testament, but no description of it survives from that time. The term is found in the non-canonical and later Christian texts (e.g., The Gospel of Thomas), and in the writings of the Church Fathers. The text called “The Psalms of Solomon,” perhaps written in the mid first century BC, has been thought of as a Pharaonic text, but never specifically identified as such.

Josephus tells us the Pharisees believed in the immortality of the soul, like the Greeks, which explains why the parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke 16) resonated with them. However, they also believed in the resurrection from the dead, as is clear from Acts 23:6-8. It is not clear how they reconciled these two beliefs. Since Josephus tells us that the Pharisees believed the soul of the righteous went into another body, it is reasonable to believe that they thought the souls of good people waited in “Paradise,” where they could be in intimate association with the Patriarchs (cp. “in Abraham’s bosom;” Luke 16:22) until the resurrection. Many Christians hold a belief that is somewhat similar: that the souls of dead Christians are in heaven and will be joined with their resurrected bodies in the future.

That John 3:1 specifically refers to Nicodemus as a Pharisee helps us understand one reason why Jesus spoke to him about the resurrection from the dead. Jesus opened the Sermon on the Mount with a teaching about the future Messianic Kingdom on earth because almost no one understood it [Matt. 5:3-12; see Appendix 3: “Christ’s Future Kingdom on Earth”]. Similarly, one reason he opens his discussion with Nicodemus about resurrection into the Kingdom was because Nicodemus did not understand it.

“ruler of the Jews.” Nicodemus was a member of the Sanhedrin, the Jewish ruling council of 70 men that was presided over by the High Priest (cp. John 7:50).

3:2. “came to Jesus.” The Bible is silent as to why Nicodemus came to Jesus, which means that either we can figure it out on our own, or it is not really important. In this case, the Bible gives us enough information that we recognize some very plausible reasons Nicodemus came.

First, we should understand that around that same time John the Baptist was active in his ministry in “Bethany beyond Jordan,” not more than a day’s journey from Jerusalem (see commentary on John 1:28). John was teaching that the Kingdom of God was very close and that the Messiah was already among them (Matt. 3:2; John 1:26), and “the whole country of Judea, and all Jerusalem, were going out to him” (Mark 1:5). That meant that huge numbers of people were being stirred up by John, and the region would have been abuzz with talk about the Messiah and the Messianic Kingdom. The impact John was making on the people was enough that the rulers of the Jews in Jerusalem sent some Pharisees to question him (John 1:24ff), and either Nicodemus would have been one of them or he would have known about the report they brought back.

Since Nicodemus would have already been stirred up by the teaching that the Kingdom was close and the Messiah among the people, he would have been especially sensitive to this new young rabbi who, in his first appearance in Jerusalem as a teacher, taught powerfully, did miracles, and even defied Temple authorities by overturning their money tables and driving away their animals. Nicodemus came to the conclusion that Jesus was a “teacher” and “sent from God.” Thus it seems at least one reason for his coming to Jesus was to find out more about his teachings and beliefs. Of course at that point Nicodemus did not believe Jesus was the Messiah. Nicodemus would have still held to the traditions and beliefs of the Pharisees; he was not coming to Jesus to be saved.
There is a wide gap between believing someone is a teacher sent from God and believing that he is the Messiah.

Perhaps a stronger reason that Nicodemus came to Jesus was that he believed John’s teaching that the Kingdom was close, and may have also believed the Messiah was somewhere among the people. That would mean he also thought there was going to be a rebellion or revolution of some sort in the near future. The Jews of Christ’s time thought that the Messianic Kingdom would replace the kingdoms on earth, but the exact way they thought that would happen is unclear. It seems certain that there were differences of opinion about it, but the bottom line was that people thought the Messiah was going to make war on the kingdoms of the world, overcome them, and set up his own kingdom. This would certainly mean the Messiah would need help overthrowing the Romans, and no doubt a godly man like Nicodemus thought it would be helpful if the Jews were more united and fought less among themselves.

Given that, it is very likely that another reason Nicodemus came to Jesus was to offer him some advice about how to be successful in Jerusalem. As a member of the Sanhedrin and an old and experienced godly man among the often ungodly Jews, Nicodemus had learned how to influence others without being personally denounced. It seems he felt he could help this young Rabbi to navigate the uncertain and shifting waters between the rival religious factions, their rival political factions, and the masses of people, all vying for what would profit them personally. Nicodemus could give Jesus practical advice as to how to be successful and effective in his ministry. But Jesus had no interest in successfully influencing the culture in Jerusalem, and knew that Nicodemus needed to rethink his theology from the ground up to know the truth of the Word. Thus it is no wonder that Jesus went right to the heart of the Kingdom issue with the statement, “Truly, truly, I say to you, unless someone is born from above, he is not able to see the Kingdom of God.”

Jesus was not going to bring the Kingdom by uniting the Jews and overthrowing the Romans. The Kingdom was going to be established on earth in a totally different way, and will in large part be populated by those people whom God raises from the dead (cp. Isa. 26:19; Ezek. 37:9-14; Dan. 12:2). It is not by being powerful enough to overthrow the Romans that a person will be able to be part of the Kingdom, but rather by being godly enough to be part of the Resurrection of the Righteous (cp. John 5:29). For more information about how “born from above” refers to the resurrection, see commentary on John 3:3. [For more information about the Kingdom of God on earth, see Appendix 3: “Christ’s Future Kingdom on Earth”.]

“at night.” Nicodemus came to Jesus at night so that he might not been recognized. This is not cowardice, but wisdom: careful caution. Lenski writes that Nicodemus “was not sure about this young Rabbi from Galilee who might turn out a disappointment after all. So he cautiously investigates.”

“Rabbi.” The term means “teacher,” and is a respectful address. Jesus’ deeds had touched a chord in Nicodemus and he knew Jesus was sent from God. Nicodemus knew Jesus was sent from God and addresses him as such, with respect.

“we.” This refers to the “many” people who believed in 2:23. It does not refer to Nicodemus’ peers, the religious leaders, because they did not believe Jesus was sent from God, they thought he was a false prophet.
“sent from God.” The Greek is the preposition apo (#575 ἀπό) which in this context simply means “from.” Jesus Christ was a teacher from God. God sent him, just like He sent angels or the prophets; and God inspired his teachings. Some people have tried to support the Trinity or the pre-existence of Christ by this verse, but it does not have to mean that at all. Actually, the very fact that Nicodemus started by saying, “Rabbi, we know that you are a teacher ‘sent from God,’” shows that the verse is not referring to the incarnation or the Trinity in any way. Neither Nicodemus, nor the “we” he referred to in his statement, had been taught about the Trinity or the incarnation, nor believed it from the Law or what they learned in Synagogue. Nicodemus, and the “we” he referred to, believed exactly what Nicodemus said: that Jesus was a teacher from God, i.e., not a false prophet, and some of them no doubt believed he was the Messiah.

3:3. “born from above.” The Greek text reads gennaō anothen (#1080 γεννάω; #509 ἄνωθεν), and literally means “born from above.” Unfortunately, gennaō anothen is mistranslated as “born again” in most English versions, and that mistranslation has caused a lot of confusion in Christianity. The word anothen occurs five times in John, and all of them mean “above” or “top” (3:3, 7, 31; 19:11, 23).

“Born from above” refers to the resurrection from the dead that will occur when God above puts His spirit in dead people who are then “born” from the grave. Saying, “born from the grave” is biblically accurate, because Isaiah 26:19 says that “the earth will give birth to her dead,” as if the earth is a big womb that gives birth to people at the resurrection (the KJV, which says the earth will “cast out” the dead, is not as clear as versions such as the ESV, NIV, or NASB, which have “give birth to.” The Hebrew word can refer to birth; cp. Brown-Driver-Briggs Hebrew English Lexicon). This same truth about the dead coming up out of the ground is found in Ezekiel 37:12-14 and Daniel 12:2. The imagery of resurrection as “birth” is in the New Testament as well as the Old. Besides here in John 3, Jesus is called “the firstborn from the dead,” referring to the fact that he was the very first one to be raised from the dead (Col. 1:18; Rev. 1:5. Cp. Rom. 8:29; Col. 1:15).

The Jews had no knowledge of what the New Testament calls the “New Birth” (1 Pet. 1:3) or being “born again” (1 Peter 1:23). There was no “New Birth” mentioned in the Old Testament or the Gospels. From Genesis until the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2), God gave His gift of holy spirit only on a relatively few people, and when He did give it, He gave it conditionally, meaning that He could take it away. So, for example, God took His spirit from King Saul (1 Sam. 16:14), and after David sinned with Uriah and Bathsheba, David prayed God would not take it from him (Ps. 51:11).

In contrast to the way God gave the gift of holy spirit during the OT and Gospel period, after the Day of Pentecost when the Christian Church started (Acts 2), God gave holy spirit in birth, and so the Epistles refer to this as the “New Birth.” Today, Christians get “born again” when they believe. However, the New Birth was never mentioned in the Old Testament and therefore the Jews knew nothing of it.

The New Birth is part of the Administration of Grace, which is also called “the Administration of the Sacred Secret (see commentary on Ephesians 3:2 and commentary on Ephesians 3:9). John 3:1-12 is not referring to the Christian New Birth. Jesus was speaking about a “birth from above” that the Jews were supposed to know about and understand. That is why Jesus chided Nicodemus, saying, “Are you the well-known teacher of Israel, and yet do not know these things?” (John 3:10). Thus we have to look in the Old Testament for the kind of birth Jesus spoke of, which is the birth of the body from the ground, which will happen at the resurrection (Isa. 26:19 (NIV); Ezek. 37:12-14; Dan. 12:2). Unfortunately, at the time of Christ, most Jews were ignorant about the resurrection from the dead and entrance into the Messianic Kingdom. The Sadducees did not even believe in a resurrection (Matt. 22:23). The Pharisees, on the other hand, of which Nicodemus was one, generally believed in immediate life after death, like the Greeks (see commentary on John 3:1; “Pharisee”). So when Jesus told Nicodemus about being born from above, he did not understand what Jesus was saying. Nicodemus, who had read the Old Testament many times, should have known what Jesus was talking about. Instead, however, due to his theology, he was confused by the “birth” terminology.

The Jews believed that God opened the womb allowing childbirth, or closed it causing barrenness (Gen. 20:18; 29:31; 30:2; 1 Sam. 1:5; Ps. 127:3; Isa. 66:9; Hos. 9:14). Thus, when Jesus spoke of being “born from above” Nicodemus would have correctly thought of Jesus’ words in terms of “being born with the help of God.” However, instead of correctly thinking that the dead are born from the ground by the power of God, he incorrectly thought about how a person could once again be born from his mother’s womb with God’s help. Jesus’ words are actually quite simple, but they were completely outside any theology that Nicodemus understood, so he misinterpreted them. Jesus was saying that in order to “see” (i.e., enter) the Kingdom of God, the Messianic Kingdom that will be set up on earth (Dan. 2:44; 7:14), the dead will have to be resurrected by the power of God and then enter it.

In summary, what Jesus said to Nicodemus is actually very simple: no one will see God’s Messianic Kingdom unless he is “born from above,” i.e., raised from the dead by God.

3:5. “born of water.” This phrase refers to the birth of the person from his mother’s womb, and Jesus used it because Nicodemus spoke of being born from the womb, somewhat sarcastically asking if a person could enter into the womb a second time. Jesus patiently pointed out that was not necessary, but to enter the Kingdom of God a person had to come from the womb once and be born of water (cp. that which is born of “flesh is flesh;” v. 6), and then he must be born from above, via resurrection.

There are some people who say that this phrase means a person has to be water baptized to be saved, but that cannot be the case. When Jesus spoke to Nicodemus, no one had to be baptized to be saved. There in Judea John and Jesus both baptized as a sign of recommitment to obedience to the Law, and there is evidence that proselytes to Judaism were water baptized, but in no case did the Word of God, or John or Jesus, say it was a requirement for salvation.

It is clear that baptism was not a requirement for salvation in the Old Testament, so if baptism became a requirement for salvation during the ministry of John or Jesus, the Bible should tell us that, and it never does (Mark 16:16 is an addition to the original text; see commentary on Mark 16:9). Furthermore, water baptism was not universally practiced by Jesus or his disciples. When he sent out the 12 (Luke 9:1-5) and when he sent out the 72 (Luke 10:1-12), in neither case did he tell any of his disciples to baptize those who listened and believed the message. This fact is made even clearer when the rich man came to Jesus and specifically asked how to be saved (Matt. 19:16ff). Jesus answered: “If you want to enter life, obey the commandments.” Jesus did not mention baptism because it was not essential in order to be saved.
Jesus just said the phrase “born of water” when he was speaking to Nicodemus, but he never explained it, so it must have referred to something that Nicodemus could understand without any explanation. Based on that, and the context that “that which is born of flesh [with water] is flesh,” the best conclusion is that “born of water” is literal, and should be understood literally. In the context in which Jesus was speaking, before the Church Age, in order to be saved a person had to be 1) born of water (when he is born from his mother) and 2) born of the spirit (when the earth gives birth to him: Ezek. 37:12-14; Isa. 26:19.) For a more thorough understanding of Nicodemus and John 3, see Appendix H, in The Christian’s Hope: The Anchor of the Soul, by John Schoenheit.

“the Spirit.” This is a reference to God, who raises people from the dead (see commentary on John 3:3). The word “Spirit,” (pneuma in Greek) does not have the definite article before it, but it is not needed in this case to make the noun “Spirit” definite because it is ruled by the proposition (See commentary on Matthew 1:18).

3:6. “the Spirit.” God is “spirit,” so it is natural that one of the names of God is “the Spirit.” It is God who creates spirit in the dead bodies of believers and gives them life.

“is spirit.” This “spirit” is the spirit God creates in people that gives life to their dead bodies. When Jesus said, “that which is born of the Spirit is spirit” (John 3:6), he was saying something that every student of the Old Testament should have known from Old Testament verses such as Isaiah 26:19; Ezekiel 37:12-14, and Daniel 12:2, 13, and Hosea 13:14, which is that God will raise the dead. God will raise the dead by putting “spirit” in their dead bodies, which will give those bodies life. In many cases, the bodies are already disintegrated, so God will have to organize the dust into bodies, just as He did for Adam, and then put spirit into them and give them life. This verse, “that which is born of Spirit is spirit,” is actually very simple when seen in light of the Old Testament prophecies. The Spirit, who is God, creates spirit in the dead bodies of believers and gives those bodies life, and they come up out of the grave in their new, spirit-powered bodies.

3:7. “you must all be born from above.” The “you” is plural in the Greek. Thus, Jesus shifts from the singular in verse 3, “unless someone is born from above,” to the plural, “you all must be born from above” or “you must all be born from above,” making the point that the birth from above is not just for Nicodemus, but applies to everyone. The only way anyone is going to enter the Kingdom is by being “born from above,” that is raised from the dead as per Ezekiel 37:12-14.

3:8. “the Spirit breathes where it wants to, and you hear its voice.” The traditional translation of this verse is “the wind blows,” not “the Spirit breathes.” However, the Greek word pneuma (#4151 πνεῦμα) can mean “spirit” or “wind;” pneō (#4154 πνέω, pronounced pnew-’oh) can mean “breathe” or “blow;” and phonē (#5456 φωνή, pronounced phoe-nay) can mean “voice” or “sound.” Therefore, “the Spirit breathes and you hear its voice,” and “the wind blows and you hear its sound” are both legitimate translations of the Greek words. In this situation we must determine what Jesus was saying from the context and scope of Scripture, not just from the Greek words themselves.

To understand John 3 it is essential that we realize (and few commentators do!) that the context of John 3 is the resurrection from the dead, not the Christian “new birth.” Jesus spoke of being “born from above,” not being “born again,” although most English versions have “born again.” In saying “born from above,” Jesus was making a reference to resurrection: people being raised from the dead and “born” out of the grave.
The Old Testament speaks plainly of the resurrection and refers to it as the earth giving birth. Isaiah 26:19 (NIV84) says, “But your dead will live; their bodies will rise. You who dwell in the dust, wake up and shout for joy...the earth will give birth to her dead.” Other versions that use the word “birth” in Isaiah 26:19 include: the BBE; ESV; NASB; NIV; NJB; NRSV; and Rotherham. Other Old Testament verses that speak of the resurrection of the dead include Ezekiel 37:11-14; Daniel 12: 2, 13; and Hosea 13:14. While the Old Testament plainly speaks of the resurrection of the dead and being born out of the grave, there is no Old Testament verse that speaks of the Christian “new birth.” Verses that speak of the new birth are all in the New Testament Epistles (1 Peter 1:3, 23; cp. Titus 3:5; James 1:18).

We must remember that Jesus was trying to instruct Nicodemus about great spiritual truths that Nicodemus should have known but was ignorant of (Jesus said, “Are you the well-known teacher of Israel, and yet do not know these things? John 3:10). Nicodemus was a Pharisee (John 3:1), and therefore would have not correctly understood about what happens to people when they die (see commentary on John 3:1, “Pharisee;” and 1 Corinthians 15:26, “death”). He would also have not had a correct understanding of the future Messianic Kingdom [see Appendix 3: “Christ’s Future Kingdom on Earth”].

From studying the Old Testament, Nicodemus should have known about the resurrection and the Messianic Kingdom, but he had no way of knowing about the Christian “New Birth” (being “born again”). It is because most commentators think that this chapter is about the Christian “New Birth” that it does not occur to them to look in the Old Testament for clues to understand what Jesus is trying to teach Nicodemus. [For more on John 3 not being about the Christian new birth, see commentary on John 3:3].

Once we understand that John 3 is about the resurrection from the dead, we can search the Old Testament and look for material about it. We find that the Old Testament links the breath of God with people being raised from the dead. In contrast, “wind” is never associated with the resurrection. This, then, begins to show us that in this context, “Spirit” and “breathes” are more accurate translations than “wind” and “blows.”

The Old Testament links the breath of God with both living and dying. In Genesis 2:7 it is the breath of God that gives life to Adam, just as in Ezekiel 37 it is the breath of God that gives life to the dead. Genesis 2:7 says, “So then Yahweh God formed man, [of the] dust of the ground, and breathed in his nostrils the breath of life—and man became a living soul” (Rotherham). Isaiah 40:7 and Ezekiel 22:21 link the breath of God with death. Isaiah 40:7 (Rotherham) says, “The grass, hath withered, The flower, hath faded, Because, the breath of Yahweh, hath blown upon it! Surely the people, is grass!” Since the breath of God is associated with life and death, it makes perfect sense that in the context of the resurrection that pneô means “breathe” and that Jesus was saying “the Spirit breathes,” and not “the wind blows.”

There is also good evidence that pneuma should be translated “Spirit.” The word pneuma occurs about 380 times in the New Testament (385 in the manuscript on which the KJV is based, 279 times in the Nessle-Aland 27 Greek text), and in the KJV this is the only place pneuma is translated “wind” (the NIV has “wind” here and one other place; which also could easily be translated “spirit”). In contrast to pneuma, the Greek word anemos (#417 ἄνεμος) occurs 31 times in the New Testament and always refers to wind (cp. Matt. 7:25; 8:26; 14:24; Eph. 4:14; Rev. 6:13). What is quite compelling evidence that pneuma should be translated “Spirit” is that pneuma occurs four times in four verses
(3:5-8), and it would seem incongruous if three of them were “spirit” and one “wind.” Leon Morris expresses this plainly: “…we would expect the meaning [of pneuma] to be unchanged. The passage then would mean that man cannot predict the movements of the Spirit” (The New International Commentary on the New Testament: The Gospel According to John). The flow of Jesus’ teaching and his implied references to the Old Testament all argue for the translation “Spirit.”

More evidence that pneuma refers to the Spirit and not the wind is that it is assigned a will, i.e., desires. Jesus said the Spirit breathes “where it wants to.” This is not true of the wind, which does not have a will and therefore does not blow “where it wants to.” Commentators such as Meyer and Lange point out that attributing desires to the wind would be the figure of speech “personification,” assigning human characteristics to an inanimate object. But there is no need for the figure of speech if pneuma means “Spirit.”

Translating pneuma as “Spirit” has had supporters for centuries. Commentators such as Origin (c. 185-254 AD) and Augustine (354-430 AD) believed this verse referred to the Spirit, not the wind (referenced in Lange). John Wycliffe had, “The Spirit breathes where it will” in his Bible (c. 1385). John Bengal understood the verse to mean: “the Spirit breathes where it will, and you hear its voice” (Bengal’s New Testament Commentary, c. 1742). Bengal pointed out that “breathe,” “will,” and “voice” are more appropriate to the Spirit than to the wind.

According to Leon Morris, a major reason that modern commentators favor the reading, “the wind blows” rather than “the Spirit breathes” is the phrase, “you hear its voice.” Commentators question, and with good reason, what that would mean. After all, most people who get “born again” would not say they heard the voice of God when they got saved. That would be a compelling argument against the translation “Spirit,” but instead it actually shows why it is essential to understand that this verse is speaking of the resurrection from the dead and not referring to Christian salvation and being “born again.”

As soon as we realize this verse is speaking about people being resurrected from the dead, we see that there is indeed a “voice” associated with that event. Jesus made it clear that people would hear his voice and come out of the tombs: “…the hour is coming in which all who are in the tombs will hear his [Jesus’] voice and will come out” (John 5:28, 29; cp. 5:25). Paul wrote that the Christian Rapture would be accompanied by “a loud command” and the “voice of the archangel,” and then the dead in Christ would rise (1 Thess. 4:16).

The book of Ezekiel makes it clear that Jesus was trying to teach Nicodemus a truth from the Old Testament about the resurrection. According to Ezekiel, the Spirit of God would breathe into dead people who would then come to life:

Ezekiel 37:9 (Rotherham):
Then said he [God] unto me [Ezekiel], Prophesy unto the spirit,—Prophesy, Son of man, and thou shalt say unto the spirit, Thus, saith My Lord, Yahweh—From the four winds, come thou, O spirit, And breathe into these slain, That they may live.

Since the prophecy in Ezekiel was that the “spirit” would “breathe” into the dead and they would come to life, we can see why, in the context of the resurrection, Jesus would say that the “Spirit” “breathes;” it took the breath of God to raise the dead. Then Jesus added that the Spirit breathes “where it wants to.” We should not be confused by the phrase “where it wants to,” because people’s true hearts are hidden from us. Unless the Old Testament had let us know, very few people would have thought that when Solomon died he was an evildoer in the eyes of God (1 Kings 11), whereas Nebuchadnezzar the Babylonian and Darius the Persian extolled God at the ends of their reigns (Dan. 4:34ff; 6:25ff). At the Resurrection of the Righteous the Spirit of God will breathe on the righteous dead, raising those whom He wants—those who have had faith in Him—and no doubt there will be many surprises. It will certainly be the case that some people we would have never expected to be righteous will be raised, while many who we thought were righteous will be passed over. For example, in his teaching about a Pharisee and tax collector who both prayed to God, it seems surprising that the Pharisee would be judged unrighteous but the tax collector judged righteous (Luke 18:9-14).

Jesus concludes his teaching to Nicodemus by saying, “this is how it is with everyone who is born by way of the Spirit.” The phrase “this is how it is” is from the Greek houtōs [#3779 οὕτως], which generally means, “thus, so, in this manner, in this way,” etc., (cp. Complete Jewish Bible by Stern). Furthermore, we say “by way of the Spirit” because the Greek text is not a simple genitive, but ek tou pneumatos (literally, “from [by way of] the Spirit”). The preposition ek (#1537 ἐκ) only takes the genitive case, which is why “Spirit” is in the genitive case in the sentence. The preposition ek is generally used in one of these six ways: 1. Source: out of, from; e.g., “she was found to be with child from the Holy Spirit” (Matt. 1:18; Luke 3:8). 2. Separation: away from, from; e.g., “Out of Egypt I called my son” (Matt. 2:15). 3. Temporal: from; e.g., “he saw a man blind from birth” (John 9:1; Acts 15:21). 4. Causal: because of; e.g., “And if by grace, then is it no more of works” (Rom. 11:6; cp. Mark 9:15). 5. Partitive (in place of a partitive genitive): of, from; e.g., “they will put some of you to death” (Luke 21:16; cp. 2 John 1:4). 6. Means: by, from; e.g., “supporting them from their possessions” (Luke 8:3; cp. 16:9).

In this case the context shows us that the first use of ek listed above, “source: from, out of” is the proper meaning. The BDAG Greek-English lexicon notes that when ek is used in the context of birth, it denotes the role of the male. John 3:8 is speaking of those people who are “born,” i.e., resurrected, “from, by, or by way of,” the Spirit.

In summing up John 3, we see Nicodemus the Pharisee coming to Jesus. Being a Pharisee, he had an incorrect understanding of what happens to a person after he dies and an incorrect understanding of the Kingdom of God. Jesus begins to correct his understanding by saying that if a person is not resurrected from the dead (“born from above”), he will not be able to enter the Messianic Kingdom on earth. It was a fairly straightforward teaching, and had Nicodemus grasped it, Jesus could have gone on and instructed him in deeper spiritual things. Instead, Nicodemus completely misunderstands Jesus and borders on being sarcastic, saying, “Can a man enter a second time into the womb?”

Jesus ignores the sarcasm and presses forward with his teaching, referring to how the Old Testament says the dead will be raised: “The Spirit breathes where it wants to, and you hear its voice, but do not know where it comes from and where it goes; this is how it is with everyone who is born of the Spirit.” Nicodemus again did not grasp what Jesus was teaching, and said, “How are these things able to happen?” At that point Jesus openly challenges Nicodemus’ ignorance, saying, “Are you the well-known teacher and don’t know this?” Then Jesus goes on to make a sweeping statement about how in general the leaders of the Jews (“you people;” the “you” is plural in Greek) do not accept what Jesus is teaching, and he expresses some futility about teaching them deep spiritual truths: “If I told you people about earthly things and you do not believe, how will you believe if I tell you heavenly things?”

At that point, at the end of John 3:12, the conversation ends, and John 3 returns to the narrator (see commentary on John 3:13). We do not know what happened after verse 12 between Nicodemus and Jesus because the Bible is silent on the matter. We do know that Nicodemus tried to defend Jesus when the Jews wanted to arrest him (John 7:50), and he also contributed to Jesus having a proper burial (John 19:39), so what Jesus did and said obviously had a big effect on him. But did Nicodemus ever go from believing that Jesus was “sent from God” (John 3:2) to believing that he was the actual Messiah? Scripture is silent on this. Nicodemus is never mentioned after Jesus’ burial, including not being mentioned among the disciples in Acts. Thus we do not know if Nicodemus truly came to believe that Jesus is the Messiah or if he remained in his conviction that Jesus was a prophet sent from God. In fact, we will not know that until the Rapture or resurrection, when the Spirit breathes life where it wants and some of those who are dead hear the voice and get up while others remain dead in the grave, awaiting the second resurrection. Thus this record of Nicodemus, which was penned in the Acts period likely after Nicodemus was dead, contains a subtle irony. Jesus’ teaching that the Spirit breathes life where it wants to, and we do not know where it comes from or is going to, applies to Nicodemus himself. We do not know the heart of Nicodemus and whether on that Great Day the Spirit will breathe life into him or not. We certainly hope he came to believe the truth.

“by the Spirit.” In this case, “Spirit” has a capital “S” because it refers to God. The Old Testament revealed that God (also called, “the Spirit), was the one who will give birth from the dead. [See Appendix H in The Christian’s Hope, by Schoenheit.] This is not referring to the gift of holy spirit or the Christian New Birth.

3:11. “you people.” The “you” is plural in Greek, here represented by “you people.” When Jesus says, “you people,” he is specifically referring to the Jewish leaders. Although Jesus was no doubt upset by the fact that the Jews in general had not accepted him or his teaching, in this case he is most specifically speaking about those people in leadership positions among the Jews. John 3:1 told us that Nicodemus was a “ruler” of the Jews, and John 7:50 lets us know that he was a member of the Sanhedrin, the Jewish ruling council of 70 men, so Nicodemus was a very powerful man.

“are not accepting our testimony.” Although some people believed in Jesus as Messiah, the majority did not, and that was especially true of the rulers of the Jews, a point that becomes especially clear at his trial. Nicodemus, at this point in his spiritual journey, was only able to say that Jesus was from God. He did not yet see him as the Messiah, and perhaps he never did.

3:12. “earthly things.” The things that Jesus taught about, though having to do with God or having originated from God, were also related to the earth. For example, the Messiah himself, the Laws of God, and the resurrection. These things had to do with God’s relation to earth and were also part of the revelation of the Old Testament. There should have been no (or very little) debate about them. Instead, the religious world was completely perverted by tradition and wrong teaching. Yet when Jesus tried to correct the situation by his teaching and signs, the religious world stood against him and the common people were usually confused. Frankly, the same situation exists in the Christian religion today. There are so many unbiblical beliefs and traditions that someone presenting the truth is usually either scoffed at or ignored.

3:13. “And no one.” Jesus did not speak the words recorded in John 3:13 (or any of the words from verse 13 to the end of chapter 3). Jesus did not say he was in heaven while he was standing in Jerusalem speaking to Nicodemus. Jesus stops speaking at the end of verse 12, and that is where the red letters in red-letter Bibles should also stop. Verse 13 is part of the narrative of the Gospel of John, not Jesus speaking. Most of the Gospel of John is the narrative of John. John opens up with narrative, and the majority of chapter 1, and most of the rest of John, is narrative. John chapter 3 opens with narrative (“There was a man of the Pharisees...”), and that narrative continues in verse 13.

Although most people do not realize it, scholars debate what part of John chapter 3 was spoken by Jesus, and at what point the words of Jesus stop and the narration of the Gospel of John restarts. Although the best way to see this debate is by reading the commentaries and articles in theological journals, an easy way to see the debate is by comparing different versions of “red-letter Bibles;” the red letters stop at different places in different Bibles. In the ESV, NASB, and NIV84, Jesus stops speaking (and the red letters stop) at verse 21, but in the NIV (2011 edition), the red letters stop at John 3:15, and John 3:16 is in black letters and is considered part of the narrative. In contrast to those two possibilities, we agree with E. W. Bullinger and assert that Jesus stops speaking in verse 12 and the narrative starts with verse 13. The Companion Bible by Bullinger has notes that make a good case for the fact that Jesus’ speaking ends at verse 12 and John, the narrator, begins with verse 13. In fact, Bullinger lists seven different reasons for Jesus’ talking ending at verse thirteen. Verses 14 and 16 agree with this entirely (see the commentary on those verses).

Bullinger’s seven reasons are: 1) Because the past tense of the Greek verbs that follow verse twelve indicate completed events. 2) Because the expression “only begotten Son” is not used by the Lord of himself, but is used by John describing the Lord (John 1:14, 18, 3:16, 18, 1 John 4:9). 3) Because “in the name of” (3:18, using the Greek word en) is not used by the Lord, but by John (1:12; 2:23, 1 John 5:13). 4) Because to “do the truth” occurs elsewhere only in 1 John 1:6. 5) Because “who is in heaven” (v. 13) points to the fact that the Lord had already ascended at the time John wrote. 6) Because the word “lifted up” refers both to the sufferings (v. 3:14; 8:28; 12:32, 34) and to “the glory which should follow” (8:28; 12:32; Acts 2:33; 5:31). 7) Because the break at verse 13 accords best with the context, as shown by the Structure of the section.

Strong and straightforward evidence that Jesus is not speaking after verse 12 comes from just reading the verses in the Greek (and sometimes even the English) and paying attention to the verbs and the content of the verses. For example, verse 13 is very clear: “No one has ascended in to heaven...except the Son of Man.” The verb “ascended” is in the past tense in both Greek and English, and shows us that Jesus had already ascended to heaven when this verse was written. This is confirmed by the last phrase of the verse, which says that Jesus “is” in heaven. The phrase, “which is in heaven,” has all the evidence of being original, and should appear in English Bibles as it does in the King James Version (this point is covered below, under “who is in heaven”).
Orthodox scholars have come up with “explanations” of why they believe this verse says Jesus has ascended into heaven but is still on earth talking to Nicodemus, but they are contrived explanations, invented due to the commentators’ pre-conceived theology. There is no need for anything other than a straightforward reading of this verse to understand it.

The verbs in John 3:14 continue letting us know that Jesus had already ascended to heaven, and was not on earth talking to Nicodemus. Verse 14 says that “just as” Moses “lifted up” the serpent (aorist tense in Greek), even so the Son of Man “was lifted up” (also aorist tense). The tense of the verb “lifted up” is the same for both the serpent of Moses and the Son of Man. Thus, the natural reading of the text is that they both the serpent and the Son of Man were lifted up in the past. Of course, because the orthodox teaching is that John 3:14 occurred long before the crucifixion and ascension of Christ, the natural reading of the Greek text is ignored, and the past tense reading of the last verb is made to read in English as if it were future, so most English versions read that the Son of Man “will be” lifted up. As in verse 13, the natural reading of the verbs show that Jesus had already been crucified; “lifted up.”

The verbs in verse 16 continue to show that Jesus’ death is in the past, and that Jesus was not talking to Nicodemus but rather that verse 16 is the narrative of John (at this point many commentators agree, including the translators of the 2011 NIV, whose red letters stop with verse 15). The text clearly says that God “loved” the world and “gave” His Son. These things were already done, not future events. The serpent being “lifted up,” Christ’s being “lifted up,” that God “loved” the world, and that God “gave” His Son—all of these verbs in the aorist tense, and all refer to past events. This is why even the English versions say God “gave” His Son instead of “will give” him.

So how do orthodox commentators explain these past tense events, especially how God supposedly “gave” His Son long before Jesus died? R. C. H. Lenski, on many subjects a very good commentator, explains the past tense verbs this way: “This verb ‘gave’ really refers to an act that took place in the other world, where any consideration of time would be inadequate, meaning only that we are in a poor human way speaking of things beyond us.” So in other words, Lenski claims that when the Bible says God “gave” His Son before He actually “gave” him, it was because the event happened in “the other world” where time is not counted like we count time. That explanation is contrived and ignores the plain reading of the Greek. We contend that there is no need to make up such bizarre explanations of verses which can be read and understood in a simple and straightforward manner. After all, is there any other place that Jesus speaks in a way that we cannot simply understand, but have to explain by saying that Jesus spoke of a future event in the past because the act “took place in the other world”? Certainly not to our knowledge.

Beyond a plain and straightforward reading of the Greek text, which places the events after verse 12 in the past, another reason to believe that Jesus stopped speaking in verse 12, and verse 13 resumes the narrative of John, is that from verse 3 to verse 12, whenever Jesus speaks, he uses “I.” However, after verse 12, we find the third person “him” in the text. The logical reason for that shift is that from verse 13 on, the Apostle John was writing about “him.” In verse 3, Jesus is speaking and he says, “I say.” In verse 5 he says, “I say.” In verse 7 he says, “I said.” In verse 11 he says, “I say,” and in verse 12 he says, “I told” and “I tell.” In verse 13, there is a sudden shift. We no longer see “I,” we see “him,” and other references to Jesus in the third person. For example, in verse 13, the text refers to “the one” from heaven, and in verse 14, instead of saying “everyone who believes in me” (which Jesus did many times in the Gospel of John, cp. John 6:35; 7:38; 11:25, 26; and 12:44, 46), the text says, “everyone who believes in him.” When the evidence is weighed, the words from John 3:13 to the end of the chapter were not spoken by Jesus, but penned by the narrator, the Apostle John, long after Jesus’ death, resurrection, and ascension.

“who is in heaven.” This last phrase of this verse as it appears in the KJV and REV is omitted in the modern Greek texts, but its originality is still disputed. Although the modern Greek texts such as Nestle-Aland and SBL text omit the phrase, and the modern English Bibles based upon those texts omit it also, there is good reason to believe the scholars compiling those modern texts have made a mistake in this instance. The reason the modern texts omit the phrase is that it is omitted in the Egyptian texts (the Alexandrian text family). Although the Egyptian witnesses carry a lot of weight, they are not the final word on the originality of any verse. The phrase is included in the texts of every other Greek text family, and it is also in early texts other than Greek, such as the Syriac, Coptic and Armenian texts.

When a word or phrase is in some Greek manuscripts, but not in others, scholars typically use a number of tests to try to reconstruct the original text. One of those tests is, “What do the earliest texts say?” Another is, “Is there a reading which is dominant among all the various text families and the early versions that are in other languages?” A very important test is, “Which reading is the most difficult?” This is important because scribes normally took difficult readings, either difficult grammatically, or difficult to understand, and simplified them. In this verse, the “difficulty” test is very important because the early Egyptian texts omit the phrase, but from a pure “difficulty” standpoint, having the phrase as part of the verse is much more difficult than not having it. The verse reads more simply without it. Thus the evidence of the “difficulty” test, and especially combined with the fact that only Egyptian texts omit the phrase, would lead us to conclude that the phrase is original. One thing is certain: the phrase was either invented by scribes and added to the original text, or it was original and was deleted from the original text. That leads us to the question, “Are there historical factors that would make a scribe alter the text one way or the other?” We will see that there was a reason Egyptian scribes would have deleted the phrase, “who is in heaven.”

The phrase “who is in heaven” is difficult because according to Christian tradition, the words in verse 13 were spoken by Jesus when he was in Jerusalem speaking with Nicodemus (which is not correct, as we saw above). So the fact that the verse says “who is in heaven” created a huge problem. How could the Bible say Jesus was in heaven when he was on earth speaking with Nicodemus? The scribes had an easy solution to that problem: omit the difficult words. While it is easy to see why an Egyptian scribe would want to omit those words, no one has ever been able to give a reason why any scribe would want to invent those words and put them in the Bible. There just does not seem to be any good reason why an early scribe would add, “who is in heaven,” to a verse that read much more clearly without it.

While the phrase “who is in heaven,” seems out of place to the ordinary reader, this was even more true in Egypt, where huge debates about the Deity of Christ were going on, and where many scribes did not believe in the Trinity. At least the Trinitarian scribes believed that Jesus could be on earth and in heaven at the same time, so they would not have seen a need to modify the verse by omitting the phrase (R. C. H. Lenski is an example of a Trinitarian commentator who has no problem with Jesus being both in heaven and on earth at the same time: “…he is both here and is still in heaven” p. 252). But to the non-Trinitarian scribes in Egypt, it would make no sense at all that Jesus could be on earth and in heaven at the same time. Thus in Egypt, there would have been pressure to omit the difficult phrase, “who is in heaven.”

We assert that on the basis of the tests that are usually used to determine which texts are original, and from the fact that the phrase, which properly understood does make perfect sense, that the phrase is original. The non-Trinitarian scribes in Egypt removed the phrase about the Son of Man being in heaven because they misunderstood it, and they saw it as a contradiction in the text.

But if the phrase “who is in heaven” is original, does that mean the explanation is believing in the Trinity? Absolutely not. The key to understanding John 3:13 is not that Jesus was on earth and in heaven at the same time, but rather that Jesus did not speak the words recorded in John 3:13.

As we have seen in the earlier commentary entry on this verse, there is a very simple answer to why the phrase, “who is in heaven,” is in the text: Jesus was in heaven and the words were not spoken by Jesus but penned by the Apostle John as part of the narrative of the chapter. But why would the scribes, even Egyptian scribes, not have recognized that? Did the inclusion of the phrase have other implications besides the Trinity? The answer is yes, it did. Verse 13 (and also 14-21) was also traditionally ascribed to Jesus because of its implications about the state of the dead. It is well understood by theologians and Bible scholars that no one could go to heaven before Jesus died and paid for the sins of mankind. Since every human has sin, if even one person could go to heaven before Jesus died for the sins of mankind, then that would mean that people could go to heaven without having had their sins paid for, and thus Jesus did not have to die to pay for sins—the death of the Messiah became unnecessary.

But in the first century it was commonly believed that people’s souls lived on after the body died, and if the souls of righteous people, like Abraham and Sarah, could not go to heaven, where did they go? We know the Bible actually teaches that when a person dies he is dead and in the ground, awaiting the resurrection, but that truth was not solidly believed by the early church and still is not widely believed today. The Jews who were Pharisees who were getting born again and joining the early Church believed in immediate life after death, and so did the Greeks and Romans. That meant that new converts to Christianity, both Jew and Gentile, brought the belief into the Church that the soul lived on after the body died. The fact that Paul had to write about what happens when people die (1 Cor. 15) shows there was division about it even when the Apostles were still alive, and soon after the death of the Apostles belief that the soul (or spirit) continued to live on after a person died was quite firmly established as orthodoxy. Thus it was, and still is, a common belief that the souls of believers who died before the time of Jesus Christ went to a place of waiting that some theologians refer to as “Paradise,” and it is supposedly similar to Abraham’s bosom in Luke 16).

According to orthodox teaching, what happened to the righteous souls in Paradise that were awaiting Jesus’ death and resurrection? They waited in “Paradise” until Jesus ascended to heaven, at which time he took all those righteous souls with him to heaven.
We are now in a position to see how John 3:13 could cause problems for people who believed the soul lives on after death. Since John 3:13 says that “no one has ascended into heaven,” if Jesus himself spoke the words, then the doctrine of immediate life after death was not challenged and not threatened. Jesus was still on earth talking to Nicodemus, so the souls of righteous dead people were still waiting in Paradise. However, if verse 13 was the words of John the narrator and was written after Jesus had ascended to heaven, then the doctrine of immediate life after death has problems. If John penned the words, “no one has ascended up to heaven” long after Jesus ascended, then when Jesus ascended into heaven he did not take the righteous souls with him. There would be no reason for righteous souls to be in a “waiting area” after Jesus ascended, so if they did not go up to heaven with Jesus, then it is logical that the orthodox teaching that the soul lives on after the body dies is wrong, and that when people die they are actually fully dead and in the grave, awaiting the resurrection or Rapture (which we assert is the true teaching of Scripture).

In examining John 3:13, we assert that the textual evidence shows the final phrase is original: Jesus had ascended into heaven and was in heaven, but no one else was in heaven. We also assert that the textual evidence shows that Jesus did not speak the verse, but rather it is part of the narrative of the Gospel of John. That makes this verse one of many verses in the Bible that teaches that no one is in heaven. The dead are asleep until Jesus comes and raises them up at the Rapture, the First Resurrection, or the Second Resurrection (see the commentary on 1 Cor. 15:26; and Graeser, Lynn, Schoenheit, Is There Death After Life?).

3:14. “Even as Moses lifted up the serpent...the Son of Man was lifted up.” Although almost all the versions treat Jesus’ lifting up as if it is future, a quick look at the Greek text shows that, from the writer’s standpoint, it is in the past. The Greek verb “to lift up” is the same for both the serpent and the Son of Man, hupsoō (#5312 ὑψῶ), and both are in the aorist tense. The translators ignore this, believing that Jesus is the one speaking in the verse and therefore referring to his future crucifixion, but the fact is that Jesus was not saying it, John was, as part of the narration of the Gospel of John, and the crucifixion was many years in the past when John was writing. [For verse 14 not being the words of Jesus, see commentary on John 3:13, “And no one”].

3:15. “life in the Age to come.” The Greek phrase that we translate “life in the Age to come” is zōē aιώνιος (#2222 ζωή; #166 αἰώνιος). The word zōē is the noun, “life,” while aιώνιος is the adjective, “Age.” (Occasionally the phrase occurs as aιώνιος zōē, with the noun last; John 17:3; Acts 13:46, but that is the exception, and there is no difference in meaning). English Bibles usually translate the phrase zōē aιώνιος as “eternal life” or “everlasting life,” but we feel that most of the time that is not a good translation, and can even be confusing. The phrase zōē aιώνιος (“Age life”) refers to everlasting life which begins in the Messianic Age, also known as the “Millennial Kingdom” (cp. Rev. 20:1-6). [For more information on everlasting life, see Appendix 2: “Life in the Age to Come”].

3:16. “For God.” Jesus did not speak the words of this verse to Nicodemus but they are part of the narration of the Gospel of John, penned by John long after Jesus had ascended to heaven. One way we can tell this is that John 3:16 is the teaching about how to be saved after Jesus died and resurrected, not before. When Jesus told people how to be saved when he was alive, although he did tell them to believe in him, he also told them to keep the commandments. For example, he told the rich young ruler that to have everlasting life he had to keep the commandments (Matt. 19:17). More evidence that John 3:16 is part of the narration of the Gospel of John and not Jesus speaking to Nicodemus is that the verse says, “He gave His only begotten Son.” This refers to Jesus’ death as a sacrifice for the sins of mankind, and it is referred to as a past event. But God’s giving His Son was still future when Jesus spoke to Nicodemus. [For more on verse 16 not being the words of Jesus, see commentary on John 3:13, “who is in heaven”].

“so loved.” The word “so” is a translation of the Greek word houtō (#3779 οὕτω), which is an adverb, and refers to “in this way” or “this much,” depending on the context. Thus, John 3:16 can open with the phrase, “God loved the world in this way: He gave....” as the Holman Christian Standard Bible does, or it could open by saying, “This is how much God loved the world: He gave....” Both meanings are in the Greek word houtō. In this case, both meanings are accurate. Giving His Son is both the way God showed His love, and shows us how much He loved the world. The English word “so” contains elements of both “how” and “how much,” so it is a good translation of houtō.

“so that.” The Greek word hina (#2443 ἵνα), plus the verb in the subjunctive mood shows this to be a purpose-result clause (see commentary on Matt. 2:15), “resulting in...what was spoken being fulfilled.” By giving his Son, God both intended to, and His action resulted in, saving those who believe.

“will not perish.” The Greek verb apollumi (#622 ἀπόλλυμι) means “perish.” It is in the subjunctive mood, which is usually known as the mood of condition, reflecting an “if” or a possibility. This verse is an example of when translating the Greek text literally can cause problems for an English reader. The average English Bible student reads John 3:16 in most versions, and reads something like, “that whoever believes in him should not perish.” But why the word “should?” The word “should” makes it seem like if a person believes, he “should” not perish (or “may” not perish, as the NRSV, Darby, and Young’s Literal Translation say), but maybe he will perish.

The key to understanding the verse is that the subjunctive mood of the verb apollumi is due to its association with hina, “so that,” which often takes a subjective mood (see commentary on “so that” above in this verse). So the subjunctive mood in this case is due to a grammatical construction, not due to there being an “if” about our salvation. Some modern versions besides the REV, such as the HCSB and the NET, are ignoring the “literal” translation due to the confusion it causes, and translating the verse the way a Greek reader would have understood it—that if anyone believe in the Son, that person will have everlasting life.

3:17. “send the Son into the world.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

“to judge.” It was not God’s purpose or intent to send Jesus into the world to judge the world. God sent Jesus into the world to save the world. However, because of mankind’s rejection of God, Jesus will judge the world to insure that those who accept God will have a wonderful everlasting future.

3:18. “name.” See 1 John 3:23 note “on the name of his son Jesus Christ.”
3:20. “worthless.” The Greek is phaulos (#5337 φαῦλος), and means, “worthless, “good for nothing.” It is not necessarily that the works are “evil,” but just worthless. We are created to do good works (Eph. 2:10), and if we waste our lives in that which is worthless to God, there is a consequence for that.

“are exposed.” The Greek is elegchō (#1651 ἐλέγχω), and can mean “reprove, correct, convict.” Here the sense is more that the person is afraid he will be discovered, and then of course reproof would follow. The subjunctive mood of the verb comes from the preposition hina earlier in the phrase, but that does not demand a translation with “would” or “should” (cp. the KJV, “lest his deeds should be reproved”). The verb elegchō is in the aorist tense, speaking not to the fact that the discovery would be sudden or complete in one act, but rather to the fact that it would occur.

3:25. “ceremonial cleansing.” The Greek is katharismos (#2512 καθαρισμός), and it refers to “cleansing,” especially ritual or ceremonial cleansing, that is a cleansing that is ritual in nature and does not actually cleanse in and of itself. For example, baptism is a “ritual cleansing,” because no amount of washing in water will wash away sin. Yet, if God commands it, and the person obeys, then God sees the act of obedience and cleanses the person from sin.

The connection between 3:25 and 3:26 is subtle but unmistakable. A certain Jew got into an argument with John’s disciples about ceremonial cleansing, and baptism was a type of ceremonial cleansing—it did not cleanse from sin, but it represented that the person was cleansed from sin. That discussion would have raised other questions about baptism in the minds of John’s disciples and thus made the bridge into verse 26.

3:28. “can testify.” John’s point here is not that his disciples were in fact testifying that he did not claim to be the messiah, but that they could. He calls on them to be witnesses on his behalf. The Greek reads, “You all testify for me,” using the dative of advantage.

3:29. “the friend of the bridegroom.” In this context, the friend of the bridegroom is John himself. This is a general, not a specific, reference to the Eastern wedding, where the friend of the bridegroom is a true friend and is just happy that the bridegroom is so happy. John had been faithfully ministering and baptizing, but now “all” were going to Jesus (v. 26.). Was John envious? Not at all, and he illustrated his point by comparing his feelings to a common occurrence: the happiness of the friend of the bridegroom because the bridegroom was happy.

3:32. “no one.” The figure of speech, hyperbole, exaggeration, as the next verse shows (and we know Jesus had some disciples). The phrase “no one” harkens back to 3:11, that the rules did not accept Jesus’ testimony, and also states hyperbolically that the majority of the people rejected him as well. As his ministry went on, more and more people believed in him.

3:36. “life in the Age to come.” This is the everlasting life that begins with the new Messianic Age, the Millennial Kingdom. [See Appendix 2: “Life in the Age to Come”.] “life.” Here the word “life” refers to “life in the Age to Come,” which can be determined from the context. See commentary on John 5:40, Luke 10:28.

Chapter 4
4:6. “just as he was.” The Greek is houtō (#3779 oú̂tō; pronounced hoo'-toe), and it means “in this manner, thus, so, in this way.” Lenski points out that in this context it means “as he was.” As Robinson points out, the “thus” [of the KJV] refers to his weary state (Word Pictures in the New Testament). Jesus got to Jacob’s Well about noon, worn out from the trip, and sat down “just as he was,” in that tired condition, by the well, while his disciples went to town to buy food. Jesus was human, and got tired like all of us do. Yet even in his tired state he draws energy from his faith and conviction, and speaks with the woman at the well, then the Samaritans. Verses like this should provide great inspiration to us as Christians. When the Bible says that Jesus Christ loved us, and did his Father’s will, not his own, verses like these are the proof. Jesus pushed himself to love people and do the will of the Father, and we should follow his example.

“the sixth hour.” The “sixth hour” was about our noon. Both the Jews and Romans divided the day into 12 hours, starting at daylight, roughly 6 AM. [For the hours of the day and the watches of the night, see commentary on Mark 6:48].

4:10. “you would have been the one to ask.” The emphasis in the Greek is hard to reproduce in English, but it is very important to get the impact of what is being said. In both verse 9 and verse 10 the “you” is emphatic, being expressed on its own and not as part of the verb. We might get the sense by capital letters: 9So the Samaritan woman says to him, “How is it that YOU, a Jew, asks me for a drink, since I am a Samaritan woman?” (For Jews have no dealings with Samaritans.) 10Jesus answered and said to her, “If you knew the gift of God, and who is the one who is saying to you, ‘Give me to drink,’ YOU would have asked him, and he would have given you living water.”

“living water.” In Jewish terminology, “living water” is flowing water, especially water that flows from a source such as a spring or river, and is not stagnant, such as well water.

4:11. “Lord.” One of the uses of “Lord” was a title of polite address, like we today say “Sir.” This woman did not know who Jesus was at this time, but still used the polite and formal form of address.

“nothing to draw with.” Many wells of the time were just a hole in the ground, or a hole with a short wall of rocks to keep dirt from being kicked it. Each person who wanted water had a rope and bucket of some sort. The most common “buckets” were skin bags or “buckets” that would not break if they hit the sides of the well, although clay jugs were used as well, but great care had to be taken with them.

4:14. “life in the Age to come.” This is the everlasting life that begins with the new Messianic Age, the Millennial Kingdom. [See commentary on this phrase in Appendix 2: “Life in the Age to Come.”]

4:15. “come all the way here.” A brief look at how much work it took to live before modern water pumps and pipes. Just getting water to drink and cook with was hard work.

4:24. “spirit.” God is “spirit,” that is, He is an immaterial substance. The word “spirit” has many meanings. This is true in English, and also true in Hebrew (ruach = spirit) and Greek (pneuma = spirit). The Greek noun pneuma comes from the verb pneō, “to blow or breathe.” Thus, to the ancient Greeks, pneuma was “breath,” and it came to be associated with invisible things that exerted a force or power. Although pneuma is a noun, it is a “verbal noun,” (a noun that has the inherent characteristics of a verb or is grammatically related to a verb), so pneuma is always associated with the invisible power exercised by it. The word “wind” is a good example of a verbal noun, a noun that cannot be divorced from the power or force associated with it. There is no such thing as “wind” without action, even though “wind” is a noun. Similarly, pneuma is associated with its action or power. In fact a good basic definition of pneuma, “spirit,” is something invisible that exerts a force. That is why some of the things that are called “spirit” in the Greek language are: God (John 4:24); the gift of God known as holy spirit (Acts 2:38); angels (Heb. 1:14); demons (Matt. 8:55); “breath” or “life” (Luke 8:55); wind; and attitudes, thoughts, or emotions (Matt. 26:41). All of these things are invisible but exert force or power. [For more information on “spirit” and its different uses, see Appendix 6: “Usages of Spirit”.

4:26. “I…am he.” A clear indication of Christ’s love. He clearly reveals himself to this woman, whose heart is pure and simple, so that she can believe. To others he veiled his identity and had them search (cp. John 10:24-26).

4:27. “with a woman.” The Greek reads with “a woman,” not “the woman,” as some versions have. The separation between the sexes in public was such that the disciples were amazed that Jesus was speaking publicly with any woman at all.

4:28. “left her water jar.” The woman believed that Jesus was the long-awaited Messiah, so she left the mundane things of her life behind in order to share the news. Many of us would do well to do the same. How much “life” consumes our time and energy such that we cannot share the Messiah with others? The text notes that she left the water jar she was going to bring her water back to town in, but there were other things, such as her rope (which would have been very valuable) that she must have left also which are not mentioned. The point was not to give a laundry list of what she left behind. A reader familiar with biblical life, upon hearing she left the water she came for, would realize she left the other stuff as well.

4:29. “everything.” Of course Jesus did not tell the woman everything she ever did. However, it is often the effect of personal prophecy that a person feels very connected to God and the one who gives the prophecy.

4:32. “I have food to eat that you do not know about.” It was the custom that people did not usually eat and talk. Meals were customarily eaten in silence. Thus Jesus did not want to start eating when the people were coming to talk to him.

4:34. “the will of him who sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

4:35. “You have a saying.” The Greek is a question that expects an affirmative answer. The evidence is that Jesus was referring to a common saying or proverb of his time. It is not attested in the literature we have found, but that would be true of many sayings today. They are not written down much and would be easily lost. We do not have much “common literature” from the time of Christ.

The evidence is good that Jesus is not making a literal statement; that is, it was not literally four months until the literal harvest. It seems clear that he was traveling in hot weather. He was tired from the travel (4:6), and it was about noon, so it would be understandable that he was thirsty. If he was traveling in or near summer, the harvest would have already started. If he was traveling a full four months before harvest then it would have been the rainy season and much colder, and there would be plenty of water so that he would not have had to ask a Samaritan woman for some.

Sayings about things coming later or people having to wait for things are common in most societies, such as our “All things come to those who wait” (the more modern version of which is “Good things come to those who wait”). This record seems to be a case of Jesus getting his disciples to see the urgency of the times. While they may have been accustomed to having to wait for things, or not hurry to get things done, Jesus tells them that they do not have a lot of time and they cannot “just wait” for the harvest, the harvest fields are ready now, and they need to be diligent to harvest while they can. The same can be said for us today. We cannot be fooled into thinking we have lots of time to evangelize and can take our time. Our time may be short, and anyone with whom we would like to speak may not have much time either.

“Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἴδον), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

“white to harvest.” While it was true that the grains turned from green to a pale golden-white color as they were ripe to harvest, that was not what Jesus was referring to. The men of the city were coming to meet him, and their robes would have been the whitish color of the standard robe of the day.

4:47. “down.” This is literal. See commentary on John 4:49, “come down.”

4:49. “come down.” This is quite literal. Capernaum was almost 700 feet below sea level. Most people know that the Dead Sea is the lowest spot on the face of the earth. The surface of the Dead Sea is almost 1300 feet below sea level. But the Sea of Galilee is also below sea level, almost 700 feet, and Capernaum is on the shore of the Sea of Galilee.

4:52. “seventh hour.” About our 1 PM. Both the Jews and Romans divided the day into 12 hours, starting at daylight, roughly 6 AM. [For the hours of the day and the watches of the night, see commentary on Mark 6:48].

4:54. “when he had come out of Judea into Galilee.” This was not Jesus’ second sign, but his second sign in Galilee. John does not include the signs he did in Judea in this counting (cp. John 2:23).

“again.” The word again goes with “did,” Jesus “did again” signs in Galilee. He had done them in Judea. John 2:23 says he did “signs” (plural). Besides that, he demonstrated his prophetic ministry to Nicodemus (John 3) and the Samaritan woman at Jacob’s well (John 4). When Jesus did return to Galilee, the people welcomed him because they had seen the signs he did in Jerusalem at the Feast of Passover (John 4:45). This second sign in Galilee was a healing, and we can certainly assume that some of the signs in Judea were healings. Now Jesus heals “again” in Galilee as a sign of his being the Messiah.

Chapter 5

5:3. See commentary on verse 4.

5:4. The last sentence in John 5:3 (that occurs in some versions such as the King James) and John 5:4, were added to the text as an explanatory note. They were not part of the original text. There are many pieces of evidence to support the conclusion that this part of the text was not original: it is omitted in the earliest and best manuscripts; in more than twenty Greek witnesses there are markings that it was not original; it has a number of words that are not found elsewhere in John’s writings; and it has a number of variant forms in the manuscript tradition, showing that when it was added, different scribes added it differently [For more information, see Metzger, Textual Commentary].

The information that became our John 5:3, 4 likely started as a marginal note that explained what the man in our 5:7 was talking about, when he said he did not have anyone to lower him into the pool when the water was stirred. We have evidence from the Church Father Tertullian (145-220) that he knew of the tradition or belief that an angel stirred the water. At some point, the note by our 5:7 got copied into the text and became the 5:3, 4 of some of the early English versions, such as the KJV.

In the early manuscripts, which were all hand written, when a scribe would accidentally omit a word or phrase, the only way to preserve it was to write it in the margin so the next scribe could copy it back into the text. But this created a problem because sometimes the marginal commentary of the scribes got copied into manuscripts as if they were part of the original text. Thankfully today, due to the fact we now have discovered over 5,700 Greek manuscripts and we can compare them all by computer, most marginal readings (like this one in John 5:3, 4) can be decisively determined to be an addition and taken out of the modern versions.

5:10. “Jews.” This is the restricted use of the word “Jews,” referring only to the religious leaders of the Jews and those who oppose God and Christ. [For more information, see commentary on John 1:19].

“The man who had been healed.” The Greek is a substantive (an adjective used as a noun), and simply reads, “The Jews said to the healed,….” [For more on substantives, see the commentary on Matthew 5:37].

5:15. “Jews.” This is the restricted use of the word “Jews,” referring only to the religious leaders of the Jews and those who oppose God and Christ. [For more information, see commentary on John 1:19].

5:16. “Jews.” This is the restricted use of the word “Jews,” referring only to the religious leaders of the Jews and those who oppose God and Christ. [For more information, see commentary on John 1:19].

5:17. “is always working.” The verb working is in the present tense, which Lenski calls the durative present, and thus the word “always” is implied in the verb in this context, or as Neuman and Nida assert, the phrase “until now” means “always;” God has always been at work, without taking a break (cp. NIV: “My father is always at His work”). The Jews were upset with Jesus because he healed on the Sabbath. Jesus’ answer to them was short and to the point. God is always working, even on the Sabbath, and so is His Son, Jesus. That is why the Jews correctly concluded that he was making himself equal to God. Not identical with God, but equal to Him, as His Son, in the way he operated.

5:18. “Jews.” This is the restricted use of the word “Jews,” referring only to the religious leaders of the Jews and those who oppose God and Christ. [For more information, see commentary on John 1:19].

“But also was calling God his own Father, making himself equal with God.” This verse shows us that Jesus knew who he was and what he was doing. It is sometimes taught that Jesus either never claimed to be the promised Messiah, or that he only took on that role as his ministry progressed and he realized that the people thought he was the Messiah. But the truth is that Jesus knew he was the Messiah and lived his life in obedience to the will of his heavenly Father.

Some Trinitarians claim that this verse is evidence that Jesus was God, because it speaks of Jesus making himself equal with God. That is not what the verse is saying. The people in the time and culture of the Bible knew that children often carried the authority of the family. For example, the son of a king had authority. When Christ said that God was his Father, the Pharisees correctly interpreted that to mean that he had God’s authority on earth, something that Jesus was in fact saying (cp. John 5:17ff).

Actually, this verse is unsupportive of the doctrine of the Trinity. It accurately records that Jesus was saying that “God” was his father, not that he was himself God, or that he was “God the Son.” It is clear that Jesus’ authority came from the fact that he was the Son of God, not God Himself.

There are a couple fundamental ways of understanding John 5:18, and neither supports the Trinity. One is that Jesus was “equal” to the Father in a limited sense because in that culture children carried the authority of the family. The second is that it was the Jews who claimed that Jesus was making himself equal with God, and they were wrong.

Jesus could have been making himself equal to the Father in a limited sense. For example, in John 5 he spoke of people honoring the Son just as they honored the Father. Also, he spoke about dead people hearing his voice and coming up out of the graves. The concept of people being “equal” is found in several places in the Bible. For example, when Joseph was ruling Egypt under Pharaoh, Judah said to him, “You are equal to Pharaoh himself” (Gen. 44:18). Paul wrote about men who wanted to be considered “equal with us” (2 Cor. 11:12). No Christian we are aware of believes that Joseph and Pharaoh or Paul and his opponents are “of one substance,” and make up “one being” simply because they are called “equal.” We believe that John 5:18 should be handled like the others verses that mention equality. Jesus was using God’s power and authority on earth, and was thus “equal” to God in the same way Joseph, who was using Pharaoh’s authority and power, was equal to Pharaoh.

It is also possible that the Jews were claiming that Christ was saying more than he actually was saying, and that Jesus almost always emphasized that his Father was greater than he was. In fact, in the very next verse, John 5:19, Jesus says that the Son can only do what he sees the Father doing.

It is also possible that the two explanations above are both partially true: Jesus was saying he was the Son of God, which gave him some equality with God in his authority, but also the Jews, in their attempts to defame Jesus, were exaggerating what he was saying and telling people that he was claiming to have power and authority that, in fact, Jesus never claimed.

[For more discussion on this verse see, Charles Morgridge, True Believer’s Defense Against Charges Preferred by Trinitarians, 1837, p. 118; and The Racovian Catechism, in Polish 1605; in Latin 1609; in English 1818; both books are available through Spirit & Truth Fellowship International, p. 133. See also Patrick Navas, Divine Truth or Human Tradition, pp. 173-185].

5:19. “the Son is not able to do anything on his own.” This verse shows that Jesus received what he taught from his father, God. See commentary on John 8:28.
“the Son also does in the same way.” Cp. NRSV. The Greek for “likewise” is homoiōs (#3668 ὁμοίως), meaning, “likewise, so, similarly, in the same way” (BDAG). 5:20. “is a friend to.” The Greek is phileō (#5368 φιλέω). It is hard to translate the verb phileō in this context and keep the English as a verb. If we say “the Father loves the Son,” as most versions do, we lose the meaning of phileō here. We could say, the Father is friendly to the Son,” or “the Father is fond of the Son,” but these seem too weak. We meet “friendly” people all the time, but they are not friends. We could say the father “befriended” the Son, but the verb in Greek is in the present tense, and “befriended” seems to be a past action. We think “is a friend to” is the best way to carry the meaning of the Greek text into the English. For a more complete understanding of phileō, and how it is different from agapē love, see the note on John 21:15.

“so that.” Purpose-result clause. See Matthew 2:15 commentary, “resulting in…what was spoken being fulfilled.” These works are done for the purpose of marveling, and are performed with the result that people marvel.

5:23. “the Father who sent him.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

5:24. “is hearing…is believing.” Both the verbs “hearing” and “believing” are in the present tense, active voice, meaning the action is currently occurring. It is important to remember when reading the Gospels that there was no new birth with its guarantee of salvation before the Day of Pentecost; the new birth is an aspect of the Administration of Grace [For the guarantee of Christian salvation, see 1 Peter 1:23, “born again”]. In the Old Testament and Gospels a person had to maintain his faith to be saved, so the fact that the hearing and believing were a current reality is important to the proper understanding of the verse.

“him who sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

“does not come.” The verb erchomai (“does come” #2064 ἔρχομαι) is in the present tense. The Gospel of John has a constant tension between the present and the future, and that tension is well represented in this verse, since the person “has crossed over” (past tense), “does not come” (present tense), and “has” (present tense), “life in the Age to come” (which will be fully manifested in the future when the “Age to come” arrives). The person is hearing Jesus and believing in God, and according to Jesus, believing was the work that God required to have everlasting life. Jesus said, “This is the work of God: that you believe on him whom he has sent” (John 6:29). If we were to translate the verbs in John 5:24 quite literally, the verse would read something such as this: “Truly, truly, I say to you, the one who is hearing my word and is believing him who sent me has, at this time, life in the Age to come, and does not come into condemnation, but has crossed over from death into life.”

Because “the one who is hearing my word and is believing him who sent me” was believing at that time, he has everlasting life at that time too (of course, if he quits believing, his everlasting life is not guaranteed). The present/future tension in the Bible is a challenge to translators as well as believers. We have to take the time to learn what God is trying to tell us when He goes back and forth between the past, present, and future. In this case, although the Day of Judgment is future, God is continually reckoning people’s sins and their good works, so although a person’s judgment and condemnation (or exoneration) will not be fully realized until the Day of Judgment, there is a sense in which that condemnation is happening today, and the Greek communicates that sense by having “does not come” in the present tense.

In translating the verse, some versions place the emphasis on the fulfillment of the judgment, which will occur on the Day of Judgment, and therefore have that the believer “will not” be condemned (cp. HCSB; NET: NIV). Other versions more literally follow the Greek text and say the believer “does not” come under condemnation, meaning that he is not piling up sins that will be condemned on the Day of Judgment and thus he will not be condemned on that great Day (cp. ESV; NASB; NRSV).

Another thing to pay attention to in the verse is that it does not say, “believes in him who sent me,” but “believes him who sent me.” Many people believe “in” God but do not demonstrate that they believe God by doing what He says to do. By hearing and believing Jesus we are hearing and believing God. John 5:30 and 14:10 teaches us that Jesus’ words are God’s words.

5:28. “in the tombs.” This verse, among many others, clearly shows that when a person dies, he is dead in the ground. Jesus did not think, or teach, that when a person died only his body went into the ground, but his soul (or spirit) went to “heaven” or “paradise.” The people are in the tombs, and they will be resurrected to life from being dead in the ground.

5:29. “Resurrection of Life.” The “Resurrection of Life” is also called the “first resurrection” and the “Resurrection of the Righteous” (see commentary on Acts 24:15). The word “life” is sometimes used for “everlasting life” or “life in the Age to Come.” Here it is obvious when Christ says the Resurrection of Life that he is referring to the life that will last forever. Most Christians misunderstand the verses about the resurrection because they think dead people are already alive in heaven or hell. In that case, why have a resurrection? But it is tradition that the soul or spirit lives on after the death of the body. The Bible says the dead are fully dead until they are raised from the dead at the Rapture or a resurrection (see commentary on 1 Corinthians 15:29, “death”).

“worthless.” The Greek is phaulos (#5337 φαῦλος), and means, worthless, good for nothing. It is not necessarily that the works are “evil,” but just worthless. We are created to do good works (Eph. 2:10), and if we waste our lives in that which is worthless to God, there is a consequence for that.

5:30. “am not able to do anything on my own.” This verse shows that Jesus received what he taught from his father, God. See commentary on John 8:28.

“the will of him who sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

5:36. “that the Father sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts.
For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

5:37. “the Father that sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

“nor seen his form.” This verse, and there are many others like it, is a problem for Christians who have been taught that no one has ever seen God. Actually, God does come into concretion in a human form that we (and angels) can see and understand. He does this so that He can better relate to His creation. God created mankind so He could intimately fellowship with us, so it is reasonable that He occasionally becomes visible and takes on human form to be intimate with His creation. This also fits with Genesis saying that God created us in His image. There are Old Testament verses in which Yahweh appears in the form of a man, and those appearances continue in the New Testament. Scripture records a number of people to whom God appeared: Adam and Eve (they heard His footsteps, Gen. 3:8), Abraham (Gen. 12:7; 15:1; 17:1;18:1), Jacob (Gen. 28:13), Moses and the elders of Israel (Exod. 24:9-11), Samuel (1 Sam. 3:10), Solomon (two times: 1 Kings 3:5; 9:2; 11:5), Micaiah (1 Kings 22:19-22), Isaiah (Isa. 6:1-5), Ezekiel (Ezek. 1:26-28), Amos (Amos 7:7), Daniel (Dan. 7:9-14), Stephen (Acts 7:56) and the Apostle John (Rev. 5:1-8). In contrast to many great men and women of God who saw God in a visible form, Jesus upbraided the unbelieving Jews by saying: “You have never heard his voice at any time, nor seen his form” (John 5:37). For more on God taking on human form, see the commentary on Acts 7:55.

5:38. “him who he sent.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

5:39. “life in the Age to come.” This is the everlasting life that begins with the new Messianic Age, the Millennial Kingdom. [See commentary on this phrase in Appendix 2: “Life in the Age to Come”].

5:47. “since.” The Greek word “if” often has the meaning, “since.”

---

6:4. [the Passover]. There is excellent contextual and ancillary evidence that the words, “the Passover” were not in the original text, even though they are in the Greek texts that we have today. See Walter Cummins, The Acceptable Year of the Lord, p. 65-73.

6:9. “young boy here who has.” The fact that the boy had so much when other people had nothing suggests that he was an enterprising young man who brought bread and fish to sell to the crowd that was following Jesus. If so, Jesus would have paid for the food and then given it to the multitude.

6:10. “sit.” The Greek word literally means “recline,” anapiptô (#377 ἀναπίπτω). The Jews of this period followed the Greek custom of reclining, or leaning on one’s side to eat. Here Jesus commands the disciples to have the people recline, which, functionally, would mean get ready to eat. Contrary to popular artistic renditions, Jesus himself and the disciples were reclining at the Last Supper (Luke 22:14; John 13:12).

6:14. “the prophet.” The crowd was referring to the prophet that Moses said would come (Deut. 18:15). There has been much scholarly discussion about who the Jews thought this prophet was. Likely the designation “prophet” is used here because that is the bottom line truth that everyone agreed on—that this man was the prophet of Deuteronomy 18:15. Beyond that, it seems clear from what we know of the Jews in that time period and area (Galilee; the home base of most of the Pharisees, there was more influence of the Sadducees around Jerusalem) that some of them believed “the prophet” was the Messiah himself, some believed the prophet was a forerunner to the Messiah and distinct from the Messiah (cp. 1:20, 21), and some likely believed that the man who started as the prophet may have become the Messiah (F. L. Godet; Commentary on John’s Gospel).

The sad truth in this record is that the people did not want the Messiah who actually stood before them and was calling for humility and self-sacrifice. They wanted the Messiah they had projected in their minds, one who would meet their selfish needs and deliver them from oppression. We learn from this very chapter that as soon as Jesus stopped “entertaining” the people with signs and miracles (which actually demonstrated who he was) and called for their commitment and sacrifice, “many of his disciples turned back and no longer followed him” (v. 66). Followers of Christ should make no mistake; we are to be prepared to turn away from worldly attractions and become broken bread for people, even as Jesus poured out his life for us as a sacrifice and an example.

6:15. “Therefore, when.” There is much detail left out of this part of John that is important to understanding the record. See commentary on Mark 6:45.

6:17. “to Capernaum.” Jesus and his apostles actually landed in “Gennesaret” (Matt. 14:34; Mark 6:53). The Gospel of John says that they sailed “to Capernaum.” It is likely that Jesus planned to go to Capernaum shortly, but landed at Gennesaret and healed people there, then made the short walk to Capernaum, where he was when the people found him (John 6:24). For more information, see the note on Matthew 14:34.

6:21. “and immediately the boat was at the land where they were going.” Several times the Bible records that God miraculously moved people from one place to another, and this is one of those times. Another was when God moved Phillip to Azotus (cp. Acts 8:39).

6:29. “in him who he has sent.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

6:33. “life.” Here the word “life” refers primarily to “life in the Age to Come,” which we can tell by reading the context (see commentary on John 5:40). However, it also has overtones of “life” now, life that is real life. Jesus came so that our lives now would be rich and meaningful, and also so that we would have everlasting life.
6:35. “bread of life.” This is primarily a genitive of production, i.e., “the bread that produces [and sustains] life.” See commentary on John 6:48.

“Whoever comes to me will never ever hunger, and whoever believes in me.” The verbs “comes” and “believes” are singular. Trust in God is an individual matter. No one has trust in God or gets saved as a member of a group. Each person must decide on his or her own.

6:37. “All those whom the Father gives me will come to me.” The ones that God “gives” to Jesus are the ones He “draws” to Jesus (see commentary, John 6:44). God “draws” people and gives to them as they respond to Him and come closer and closer to Him. The Father does not “give” people to Jesus apart from their freewill, or make choices for people that they are then forced to follow. A simple reading of the majority of the Bible shows this. God is constantly commanding people to do things that they do not do. That alone shows people’s freewill.

There are Christians who believe that people have freewill, but due to their sin nature they cannot make a truly godly choice, such as for salvation, so it is freewill, but in effect only the freewill to choose between different evils (this was the position of John Calvin and is the accepted position of the Reformed Churches). These Christian teach that in order for a person to make a truly godly choice they need God’s intervention and mercy. However, that belief does not fit with what Scripture says about the nature of God, who is universally loving and merciful.

It is very common in the Bible that God gets angry with people who are disobedient or defiant, and that includes both believers and unbelievers (cp. Exod. 4:14; Num. 11:1; 12:9; 32:13; Deut. 29:20; Judg. 2:14; 2 Sam. 6:7; 1 Kings 11:9; 15:30; 2 Chron. 25:15). This anger is genuine, not “faked” in some way, or disingenuous. God is genuinely disappointed in people and angry with them if they disobey or defy Him specifically because people have the ability to choose to obey or disobey Him. However, if the Reformed believers are correct, then God not only knew the people would disobey Him, He actually contributed to their disobedience by not giving them the mercy to make a good decision. But that is simply not the way the text reads. If God keeps people from obeying, then is angry when they do not obey, then God is not “loving” in any usual sense of word, and would really be quite irrational. In fact, if a human were to behave that way, psychologists and sociologists would label them irrational at best and perhaps even sociopathic. It is important that we take to heart that the descriptions of God, such as that He is loving, righteous, just, good, etc., and take those words in the common way they are used in our speech, and not think that they have some kind of “special meaning.” Otherwise, how are we to understand the command to “be imitators of God” (Eph. 5:1). If we are going to imitate God, then we have to be truly loving, giving, good, righteous, etc., and God does too.

6:38. “I have come down from heaven.” Jesus said that he came from heaven, meaning that He came from God; God was his source. The Jews would not have taken Christ’s words to mean that he “incarnated” or was somehow God. It was a common use of language for them to say that something “came from heaven” if God were its source.

James 1:17 is a good example about things coming down from God. Is says that every good gift is “from above” and “comes down” from God. What James means is clear. God is the Author and source of the good things in our lives. God works behind the scenes to provide what we need. The verse does not mean that the good things in our lives come directly down from heaven. We use the same language today. Many Christians say “the Lord” blessed them when they receive a blessing by way other people but realize that the ultimate source of the blessings was the Lord. Some people even use the phrase “blessings from heaven,” just meaning that God ultimately somehow was behind the blessings that were given. Jesus’ words should be understood the same way we understand James’ words—that God is the source of Jesus Christ, which He was. Christ was God’s plan for the salvation of mankind, and God directly fathered Jesus. The fact that Jesus said he came down from God does not make him God, as some Trinitarians claim.

It was common to speak of things coming from heaven when what was meant was only that God was the ultimate source. When God wanted to tell the people that He would bless them if they gave their tithes, He told them that He would open the windows of “heaven” and pour out a blessing (Mal. 3:10). Of course, everyone understood the idiom being used, and no one believed that God would literally pour things out of heaven. They knew that the phrase meant that God was the origin of the blessings they received. So, for example, one way God would “pour blessings out of heaven” was to give the rain and sun so the crops were abundant. Still another example is when Christ was speaking and said, “John’s baptism—where did it come from? Was it from heaven or from men?” (Matt. 21:25). Of course, the way that John’s baptism would have been “from heaven” was if God was the source of the revelation. John did not get the idea on his own, it came “from heaven.” The record about John’s baptism makes the idiom about heaven clear: things could be “from heaven,” i.e., from God, or they could be “from men.” The idiom is the same when used of Jesus. Jesus is “from God,” “from heaven” or “from above” in the sense that God is his Father and thus his origin. [For discussion on a related point, that God “sent” Jesus, see commentary on John 6:57].

“not to do my own will.” This verse shows that Jesus received what he taught from his father, God. See commentary on John 8:28.

“the will of him who sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

6:39. “the will of him who sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

“them.” The Greek word is autos (#846 αὐτός), and it is singular, which is why literal versions such as the KJV have “it.” However, in this context it is clear that the Greek is what grammarians call a “collective singular,” where the singular is used but it stands for a group (D. A. Carson, The Gospel According to John; and NET First Edition text note). We have collective singulars in English in words like “deer” or “fish,” but do not use “it” that way. So bringing the autos literally into English as “it” is actually unhelpful, because whereas the collective singular “it” would not confuse a native Greek reader, it is confusing in English. The subject is the people, the “them,” who will be raised from the dead.

This verse contains the figure of speech anacoluthon (cp. Lenski), which is why it reads in such a choppy fashion.
6:40. “sees…believes.” The verbs are singular. See commentary on John 6:35.

6:44. “No one is able to come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him.” This verse is sometimes used to prove the theory of predestination or to assert that God chooses those who will be saved and those who will not. However, if we examine the verse in its context and in light of the whole scope of Scripture, we will see that this verse is not speaking of predestination, but is referring to God’s constant efforts to help and bless people, and to bring them to Himself. In fact, instead of being a verse supporting predestination, when it is properly understood, this verse and the verses around it are a testimony to the freewill of man and that we humans ultimately decide whether or not we will believe and obey God, and thus determine our own eternal fate.

In the context, the Jews had been grumbling about the claims Jesus was making about himself (v. 41, 42). God was trying to draw even those hard-hearted Jews to Himself, but they were suspicious and spiritually blind. Their hardheartedness was what was keeping them from properly seeing the great miracles that Jesus was doing and then concluding that he was a prophet of God and perhaps even the Messiah. They should have been at least convinced by Jesus’ miracles that he was a prophet of God; after all, many common people had made that connection, and these leaders should have been much more educated about the Law and the actions of a prophet than the common people. A few chapters earlier, the Pharisee named Nicodemus properly concluded: “...you are a teacher who has come from God, for no one is able to do these signs that you do unless God is with him” (John 3:2). However, unlike the humble and pure-hearted Nicodemus, these Jews in John 6 were fighting against God, who was actively working in Jesus’ life by signs and miracles to demonstrate that he was the Messiah. All this is made plain in the next verse (v. 45), which Jesus quoted to show what he meant when he said that no one could come to him without the Father drawing him.

In John 6:45, Jesus quoted Isaiah 54:13 and explained its implications. Jesus quoted the phrase, “They will all be taught of God,” which shows that God is trying to reach, and teach, everyone. No one is excluded from our loving heavenly Father’s attempts to touch their hearts and teach them truth. However, not everyone listens to God. The Pharisees, for example, rejected God’s plan for them when they refused to be baptized by John (Luke 7:30). In fact, most of the Jews did not submit to God’s will when it came to faith in Christ (Rom. 10:3). Jesus quoted Isaiah 54:13 to show that God was attempting to teach everyone, then he further explained that “Everyone who has heard from the Father, and has learned, comes to me.” Thus he made the point that God is always trying to teach everyone, but some people close their ears (Ps. 58:3-5; Ezek. 12:12; Zech. 7:11; Matt. 13:15; Acts 7:51; 28:27; 2 Tim. 4:4) and harden their hearts (Zech. 7:12; Heb. 3:8, 15; 4:7). Thus, these prideful people did not learn from God, and were not drawn to Jesus Christ. But the people who are humble and hear God’s voice and pay attention to it and follow it, come to Jesus as a result. Their coming is their own choice, but they come because God is constantly trying to draw them to Himself. Again, Isaiah 54:13 and other verses make the point that God’s will is that everyone come to Him (cp. 1 Tim. 2:4). That these Jews did not believe in Jesus due to their failure to listen to God was their choice and their problem, not God’s.

It is important to notice that at no time in the discourse did Jesus excuse the Jews, as if their attitude towards him was not their fault. Of course, if the doctrine of predestination is true, then somewhere in Jesus’ dialogue with these Jews we would have expected Jesus to have some pity on these unbelievers, realizing that they could not believe unless God helped them believe, and so unbelief was not their fault. However, he never said, or implied, anything like that. In studying the doctrine of predestination, we must realize that at all through the Bible, Jesus, and the other writers as well, when addressing unbelievers, always laid the blame for the unbelief on the unbelievers themselves, never on God. But if the doctrine of predestination is correct, the basic unbelief of unbelievers is always God’s “fault,” never theirs. That is because according to the doctrine of predestination, if God does not specifically move a person to believe, that person will remain in unbelief. In fact, when there were some in the audience who did not believe, (v. 64), and some disciples who went away (v. 66), Jesus turned to his disciples and asked, “Do you want to go away as well?” (v. 67). The fact he asked them if they “wanted” to go away shows that he was respecting their choice to stay with him as a disciple, or leave him. Belief or unbelief; it is our choice, not God’s.

“the Father who sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

6:45. Quoted from Isaiah 54:13. See commentary on John 6:44.

6:47. “whoever believes.” The noun and verb are singular. See commentary on John 6:35.

“life in the Age to come.” This is the everlasting life that begins with the new Messianic Age, the Millennial Kingdom. [See commentary on this phrase in Appendix 2: “Life in the Age to Come”].

6:48. “I am the bread of life.” This verse is a metaphor. The phrase, “bread of life” is primarily a genitive of production, i.e., “the bread that produces [and sustains] life.”

A paraphrased translation could read, “I am the bread that gives life.” Our regular bread, and even the manna God gave in the desert, only sustained life. In contrast, Jesus is the bread that truly gives life. Jesus contrasted himself with manna in verse 58, and pointed out that the people who ate it were dead. Only Jesus Christ can truly give life, everlasting life.

Using the metaphor, “I am the bread that gives life,” and comparing himself to bread, should have been clear to his audience. The word “bread” is αρτός (#740 ἄρτος), and it is used primarily of bread, but because bread was the most important food, it was also used of food in general (a synecdoche of the part for the whole). Everyone knows that bread, food, is essential to life, so when Jesus said he was the bread of life, they should have known that he was saying that it was he, not literal bread, that was essential if someone was going to have everlasting life.

6:51. “I am the living bread.” Jesus repeats the metaphor he had used in verse 48 (see commentary there), but added the word “living.” Christ does not abandon the metaphor of bread, but now expands it, because bread sustains our life but is dead; it is not a living thing. In contrast, Jesus will give us life and is himself living. He continues the figurative comparison of himself to bread when he says that the bread he will give is his flesh, that he will give for the life of the world.

As we saw in the metaphor he used at the Last Supper (“This is my body which is broken for you”), in this context also, Jesus lets us know that his flesh will be broken for us, and that he will give it “for the life of the world.” This phrase is loaded with meaning. The word “for” is the Greek word huper (#5228 ὑπέρ), meaning, “on behalf of, in place of, instead of.” The word “world” is a metonymy for the people of the world. The essence of the phrase is that Christ would give his life on behalf of the people of the world, so they could have life.

By referring to himself as bread, Jesus sets up a scenario in which he can use the metaphor of being bread in combination with the common idiom and understanding that to “eat” something was to fully partake of it (see commentary on verse 54).

6:53. “eat the flesh...drink his blood.” See commentary on verse 54.

“life.” Here the word “life” refers primarily to “life in the Age to Come,” which we can tell by reading the next verse, John 6:54. However, it also has overtones of “life” now, life that is real life. Jesus came so that our lives now would be rich and meaningful, and also so that we would have everlasting life (see commentary on John 5:40).

6:54. “The one who eats my flesh and drinks my blood.” Jesus had already referred to himself as bread (see commentary on verse 48, 51). Now when Jesus spoke of eating his flesh and drinking his blood, he was using idioms that were common enough in his day that they should have understood him. Nevertheless, people did not understand, not because they did not understand the idiom, but because they did not believe Jesus was the Messiah, or that being committed to him was the way to everlasting life. Therefore, when he spoke of eating his flesh and drinking his blood, they were confused. Eating and drinking were common activities that required personal involvement, so it is easy to see why they became idioms for involvement and commitment. For example, Jeremiah 15:16 (KJV) says, “Thy words were found, and I did eat them; and thy word was unto me the joy and rejoicing of mine heart.” By saying he ate the Word, Jeremiah portrays his enjoyment of it and commitment to it. Of course, the idiom “eat” can be used in a destructive sense too, such as when Psalm 53:4 (ESV) says evildoers “eat up” God’s people like bread (cp. Micah 3:3). To eat the bread of sorrow (Ps. 127:2 KJV) is to have or receive sorrow. To eat the fruit of your way (Prov. 1:31) is to receive consequences for your actions (cp. Isa. 3:10).

The word “drink” was also used idiomatically for involvement. Proverbs 4:17 says the wicked will drink the wine of violence, meaning they will be committed to violence and be intoxicated by it. Jeremiah 2:18 has a great example of using “drink” to show commitment. God asks the “house of Jacob” (Jer. 2:4), “And now what do you gain by going to Egypt to drink the waters of the Nile? Or what do you gain by going to Assyria to drink the waters of the Euphrates?” No one would travel from Israel to Egypt or Assyria just to drink from their rivers. God is reproving His people from going to those pagan lands to “drink,” i.e., be committed to, their pagan ways. Job 21:20 speaks of drinking the wrath of God in the sense of being involved with it, i.e., receiving it (cp. Ps. 75:8; Isa. 51:22; Jer. 9:15; 25:15-17; 49:12; Ezek. 23:32). Psalm 36:8 speaks of godly people who drink of the river of God’s delights. 1 Corinthians 12:13 says that Christians have been made to “drink” of the spirit of God; we have received it and are involved with it in our daily activities. Eating and drinking are also used idiomatically in English to describe mental activities. If someone really liked something, we say he “ate it up.” If someone believes something without properly thinking it over, we say he “swallowed it,” or “swallowed it whole.” If we have learned something, but have not had time to fully comprehend it, we say we “have not digested it yet.”

By asking people to eat his flesh and drink his blood, Jesus was asking people to be committed to him, and the response of the people is telling. They said Jesus’ words were hard, many disciples turned from him (John 6:60, 66).

6:57. “the living Father sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. That God sent Jesus into the world can have a couple different nuances. For one thing, Jesus is the “last Adam” (1 Cor. 15:45), and just as God created Adam, so God created Jesus by Fathering him in Mary. Thus, God’s sending Jesus can refer to his conception and birth, and then subsequent ministry to save mankind, or it can simply refer to the much later event of God sending Jesus to fulfill his ministry to be the savior of mankind. That latter meaning, for example, is what John 17:18 (NET) means when Jesus prayed to God and said: “Just as you sent me into the world, so I sent them into the world.” Jesus commissioned his apostles and sent them out just as God had commissioned him and sent him out.

There are Trinitarians who insist that because God “sent” Jesus, Jesus must be God. But that is reading far too much into the simple concept of being “sent.” The idea that something has been “sent” by God was commonly used and simply means that God is the ultimate source, or “sender,” of what was sent. There is no reason to believe that Jesus’ being sent by God makes him God—nothing else that is “sent” by God is God. The phrase just means what it says, that God sent Jesus. The Bible has dozens of examples of things being sent by God, all meaning that God was the source. God sent bad weather on Egypt (Exod. 9:23), fiery serpents upon the Israelites (Num. 21:6), Moses (Deut. 34:11), prophets (Judges 6:8), and many more people and things. John the Baptist was a man “sent from God” (John 1:6). The words of John the Baptist about being sent are very clear and, if taken the same way some Trinitarians take Jesus being “sent” by God, would make John God too. John said, “I am not the Messiah, but I’ve been sent ahead of Him” (John 3:27 HCSB). We all know that what John meant by “I’ve been sent ahead of him” simply means that God commissioned John at a time that preceded the Messiah. But if someone already believed John to somehow be a fourth member of the Godhead, then what John said could be used as evidence supporting that belief. The point is that the only reason someone would say that Jesus’ being “sent” by God meant that he was God or was pre-existent in heaven would be if he already held that belief. The words themselves do not say or mean that.
Actually, the fact that God, or the Father, “sent” Jesus proves that Jesus is not part of the Trinity: co-equal and co-eternal with God. Jesus made it clear that the one who “sends” is greater than the one “sent.” In John 13:16 he said, “A servant is not greater than his lord, neither is one who is sent greater than the one who sent him.” Then he made that very clear when he said in the very next chapter, “My Father is greater than I” (John 14:28).

The culture of that day made it clear that the “lord” was greater than the servant, and the one who sends someone is greater than the one who is sent. Thus, by Jesus’ own standards, the fact that he says he was “sent” by God shows that although he is the Son of God, he was still a servant to God, his Father. And that is exactly how the early Christians related to Jesus: as their lord, but God’s Son and God’s servant. For example, they prayed in Acts that Jesus was God’s “Servant” (cp. Acts 3:13; 4:27, 30; also, see commentary on Acts 3:13).

Another piece of evidence that Jesus’ being sent by God does not make him God and “co-equal” with the Father is that the Bible never says Jesus “sent” God (or “the Father”) to do anything. If the Bible says more than forty times that God sent Jesus, and both Jesus and the Father are God and co-equal, why does the Bible never say Jesus sent the Father to do anything? The answer is simple and clear from Jesus’ own mouth: the one who sends is greater than the one who is sent. Jesus is not God, and the fact that he says he was sent by God proves it.

6:62. This verse does not refer to the ascension but to Jesus Christ’s resurrection from the dead. See One God & One Lord.

6:64. “(For Jesus knew from the beginning who they were who did not believe, and who it was who would betray him).” This verse shows the great love and patience of Jesus, because even though he knew who would betray him, he knew people have freewill and can change if they want to. Some Trinitarians claim this verse proves that Jesus was God just because the word “beginning” is in the verse. Nothing could be further from the truth. Even a cursory word study will show that the word “beginning” has to be defined by its context. Any good lexicon will show that the word “beginning” is often used to describe times other than the start of creation. Examples abound: God made them male and female at the “beginning,” not of creation, but of the human race (Matt. 19:4). There were “eyewitnesses” at the “beginning,” not of creation, but of the life and ministry of Christ (Luke 1:2). The disciples were with Christ from the “beginning,” not of creation, but of his public ministry (John 15:27). The gift of holy spirit came on Peter and the apostles “at the beginning,” not of creation, but of the Church Administration that started on the Day of Pentecost in Acts 2 (Acts 11:15). John 6:64 is simply saying that Christ knew from the time he began to choose the Apostles which one would betray him.

When this verse is understood in its context, it is a powerful testimony of how closely Jesus walked with his Father. First, there is nothing in the context that would in any way indicate that the word “beginning” refers to the beginning of time. Jesus had just fed the five thousand, and they said, “Surely this is the Prophet who is to come into the world” (6:14). Right away that tells you that the people did not think Jesus was God, but a prophet. The people wanted to make Jesus king, but only because he filled their stomachs (6:15, 26). When he challenged them to believe in him (6:29), they grumbled (6:41). As Jesus continued to teach, the Jews began to argue among themselves (6:52), and even some of Jesus’ disciples began to grumble at the commitment Jesus was asking from them (6:60, 61). Jesus, knowing his disciples were upset with his teaching, did not back off, but rather pressed on, even saying that he knew some would not believe (6:64). The result of this discussion was that some of his disciples left him (6:66). It is telling that the disciples left him at a time when Jesus was asking for their personal commitment. The fact is, and always has been, that some believers are more than happy to hang around as long as you do not ask much of them, but when they are required to give much of themselves, then they leave. Jesus taught that in the Parable of the Sower, when he said that some believers leave as soon as persecution arises. [For more on this verse not supporting the Trinity, see Don Snedeker, Our Heavenly Father Has No Equals, p. 215].

6:65. “no one is able to come to me, unless it is given to him by the Father.” This is a restatement, in different words, of verse 44, and a reflection of verse 37 (see commentary on John 6:37 and 6:44). God is always trying to draw people to Him. We can understand why God has to draw people to Him in order for them to come to Him. Of course, He cannot, and does not, act against a person’s free will, but when they want to come to Him, they need His help. For one thing, God is spirit. He is invisible and immaterial, so people who come to Him have to get some guidance as to how to do it. For another thing, people who believe and strive to live godly lifestyles are fighting against their sin nature, which is pushing them toward selfishness and a self-centered lifestyle. People can become selfless and God-centered in their lives, but it takes a diligent effort and some help from God. Thirdly, there is the spiritual battle that we need help from God to fight. The Adversary is always trying to steal, kill, and destroy (John 10:10), to oppress and ensnare people (Acts 10:38; 1 Tim. 2:26), and pervert the ways of God (Acts 13:10). Since the Adversary is constantly working behind the scenes to keep people from God, God has to be constantly working behind the scenes to make a way for people who want to come to Him to do so. With all that is working against people being godly, if God were not working to bring people to Him, they could not come, which is why it makes perfect sense for Jesus to say, “no one is able to come to me, unless it is given to him by the Father.”

By saying what he said, Jesus was trying to highlight the spiritual truth that since God is always working to draw people to Himself, if people are not coming to God, it is due to decisions they themselves are making. This was the point of the Parable of the Sower (Matt. 13:1-23; Mark 4:1-20; Luke 8:4-15). God is always sowing His word into every person’s heart, but not every person receives it the same way. As the parable points out, some people do not hold the Word in their minds very long and so the Devil takes it from them. Some people abandon the Word due to trouble or persecution, and some ignore it and instead focus on this world and what it has to offer. Only some people make decisions that allow the Word to grow and produce fruit in their lives. But nevertheless, God is sowing into every heart. In the Parable of the Sower, it is never hinted or stated that people do not choose the Word because that is the choice God made for them, or the people who do choose the Word do so because that is the choice God made for them. The simple fact is that most people are selfish, and they want to be that way. They harden their hearts and close their eyes and ears to the things of God (Matt. 13:15). Jesus made that clear in John chapter three. He said, “people loved the darkness rather than the light, for their works were evil. For everyone who makes a practice of doing worthless things hates the light, and does not come to the light, lest his works should be exposed.” (John 3:19, 20).

6:68. “words of life.” The possibilities for understanding this genitive are multiple. The genitive of relation would make the phrase, “words relating to life,” or “words about life.” Also, the genitive of production would make the expression say, words that produce, or lead to, life in the Age to come. This record is associated with the feeding of the 5,000, which is Matthew 14, and before Peter declared that Jesus was the Christ (Matt. 16). So although Peter may not have been certain Jesus was the Messiah at this time, he still knew that Jesus had the words that were about, and led to, life in the Age to come.

6:70. “a Slanderer.” “Slanderer” is a name for the Devil. The Greek is diabolos (#1228 διαβόλος). The Greek word diabolos means “slanderer,” the one who slanders others, and that is a primary characteristic of the Devil. Jesus was using a name for the Devil to import that meaning into the text. [For information on the names of the Devil, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”].

Chapter 7

7:1. “Jews.” This is the restricted use of the word “Jews,” referring only to the religious leaders of the Jews and those who oppose God and Christ. [For more information, see commentary on John 1:19].

7:5. “for not even his brothers believed in him.” Jesus’ brothers were James, Joseph, Simon, and Judas (Matthew 13:55). It is an amazing truth that Jesus’ own brothers did not believe he was the Messiah, and there is no evidence that any of them did until after his resurrection (cp. Acts 1:14; 15:13; 1 Cor. 15:7). In fact, it is possible that one of the reasons for Jesus going to Galilee after his resurrection was to see his family. We know Jesus went to Galilee after his resurrection, and met with many people there, apparently including one meeting in which were more than 500 people (cp. Matt. 28:7, 10; Mark 14:28; John 21:1; 1 Cor. 15:6. It is assumed that the meeting with more than 500 took place in Galilee because on the Day of Pentecost, only about a month later, there were only 120 disciples gathered in Jerusalem. In contrast, it seems that Jesus could have gathered more than 500 in Galilee).

Taking care of one’s family is a very important part of a person’s walk with God, and it certainly would fit with the example that Jesus set for us that he would go to Galilee in part to convince his family that he was indeed the risen Christ, and in convincing them assure them of having everlasting life.

One of the reasons we know that none of Jesus’ brothers believed that he was the Messiah until after his resurrection was at the crucifixion Jesus told the Apostle John to take care of Mary his mother, and he told Mary that John would take care of her (he did this by saying to John, “Look! Your mother.”) Jesus would have only done this if Joseph, Mary’s husband and Jesus’ step-father, was dead, and if none of Jesus’ brothers were considered to be an appropriate caretaker to Mary. Since Mary was a believer of great faith, it would not have been in her best interest to be taken care of by her children who did not even believe their brother was the Messiah she claimed him to be. Their consistent refusal to believe that Jesus was the Messiah in spite of what he and Mary no doubt did to try to convince them would have made them inappropriate caretakers for Mary [For more on this, see commentary on John 19:27].

At some point after the resurrection, at least some of Jesus’ brothers came to believe. In fact, Jesus’ brother James rose to lead the Church in Jerusalem after Herod Agrippa executed the Apostle James who was the son of Zebedee and brother of John (Acts 12:2). Although history is silent as to how Jesus’ brother James came to lead the Church, it is clear that he did. He first appears in a leadership role in Acts 12:17, then can be seen to be the leader by Acts 15:13. He is also the writer of the Epistle of James. Another brother of Jesus, Judas, also became a leader in the Church and wrote the Epistle of Jude.

7:6. “right time.” The Greek word is kairos (#2540 καιρός), here meaning the right or proper time. Jesus had a mission from God, and a “right time” to go to Jerusalem. Nyland (The Source New Testament), catches the meaning in her translation: “It isn’t the right time for me yet—but for you, any time is right!”

The context is not just about going to Jerusalem. Jesus’ brothers were urging him to show himself to the world. In saying that it was not the “right time” to go to Jerusalem, Jesus was saying that now was not the right time to go to Jerusalem and reveal himself. He knew he would go later, and when he did, it was in secret (7:10). Nevertheless, when Jesus did get to the feast of Tabernacles, he did reveal himself to those with eyes to see and ears to hear. He made many bold statements, saying he was the light of the world and “unless you believe that I am the one, you will die in your sins” (John 8:24).

When he told his brothers that the “right time” for them was always here, he was saying that because his brothers did not have a mission from God, and because his brothers were still “of the world” (his brothers did not yet believe in him; 7:5), for them the “right time” to go to Jerusalem was any time. It made no difference to the world who they were.

7:8. “I am not going up to this feast because my time is not yet fully come.” Jesus said he was not going up to the feast, but then he went. There is an apparent contradiction here, which is solved by understanding the subject being discussed. The brothers wanted him to go up to the feast to make him known as the Messiah because they did not believe in him (v. 5). He was going, but not as they asked, i.e., to make himself known as Messiah.

7:10. “as if.” There is a textual debate surrounding the originality of the particle hos (#5613 ὡς) in this verse. Hos means “like,” “as,” or “as though.” Some translations such as the NASB keep it in the text, “He Himself also went up, not publicly, but as if, in secret” (emphasis added); others leave it out: “he went also, not publicly, but in secret” (NIV). The textual sources that include the “as if” are better, but the transcriptional probability of hos being added is also very likely; the evidence is divided (Metzger, Textual Commentary). We believe the particle is original, however. It is not that Christ went to feast in secret, but his late arrival at the feast was as though he came in secret; that is, everyone else had already arrived and he came in like one who would come in secretly. The hos softens the meaning. After the roads had cleared, Jesus came so as not to make a show of himself to the world as his brothers would have liked (vv. 3-8).
7:11. “Jews.” This is the restricted use of the word “Jews,” referring only to the religious leaders of the Jews and those who oppose God and Christ. [For more information, see commentary on John 1:19].

7:13. “Jews.” This is the restricted use of the word “Jews,” referring only to the religious leaders of the Jews and those who oppose God and Christ. [For more information, see commentary on John 1:19].

7:15. “Jews.” This is the restricted use of the word “Jews,” referring only to the religious leaders of the Jews and those who oppose God and Christ. [For more information, see commentary on John 1:19].

7:16. “My teaching is not mine, but his that sent me.” This verse shows that Jesus received what he taught from his father, God. See commentary on John 8:28.

“that sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

7:18. “of one who sent him.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

7:28. “on my own.” Greek is ap’ emautou, literally, “from myself.” The word ap’ is a contracted form of the preposition apo (#575 ἀπό), which in this case indicates the idea of agency [see Appendix 11: “Greek Prepositions”]. Jesus is saying he does not stand as his own representative; he is not an agent, as it were, sent from himself, but rather it was the father who sent him. To communicate this denial of self-agency, the NET translation reads, “on my own initiative,” and that is the general idea of the verse, but we thought just saying, “on my own” communicated well.

“he who sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

7:29. “he sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

7:33. “to the one who sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

7:35. “Jews.” This is the restricted use of the word “Jews,” referring only to the religious leaders of the Jews and those who oppose God and Christ. [For more information, see commentary on John 1:19].

7:37. “Now on the last day, the great day of the feast.” The Feast of Tabernacles started on the 15th day of Tishri (the seventh month—usually in our September) and lasted 8 days (Lev. 23:34-36). Although there are several scholars who feel that the last and great day of the feast is the seventh day, most scholars feel that the last and great day was the final day, Tishri 22, which was a special Sabbath like the first day. As a special Sabbath, it was a specially appointed time of gathering (a solemn assembly, Lev. 23:36).

7:38. “The one who is believing in me,…out of his belly...” This is the figure of speech, Anacoluthon, in which the flow of a sentence is abruptly changed (Bullinger, Figures of Speech).

“will have rivers of living water flowing out of his belly.” In the Greek, the verb “flow” is future tense, active voice, meaning that the river will flow and flow, not just “flow” one time, or only occasionally. Charles Williams (The New Testament in the Language of the People) goes so far as to translate that a believer will have “rivers of water continuously flowing from within him.” Believers should expect, and act upon, this promise and allow the spirit of God to flow from them day after day by speaking in tongues, interpreting, giving words of prophecy, and endeavoring to walk by the spirit.

“as the Scripture has said.” This phrase does not have to be a formula for a direct quotation from the Old Testament (there is no such verse), but rather an introduction of scriptural thought, i.e., the essence of what Scripture teaches. As long as what is being spoken reproduces the essential meaning of the biblical text, it is “as the scripture has said.” Modern preachers and teachers do this all the time. They say, “The Bible says...” but give the essence, rather than a quotation. Isaiah 58:11b states, “You will be like a well-watered garden, like a spring whose waters never fail.” Zechariah 14:8 mentions that living waters will flow from Jerusalem, and it is thought by many that Jesus was relating this to what he was saying, because that verse was one of the traditional readings at the Feast of Tabernacles. The Scripture foretold that the spirit would be poured out into the believer (cp. Isa. 44:3-5; 59:21; Joel 2:28, 29; Ezek. 11:19; 36:26, 27; 37:14). Jesus here adds that the ones who receive the spirit of God are those who believe in him.

“rivers of living water will continuously flow.” The manifestations of the spirit of God that flow from believers have God as their source and thus can flow continuously in a believer’s life. The reason Jesus would pick this illustration would have been immediately apparent to those people attending the Feast of Tabernacles. For the first seven days of the Feast of Tabernacles, a priest would bring water from the Pool of Siloam and pour it, along with wine, on the altar of the Temple. However, on the eighth day no water was brought. Opinions differ as to how the water ceremony got started and what it symbolized, but it seems likely that it referred to the water from the rock that Moses struck in the wilderness. Then, on the eighth day, no water was brought, symbolic of the water of Canaan that the people now could freely partake of. Thus, it seems natural that on this day when no water was brought that Jesus would cry out that if anyone was thirsty, he could come to Jesus and drink.

“Out of his belly.” Theologians have disputed whether or not “his” refers to the Messiah or the believer. In the Old Testament, God was the fountain of living water, the source of spiritual and physical sustenance, and Christ then became the source of holy spirit after he was glorified. However, the Greek text naturally refers “his” to the believer, not the Messiah (cp. Lenski, C.K. Barrett). Although the believer is the most obvious “him,” it is not impossible that the Messiah is also being indirectly referred to. In John 4:14 Jesus speaks of spiritual water, and makes the point that he is the source, although it comes “springing up” (NASB) or “gushing up” (NRSV) from within the believer.
“belly.” The Greek word is koilia (κοιλία), and it means 1) the whole belly, 2) the lower belly, the lower region, the receptacle of the excrement 3) the gullet 4) the womb, the place where the fetus is conceived and nourished until birth 5) the innermost part of a man as the seat of thought, feeling, choice. The exact meaning is determined by the context. It seems obvious that “living water” will not flow out of a person’s belly, so what is the verse saying? Scientists are now discovering that the gut, the belly, plays a very important part in the emotional life of a person. The gut, also called the enteric nervous system, has as many nerve cells as the brain, and studies are now showing that it can react, or “think,” independently of the brain. This is why we have a “gut feeling” about something, or a “gut reaction,” or why we get an upset stomach when we are afraid or anxious. In contrast to the “heart” (Greek is kardia, where we get “cardiac”), which is more closely related to what we “think,” the belly, kidneys (Rev. 2:23) and bowels (2 Cor. 6:12) are more closely related to how we “feel,” our emotions and emotional state. The point being made in John 7:38 is that the person relates to the spirit on an emotional “gut level,” and not just a mental one, although the mind is certainly involved in our spiritual walk. But our emotional connection to our spiritual life is important too, and highlighted here. Although some versions read “heart,” it misses the point, and to make the vague reference, “within him,” as some versions do, is to water down the teaching so much no point can be made of it. Other verses that refer to the “belly” in a way that relates to the emotional life are Romans 16:18 and Philippians 3:19. [For the note on “kidneys” see Rev. 2:23, and for the note on bowels see 2 Cor. 6:12].

7:39. “as yet there was no spirit.” The Greek text says “…for as yet there was no Spirit….“ This clearly shows that the gift of holy spirit in the Millennial Kingdom, which Christ knew about and understood, was going to be so completely different from the gift of holy spirit that God gave in the Old Testament that the promised holy spirit did not exist yet. We have today what was promised to Israel. The obvious presence of holy spirit in the Old Testament and people’s not realizing that this “spirit” was the gift of God that would be different in the Millennial Kingdom (and for us) than it had been in the Old Testament, had a serious consequence. Wanting it to “make sense” to them, men who copied the Bible added to this verse as they copied it. Therefore, among the thousands of Greek texts in existence, there are several different later renditions, among them that the spirit “was not yet given,” “was not yet upon them,” and “not yet came.” See Bruce Metzger, A Textual Commentary on the Greek New Testament, p. 218.

The Old Testament prophets had foretold that a new spirit was coming in the future, one that was different from the spirit God gave in Old Testament times. It was foretold to come as part of the Messianic Kingdom and the New Covenant that God would make with Israel (Isa. 32:15-18; 44:3-5; Ezek. 11:17-21; 36:26, 27; Joel 2:28, 29). The Old Testament prophets and Jesus foretold the coming of this new spirit, saying it would be “poured out” (i.e., given in fullness) into all the believers (Ezek. 39:29; Joel 2:28, 29). Jesus knew that it would come before his kingdom, perhaps to help believers to endure the Great Tribulation (John 15:26-16:16).

Although the Christian Church was a sacred secret, hidden in God and not foretold in the Old Testament, God has given the Christian Church the gift of holy spirit that He promised to give in the Millennial Kingdom. Thus in Acts and the Church Epistles this new holy spirit is sometimes referred to as “the promised holy spirit (Eph. 1:13; cp. Acts 2:33; Rom. 8:23).
When a person believes Jesus Christ is Lord, he is “born again” (1 Pet. 1:3, 23; Titus 3:5; James 1:18), and what gets born inside the Christian is this new gift of holy spirit. [For more on the holy spirit and new birth, see Appendix 1, “The Permanence of Christian Salvation”].

7:53-8:11. A lot has been written from a textual point of view about the record of the woman caught in adultery. Every indication is that it was not part of the original text. The oldest and best manuscripts do not include it. Furthermore, it is absent from a diverse number of manuscripts from different manuscript families (see Metzger, A Textual Commentary on The Greek New Testament).

One of the signs that shows scholars the record is not original is different scribes put it in the Bible in different places. For example, in the Greek manuscripts that do have the record, it occurs in four different places in John, and even occurs in the Gospel of Luke. If the record were original but taken out of some manuscripts by zealous scribes who did not like the idea of Jesus letting adultery go unpunished, the manuscripts that still contained the record would always have it in the same place. That the record of the woman caught in adultery occurs in different places is very good evidence it is not original.

Very importantly, the record breaks the flow of Jesus’ presentation in the Temple during the Feast of Tabernacles. This is the most compelling reason for removing the record from John 8 and moving it to the end of the book of John, and why we do so in our version. Jesus began his teaching in John 7 during the Feast of Tabernacles, which was the longest of the three feasts of the Mosaic Law that every Jewish male was commanded to attend (Exod. 23:14-17). By the first century, many people did not journey to Jerusalem three times a year, which was a three-day walk from Galilee. Many people would come only one time a year, and if they lived much further, not even that often. When they would make the journey for the Feast of Tabernacles, it often made sense to stay for the entire festival season, which, in the Jewish calendar, was longest in the month of Tishri (our September/October). The month of Tishri had the Feast of Trumpets (Tishri 1), the Day of Atonement (Tishri 10), and the Feast of Tabernacles (Tishri 15-22). After the Feast of Tabernacles, the festival season came to a close and people started to return home.

Jesus started his powerful presentation in John 7 inside the Temple, about midway through the Feast of Tabernacles (7:14) by confronting the Jews about trying to kill him and saying to judge rightly (7:17-24). He was accused of being demon-possessed (7:20).

On the last and most important day of the Feast (7:37), Jesus taught about holy spirit coming to those who believed in him (7:37). This caused some to believe he was the Christ (7:41) and the Jews to try to arrest him (7:45-52). Undaunted by the apparent danger, Jesus continued to try to wake up the huge crowd that would be gathered at that last day of the Feast. He told them he was the light of the world (8:12), and was contradicted at every turn by the Jewish leaders. Finally, he addressed those who believed in him about being his disciples and being set free (8:31) while directly confronting his Jewish adversaries and telling them plainly they were from the Devil (8:41-47). The intense debate continued until the Jews finally picked up stones to kill Jesus, and he left the Temple area (8:59). There is no way to tell how large the crowd would have been who heard Jesus reveal in quite clear ways that he was the Messiah, but it would have been well into the thousands.
If John 7:53-8:11 is left in place, then it ends the Feast of Tabernacles, and begins a new “regular day” at the Temple (John 7:53-82). Thus, not only is the debate between Jesus and the Jews interrupted, but the huge crowd that would have heard him speak about being the Messiah and how the Jews were of the Devil would have not been present because they would have gone home the day before. Thus, we feel compelled to do more than just put the record of the woman caught in adultery in brackets, but to move the record to the end of John to preserve the powerful presentation of Jesus on the last day of the Feast of Tabernacles.

In spite of the textual evidence that the record was added, we keep it in John because it has all the earmarks of being a true story. It is likely that it was an amazing event in Jesus’ life that was well remembered by his followers and at some point written down and then inserted into the Gospel of John (and Luke), but scribes could not agree where to put it.

8:9. “in the midst.” At first reading this phrase seems to contradict the context, which says the accusers left. However, the accusers were not the only people at the scene. One can just imagine how the religious leaders brought the woman to Jesus and thrust her toward him saying she had been caught in the act of adultery, and demanding to know how he would judge the case. In short order these vicious men would have formed a circle or semicircle around Jesus, each wanting to hear exactly how he would answer them. Behind these men onlookers and curious people would gather, mixed with the disciples of Jesus. When Jesus answered the religious leaders and they melted away one by one, the outer circle would still remain and thus the woman and Jesus, though left alone from the accusers, would still factually be “in the midst” of the crowd.

8:11. “do not sin any more.” The record of the woman caught in adultery is sometimes quoted to show that the death penalty that God commanded in the Old Testament is no longer valid, and we should not use it. It is argued that since Christ forgave a criminal (an adulteress) we should forgive the criminals in our society. However, when we take the time to study the record, we can see why Jesus said, “Go, and from now on do not sin any more.”

First, it is easy to prove that the religious leaders who brought her to Jesus were not interested in justice. Jesus was not a judge in Judea, especially not of capital cases. Capital cases were tried by the Sanhedrin, the ruling counsel of the Jews. Therefore Jesus had no recognized legal authority to render judgment on the case. That leads us to ask, “Why did the Jews bring the woman to Jesus in the first place?” John 8:6 answers that question—to have something with which to accuse him.

Secondly, the religious leaders were themselves breaking the Mosaic Law by bringing the woman without the man with whom she committed adultery. The Law of Moses clearly said that both the man and the woman were to be executed (Lev. 20:10 and Deut. 22:22). If this woman was caught “in the act” of adultery as the Jews stated, then why did they not bring the man too? The answer is obvious: the woman was set up. For those reasons, Jesus knew that this was a trap, and not “justice” in any sense of the word.
The Jews had indeed formed a clever trap. The Romans had forbidden them to execute people (John 18:31), so if Jesus said to stone the woman, the Jews would have had Jesus arrested for breaking Roman law. However, if Jesus said not to stone her because the Romans forbade it, then the Jews would have defamed him for elevating Roman law over Mosaic Law. It seemed that no matter what Jesus said, he would “lose.”

Jesus got out of the trap by convicting the people’s consciences, which in this case was made easier by the fact that the accusers knew in their hearts that they were willing to take this woman’s life just to trap Jesus. The Jews were already almost certainly guilty of conspiring to commit adultery and also the sin of perjury in the situation, which in a capital case meant getting the penalty of the crime—in this case, death (Deut. 19:16-21). Had Jesus led a mob and stoned the woman based on their testimony, they would have also been guilty of murder. It was obvious from Jesus’ answer to them that he had figured out their sin, and challenged them, saying if they were without sin they could cast the stone; and so one by one they left until there were no accusers left. That is a very important fact, because according to Mosaic Law there had to be eyewitnesses if someone were to be executed. In fact, the witnesses had to cast the first stone (Deut. 17:6, 7). Since Jesus was not a witness, he, by law, could not condemn the woman.

Although Jesus could not legally condemn the woman according to the demands of the Mosaic Law, he nevertheless knew she was in trouble because of her wayward lifestyle, and so he warned her to leave her sinful life. If she did not, not only would she incur the wrath of God on Judgement Day, but at some point she was likely to get caught and executed for her adultery. Thus he said to her, “Go now and leave your life of sin.”

A careful reading of this record with a knowledge of the Mosaic Law and the Roman law in force at the time clearly reveals that this record has no bearing on whether or not there should be a death penalty today. Jesus did not simply excuse a criminal, he prevented a perversion of justice. The Romans executed many criminals during the life of Jesus, and there is no record of him ever trying to intervene in the criminal justice system in any way.

8:12. “the light.” Jesus referred to himself as “a” light in John 9:5 and 12:46 (Greek text; cp. YLT). He reflected the light of God, and knew that other people who reflected the light of God into the world were also lights. The only time Jesus referred to himself as “the” light is John 8:12, and when we read what he said in its context, we understand why he did that.

Jesus said he was “the” light while speaking at the Feast of Tabernacles (also sometimes called “the Feast of Booths,” John 7:2), which is one of the three feasts that the Law of Moses said the Jews were to attend each year (Exod. 23:14-17; ESV). The Feast of Passover occurred in the spring, the Feast of Pentecost occurred in the summer, and the Feast of Tabernacles occurred in the fall, usually our September. The way it was celebrated at the Time of Christ, the Feast of Tabernacles was an eight day feast, and the Feast of Tabernacles that is recorded in John 7 and 8 was the last of the three major feasts of Exodus that Jesus attended before he was killed at the Passover Feast the next year.

In the record in John 7 and 8, Jesus was trying to reveal that he was the Messiah, but was doing so in a way that those with an open heart would understand, while those with cold hearts would not. Jesus’ words and actions did indeed convince people, because day after day as the Feast progressed, more and more people believed in him. John 7:31 says “many in the crowd put their faith in him.” Then, John 7:41 says people declared, “He is the Christ.” Then, on the last day of the feast, John 8:30 says, “Even as he spoke, many put their faith in him.” Thus, in the context of revealing that he was the Messiah, it makes sense that Jesus said he was “the” light of the world. He was not being exclusive and claiming to be the only light, he was claiming to be the major light, the promised Messiah.

The fact that Jesus said to the people, “you are the light of the world,” (Matt. 5:14) shows us that he did not think of himself as the only light. We all have the privilege and responsibility to reflect God’s light. In contrast to people and even the Messiah, who all reflect the light of God, God Himself is not “a” light, or even “the” light, God is “light” (1 John 1:5). In God is no darkness at all. He shines brilliantly and has done so forever.

“life.” Here the word “life” refers primarily to “life in the Age to Come,” which we can tell by reading the context. For example, verse 21 speaks of people dying in their sin. However the word life also has overtones of “life” now, life that is real life. Jesus came so that we would have everlasting life but also so that our lives now would be rich and meaningful (see commentary on John 5:40).

8:16. “for I am not alone in my judgment, but I and the Father that sent me.” This verse shows that Jesus received what he taught from his father, God. See commentary on John 8:28.

“the father that sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

8:18. “the Father that sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

8:22. “Jews.” This is the restricted use of the word “Jews,” referring only to the religious leaders of the Jews and those who oppose God and Christ. [For more information, see commentary on John 1:19].

8:25. “You—who are you.” The second person singular of “to be” makes the “you” at the beginning of the phrase emphatic. The Jews were asking and asking who Jesus was, but not accepting his answer (cp. 7:19ff; 7:30ff; 8:13ff). Jesus’ answer in this verse is difficult in the Greek, and Lenski writes, “The reply of Jesus constitutes one of the most disputed passages in the New Testament.…” Nevertheless, Lenski gives an excellent explanation of it. First, ten archē does not have the force of “the beginning,” but rather “in general,” or “altogether” (Lenski; Thayer on archē). Second, the word lalō (from laleō) is a present active, although almost all versions translate it as a past tense. Christ was telling the Pharisees who he was even as they were asking him who he was, so he answered, “I am what I am [presently] telling you.” Christ had just told them (v. 12) that he was the light of the world, an obvious Messianic reference (“a light for the Gentiles” (Isa. 42:6) and the glory of Israel). Because they did not know that Jesus was speaking of the Father (v. 26) then they certainly did not understand that he, the one sent by the Father was obviously the Messiah.
8:26. “he who sent me is true.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

8:28. “lifted up.” This refers to the crucifixion, as is clear from that fact that Jesus says, when “you” (Jews) have lifted up the Son of Man.” The reason there is any confusion at all is that there is no evidence in the writings that have come down to us from antiquity that the term “lifted up” was used of crucifixion. However, that does not mean it was not used that way, or it may have been that Jesus was being purposely obscure, which he sometimes was.

“then will you know that I am the one.” The sentence should end after “one” (or “he” if the translation is “that I am he”). “The one” refers to the one whom they were expecting: the Messiah. There is no connective, such as “that,” between that statement and the next one, even though the major versions (KJV; HCSB; ESV; NIV; NRSV; etc.) all put one in the text. D. A. Carson writes, “Probably we should read a full stop after “I am.” In the next words, nothing in the Greek text corresponds to the NIV’s ‘that.” Rather, Jesus goes on to say, ‘And I do nothing on my own...’ recapitulating the argument of 3:34; 5:30; 6:38; 8:16; etc.” (The Pillar New Testament Commentary: The Gospel According to John). Other scholars agree, cp. Leon Morris, The Gospel According to John.

Lenski (The Interpretation of St. John’s Gospel) points out that the word “know” is an ingressive aorist, and means “come to know” The “then” is not tied to the immediacy of the crucifixion, as if as soon as Jesus was crucified the Jews would know he was the Messiah, but to the whole context. We approach Jesus’ words as they are written, but we must remember that they were spoken in a quickly moving and tense verbal context. Thus the Jews “coming to know,” or “coming to realize” that Jesus was the Messiah was tied to his crucifixion and what would happen after it, all of which are part of the context of Jesus’ statement.

“And I do nothing of myself.” A new sentence starts with the word “And.” When deciding how to punctuate a verse, we must be sensitive to the grammar, context, and scope of Scripture. In this case, Jesus continues a theme that he taught over and over in John, that he had not come on his own and that he was not acting on his own initiative or from his own power (cp. 5:19, 30; 6:38; 7:16; 8:16, 28, 29; 12:49, 50). Thus this verse is a continuation of something he had been teaching all along. Furthermore, there is no compelling to connect the two halves of the verse. The verse makes much more sense, and flows with the teaching of Jesus, to have it read as two separate sentences. Then also, the last sentence in the verse flows seamlessly into the next verse, verse 29.

This verse, and the other verses mentioned above that are similar to it, show the dependency that the Son had upon the Father. This is very good evidence that Jesus is not God in the flesh, but the Son of God. Even Jesus’ statement to the Jews, that he was the one,” reflected back to the Messiah they were expecting, and they were expecting a human being, a man from the line of David. If Jesus were God, and especially if a person had to believe that to be saved, this was a perfect time for Jesus to say so. Instead, he said he was the Messiah the Jews were expecting.

8:29. “and he who sent me is with me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

“for I always do the things that are pleasing to him.” This verse shows that Jesus received what he taught from his father, God. See commentary on John 8:28

8:42. “came from God.” God created Jesus when he was conceived in Mary. [For more explanation of the phrase that Jesus came from God, see commentary on John 6:38].

“but he sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

8:44. “the Slanderer.” This is “the Devil.” The Greek is diabolos (#1228 διαβόλος). The Greek word diabolos means “slanderer,” the one who slanders others, and that is a primary characteristic of the Devil. He has no regard for a person’s reputation or the illicit means he uses to discredit and destroy people. Slander is a primary tactic of the Devil. [For information on the names of the Devil, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”].

8:48. “Jews.” This is the restricted use of the word “Jews,” referring only to the religious leaders of the Jews and those who oppose God and Christ. [For more information, see commentary on John 1:19].

8:51. “see death.” This is an idiom for “die,” and in this case “see death” is used idiomatically for experiencing “everlasting death.” Jesus is not saying that a person who keeps his word would not die in the flesh, but that he would not die an everlasting death. The words “live” and “life” were sometimes used of everlasting life (see commentary on Luke 10:28), and the words “die” and “death” were sometimes used of everlasting death, as is the case here in John 8:51.

8:52. “Jews.” This is the restricted use of the word “Jews,” referring only to the religious leaders of the Jews and those who oppose God and Christ. [For more information, see commentary on John 1:19].

8:53. “Surely.” The “surely” is implied by the me (not) which expects a negative answer.

8:54. “He is our God.” Early manuscripts say “He is our God,” and early manuscripts say “He is your God.” It is more likely that the “our” was changed to “your” as the scribes would not like to possibly imply that the Jews were saying that God was Jesus’ God also. The punctuation that makes the reading clear was not in the early texts.

8:57. “Jews.” This is the restricted use of the word “Jews,” referring only to the religious leaders of the Jews and those who oppose God and Christ. [For more information, see commentary on John 1:19].

8:58. “I am the one.” Trinitarians argue that this verse states that Jesus said he was the “I am” (i.e., Yahweh, the God who revealed Himself to Moses in the Old Testament), so he must be God. Saying “I am” does not make a person God. The Greek that is translated as “I am” is egō eime, and it was a common Greek way to identify oneself. For example, only ten verses after Jesus said, “I am,” the man who Jesus healed who had been born blind identified himself by saying exactly what Jesus said; egō eime (“I am;” John 9:9). Thus, Jesus and the man born blind both identified themselves by egō eime (“I am”) only ten verses apart.

Sadly, unless a person looks at the Greek text, he will never see that “I am” was a common Greek way to identify oneself. In what seems to be a clear case of Trinitarian bias in translating the Greek text, when Jesus says, \textit{egō eime} (“I am”) in John 8:58, our English Bibles read, “I am.” But when Jesus says \textit{egō eime} in other places in the New Testament, or other people say \textit{egō eime} (“I am”), the Greek phrase gets translated differently. So, for example, some English translations of what the man born blind said are: “I am the one” (or “I’m the one;” CJB; HCSB; NASB; NET); “I am he” (BBE; ERV; KJV; YLT); “It is I” (Darby); and, “I am the man” (ESV; NIV). The only English Bible we know of that has “I am” in John 9:9 is the New American Bible.

There are many other examples of the phrase \textit{egō eime} (“I am”), being translated as “I am he” or some other similar phrase. Jesus taught that people would come in his name, saying “I am,” and will deceive many (Mark 13:6; Luke 21:8).

Jesus said \textit{egō eime} (“I am”), in a large number of places, but it is usually translated “I am he,” “It is I,” or “I am the one,” which are good translations because \textit{egō eime} was used by people to identify themselves. Examples of Jesus using \textit{egō eime} include: John 13:19; 18:5, 6, and 8; Jesus identifying himself to the apostles on the boat: Matthew 14:27; Mark 6:50; and John 6:20; and Jesus identifying himself to the Jews, saying \textit{egō eime}, translated “I am the one I claim to be” (NIV84, John 8:24 and 28.). These translations where Jesus says \textit{egō eime} but it is not translated “I am” shows that the translators understand that just saying \textit{egō eime} does not mean you are claiming to be God.

At the Last Supper, the disciples were trying to find out who would deny the Christ. They used \textit{egō eime} as the standard Greek identifier. Jesus had said one of them would betray him, and one after another they said to him, \textit{mēti egō eime, Kurie} (literally, “not I am, Lord;” Matt. 26:22 and 25.) The apostles were not trying to deny that they were God by saying, “Not I am.” They were simply using as the common personal identifier \textit{egō eime} and saying, “Surely not I, Lord”.

In Acts 26:29, when Paul was defending himself in court, he said, “I would to God, that …all who hear me this day, might become such as I am [\textit{egō eime}].” Obviously Paul was not claiming to be God. There are more uses of the phrase “I am,” and especially so if we realize that what has been covered above is only the nominative singular pronoun and the first person singular verb than we have just covered. The point is this: “I am” was a common way of designating oneself, and it did not mean you were claiming to be God. C. K. Barrett writes:

\textit{Egō eimi} [“I am”] does not identify Jesus with God, but it does draw attention to him in the strongest possible terms. “I am the one—the one you must look at, and listen to, if you would know God” (\textit{The Gospel According to St John}, p. 342).

A major problem that occurs when we misunderstand a verse is that the correct meaning goes unnoticed, and that certainly is the case with John 8:58. If the phrase \textit{egō eime} in John 8:58 were translated “I am he” or “I am the one,” like all the other places where Jesus says it, instead of coming to the erroneous conclusion that Jesus is God, we would more easily see that Jesus was speaking of himself as the Messiah of God who was foretold throughout the Old Testament.

Trinitarians assert that because Jesus was “before” Abraham, Jesus must have been God. Jesus did not literally exist before his conception in Mary, but he “existed” in the plan of God, and was foretold in prophecy.
It is also worth noting that many people misread John 8:58 and think it says Jesus saw Abraham. We must read the Bible carefully, because it says no such thing. It does not say Jesus saw Abraham, it says Abraham saw the Day of Christ. The text does say that Christ was before Abraham, but that does not have to mean Jesus existed literally as a person before Abraham. We did not have to literally exist as people for God to choose us before the foundation of the world (Eph. 1:4), we existed in the mind of God. Similarly, Jesus did not exist as an actual physical person during the time of Abraham, but he “existed” in the mind of God as God’s plan for the redemption of man.

A careful reading of the context of the verse shows that Jesus was speaking of “existing” in God’s foreknowledge. John 8:56 says, “Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day, and he saw it, and was glad.” This verse says that Abraham “saw” the day of Christ (the day of Christ is usually considered by theologians to be the day when Christ conquers the earth and sets up his kingdom—it is still future). That would fit with what the book of Hebrews says about Abraham: “For he was looking forward to the city with foundations, whose architect and builder is God” (Heb. 11:10). The Bible says Abraham “saw” a city that is still future. In what sense could Abraham have seen something that was future? Abraham “saw” the day of Christ because God told him it was coming, and Abraham “saw” it by faith. Although Abraham saw the day of Christ by faith, that day existed in the mind of God long before Abraham. Thus, in the context of God’s plan existing from the beginning, Christ certainly was “before” Abraham. Christ was the plan of God for man’s redemption long before Abraham lived.

Jesus did not claim to be God in John 8:58. In very strong terms, however, he claimed to be the Messiah, the one whose day Abraham saw by faith. Jesus said that before Abraham was, “I am the one,” meaning, even before Abraham existed, Jesus was foretold to be the promised Messiah. Jesus gave the Jews many opportunities to see and believe that he was in fact the Messiah of God, but they were blind to that fact, and crucified him.

Some other sources that comment on John 8:58 and conclude that Jesus’ using “I am” did not make him God are: Anthony Buzzard and Charles Hunting, The Doctrine of the Trinity; Mary Dana, Letters Addressed to Relative and Friends Chiefly in Reply to Arguments in Support of the Doctrine of the Trinity (1845; available from Spirit & Truth Fellowship); Charles Morgridge, The True Believer’s Defence Against Charges Preferred by Trinitarians (1837; available from Spirit & Truth Fellowship); Andrews Norton, A Statement of Reasons for Not Believing the Doctrines of Trinitarians; Don Snedeker, Our Heavenly Father Has No Equals; Patrick Navas, Divine Truth or Human Tradition?

8:59. “they picked up stones to throw at him.” The Jews were so arrogant that they thought if anyone was the Messiah they would know it, so they considered it blasphemy and worthy of death if someone claimed to be the Messiah. Jesus was claiming to be the Messiah, so they picked up stones to kill him.

Trinitarians claim that the Jews picked up stones to stone Jesus because he was claiming to be God (John 8:59), but that is an assumption. There is a different explanation that is supported by better evidence: the Jews picked up stones to kill Jesus because they understood he was claiming to be the Messiah. At Jesus’ trial, the High Priest asked, “I charge you under oath by the living God: Tell us if you are the Christ, the Son of God” (Matt. 26:63). First of all, we should notice that no one at the trial asked Jesus if he were God. However, if they thought he had been claiming to be God, that would have certainly been a question they would have asked. At the trial the High Priest asked Jesus in very clear terms if he was the Christ because that is what the Jews knew Jesus was claiming to be. Second, when the Jews heard Jesus’ clear answer (“Yes, it is as you say”), they accused him of blasphemy and said, “He is worthy of death” (Matt. 26:66). They felt he was worthy of death in the record in John 8, but in that record they picked up stones to kill him, while after hearing his “blasphemy” at the trial, they took him to Pilate and got the Romans to execute Jesus. It was technically illegal for the Jews to execute anyone, but in times of great emotion the law was sometimes ignored. That would have happened in John 8 if Jesus had not gone away, it almost happened to Paul in the Temple (Acts 21:31), and it did happen to Stephen, the first Christian martyr (Acts 7:58-60).

9:1. “And as he passed by.” The record reads like Jesus just left the Temple and saw the blind man. It is possible, but not necessary, that that is what happened. The man was healed on a Sabbath day (9:14), and the last day of the Feast was a Sabbath. John 7:37 mentions “the last, the great” day of the feast, which most scholars believe is the eighth day of the feast, which, according to Leviticus 23:36 was a Sabbath. Thus, it is possible that Jesus simply left the Temple on that last day of Tabernacles and saw a man who was blind who had been brought there, likely to beg, much like the lame man in Acts 3. However, it is also possible that Jesus simply remained in Jerusalem after the Feast of Tabernacles and the record of the blind man occurred later, on another Sabbath.

9:2. “Rabbi, who sinned, this man or his parents.” The Jews taught that the sins of the parents could cause a baby to be afflicted. However, the full question of the disciples seems very strange to us, because how could the man sin before he was born? The answer is not reincarnation or some form of transmigration of the soul (i.e., the person did not sin in an earlier life), but rather that that Rabbis taught that a person could sin even in the womb (Cp. John Lightfoot: A Commentary on the New Testament from the Talmud and Hebraica; and William Hendriksen: New Testament Commentary: John). If this man sinned in the womb so that he was born blind, then he would have then been born “entirely” in sin, as the religious leaders confidently asserted in verse 34.

“so that he was born blind.” Hina with a verb in the subjunctive mood result clause, see Matthew 2:15 entry, “resulting in...what was spoken being fulfilled.” The disciples assumed that someone’s sin unintentionally resulted in this man’s blindness. Jesus specifically rejects this thinking in verse 3. His response takes the disciples’ thoughts away from who is to blame, and leads them to think only of working the healing works of God in this man’s life.

9:3. “Neither did this man sin nor his parents.” Here Jesus specifically refutes a common thought of his day, that a child could sin in the womb and bad things happen to people because of sin.

“let the works of God be revealed in him.” This phrase is open to several different translations. The translator’s understanding of the passage, how he believes it fits into the context and the scope of scripture, in accordance with his theology, will determine his opinion as to how it is best brought into English. The Greek reads, hina phanerōthē ta erga tou theou en autō. The controversy surrounds the use of the particle hina (#2443 ἵνα) with phaneroō, the verb for “revealed” (#5319 φανερῶ), in the subjunctive mood. The question is whether this use of hina with the subjunctive is to be understood here to indicate purpose or command. This same Greek construction can be used in purpose and command clauses, with purpose clauses being the more common of the two (Wallace, Greek Grammar, p. 471-72, 476-77). A purpose clause indicates why something happened, it shows the intention behind the action: e.g., “Children were being brought to him in order that he might lay [Greek = hina with a verb in the subjunctive mood] his hands on them and pray” (Matt. 19:13). A command clause, on the other hand, issues an order or command: e.g., “Come and lay [Greek=hina with a verb in the subjunctive mood] your hands on her, so that she may be made well and live” (Mark 5:23). [For more on result clauses, see Matt. 2:15 commentary “resulting in…what was spoken being fulfilled”].

Because it is the same Greek form of hina with the subjunctive, there can be disagreement as to whether purpose or command is meant. This disagreement shows up in the varying translations of Mark 5:12 for instance, when the demons plead to go into the herd of swine. Some versions translate the second part of their plea as purpose, “Send us into the pigs so that we may enter them” (cp. NASB; HCSB; KJV; ASV), while most modern versions translate it as a command: “Send us into the pigs. Let us enter them” (cp. ESV; NIV; NRSV; NET; NAB; NJB). Interestingly, we see precisely the same split between the translations with regard to Titus 3:13, “see that they lack nothing” (command: ESV; NIV; NRSV; NET; NAB; NJB) as opposed to “so that they lack nothing” (purpose-result: NASB; HCSB; KJV; ASV). (See also Revelation 14:13 for similar disagreement between translations).

Since John 9:3 has hina with the subjunctive, we must ask whether it is meant to be a purpose or command clause. It is rendered as a purpose clause in most translations, “He was born blind so that God’s works might be revealed in him” (NRSV); however, this translation has serious consequences to the meaning of the text. It makes the man’s blindness intentionally brought upon, so that he could not see for the better part of his life, simply for the purpose of being healed this day—that “God’s works” may be manifest by his healing. Such an interpretation goes against the teaching of scripture, that God is love (1 John 4:16), has plans not to harm us (Jer. 29:11), and that it is Satan who is our enemy, the god of this world (2 Cor. 4:4) who has the power of death (Heb. 2:14). Jesus came to destroy the works of the devil (1 John 3:8), his ministry was to heal those oppressed by Satan (Acts 10:38). The Gospels nowhere portray this warfare mindset of Jesus as going about healing those oppressed by God (See Boyd, God at War, pp. 231-34).

Accordingly, a number of scholars agree that John 9:3 should be read as a command clause, “But let the work of God be revealed in him.” (see Boyd, God at War, pp.231-34; Boyd also notes M. Zerwick, Biblical Greek, trans. J. Smith, pp. 141-42; C.F.D. Moule, An Idiom-Book of New Testament Greek, 2nd ed., pp. 144-45; Nigel Turner, Grammatical Insights into the New Testament, p. 145ff.) In this way, the Greek is understood just like Ephesians 5:33, which has the same construction: “let [Greek=hina with a verb in the subjunctive mood] the wife see that she respects her husband.” [For other command clauses see also: Matt. 20:33; Mark 5:23; 10:51; 12:19; 1 Cor. 7:29; 16:16; 2 Cor. 8:7; 2 Cor. 8:7; 1 John 3:11; 3:23]. This translation fits best with the context of the verse, as well as the rest of the gospels and the scope of scripture. In the context, the disciples falsely assume that someone’s sin resulted in this man being born blind. Jesus corrects this wrong thinking, saying it was not the result of anyone’s sin, and then he points them to the proper response of seeing such a man. He models what he came to do—to destroy the work of the devil and heal those oppressed by him—“Let the works of God be manifest in him,” he says, showing compassion for the man. Then he turns to his disciples and reminds them that they must work the works of God while it is day. Rather than painting a picture of a capricious God who makes a man blind for the purpose of healing his blindness, this passage reveals the son of a loving God, who makes the works of his Father manifest by healing a man oppressed by the devil.

There are two other grammatical options for understanding this verse, which we feel are less likely than the command clause but are worth mentioning here. First, it is also possible that Jesus’ words should read as a result clause. On this understanding the verse would not be speaking of the purpose of the man’s blindness, but only of its result, “he was born blind with the result that the works of God are manifest in him.” This understanding, like the purpose clause reading, requires that the phrase, “he was born blind” be supplied since it is not in the original Greek. This view has for it the fact that the disciples used a result clause in verse 2, asking Jesus whose sin resulted in the man’s blindness. To this Jesus reverses their thinking from whose sin resulted in the blindness to how the blindness can result in the manifestation of the works of God.

Secondly, there is the option that the phrase is in fact a purpose clause, but nevertheless is not to be read that he was born blind for a purpose. Rather, it should be read with what follows. In that case it would read: “Jesus answered, “Neither did this man sin, nor his parents. But in order that the works of God be revealed in him, we must work the works of him who sent me while it is day.” But this is highly unlikely, for there is no other clear instance of a purpose clause gathering its main verb from what follows, usually the action comes from what precedes the hina clause not after. Romans 7:13 is a near parallel, but it is a result clause, not purpose.

9:4. “We.” There are texts that read “I,” but the better textual support is for “we.” It is understandable that the copyists, particularly early in the Christian era, would be uncomfortable with “we,” wanting to put all the focus and power upon Jesus. Nevertheless, the true reading is very empowering to those who work for the Lord. “We” must all work, if work is to get done for the Lord. The “night” that Jesus referred to would be during the Tribulation period, after the Rapture, when not much work will be done for God. That will be a dark time indeed.

9:5. “a light of the world.” Although almost every translation reads, “the” light of the world, the Greek text does not read that way. John 8:12 says Jesus is “the” light, but not this verse. In the context of “we” must work the work of God, Jesus is “a” light, and we are lights also. Believers have always been lights in the world, shining the way to God (Matt. 5:14).

9:17. “the blind man.” Here “the blind man” is used as a commonly known designation for the man. He was actually no longer “the blind man” since he could see.

9:18. “Jews.” This is the restricted use of the word “Jews,” referring only to the religious leaders of the Jews and those who oppose God and Christ. [For more information, see commentary on John 1:19].

9:34. “And they cast him out.” After at first not believing that he was blind (v. 18), because that would then give credit to Jesus for healing the man and doing a great miracle, the religious leaders now refer back to the fact that he was “born” blind, and accuse him and excommunicate him on that basis. The Rabbis believed that a person could sin while in the womb, and reap the result of that sin at birth (see commentary on verse 2). Because the man was born blind, the Jews assert that he was born “entirely” in sin, and was in no position to teach them anything. This is spiritual blindness and evil at its worst, yet is happens often in religious circles. It often happens that someone who is healed supposedly gets his healing “in the wrong way” or “from the wrong person” and is excluded from fellowship on that basis. The leaders ignore the healing that has occurred and hurt is piled upon hurt by supposedly well-meaning people.

9:38. “bowed down before him.” See commentary on Matthew 2:2. When he was healed, this man believed that Jesus was a prophet (v. 17). It is clear from the record that the man does not believe Jesus is God. He spoke of God not hearing sinners, but hearing this “man,” Jesus. Jesus, however, sought him out, and asked if he believed on “the Son of Man,” a Messianic title. The man answered, “Who is he, Lord (in this case, “Lord” is the cultural equivalent of “sir.”). When Jesus identified himself as the Son of Man, the man said, in clear terms, “I believe you,” thus accepting Jesus as the Messiah. At that point it would have been appropriate and cultural for him to bow (or fall on his face) before Jesus. This is where the exact action that accompanies proskuneō is not clear. What is clear is the act of homage the man paid to Jesus.

9:39. “will see.” The verb with “blind” and “see” is in the subjunctive mood, thus many versions have “may” instead of will. But the Greek conjunction hina is the reason the verb is subjunctive, (#2443, hina, ἵνα; usually translated “that,” “in order that,” or “so that,” but see commentary on Matthew 2:15). Thus, when hina is used, the verb must be translated according to the context, not strictly by the mood of the verb. Jesus says he came for judgment, which will mean that those who are blind will see, while those who say they see will be blind.

10:1. “Truly, truly.” The Greek is amēn amēn (#281 ἀμήν). It was a strong affirmation or way of emphasizing what someone was about to say. In the three other Gospels it is not doubled, it is only, “truly I say to you.” However, it occurs 25 times in John and is always doubled. The doubling adds emphasis, and is technically the figure of speech geminatio, a form of epizeuxis. The figure geminatio occurs when the same word is repeated with the same meaning for emphasis with no words between the word that is repeated (see Bullinger, Figures of Speech Used in the Bible).

This teaching of Jesus is very much like a parable in that it contains many figures of speech and has many levels (thus it can be called a parable). It certainly was an illustration from everyday life in biblical times, and the sheepfold, shepherd, doorkeeper, and sheep would be familiar to everyone. Beyond that simplicity, the teaching becomes complex, involving the figure metaphor (“I am the door,” etc.) and hypocatastasis (“sheep.” We learn from the scope of Scripture that “sheep” are believers).

A sheepfold was an open area in the countryside surrounded by a wall that was usually topped with interwoven briars and thorns so that wild animals and thieves could not get to the sheep inside. The folds were often quite large, and would accommodate several flocks at once. That is why it was so vital that the sheep knew the shepherd’s voice, who not only called to them, but often called them by name, as in this parable (10:3). As the shepherd called to his sheep, often in the early morning while it was still quite dark, the sheep would know the shepherd’s voice and leave the other sheep and go out with their shepherd (10:3). The sheep would not know the voice of a stranger, and so would never follow a stranger (10:5). The biblical shepherd went ahead of his flock, calling, speaking to them, or singing, and his sheep would follow him (10:4). This is in contrast to the Western shepherd, who herds his sheep in front of him, and follows them. The doorkeeper of the fold would let legitimate shepherds and hired hands in, but not allow unauthorized people to enter. The doorkeeper is not named in this teaching, but the scope of the teaching shows us it must be God.

This parable of Jesus has multiple layers of meaning. For example, Jesus is both the door of the fold, and the Good Shepherd. The multiple layers of meaning draw us deeply into the teaching, inviting us to spend time reading and re-reading the parable, considering all that it is saying to us. Because of the layers of meaning, it cannot be read once through and “simply understood.” Often the multiple layers of meaning are confusing to an unsaved or unspiritual person, who thinks the biblical writers should have written something simple and straightforward. They wonder, “How can Jesus be both the door and the Good Shepherd? How can the fold represent everlasting life and also just safety on this earth?” It is that kind of information that can be confusing that causes some scholars to call the teaching “nonsense” (cp. The Gospel and Letters of John by Urban von Wahlde). In reality, it is the profound Word of our Heavenly Father who loves us on multiple levels and wants us to explore that with Him as we read and pray.

The sheepfold represents two different things in the parable. The “fold” is everlasting life (“If anyone enters by me, he will be saved;” 10:9). However, it also is simply a place where the sheep can be safe, because they “go in and out, and find pasture” (10:9). It is easy to understand the two meanings, because while it is true that God’s sheep have everlasting life, they also need the guidance and support of the Good Shepherd right now, while they go in and out in life.

A point of the parable that we should not miss is that the thieves and robbers enter the fold by stealth, not to stay there and have everlasting life (if they wanted that, they would just enter by the door and be a sheep), but to get to the sheep. They come to steal, kill, and destroy (10:10), not to have everlasting life. They are thieves, robbers, strangers, and wolves (10:1, 5, 12). Often God’s people are naïve about how many thieves and robbers there are who do not love the flock, but by design or ignorance, hurt the sheep. Also, there are good people who try to shepherd the flock but who do it for reward, not out of love and devotion, and these “hired hands” do not adequately protect the sheep and thus contribute to their being hurt (10:12).

We can tell from the use of “thieves” in 10:1, that “the thief” in 10:10 is anyone who is trying to take the sheep away from the Good Shepherd, but it also certainly points to that Great Thief, the Devil, who is ultimately behind all the attacks on the sheep. All those who work to destroy the sheep are doing the work of the Devil.

“fold.” The Greek is aulē (#833 αὐλή; pronounced ow-lay'). It was used in the time of the Greek poet Homer (c. 850 BC) to refer an uncovered space surrounded by a wall in which was the house and stables for livestock. So in the biblical culture it came to be used for a roofless area enclosed by a wall out in the open country in which flocks were kept at night, a sheepfold. It was also used for the uncovered court-yard of a house. Also, in the Septuagint it was used of the open courts of the Tent of Meeting (Tabernacle), and the Temple in Jerusalem, and the New Testament uses aulē of the Temple courtyard as well (Rev. 11:2).

“door.” The Greek word is thura (#2374 θῦρα), “door.” The meaning of “door” is just as we use it today, usually the door to a building, or room in a building. It was different from “gate” (Greek: pulē, #4439 πύλη; pronounced poo'-lay), which often referred to gates that opened into courtyards or wide areas (such as the gate of the Temple.

10:4. “he goes before them.” This is a custom of shepherds in biblical times. The Western shepherd drives his sheep, the Eastern shepherd leads them.

10:6. “veiled language.” The Greek is paroimia (#3942) and it occurs 5 times in the NT. It is “a brief communication containing truths designed for initiates, veiled saying, figure of speech, in which esp. lofty ideas are concealed” (BDAG Greek-English Lexicon). It is also translated “proverb” in 2 Peter 2:22.

10:10. “kill.” The word is from the Greek word thuō (#2380 θαύω), meaning “to sacrifice.” Elsewhere in the Old and New Testaments it is used nearly exclusively to refer to the killing of animals (for ritual sacrifice or celebration). There were several other Greek words for kill (e.g., apokteino, anaireō, diaxeirizomai, phoneuo), so it is very telling that the Lord used this word to describe the Thief (the devil). The choice to employ thuō shows us that humans are just like animals to the devil, and he seeks to kill us with no regard, just like animals. (See Acts 10:13 for another interesting usage of this word).

10:11. “life.” The Greek word is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoo-kay'), often translated “soul.” The Greek word has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person or animal; an individual person; or attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. Here it refers to the physical life of the body, which is why most versions translate it “life,” which is accurate in this context. This is one of the many verses that shows that psuchē, soul, is not immortal. [For a more complete explanation of psuchē, “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’”].

10:19. “Jews.” This is the restricted use of the word “Jews,” referring only to the religious leaders of the Jews and those who oppose God and Christ. [For more information, see commentary on John 1:19].

“souls.” The Greek word translated “soul” is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoo-kay'), and it has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person or animal; an individual person; and attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. Here psuchē is used broadly, and means “us” (as it is translated in most versions), but the fact that “soul” is used and not just the Greek word “us” lets us know that these religious leaders were emotionally invested in getting an answer to their question. The Greek has psuchē in the singular, “our soul,” but in English we would say, “our souls.” Note how this section of John shows us some of the common uses of psuchē, because it refers to human “life” in 10:11, 15, and 17. [For a more complete explanation of “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’”].

10:26. “of my sheep.” This is the partitive use of the preposition ek (#1537 ἐκ) and the genitive case. The partitive usage indicates a part of some greater whole; in this case, Jesus denies that these Jews were a part of the larger group of “his sheep.”

10:30. “I and the Father are one.” Jesus and the Father operate in perfect unity, and it should be the goal of every Christian to be “one” with them, even as Jesus wanted us to when he prayed to God: “that they may be one as we are one; I in them, and Thou in me, that they may be perfected into one” (John 17:22, 23 Young’s Literal Translation).

There is no reason to take this verse to mean that Christ was saying that he and the Father make up “one God.” To be “one” was a common idiom, and in fact it is still used the same way today when two people say they are “one. When Paul wrote to the Corinthians about his ministry in Corinth, he said that he had planted the seed and Apollos had watered it. Then he said, “he who plants and he who waters are one” (1 Cor. 3:8 KJV). In the Greek texts, the wording of Paul is the same as that in John 10:30, yet no one claims that Paul and Apollos make up “one being,” or are somehow “of one substance.” Furthermore, the NIV translates 1 Corinthians 3:8 as “he who plants and he who waters have one purpose.” Why translate the phrase as “are one” in one place, but as “have one purpose” in another place? The reason is the translator’s bias toward the Trinity. But translating the same Greek phrase in two different ways obscures the clear meaning of Christ’s statement in John 10:30: Christ always did the Father’s will; he and God have “one purpose.” The NIV translators would have been exactly correct if they had translated both John 10:30 and 1 Corinthians 3:8, instead of just 1 Corinthians 3:8, as “have one purpose.”

Jesus used the concept of “being one” in other places, and from them one can see that “one purpose” is what he meant. John 11:52 says Jesus was to die to make all God’s children “one.” In John 17:11, 21, and 22, Jesus prayed to God that his followers would be “one” as he and God were “one.” We believe the meaning is clear: Jesus was praying that all his followers be one in purpose just as he and God were one in purpose, a prayer that has not yet been answered.

Sadly, the Trinitarian bias in reading John 10:30 has kept many people from paying attention to what the text is really saying. Jesus was speaking about his ability to keep the “sheep,” the believers, who came to him. He said that no one could take them out of his hand and that no one could take them out of his Father’s hand. Then he said that he and the Father were “one,” i.e., had one purpose, which was to keep and protect the sheep. No wonder Jesus prayed that we believers be “one” like he and his Father. Far too many believers are self-focused and do not pay enough attention to the other believers around them. Cain thought he did not have to be his brother’s keeper, but we should know differently. If we are going to be “one” like God and Jesus are “one,” then we need to work hard to help and bless God’s flock [For more information on “I and the Father are one,” see, Anthony Buzzard and Charles Hunting, The Doctrine of the Trinity, Christianity’s Self-inflicted Wound, p. 289-291; Frederick Farley, The Scripture Doctrine of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, 1873, reprinted by Spirit & Truth Fellowship International, pp. 60, 61; and Charles Morgridge, True Believer’s Defense Against Charges Preferred by Trinitarians, 1837, reprinted by Spirit & Truth Fellowship, pp. 39-42.]

10:31. “Jews.” This is the restricted use of the word “Jews,” referring only to the religious leaders of the Jews and those who oppose God and Christ. [For more information, see commentary on John 1:19].

“defaming words.” The Greek noun is blasphēmia (#988 βλασφημία; pronounced blas-fay-me'-ah), and was used of someone speaking against another. The primary meaning as it was used in the Greek culture was showing disrespect to a person or deity, and/or harming his, her, or its reputation. See “defaming words,” 10:36. [For more on blasphēmia, see commentary on Matt. 9:3].

“a god.” The Greek word Theos (2316 θεός), God or god, does not have the definite article and should be translated “a god” or “divine.” Since the Jews would never believe a man could be Yahweh, and since it was common in the Aramaic and Hebrew to call an important man “god,” that is the way we translated it. [For a much more detailed explanation on the words for “God” being used of God’s representatives, see commentary on John 20:28 and Hebrews 1:8].

10:34. Quoted from Psalm 82:6.

10:36. “him whom the Father made holy and sent into the world.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 20:28 and Hebrews 1:8.

“You speak defaming words.” The Greek verb blasphēmeō (#987 βλασφημέω) means showing disrespect to a person or deity, and/or harming his, her, or its reputation. The religious leaders thought it was defaming and insulting to God that Jesus would refer to himself as the Son of God. [For more on blasphēmeō, see commentary on Matt. 9:3].

10:38. “come to know and continue to know.” The Greek verb, used twice, is ginōskō (#1097 γινώσκω). The first ginōskō is in an aorist tense active voice and here means, “come to know,” or “get to know.” The second ginōskō is in the present tense, active voice and refers to an ongoing knowledge, “continue to know.” Lenski’s commentary has, “that you may come to realize and go on realizing.” The force of the two verbs is expressed more idiomatically, but correctly in A Translator’s Handbook to the Gospel of John: “that you may know once and for all….” Most modern versions say something similar to “know and understand,” using “understand” to express ongoing knowledge, but there is a fundamental difference between knowing something and understanding it. Also, there is the fact that it would not just be one work that would convince people that Jesus was the Christ, but ongoing works that could be seen and believed, thus continuing to reinforce the knowledge that Jesus was the Christ.
“the Father is in union with me, and I am in union with the Father.” This is the use of “in” that refers to the sense of sphere and relation, which some Greek grammars refer to as the “static en.” It often refers to being in a relationship, and that is certainly true with the phrase, “in me” and “in the Father.” The preposition en (#1722 ἐν), like all prepositions, has many different meanings, depending on the context. In fact, the BDAG Greek-English lexicon says of en:

“The uses of this preposition are so many and various, and often so easily confused, that a strictly systematic treatment is impossible. It must suffice to list the main categories, which will help establish the usage in individual cases.”

What BDAG is saying is that there are so many meanings of the preposition en (“in”), that we need to get an understanding of its major uses and then we can gain a feel for how it is used in specific places. The important meaning of en for the study of these verses in John and the many other verses that speak of us being “in Christ,” “in the Lord,” “in him,” etc., is that it signifies a close association or relationship. The BDAG Greek-English lexicon says:

“Especially in Paul or Johannine usage, [en is used] to designate a close personal relation in which the referent of the ἐν-term is viewed as the controlling influence: under the control of, under the influence of, in close association with...In Paul the relation of the individual to Christ is very often expressed by such phrases as ἐν Χριστῷ [in Christ], ἐν κυρίῳ [in the Lord], etc.,...in connection with, in intimate association with, keeping in mind.”

In light of what the BDAG Greek-English lexicon is saying, some of the ways the preposition en can be translated include, “in connection with,” “in association with,” or “in union with.” When two people (or groups of people) are “in” one another, they are in relation to each other, and the degree of intimacy and connection is defined by the context and scope of Scripture. Thus, for example, in John 10:38, Jesus speaks of the Father being “in” him and he “in” the Father, which is certainly a very close relationship. Some time later, during the Last Supper, Jesus again says he is “in” the Father and the Father “in” him (John 14:10, 11). Then Jesus developed his teaching to show that because the Apostles follow Jesus he can say, “I am in my Father, and you in me, and I in you” (John 14:20).

When Jesus says to the Apostles, “you in me, and I in you,” he is using the same wording that he used when he speaks of being “in” the Father. In fact, Jesus prayed in John 17:21 that people will believe so “that they also may be in us” (in the Father and Jesus).

A study of Jesus’ teaching at the Last Supper shows that he placed a lot of emphasis on he and the Father being “in” each other (John 14:10, 11, 20; 17:21, 22), and similarly taught about the disciples being “in” him and he “in” them (John 15:4-7). Thus, just as God and Jesus have an intimate relationship and are in union with one another, so God, Jesus, and believers are to be in an intimate relationship with one another. This intimate relationship is expressed by the word “fellowship” in 1 John 1:3, and according to that verse our fellowship, i.e., our full sharing and intimate joint participation, is to be with each other, God, and Jesus. Thus 1 John 1:3 expresses by the word “fellowship” what the Gospel of John expresses by the word “in.”

Another word in John that expresses the union and fellowship between God, Jesus, and the believer is the word “one.” Jesus said that He and the Father were “one” (John 10:30), meaning one in purpose, unified, in intimate relationship with each other. The Jews were offended at his statement, but he explained it by saying he was “in” the Father and the Father “in” him (John 10:38). Jesus expanded what he said about He and his Father being “one” at the Last Supper, when three times he prayed about the believers being “one” just as God and Christ were one. He prayed, “that they may be one, just as we are” (17:11), and “that they may all be one, just as you, Father, are in me and I in you, that they also may be in us” (17:21), and “so that they may be one, just as we are one; I in them, and you in me, that they may be perfected into one” (17:22, 23). It is clear from all the uses of “one” that Jesus and God being “one” does not refer to them being “one God and of the same essence,” but rather one in purpose.

That the word “in” is referring to a relationship, a very close relationship, is clear from Jesus elucidating his teaching by using the same vocabulary and speaking of a branch being “in” a vine: “Remain in me, and I will in you. As the branch is not able to bear fruit by itself unless it remains in the vine…” (John 15:4). The branch is not “inside” the vine, nor is “in” referring to being of the same mystical essence. It is a simple truth that the branch is in union with the vine; in an intimate relationship with it and united for the same purpose: to produce fruit. Similarly, God and Christ are in an intimate relationship and are in union with each other, and believers are to be in union with them in their hearts and minds.

A few English versions make the relationship between God, Christ, and us somewhat clearer by translating the en (in) as “in union with,” or “unified with” instead of simply “in.” So, for example, in John 10:38, Charles Williams’ translation reads, “the Father is in union with me and I am in union with the Father” (he also uses “in union with,” rather than just “in” in other places in John). The New Testament translated by Edgar Goodspeed also uses “in union with” in John 10:38; 14:10, 11, 20; and “united with” in John 15:4, 5, 6, 7). The Complete Jewish Bible by David Stern also reads, “united with” instead of just “in” in John 10 and 14. The New English Bible uses “united with” in John 14:4. The point is that when the Bible says that the Father, Jesus, and believers are “in” each other, or being “one,” it refers to being in a relationship with each other; being in union with each other.

After the Christian Church started on the Day of Pentecost, and salvation via the New Birth became available, the Church became “in” Christ, “in union with” Christ, in an even more powerful way. Christians have the blessings they have by virtue of being united with Jesus Christ (see commentary on Ephesians 1:3).

Although the concepts of “in” and “one” in John 14-17 are very simple and point to a close relationship, the concepts are greatly complicated by the doctrine of the Trinity. According to the Trinity, Jesus and the Father are “one God,” so when the Bible says they are “in” each other and “one,” Trinitarians have to give these words a mystical meaning and say they refer to God and Jesus’ being unified in essence and one-and-the-same being. However, that understanding of “in” and “one” can come only when those words are taken away from the straightforward reading of the whole Gospel, especially the narrative of the Last Supper, and a pre-conceived understanding of the Trinity is read into the verses.

God being in Christ, Christ being in the disciples, the disciples being in Christ, and the branch being in the vine, should all have the same meaning in the same teaching.
If we simply read the entirety of Jesus’ teaching, using all the verses that use the same
Greek construction with “in” to guide our interpretation, the conclusion is an easy one.
God and Christ are “in” each other and want the disciples to be “in” them; and God and Christ are “one” with each other and want the disciples to be “one” with each other and “one” with them. God, Jesus, and the disciples should be in close relationship with each other.

Another difficulty caused by Trinitarian doctrine is that in John 17 Jesus prays that the disciples “may all be one, just as you, Father, are in me, and I in you, that they also may be in us... that they may be one even as we are one, I in them and you in me, that they may become perfectly one” (17:21-23). We should pay attention to the fact that when Jesus prayed, “that they may be one even as we are one,” the words “even as” are the translation of the Greek word kathos (#2531 καθοσ), which means “in the same manner,” “in the same way.” The only way all the disciples can be “one” is if they are united in heart and mind, and since Jesus was praying that the disciples would be unified “in the same manner” in which he and God were unified, we can know that Jesus was united with his Father by being of the same heart and mind. There is no difficulty here unless it is created by Trinitarian doctrine.

Meyer, himself a Trinitarian, confirms that the unity being spoken of in John is a unity of the heart and mind. He says that the unity referred to in John 10:38 is not “essential unity,” as in the Trinitarian understanding, which Meyer identifies as the “old orthodox explanation,” but rather it is a “dynamic unity.” He identifies this “dynamic unity” as “nothing else than that of inner, active, reciprocal fellowship” (Meyer’s Commentary on the New Testament). [For more on “in” and the relationship it refers to, see commentary on Ephesians 1:3]. (The Greek preposition eis can have the same meaning as en and refer to a relationship; see commentary on Romans 6:3).

Chapter 11

11:3. “friend.” The Greek is the verb phileō (#5368 φιλέω), “to be a friend to.” It is hard to translate the verb phileō in this context and keep the English as a verb. If we translated quite literally, which is simply not the way we would talk in English, we would have to say, “He who is your friend is sick,” and understand the verb to be “is your friend.”

Jesus had a special attachment to Lazarus. For a similar construction see commentary on “is a friend to,” in John 5:20, and for a more complete understanding of phileō, see the commentary on John 21:15.

11:4. “is not ending in death.” The Greek has an unusual construction here. The Greek phrase πρὸς θάνατον would literally mean something such as “with a view to death,” as if you could translate it, “This sickness is not with a view to death.” The point was not that Lazarus would not die, because in fact he was already dead (see commentary on John 11:6). The phrase means that the final result of the sickness would not be death. Jesus already knew he would raise Lazarus from the dead, something he plainly stated in 11:11. Newman and Nida write: “The Greek expression ‘this sickness is not to death’ means that ‘death will not be the final result of this sickness’ (A Translator’s Handbook on the Gospel of John). While Newman and Nida say “final result,” Robertson (Word Pictures in the New Testament) and Vincent (Vincent’s Word Studies) both say death would not be the “final issue.” H. Meyer translates the phrase: “it is not to have death for its result.” Also, the verb is in the present tense, although that makes it hard to translate into English without it being awkward English. Thus some translations read, “will not” end in death, while the REV attempts to keep the present tense verb and also communicate that the phrase is speaking of an ultimate result: thus, “is not ending in death.”

Jesus knew Lazarus was dead when the messengers arrived to say he was sick, something we learn by putting the record together, understanding the context, scope of Scripture, and geography. Nevertheless, he did not tell people that, but worded his statement in a way that was true without revealing what he knew. He did not say Lazarus would not die, what he said was that the final result of the sickness would not be death. If the messengers returned to Mary and Martha and told them exactly what Jesus had said, they could have rested in hope that no matter what happened to Lazarus, he would live.

If we translate the phrase, “This sickness will not end in death” (HCSB; NIV); or “This sickness will not lead to death” (ESV; NET), we can see what it is saying when we realize that Jesus knew Lazarus was already dead. For Jesus to say the sickness would not end in death when Lazarus was already dead was a way of saying he would raise Lazarus from the dead.

Some commentators think that Lazarus did not die until after the messengers left Jesus and headed back to Bethany, and Jesus knew that by revelation that Lazarus had just died and stayed where he was for two more days. It seems more likely, both from when the messengers would have arrived where Jesus was, and what Jesus said, that Lazarus was already dead when the messengers arrived.

“but to the glory of God.” The sickness would result in God’s being glorified. That does not mean God made Lazarus sick; no verse says that. God does not make people sick just to make them well. As to the preposition huper, it can mean “to do or suffer anything” (Thayer). [For more on how God was glorified, see commentary on John 11:6].

“glorified.” The Greek word is the verb doxazō (#1392 δοξάζω pronounced dox-ad'-zo), and it refers to glory: i.e., holding in honor, show and acknowledge the dignity, power, and worth of someone. It is related to the noun “glory,” which is doxa (#1391 δόξα). In the Greek and Roman culture, the idea of “glory” also often contained the idea of power or might, and that is the case here. It is not just that raising Lazarus from the dead would show Christ’s dignity and worth, but that it would also reveal that he and God have the power to raise the dead after an extended period of time, which the disciples needed to be completely convinced of, because they had to believe that Jesus could come back from the dead after he had been in the grave three days and nights (see commentary on John 11:6, “stayed two more days.” For more on glory being associated with power, see commentary on Romans 6:4).

11:5. “loved.” The Greek verb is agapaō (#25 ἀγαπάω), and is very important here. Agapē love (agapē is the noun form), is a love that often runs against the feelings. God so loved that He gave His Son when He did not want to. Christ so loved he gave his life when he did not want to. We are told to love our enemies. In this case, Jesus knew he had to follow the guidance he was being given by God even though his absence was very hard on Mary and Martha. Nevertheless, Jesus loved them with agapē love, and did the difficult, but loving, thing, following the revelation he got from the Father. Lazarus was already dead, and the people needed to be completely convinced that God could raise the dead even after three days (as to why four days were important, see commentary on John 11:6).

11:6. “so when.” The Greek phrase hōs oun that starts this verse should be translated as “so when” as many modern versions do (cp. BBE, HCSB, ESV, NET, NIV, RSV); or with a “therefore,” as “When, therefore,” or “Therefore, when” (cp. ASV, Darby, NASB, Rotherham, YLT). Although almost all versions end verse 5 with a period and start verse 6 as a new sentence, the text does not have to be punctuated that way. The Greek connective oun ties the two verses together. The point of verses 5 and 6 is so counterintuitive that it grabs our attention and requires study, reflection, and prayer. They say that it was because Jesus loved Mary, Martha, and Lazarus that he stayed where he was for two more days. But how can that be? There are several reasons, but a major part of the record is that when he heard from the messengers that Lazarus was sick, he also knew by revelation that he had already died (see commentary on “stayed two more days” below).

“stayed two more days.” When we piece together what we know about the character of God and Christ, the geography of the area, the four-day time period involved, and the beliefs of the people at the time, we can see both why Jesus knew Lazarus was already dead when the messengers arrived and told him Lazarus was sick, and also why Jesus waited two extra days to raise him from the dead.

As to the character of Christ, that he walked in love and would never let a person die from sickness if it could be prevented, nothing needs to be said. If Jesus heard that Lazarus was sick and could have arrived in time to keep him from dying, he would have left immediately to help him. However, it seems most likely that sometime around the arrival of the messengers, shortly before they arrived or just as they arrived, God let Jesus know Lazarus was already dead. That kind of revelation is quite in character with the entire Gospel of John. The first day that Jesus began to gather disciples he demonstrated that he walked with God by renaming Simon and calling him “Peter” (John 1:42), and very shortly after that he told Nathaniel that he saw him under the fig tree (John 1:48). John 2:25 says Jesus knew what was in people, and many other verses in John highlight and confirm his walk by revelation (cp. John 4:17, 18; 5:19, 20; 6:6, 70; 7:16; 13:10, 11, 38). God telling Jesus that Lazarus had died explains why he did not immediately leave for Bethany. F. F. Bruce writes: “…Lazarus must have died shortly after the message was dispatched, and Jesus knew that he had died” (The Gospel & Epistles of John). Leon Morris concurs, and writes that the “therefore” (or “so when” as the REV translates it) that opens verse 6, “cannot mean that Jesus deliberately waited for Lazarus to die. Indeed, the death must have already taken place when the messengers arrived” (The New International Commentary on the New Testament: The Gospel according to John). J. Dongell writes: “Lazarus must have died almost immediately after the messenger left to find Jesus. The delay of Jesus, then, was not designed to permit Lazarus to die” (John: A Bible Commentary in the Wesleyan Tradition). Newman and Nida write that “verses 17 and 39 suggest that Lazarus was already dead at the time Jesus received the message” (A Translators Handbook on the Gospel of John).
As to the geography and the timing of the four days, we do not know exactly where Jesus was staying. John had been baptizing at “Bethany” beyond the Jordan (John 1:28) and the exact location of that place was unknown. However, it is most likely close to the Jordan river across from Jericho (see commentary on John 1:28). Since the other Bethany, the town of Lazarus, was east of Jerusalem, it would not have been a full day’s journey to go from where Jesus was staying to where Lazarus was buried. Lazarus had been dead for four days when Jesus arrived. Leon Morris succinctly writes: “The four days are accounted for by allowing a day for the journey of the messengers, the two days that Jesus remained where He was, and a day for Jesus’ journey.” In the culture of Palestine, burials occurred the same day as the person died, and by the time Jesus arrived Lazarus had been in the tomb for four days (John 11:17).

A vital final thing we need to understand in order to understand the record is why Jesus would stay where he was for two more days. The answer to that question comes from the beliefs of the people. Rabbinic literature from after the time of the New Testament shows that the rabbis taught that the soul hung around the body for three days looking for an opportunity to re-enter it, but when decomposition set in on the fourth day, the soul left (cp. Leviticus Rabba (Rabbinical commentary) 18.1 (Leviticus 15:1)). Although that particular rabbinical commentary post-dates the New Testament, Jesus purposely staying away from Bethany for four days is good evidence that the belief was in existence at the time of Christ.

Even though Lazarus died close to the time of Jesus’ crucifixion, the death and resurrection of Christ was still unknown to the Apostles and disciples. Jesus had told them over and over about it, but they just could not grasp it. The cultural belief that the soul would not re-enter the body after 3 days would have made Jesus’ resurrection very hard for some people to believe. That Jesus raised Lazarus after four days would confirm to people that God could raise the dead even if they had been in the grave for four days.

Jesus’ powerful miracle of raising Lazarus showed that God could raise the dead even after four days, and helped people, even the Apostles, believe in the resurrection. This is clear from 11:15: “I am glad I was not there [to heal him] so that you may believe.” The raising of Lazarus did something besides get people to believe Jesus was the Messiah and believe in the resurrection. It was because of the miracle of raising Lazarus that the enemies of Jesus went in high gear in their plans to kill Jesus.

Jesus’ miracle in raising Lazarus after he had been dead was so great, and so undeniable, that many of the Jews believed in him (John 11:45). In contrast to those pure-hearted Jews, the religious leaders realized if they let Jesus go on doing miracles, “everyone will believe in him, and the Romans will come and take away both our Place and our nation” (John 11:48). Then Caiaphas prophesied that it was better for one man to die than for the nation of Israel to perish (John 11:50-52). The result of all this was that from the very day that Jesus raised Lazarus, “from that day on they made plans to kill him” (John 11:53). It was only a short time later, at the time of the Passover, that their plans were fulfilled, and Jesus was crucified.

It was Jesus’ delay to go to Lazarus that made the raising of Lazarus so amazing and undeniable, and started the intense religious fervor to arrest and kill Jesus. Jesus had said that Lazarus’ death was “to the glory of God, so that the Son of God may be glorified by it,” and now we can see the fullness of what he meant. The death and resurrection opened the door for God to be truly glorified by giving His only Son and providing for the salvation of mankind so that anyone who believed could have everlasting life.

11:9. “twelve hours in a day.” At the time of Christ, in both Jewish and Roman reckoning of time, the “day” was divided into 12 hours. Also, both the Jews and Romans divided the night into four “watches,” each being three hours long. (See commentary on Mark 6:48).

Jesus was obviously making a point in John 11:9 and 10 when he spoke about the hours of the day, but he did not explain it so there are many opinions about what he meant. We believe that here, like in many other places, Jesus is using something physical to make a spiritual point, actually more than one point. There are 12 hours in a day, and Jesus’ “day” was running out. He would soon die in Jerusalem. After Jesus’ day was over and he was gone, we would be left to “see in a mirror, darkly,” and would stumble (1 Cor. 13:12). Furthermore, Jesus knew that “night is coming, when no one will be able to work” (John 9:4). After the resurrection and ascension, people would not see clearly and stumble, and eventually the time of the Antichrist would come with its full darkness, when even the believers would be handed over to evil (Dan. 7:21; Rev. 13:7).

While it is “day” there is light, but the light is not “in him” (v. 10), it comes from outside him, from God. Jesus could go back to Judea even though the Jews were trying to kill him because he walked in the light, i.e., by the revelation God gave him. Thus it also seems clear that part of the meaning of what Christ said was that by walking by revelation a person could be safe even in situations that were normally very dangerous. This would turn out to be a good lesson for the disciples after Jesus’ ascension when they were being hunted by the authorities.

11:11. “fallen asleep.” The Greek verb is koímāō (#2837 κοιµάω), to fall asleep, to be asleep. Sleep is used as a euphemism and metaphor for death. See commentary on Acts 7:60.

“to awaken him.” In the Greek, the hina phrase indicates purpose and is also the reason the verb is subjunctive mood. But Jesus was not going so he “may” awaken him, he was going “to awaken him,” so that is the better translation here.

11:15. “rejoice.” The Greek word is chairō (#5463 χαίρω), which usually means “rejoice.” Although “glad” is within the semantic range of meanings of chairō, it did not seem to carry the full meaning of what Jesus was feeling, and perhaps even seemed too smug. It was a difficult time, emotionally. Jesus knew he was very close to his death, and his friend had just died and the family he loved was obviously very hurt. Yet we can have joy and rejoicing in those times because of what we see lies ahead. He was not happy about the death of Lazarus, or the four days he would wait to raise him from the dead, but he rejoiced for the disciples and that what happened to Lazarus would help them to believe in his own resurrection.

“that you may believe.” Jesus’ raising Lazarus from the grave after four days was clear proof that God could raise the dead even if they had been dead a long time. The historical evidence supports the fact that the rabbis taught that the soul (or spirit; life force) of the body hung around the dead body for three days, but by the fourth day, when decomposition had definitely started, it left and would not return. Thus, culturally, many people would likely have rejected Jesus’ resurrection solely on the basis that he had been dead for three days and nights. However, with Lazarus alive and among the disciples, that objection would melt away.

Although Jesus taught about his death and resurrection many times, the disciples just could not seem to grasp it until after the resurrection when Jesus opened their minds to the Scriptures. No doubt the fact that Jesus raised Lazarus helped the disciples believe in the resurrection, and also helped them witness about Jesus’ resurrection after he ascended to heaven. [For more information on the disciples understanding Christ’s suffering and death, see commentary on Luke 18:34].

11:16. “die with him.” Although Thomas generally has a bad reputation in Christian circles, verses like this one show he was a man of great devotion and courage. We do not know anything about the life of Thomas, but here he boldly declares that death with Jesus is better than life without him. So true; and such a wonderful spiritual lesson! Jesus taught that if we lose our life for his sake we will actually find our life.

Thomas was courageous, but his courage was based on misunderstanding. It seems clear that Thomas did not grasp that Jesus was the “Lamb of God” and had to die for the sins of the world (Heb. 2:17; 1 John 2:2), and he also was obviously ignorant of the fact that Jesus’ atoning death was something that Jesus alone could accomplish. No one else, by dying with Jesus, could help with the atonement.

11:17. “found.” The Greek word is heuriskō (ἓυρίσκω), and means to find; come upon; discover for oneself; find by searching, or accidentally, or by thought and reflection; to “see;” discover, understand, experience. Jesus knew Lazarus was dead four days, but now he sees that fact personally for himself.

11:18. “fifteen stadia.” About 1 ¾ miles (2.8 km). The Greek word is stadion (στάδιον), and it a stadia is about 600 feet (185 meters); or 1/8 of a Roman mile. Thus the 15 stadia is very close to 1¾ miles. People who lived in Palestine and went to the feasts likely were very familiar with the distance, but people outside of Palestine were not, and the distance is likely given in the text to show us how close to Jerusalem Jesus went, and therefore how dangerous the situation was for him and the Apostles.

The description, “fifteen stadia,” would have let everyone know the distance from Bethany to Jerusalem. Historically, the one stadion race was very popular in the Greco-Roman world, and was one of the events in the Panhellenic Games, of which the Olympic Games was one of the games. In fact from 776 to 724 BC, the stadion race was the only Olympic event. This stadion race, this 200 yard sprint, was so prestigious that the “Olympiad,” the span of four years, was named after the winner of the stadion race. The stadion unit of measurement got its name from the place where the race was held, which then came into Latin and English as a place where events were held: a stadium (the Latin and English are spelled the same way).

11:19. “many of the Jews.” This is one of the several indications that Lazarus and his sisters were a wealthy and influential family. It was Mary who poured the ointment on Jesus that was worth 200 denarii, or about a full year’s salary (John 11:2). It is not unlikely that some of the visitors were some of the “chief priests” that would soon try to kill Lazarus because of the witness he was to Jesus (John 12:10). These Jews were so willing to comfort the sisters concerning their dead brother, but they wanted him dead again when his living witness supported that Jesus was the Christ. This is the blindness and nature of evil: it dismisses reality and does not mind even murder if it furthers its cause.

11:20. “Mary remained seated.” The records of Martha and Mary show that Martha is the more active and perhaps even the more aggressive one. She is often belittled because she served while Mary sat and listened to the Lord (Luke 10:38-42). But then we do not know how much private time they and their brother got to spend with Jesus, and how many people needed attending to when Jesus visited their home. In this record there is no indication that Jesus called for Martha; it seems to be her more aggressive nature that she would take the initiative to go see him. Perhaps Mary was affected more deeply by the death of her brother; she is the only one who is said to be crying (11:33). Perhaps Mary felt betrayed by circumstances. She, like Martha, believed that had Jesus been around when Lazarus was still sick that Jesus could have healed him and kept him from dying (11:21, 32). And Jesus had been around until just shortly before Lazarus got sick, but his confrontation with the Jews was so intense that they were seeking to arrest him (10:39), and so he had left and traveled beyond the Jordan, out of Judea (10:40). That kind of circumstance naturally leaves people with an “If only” mindset.

Martha’s faith shines clearly in the record as she declares that she knows her brother will be in the resurrection. By staying home Mary missed out on one of Jesus’ very powerful and oft-quoted statements: “I am the resurrection and the life.”

11:25. “life.” Here the word “life” refers to “life in the Age to Come, which is clear from the next verse, John 11:26.” See commentary on John 5:40.

11:26. “in the Age to come.” A translation of eis ton aiona, “to (and through) the Age.” The Greek word eis does not just mean to, but fully into, and in this case, by inference, through it. The preposition dia might have been used, but dia has the added meaning of through and passing out of (Bullinger, Companion Bible, Appendix #104.) No resurrected person dies in the middle of the Messianic Age. In the mind of Jesus’ audience, the Messianic Age that was to come was established on earth and lasted forever. The details of it coming to an end and an eternal kingdom following it were not revealed in the Old Testament (Cp. John Schoenheit, The Christian’s Hope).

11:27. “believe.” The Greek word pisteuō (#4100 πιστεύω), is in the perfect tense, active voice, which generally refers to something that started in the past and still is continuing. Martha’s believing that Jesus was the Christ seems to be a firm conclusion she had reached some time earlier and had not wavered in, thus Nyland (The Source New Testament) translates it “firmly believe.” On the other hand, it is possible that the perfect tense is being used for emphasis: “I do believe” or “I really believe.”

11:32. “Lord, if you had been here, my brother would not have died.” Mary makes the same basic statement that Martha did, only the position of “my” in the Greek text is different. No doubt they had expressed the sentiment to each other many times, and both expressed it to Jesus (11:21, 32). But whereas Martha was more in control of her emotions, and enters into a dialogue with Jesus, Mary, upon seeing him, falls down at his feet crying.

11:33. “was deeply angered.” The Greek is embrimaomai (#1690 ἐμβριμάομαι), and it occurs 5 times in the New Testament. It has the overtone of anger or indignation, and can mean to sternly warn (Matt. 9:30; Mark 1:43) to harshly scold because of anger or indignation (Mark 14:5), or be moved with anger or indignation. Robertson (Word Pictures in the New Testament) writes, “First aorist middle indicative of embrimaomai, old verb (from en, and brimê, strength) to snort with anger like a horse. It occurs in the LXX (Da 11:30) for violent displeasure. The notion of indignation is present in the other examples of the word in the New Testament (Mark 1:43; 14:5; Matt. 9:30). So it seems best to see that sense here and in verse 38. The presence of these Jews, the grief of Mary, Christ’s own concern, the problem of the raising of Lazarus—all greatly agitated the spirit of Jesus (locative case tôi pneumati). He struggled for self-control.” The New Living Testament translates this phrase, “a deep anger welled up within him,” which catches the sense very well. Most modern versions say something such as Jesus was “deeply moved.” However, to our modern ears this seems like a touching sympathy, not an anger and indignation about what the Devil had been able to do in the situation, causing such pain and hopelessness. When faced with the pain of the sisters and even some of the crowd, and the realization that they thought that Jesus could have saved Lazarus if he were just sick but could do no more once he died, a deep anger and indignation arose within Jesus. Often that is what happens to men and women of God who are faced with not only the effect of the Devil’s work (destruction and death) but also the fact that the people are confused and deceived and thus faithless and hopeless. A deep resolve born of righteous anger wells up, and the sword of the Lord is bared to do its work as the believer steps forth to do the will of God.

“was troubled” (etaraxen heauton). First aorist active indicative of tarassô, old verb to disturb, to agitate, with the reflexive pronoun, “he agitated himself” (not passive voice, not middle). “His sympathy with the weeping sister and the wailing crowd caused this deep emotion” (Dods). Some indignation at the loud wailing would only add to the agitation of Jesus.

11:35. “burst into tears.” The Greek word is dakruô (#1145 δακρύω pronounced dack-roo’-ô). The verb literally means “to shed tears,” and thus means to cry or weep, and this is the only time it is used in the New Testament. The cognate noun, dakruon, which occurs ten times in the New Testament, is a “tear,” and the plural noun can refer to “tears” or “weeping.” Dakruô usually means to weep or cry quietly without loud wailing, and it means that here in John 11:35, and is in stark contrast to klaîô (#2799 κλαίω pronounced kly’-ô), which means to cry, weep, or mourn, usually with loud and open crying or mourning (John 11:31, 33). Klaîô occurs some 40 times in the New Testament. Here in John 11:35 dakruô is in the aorist tense, active voice, and as such most likely means “burst into tears.” (cp. Leon Morris, The Gospel According to John; also, C. K. Barrett; H. Meyer; Sanders). C. William’s translation renders it: “Jesus burst into tears.” In contrast, when Jesus got over the Mount of Olives and could see Jerusalem he “burst into sobs,” broke into audible crying. In Luke the Greek word is klaîô, while John 11:35 uses dakruô, but both verbs are in the aorist tense active voice, and refer to a sudden outburst of emotion. In Luke Jesus bursts into audible sobs, here he bursts into tears. Here he holds back his voice but experiences the deep emotion from the circumstances around him: the death of his friend, the pain of Mary and Martha, the misunderstanding of his Apostles, the ignorance and duplicity of the Jews.

Verses like this show us the true humanity of Jesus—that he was fully human and the Son of God, not God the Son. If he were God in the flesh he would have been better prepared for the situation and not, it seems clear, overcome with emotion. Indeed, Trinitarians have wrestled with this verse. Most point out that this verse shows Jesus’ true humanity, but that glosses over the fact that he was also supposedly God. God would not have been so overcome by emotion. For that to happen Jesus’ humanity would have had to have overridden his godhood, but how could that happen? So this verse has caused problems. Hippolytus of Rome (170-235) wrote that Jesus wept “to give us an example.” Peter Chrysologus (c. 380 – c. 450), a bishop and doctor in the Church, wrote that Jesus did not weep out of human weakness, but “because he was welcoming him [Lazarus] back.” Potamius of Lisbon, a bishop in the mid-4th century AD, wrote that one reason Jesus wept was to “moderate the sisters’ outpouring of grief.” Augustine (354-430) said that Jesus wept to teach us to weep. Basil of Seleucia (d. c. 460) taught that Jesus wept to set “a law with his tears...He defined the bounds of grief.” (All examples from Joel Elowsky, Ancient Christian Commentary on Scripture).

All of these explanations fundamentally deny that Jesus had true human emotions and was overwhelmed by them. But having strong emotions is not a sin, and not even a sign of weakness. Indeed, quite the opposite. Jesus’ strong emotional reaction in the situation shows how deeply he was both in touch with how he felt (he did not have a head-heart disassociation problem), and that he had very deep emotions. No wonder Isaiah foretold that Jesus would be “a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief” (Isa. 53:3 ESV). Thus, in his sobbing and weeping, Jesus again sets a standard that we strive to emulate: having very deep feelings, but not losing control of ourselves in the midst of those feelings.

11:36. “was a friend to him.” The Greek is φιλέω (#5368 φιλέω). It is hard to translate the verb φιλέω in this context and keep the English as a verb. Jesus had a special attachment to Lazarus. See commentary on John 5:20 and 11:3, on “is a friend to.” For a more complete understanding of φιλέω, see commentary on John 21:15.

11:38. “deeply angered.” See verse 33. The anger that Jesus initially felt when he saw the pain and weeping of Mary and the Jews subsided (as emotions do) as they all walked to Lazarus’ tomb. However, upon arriving at the tomb, the anger was rekindled.

11:42. “so they believe that you sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

11:48. “our Place.” The word “place” was a designation of the Temple (see commentary on Matthew 24:15; topos.)

11:50. “People.” This is a good example of the use of the word “People” as meaning the Jewish nation, “the Jews,” hence the capital “P.” See commentary on Matthew 2:4.

11:51. “Now he did not say this of himself.” Before the Day of Pentecost God could place His gift of holy spirit upon people so that they would accomplish His work. This is a good example. Caiaphas, though not a godly man, was still High Priest and God placed holy spirit upon him at least so that he could give an accurate prophecy about Jesus, which then became a prime motivator for them to seek his death (see v. 53). This is an example of how God works in history to bring about His purposes without the need of perfect foreknowledge. God, by His power, can influence things He wants accomplished.

11:53. “plans.” The middle voice of the verb indicates they worked together (cp. NASB).

11:54. “Ephraim.” A city close to the Arabah desert, about 13 miles (20 km) NNE of Jerusalem. From here Jesus went north through Samaria, into Galilee, across the Jordan.
River, traveled south through Perea, crossed the Jordan River again and came to Jericho, and then traveled west to Jerusalem. The Gospel of John omits this entire final itinerary of Jesus. See commentary on Luke 17:11.

11:56. “were seeking.” zeteō (#2212 ζητέω), “to seek.” The verb is in the imperfect tense, active mood, so the Jews were seeking Jesus. Caïphas had given a prophecy that one man should die for the nation instead of the nation being destroyed, and so the Jews were now zealously seeking to kill Jesus.

“Surely he will not come to the feast?” The form of the question assumes strongly that Jesus will “absolutely not” (the Greek uses two negatives for emphasis: ou mê) dare to come this time (Robertson, Word Pictures in the New Testament). The translation in many modern versions loses the fact that the question expects a “no” answer. This shows that the people knew their leaders were trying to arrest and kill Jesus, and so they assumed that he would know that too, and not show up at Passover.

12:1. “six days before Passover.” As Lenski points out in his commentary on this verse, when the Greeks counted, they counted backward from the termination, and the Passover fell on the 14th of Nissan (that was the day the lamb was killed at about 3 PM; the Feast of Unleavened Bread started the next day, the 15th, which was at sunset). That made six days before the Passover the 8th of Nissan, which was a Saturday.

This chronology poses a problem for those people who believe what tradition teaches, that Jesus was crucified on Friday, because it would mean that the simple and straightforward reading of the text would be that Jesus walked from Jericho to Bethany on the Sabbath, a distance of some 15 miles (24 km), far greater than the standard “Sabbath day’s journey,” (just over ½ mile or .8 km) allowed by the law the religious leaders enforced. This leads to some very inventive solutions.

A common solution is that Jesus walked almost to Bethany on Friday (within ½ mile or .8 km), and then walked into Bethany on the Sabbath. At face value, however, this is absurd. For one thing, there are no known good resting places on the downhill slope of the Mount of Olives that close to Jerusalem. The “Jericho Road” had an inn on it (cp. the parable of the Good Samaritan; Luke 10:34), but it would have been much further down the slope toward Jericho. But the real problem with that solution is that no one who has walked uphill for some 15 miles (24 km) would stop within a few minutes of their destination and friends and food. There would simply be no reason for such a halt.

Lenski, Hendriksen, and other commentators say that the Passover Lamb was killed on Thursday the 14th, so that day was “Passover,” and thus the Last Supper that Jesus ate with his disciples was the Passover. Then Jesus’ death was Friday, Nisan 15. In that scenario, six days before “Passover” (Thursday) was the previous Friday, and thus Jesus was free to travel on that day. Many commentators have a problem with that construction of events, and rightly so, because Jesus could not have been the “real” Passover Lamb if he was not killed when the Passover Lamb was being killed in the Temple.

It is suggested by some commentators that Jesus simply broke the Sabbath and acted in a similar way to when his disciples picked grain on the Sabbath. But this was very different. First, there was no law about eating raw grain on the Sabbath. You could not light a fire and cook, but that was not what the disciples were doing. They were eating the raw standing grain just the same as they would have taken a drink from a flowing brook.

Second, this time Jesus was accompanied by hundreds, perhaps thousands, of followers, and they would not have broken the Sabbath and would have doubted that Jesus was the Messiah if he had done so.

A more reasonable solution, but an unlikely one, is that the sun set just as Jesus was entering the Bethany area, which means he would have walked the last \( \frac{1}{2} \) mile to Bethany in the dusk on the Sabbath. The problem with that solution is its improbability. Jesus had left Jericho many miles and many hours earlier, and, as anyone who hikes long distances knows, it is very hard to judge any arrival time with much accuracy. Jesus and the people following him would have known that the next day was the Sabbath and allowed plenty of time for the journey, which could be made in one long day. The thought that Jesus and the people following him would have cut their timing so close and may have had to stop traveling and be stuck for the Sabbath day in the open only a mile or so from Bethany and Jerusalem is improbable in the extreme. People knew they could not travel on the Sabbath and made sure not to get stranded in a difficult place. Furthermore, if Jesus arrived on the Sabbath to Bethany, which was a small village on the east slope of the Mount of Olives, it is likely that a good portion of the people with him would have needed to go to Jerusalem to get food and lodging. But to do that those people would have to travel more than a Sabbath day’s journey, because they had already walked part of a Sabbath day’s journey to reach Bethany, and so they could not go on to reach Jerusalem without breaking the law.

The “problem” caused by John 12:1 is not a problem at all. Jesus was crucified on Wednesday the 14\textsuperscript{th} of Nissan, and his arrival in Bethany was six days earlier, Thursday, the 8\textsuperscript{th} of Nissan. [For more information on the last week of Jesus’ life, see commentary on John 18:13; 19:14; and Luke 23:50].

“came to Bethany.” He was traveling up from Jericho. This is clear from reading the record in John and comparing it to the other Gospels. [For more information of Jesus’ travels in the last weeks of his life, see commentary on Luke 17:11].

“out from among the dead.” See Romans 4:24. Wuest: “out from among the dead.”

12:2. “So they made him a supper.” This event is out of chronological order, in John coming before Jesus enters Jerusalem (John 12:12), and in Matthew and Mark after he did. There is no problem with that, because the chronology is not being emphasized here, but rather that the people would have it on their heart to honor Jesus, and thus the supper is mentioned at the beginning of his last time in Jerusalem.

“Martha was serving.” The anointing occurred in the house of Simon the Leper (Matt. 26:6; Mark 14:3), which is why John specifically says Martha was serving. If the supper occurred at the house of Mary and Martha that would never be stated because it would be obvious and expected.

“Lazarus was reclining with him.” Thus Lazarus is mentioned as an honored guest. This would never be mentioned if the supper was at Lazarus’ house.

12:3 “pound.” A Roman pound was 12 ounces, three-quarters of our English pound. “Spikenard” is a plant native to northern India and was a favorite perfume in the ancient world. The prefix “spike” refers to the shape of the plant. The best nard was imported from India in sealed alabaster boxes, which were only opened on special occasions. The Roman historian Pliny commented on the expensive nature of Indian nard (Pliny; Natural History, 12. 24-26 [41-46]). For “perfume of pure nard” see Lenski.

“anointed the feet.” This record of Mary pouring the oil on Jesus occurs in Matthew 26:6-13; Mark 14:3-9; and John 12:1-8. The anointing occurred in the house of Simon the Leper (Matt. 26:6; Mark 14:3), which is why John specifically says Martha was serving. If the supper occurred at the house of Mary and Martha that would never be stated because it would be obvious and expected.

At first glance there seems to be a contradiction between Matthew, Mark, and John, because Matthew and Mark say the ointment was poured on Jesus’ head, while John 12:3 says Mary poured the ointment on Jesus’ feet. The key is to realize that a flask of oil worth a year’s salary would be quite large, and covered both his head and feet. That is why Jesus said that the woman “poured this perfume on my body” (Matt. 26:12).

12:6. “money box.” The Greek word, glossokoman is from glossa, “tongue” and komeo, “to keep, to preserve.” It technically referred to a small box or container in which reeds for wind instruments were kept, but, as with all boxes, eventually all kinds of things are kept there. “Money box” is probably better than “money bag” since the reeds would never be kept in a bag.

12:7. “It was that she kept this until now for the day of my burial.” The similar records in Matthew 26:12 and Mark 14:8 are clearer, and from them we build the full meaning of this record. Lenski does a wonderful job. “…it was that…” see Robertson’s Word Pictures in the New Testament. We added until now for clarity’s sake. Versions such as the NASB, “…Let her alone, in order that she may keep it for the day of My burial…,” make no sense—she had just poured out the oil, how could she now keep it? Or, “Leave her alone. It was intended that she keep this for the day of my burial.” In other words, she had intended to keep this for Jesus’ burial anyway, but had poured it out now.

12:9. “the common people of the Jews” This is the partitive use of the preposition ek (#1537 ἐκ) and the genitive case. The partitive usage indicates a part of some greater whole; in this case, it is a part of the whole group of Jews that have gathered in a crowd.

“out from among the dead.” See commentary on Romans 4:24. Wuest: “out from among the dead.”

12:10. “that they might put Lazarus to death…” This is religion at its worst. The religious leaders were willing to kill an innocent man to protect your power and doctrine. The Devil’s way is to steal, kill and destroy, and you know his followers by their fruit.

“Hosanna.” The people who were shouting praises to Jesus as he entered Jerusalem were for the most part not the same group as the group that shouted, “Crucify him” only a few days later. See commentary on Luke 23:21 and 27.

“Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδοῦ), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

12:17. “meanwhile.” Cp. HCSB. The Greek word is oun (#3767 οὖν), it is understood to be used here as a continuation of narrative (BDAG, def. 2), which the translation “meanwhile” captures beautifully here.

“crowd.” This is the crowd (the multitude of people) who followed Jesus from Jericho, where Jesus had performed miracles such as healing blind Bartimaeus and his blind companion (Matt. 10:29-34; Mark 10:46-52; Luke 18:35-43). It is different from the crowd in verse 18, who were the people who came out of Jerusalem to see Jesus when you heard he was approaching and went out to see and welcome him (John 12:12, 13).
(There were two crowds that merged into one huge multitude as Jesus reached the top of the Mount of Olives).

“out from among the dead.” See Romans 4:24. Wuest: “out from among the dead.”

12:18. “the crowd went and met him…” A different crowd than the crowd specifically mentioned in verse 17 (see commentary on John 12:17).

12:19. “You see that you are gaining nothing. Look!, the world has gone after him.”
The religious leaders had been looking for Jesus to arrest him. They can find him now easily enough! But they dare not to take him.

12:25. “is overly attached to.” The Greek is phileō (#5368 φιλέω). Although most versions say “love his life,” in doing so we confuse agapē love (“love” in the REV) and phileō love. Phileō love has an attachment, and it is the attachment between good friends.
However, we would not say, “If anyone is a friend of his life…..” We could say, “is attached to his life,” but that would be confusing because there is an appropriate attachment to life that we must all have or we would commit suicide during difficult times. For a more complete understanding of phileō, see the note on John 21:15.

“life” (first 2x). The Greek word is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoo-kay’), often translated “soul.” The Greek word has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person or animal; an individual person; or attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. Here it refers to the physical life of the body, which is why most versions translate it “life,” which is accurate in this context. This is one of the many verses that shows that psuchē, soul, is not immortal. [For a more complete explanation of psuchē, “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’”].

“life in the Age to come.” In this phrase, “life” is zōē (#2222 ζωή; pronounced zō-ā’), life, animal life that animates the body. This verse contrasts two words that are used for “life.” psuchē, soul, is used more broadly, while zōē is used more specifically of the “life” in man and animals. This verse could be translated: “Whoever is overly attached to his soul loses it, and whoever hates his soul in this world will keep it, resulting in life in the Age to come. “Life in the Age to come” is the everlasting life that begins with the new Messianic Age, the Millennial Kingdom. [See Appendix 2: “Life in the Age to Come”].

12:27. “troubled.” The Greek word is tarassō (#5015 ταράσσω), and it has a broad range of meaning, including, to trouble, agitate, disturb, make restless, stir up, be in fear or dread. This record in John occurs in the last few days of Jesus’ life, and Jesus was agitated and troubled in his soul. Man’s redemption was on the line, and his task was neither easy or fun. There were many details that had to happen exactly on time and as prophesied. The night of his arrest he was even more deeply troubled; see commentary on Matthew 26:38.

12:31. “ruler.” The Greek word is archon (#758 ἀρχων), which is from archē, “first,” and it means the one who is first, thus the “ruler, commander, chief,” etc. The Slanderer (Devil) is indeed the “ruler of this world.” Although most Christians believe that God is the ruler of the world, all we have to do is look around us at life to realize this world is not being ruled by God. God gave the world to Adam and Eve to steward (Gen. 1:28). In the Fall, the Devil somehow took the control of the world from Adam and Eve. It immediately began to show the effects of the Devil’s rulership both in the physical aspects of the world (“the ground is cursed” “it will produce thorns and thistles;” Gen. 1:17, 18), and in his effect over people (Cain killed his brother Abel and lied about it; Gen. 4:8, 9). The Devil told Jesus he had been given authority over the world (Luke 4:6). Furthermore, it is because the Devil is the ruler of this world and has authority over it that he could offer that authority to Jesus, and Jesus did not deny the Devil’s claim (Luke 4:6). [For more on the power the Devil exercises as the “ruler” and “god” of this world, see commentary on 2 Cor. 4:4 and 1 John 5:19. For more names and characteristics of the Devil, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”].

“of this world.” The Greek word for “world” is kosmos (#2889 κόσμος), and it has a wide range of meanings in Greek, but here it just has a standard meaning of “world,” the inhabited earth.

“Now the ruler of this world will be cast out.” The Adversary had been able to go into heaven, into the presence of God (Job 1) when he wanted, and thus he “accuses them before our God day and night” (Rev. 12:10). However, before Armageddon, the Adversary will be cast out of heaven by Michael and his army (Rev. 12:7-10). The ruler of the world will first be cast out of heaven (Revelation 12:8 and 9) and then out of the world as we know it when he is chained in the Abyss (Rev. 20:1-3). Christ was anticipating that event not many years after his death. He did not know the Sacred Secret.

12:34. “We have heard from the law that the Christ will remain forever.” In this verse, the people are using the word “law” in its broader sense of the entire Old Testament, not just the five books of Moses. The people correctly understood that when the Messiah finally set up his Kingdom it would last forever. What they did not see was that would happen the second time the Messiah came. The first time he would be killed, resurrected, then ascend to heaven. There is no verse that specifically says that the Messiah would live forever and not die. However, that doctrine was being taught, based on all the prophecies that his kingdom would never end, such as Psalm 110:4 (“You are a priest forever”), Isaiah 9:7; Ezekiel 37:25; Daniel 2:44; 7:14. There were Jewish teachings that the Messiah would die, so what the crowd is voicing here was not the only Jewish teaching, but was probably the predominant one, and the one that had to be overcome for the people to understand what happened to Jesus.

“with the result.” The Greek is a hina with a verb in the subjunctive mood result clause, see Matthew 2:15 entry, “resulting in…what was spoken being fulfilled.” For commentary on this passage see entry on Matthew 13:13. To fully understand this passage, we must see how Matthew’s record portrays the human side of the events, John’s the spiritual side, and Mark and Luke’s records combine the two into one.

Their decision of unbelief resulted in the word of Isaiah being fulfilled. The decision to believe or disbelieve was the free choice of those present. Hence, the verse should not be translated as a purpose clause: “they did not believe in him, in order that the word which Isaiah the prophet spoke might be fulfilled…” (NAB). Those who were unbelieving did not intend on fulfilling the passage in Isaiah, neither did God overstep their freewill and control their belief with the purpose of fulfilling the word. Rather, this is a result clause, indicating that these Jews’ unbelief, their own free decision of unbelief, resulted in this passage’s fulfillment. See also John 15:25 entry on “but let the word…be fulfilled” for a similar passage employing a command clause.

12:39. “for this reason.” The reason refers to what was spoken in verse 37: they still did not believe in him. It was because of this persistent unbelief that they were hardened. See commentary below, and on Matthew 13:13.

“they were not able to believe.” The people were “not able to believe” because they had allowed their hearts to become hardened to the possibility that Jesus could be the Messiah. They had let their interpretation of the Law blind them to the truth being revealed through Jesus’ teaching and actions. For example, they decided that healing on the Sabbath was wrong, but God never said it was, and Jesus proved that it was not (Matt. 9:12-14; Luke 13:14-17). So when Jesus healed on the Sabbath, instead of being open to the possibility they were wrong, and adjusting their doctrine, they arrogantly held to their doctrine and concluded Jesus was a sinner (John 9:24). Eventually their hearts were so hard and blind that they were not able to believe based on the signs that Jesus did. When a person’s heart becomes that hard, it takes much love and prayer to change it.

12:40. Quoted from Isaiah 6:10.

“he has blinded…hardened.” Quoted from Isaiah 6:10. We need to realize this was a Semitic way of saying that God permitted the people to be blinded, and permitted their hearts to be hardened. This is the idiom of permission, just the same as Exodus 4:21. (Bullinger; Figures of Speech; “idiom”; see commentary on Romans 9:18). “Active verbs were used by the Hebrews to express, not the doing of the thing, but the permission of the thing which the agent is said to do” (p. 823. Cp. Don’t Blame God, chapter five).

Rotherham’s Emphasized Bible translates Exodus 4:21 as, “…but I will let his heart wax bold [hard], and he will not suffer [allow] the people to go.” Then his marginal note reads, “…the translation…is thoroughly justifiable on the two grounds (1) of the known character of God, and (2) the well-attested latitude of the Semitic tongues, which are accustomed to speak of occasion as cause.” God has given mankind freedom of will, and when we make up our minds to do something, God respects the free will we have and allows us to make bad choices. That is why He so often in His word reminds us, even commands us, to make good choices. These people who were blinded and hardened had made a series of bad choices in their lives, and even held to their error when they could have repented and changed. However, not everyone was so hardened. Only two verses later (12:42) we read about leaders of the Jews who were not hardened and who believed on Jesus.

12:42. “even many of the rulers believed in him.” This verse shows the great power of fear and of wanting success in this life. The versions are divided as to the wording of the verse. Some versions read as if the verse is saying “many people, including some of the rulers, believed in him” (NAB, NJB, NRSV), while other versions read like the verse is saying “many of the rulers believed in him” (HCSB, NET, YLT). The natural reading of the Greek text is that many of the rulers believed. However, that reading seems difficult to believe because we wonder, “If many of the rulers believed, why do we not see more evidence of it? Where is the support from these leaders that Jesus needed?” The answer to those questions is in the verse itself. These rulers loved their earthly life and positions of authority, and knew that if they openly confessed what they believed then they would lose their position in the synagogue and with it the glory of men they received every week. It is verses such as this that show us the Word of God is living and real, and as relevant today as when it was written, for it is clearly true that many people in authority do not speak up about what they really believe because of fear of losing their earthly possessions or positions. Jesus Christ often tried to help people deal with earthly concerns, and told us to not be afraid of those who could only kill the body, but to fear God (Matt. 10:28). To those to whom much has been given, much will be required (Luke 12:48).

12:44. “Jesus had cried out and said.” The Greek sentence starts with the word de, which is often the signal of a new subject and left untranslated, as we have here (cp. CJB, KJV, NLT). John 12:36 said Jesus left the feast and was not in public, so he cannot now be speaking in public. Verses 12:44-50 are a continuation, and in a sense a summary of what he had spoken publicly. In that light, it is not correct to translate the de as “then,” as many versions do, for this is something that Jesus had said earlier, not a continuation of his teaching when at the feast. The verbs “cried out” and “said” are in the aorist tense in Greek, and thus in this context indicate something that had already occurred. We could and should ask, “Why would God separate this part of what Jesus said from the body of his teaching, and place it alone by itself?” The answer seems to be that this summary is the “chewy caramel center,” of what he said, a very important and central point to his teaching.

“but in him who sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

12:45. “him who sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

12:46. “…a light.” Not just “light” as some translations have, although the Greek could be read that way. Jesus was “the light, and “a light,” because other prophets were light too (John 5:35).

12:49. “speak.” The English does not do justice to what is being communicated here. The difference between “say” and “speak” is that “say” in the Greek refers to the communication, the message, but “speak” can, in the range of the word, refer to the utterance itself. Thus, Jesus got even the tone of what he said from God (Cp. Lenski).

“for I did not speak on my own.” This verse shows that Jesus received what he taught from his father, God. [For more information on Jesus not speaking on his own, see commentary on John 8:28].

“the father who sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. [For more information and in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57].

12:50. “His commandment is life.” The “commandment” is not in and of itself life, as if a person could have everlasting life by just knowing the commandments. This is the figure of speech Metonymy (metonymy of the effect), whereby the commandment is substituted by metonymy for believing and obeying the commandment, which is what produces the effect of having everlasting life (cp. Bullinger, Figures of Speech). A similar example in common English is the saying, “knowledge is power.” Knowledge is not power unless the knowledge is recognized for what it is and then properly applied. So just as “knowing and obeying” the commandment results in everlasting life, “recognizing and properly applying knowledge results in power.

Jesus had been saying that he was speaking on the authority of God, and teaching about believing and obeying what he was saying (12:44-47). The metonymy emphasizes the “commandment,” which is from God, instead of the believing and obeying, which is works that people do.

“life in the Age to come.” This is the everlasting life that begins with the new Messianic Age, the Millennial Kingdom. [For more information on the translation “life in the Age to come,” see Appendix 2: “Life in the Age to Come”].

“the things that I speak, I speak just as the Father has said to me.” This verse shows that Jesus received what he taught from his father, God. See commentary on John 8:28.

Chapter 13

13:2. “the Slanderer.” This is “the Devil.” The Greek is diabolos (#1228 διάβολος). The Greek word diabolos means “slanderer,” the one who slanders others, and that is a primary characteristic of the Devil. He has no regard for a person’s reputation or the illicit means he uses to discredit and destroy people. Slander is a primary tactic of the Devil. [For information on the names of the Devil, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”].

13:5. “began to wash the disciples’ feet.” This was much easier to do in Jesus’ world than it would be in the modern Western culture, for the people eating were reclining and their feet were very accessible.

“let the scripture be fulfilled.” Judas was not fatalistically damned to fulfill this passage (see also commentary on John 17:12, “resulting in the scripture being fulfilled”). Rather than a purpose clause, “so that the scripture might be fulfilled,” the phrase should be understood as a command clause. [For more on command clauses, see entries on John 9:3, “let the works of God be revealed in him,” and John 15:25, “but let the word… be fulfilled”]. The HCSB translates this phrase as a command, but uses the word “must.” See comments on John 15:25 for why “let” is a better translation of the command clause. See also Nigel Turner, Grammatical Insights into the New Testament, p. 147-48 as cited in Boyd, God at War, p. 379.

13:19. “will believe.” The verb “believe” is in the subjunctive mood, but that comes from the hina ("so that") at the start of the phrase that requires a subjunctive. Jesus was not telling the apostles things ahead of time just so they “may” believe,” but so that they will believe.

13:20. “him who sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.
13:24. “nods” The Greek is clear, and means to signal with a nod of the head. “…to give a nod; to signify by a nod…followed by an infinitive of what one wishes to be done,” John 13:24; Acts 24:10. (From Homer down; the Septuagint Prov. 4:25) (Thayer). Peter was not close enough to John to whisper, and if he spoke it loudly, Jesus would have heard also. The intimate connection between Peter and John shows clearly here. Peter simply nods his head and John knows what he should do.

13:26. “piece.” The word “morsel,” used in many versions, in today’s English communicates a very good tasting bite of something. The Greek does not necessarily mean that the piece tasted good, just that it was a small piece. So we used “piece.”

13:27. “the Adversary.” The Greek word for Adversary is Satanas (Σατανᾶς), which has been transliterated into “Satan” in most versions. This causes the meaning of the word, which is important, to be lost. For more information on it, see the note on Mark 1:13. For information on the names of the Devil, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”.

Luke 22:3 tells us the Adversary entered in Judas earlier, and thus Judas had already gone to the priests to betray Jesus, which had started the process of betrayal. That was why Jesus says, “What you are doing…” In the Greek text, the verb “do” is a “conative present” (Robertson, Grammar, p. 880; cp. Lenski), thus it means “are doing.” Furthermore, the words usually translated “do quickly” should be translated as, “do more quickly.” Lenski writes, “The adverb tachion [“quickly”] is comparative and does not mean “quickly” (our versions) but “more quickly..,” Robertson writes, “Sometimes the comparative form is used absolutely…that is because the context makes the point perfectly clear” (Robertson, Grammar, p. 664). Robertson goes on to say that Jesus’ statement to Judas may have well been the factor that caused Judas to act as quickly as he did, after all, it is clear from Scripture that Judas had been exposed in front of the other apostles: “Jesus testified and said, ‘Truly, truly, I say to you, that one of you will betray me. It is he to whom I will give this piece of bread when I have dipped it.’ So when he had dipped the piece, he gives it to Judas” (John 12:21-26 abridged).

Jesus knew that he had to be the Passover lamb that year, which meant that Judas did have to move quickly. We do not know, but it well may be that Judas and the religious leaders might have preferred to arrest Jesus after Passover. After all, Jesus had touched the lives of many people all over Israel, and many of those people would be in Jerusalem for Passover. The possibility of a riot could have made an arrest at Passover less desirable than simply waiting a week until all the crowds were gone. But now that option was not available. Jesus had exposed Judas in front of the other apostles. Even though it is likely that the other apostles did not understand what Jesus meant when he spoke of being betrayed, Judas did, and the evil in his heart convicted him. He left the room immediately and arranged for Jesus to be arrested that very night.

13:31. “now is the Son of Man glorified.” Jesus was not yet literally glorified when this was spoken, yet in the Greek, the verb “glorified” doxazō (δοξάζω) is in the aorist tense, which would be well represented in English as “has been glorified.” This is the idiom of the prophetic perfect, when something that was absolutely going to happen in the future was spoken of as if it had already happened to emphasize the fact that the event was surely going to happen.

Robertson (Grammar of the Greek New Testament, p. 847) points out that we know the two aorist “glorify” verbs in verse 31 refer to a future event because the verbs... are in the future tense in verse 32. We also know it is a prophetic perfect because the actual glorification did not occur until the resurrection, but Jesus’ arrest and the process of his death leading to the resurrection started that night.

The prophetic perfect is a very common idiom, but translating it can be very difficult because if we translate it as a future event, true to facts but not representing the certainty of the original text, we lose what the actual text is saying and the certainty being communicated by the past tense, but the meaning is clear. Hence the NLT translation: “Jesus said, ‘The time has come for the Son of Man to enter into his glory, and God will be glorified because of him.’” However, if we translate the verb as a past tense we risk confusing and reader and leading them to the wrong conclusion. [For more on the prophetic perfect, see commentary on Ephesians 2:6].

13:32. “immediately.” This is a hyperbole, an exaggeration (cp. Bullinger, Figures of Speech, “hyperbole”). It would be very soon.

13:34. “you also are to love one another.” The Greek is a hina with a verb in the subjunctive mood command clause. For an explanation of this construction, see John 9:3 entry, “let the works of God be revealed in him.”

13:37. “life.” The Greek word is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoo-kay’), often translated “soul.” The Greek word has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person or animal; an individual person; or attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. Here it refers to the physical life of the body, which is why most versions translate it “life,” which is accurate in this context. This is one of the many verses that shows that psuchē, soul, is not immortal. [For a more complete explanation of psuchē, “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’”].

“the rooster will absolutely not crow before you have denied me three times.” Jesus can make this statement, knowing that God would back him up. God backed up Joshua when the sun stood still (Josh. 10:14), and He backed up Samuel when he called upon Yahweh (1 Sam. 12:17). Our relationship with God and Jesus is one of fellow-laborers. We can make requests of God, and He can answer them (we should be praying, asking, all the time). Jesus could make this statement, knowing that God would honor it. It is not hard for God to make a rooster crow, or keep a rooster from crowing.

14:1. “Continue to trust in God and continue to trust in me.” This occurs in the shadow of Judas’ betrayal, Peter’s denial, and the events of Christ’s last night, when he will not look like the Christ at all, but rather appear to be conquered. So the Lord is not simply commending belief in God to disciples who already believe in God, but telling them of the necessity to continue to trust God and his messiah considering what is about to happen. This use of the present tense is known as the “iterative” present (cp. Wallace, Exegetical Syntax, pp. 520-21).

14:2. “are many places to live.” The word translated “mansions” (KJV), or “rooms” (NIV) is monē (#3438 μονή, pronounced moe-nay’), and it is translated “dwelling places” in the NASB. It refers here to a place to live. In God’s “house” (i.e., kingdom) are many places to live. The fact that Jesus says, “are” many places to live causes some commentators to assert that the places already exist, and people are living in them in heaven. From the scope of Scripture we can see that is not the case. Things in heaven are often spoken of by the Jews as if they physically exist when they exist in the mind of God and will come into concretion in the future. So, for example, Jesus taught us to store up our treasure in heaven as if there were already storehouses there where things could be stored (Matt. 6:20). But there is nothing like that in heaven and we cannot put things there. Similarly in Matthew 5:12 Jesus spoke of people’s reward as being “in heaven,” when he meant that God kept a record of it and would bestow it on the believer at the resurrection. Similarly, God was keeping track of the believers and would have a place for each of them to live in the Kingdom. Thus one of the blessings of the Messianic Kingdom on earth will be that “Every man will sit under his own vine and under his own fig tree” (Micah 4:4 NIV84, cp. Zech. 3:10).

“I go to prepare a place for you.” This statement has been misunderstood due to the traditional teaching that when people die, their soul goes to heaven and lives with God and Jesus forever. Scripture teaches that Jesus will come to earth and set up a Kingdom that lasts 1000 years; then there is a final war; then a White Throne Judgment; then the New Jerusalem, a gigantic city with streets of gold, descends from heaven and lands on earth, [For more on the Millennial Kingdom, see commentary on Matthew 5:5. For more on the final war and the New Jerusalem see Revelation 20-22].

The statement “I go to prepare a place for you” is very broad. We should not define our understanding of Christ’s reign on earth or the future New Jerusalem in terms of this one statement, but rather understand this statement in terms of what we know about the coming Kingdom. We do not know much about what Jesus’ preparation for the future earth includes. Jesus said, “I go to prepare a place for you,” at the Last Supper, and the indication is that although Christ said he did not know when his Second Coming would be, he did think it was going to be very quickly, while that generation was still alive (Matt. 24:34). He was thinking there was lots of preparation to do very quickly.

No doubt Jesus knew there was a lot to be done before God’s kingdom could come on earth. He had to fully understand his role as king and Lord over God creation. Also, there was much to do when Jesus set up his kingdom that had to be prepared for. Satan had to be defeated (Rev. 19:11-20:3), the people of earth judged (Matt. 25:31-46), assignments had to be given to resurrected believers who would have jobs in the Millennial Kingdom, the New Temple and New Jerusalem had to be built as per Ezekiel’s prophecy, and much more. Jesus knew that when he went away he would have to prepare to receive believers.

We do not know how much Jesus had to learn, or how much information God would “divinely implant” into his mind, but Jesus knew that once he ascended to heaven he would not just be “sitting around” enjoying himself. He would be working on things concerning his return and preparing for his kingdom on earth.

14:3. “I will come again.” Christ will come back to earth in the event known as the Second Coming. The “Second Coming” is not the same event as the Rapture of Christians, which is described in 1 Thessalonians 4:17. At his Second Coming, Jesus will come down from heaven with his armies and conquer the earth, an event described in Revelation 19:11-21. Christ’s conquest of the earth was foretold in scriptures such as Isaiah 63:1-6 and Zechariah 14:3-10, and scriptures such as Daniel 2:35, 44-46 speak of Christ’s kingdom filling the earth.

The Old Testament does not show clearly that Christ’s “coming” would be in two distinct stages: his first coming when he was crucified, and his Second Coming when he comes from heaven and conquers the earth. The information is there, but it is unclear and much more clearly seen in hindsight through the lens of the New Testament than when it was read by the people living before Christ. The New Testament, of course, is very clear about the first and second comings of Christ. Nevertheless, even though they are somewhat veiled, Old Testament passages that speak of the Second Coming of Christ include Isaiah 63:1-6, Daniel 2:34, 35, 44; Zechariah 14:3-6, and there are many more that speak of Christ ruling the earth (see commentary Matt. 16:27).

The Greek text emphasizes the word “again” by moving it to the front of the sentence: “Again I will come and will receive you to myself.” Christ came to earth once, and he will come again as conqueror and king.

“and will receive you to myself.” There has been mistranslation and misunderstanding of this phrase due to the traditional belief that when a saved person dies his soul goes immediately to heaven and is with Jesus. Actually, the verse is simple. Jesus said that it would be when he came back that he would receive believers to himself. Jesus’ statement applies to two different classes of believers: those who are dead when Christ comes back and those who are still alive. Christians are in a different category entirely, because Christians experience an event known as the Rapture, which occurs before the Second Coming. At the Rapture, both living and dead Christians will be taken into the air to be with Christ and then will return to earth with him at his Second Coming [For more information on the Rapture of Christians, see commentary on 1 Thessalonians 4:17].

We will first discuss Jesus’s statement, I “will receive you to myself,” in terms of those believers who are alive on earth at the Second Coming. The Bible is clear that the Great Tribulation and Armageddon will not kill everyone on earth. Many people will still be alive, and so when Jesus comes to earth he will gather all the nations before him and judge them. Those people who are judged unworthy will be thrown into the lake of fire, while those people who are judged worthy will enter into Christ’s Kingdom on earth (Matthew 25:31-46). Thus, at Christ’s Second Coming, believers who lived through the Great Tribulation will be “received” by Christ and will enter into his kingdom.

The believers who are dead at the time of the Second Coming will be raised from the dead and received by Christ into his kingdom on earth. The dead believers who Christ will raise will be those believers who died before the Day of Pentecost or who died after the Rapture but before the Second Coming (in other words, Christ will raise every dead believer from Adam to his Second Coming with the exception of the Christian Church, because Christians will have been raised earlier, at the Rapture). At the Second Coming, when Christ comes back to earth, he will call the dead believers out of the ground and receive them to himself.

This verse settles the argument about whether or not Old Testament believers are in the Rapture. They are not. They are, like Ezekiel 37:12-14 says, raised from the ground and return to Israel. This is further substantiated by Revelation 11:18. The time to give rewards to the believers is when they are raised from the dead, which happens immediately after the Second Coming.

The Bible does not teach that people are alive after they die, they are truly dead and awaiting being raised from the dead [for more information on this, see Appendix 4, “The Dead Are Dead”]. Jesus was speaking before the Day of Pentecost, and the Old Testament taught that believers would be dead until they were resurrected (cp. Ezek. 37:12-14), and Jesus taught that the resurrection would occur when the dead heard his voice (John 5:28, 29), which we learn from John 14:3 is when he comes again.

The word “receive” in John 14:3 is the verb paralambanō (#3880 παραλαμβάνω), and it is in the future tense, middle voice. Thayer’s Greek-English lexicon speaks specifically about John 14:3 and says, “middle [voice] with πρός ἐμαυτόν [to myself], [means] to my companionship, where I myself dwell.” Friberg’s Analytical Lexicon agrees, and also references John 14:3 and says that in John 14:3 paralambanō means “receive to oneself,” and the BDAG Greek-English lexicons also references John 14:3 and has “I will take you to myself.” When Jesus raises the dead he has already come from heaven to earth, and thus when he calls and wakes the dead, he “receives” them to himself and into his kingdom. That is why Ezekiel 37:12-14 says that when the dead get up they will go to the land of Israel. Jesus is there, ruling from the newly rebuilt city of Jerusalem (the boundaries of Israel including the size of Jerusalem are described in Ezek. 47 and 48).

In John 14:3 Jesus spoke to the Apostles and told them he “will come back and will receive you [“you all,” the “you” is plural] to myself so that where I am you will be also.” What Jesus was saying to the Apostles was in essence: “I will come back to earth at my Second Coming, and receive all the believers to me so that where I am, on the wonderful new earth, they will be too.”

14:6. “the life.” Here the word “life” refers to “life in the Age to Come.” See commentary on John 5:40.

“except through me.” This phrase uses the Greek preposition dia with a genitive object, and thus is correctly translated “through.” Here Jesus is focusing on his role as the mediator between God and mankind. In the biblical world it was customary that people did not get to see an important person without going through some kind of mediator. So, for example, when some Greeks wanted to see Jesus, they went to Phillip, one of the apostles (John 12:21). The centurion who wanted his servant healed sent a delegation of Jews to Jesus (Luke 7:3-5). Here Jesus correctly teaches that now that the Son has come, if a person is going to get close to God, he or she must go through His Son.

14:10. “I am in union with the Father, and the Father in union with me.” See commentary on John 10:38 “the Father is in union with me, and I am in union with the Father.”

14:11. “Keep on believing…keep believing.” The Greek is pisteuō (#4100 πιστεύω) in the imperative present active. Robertson notes that this stresses, especially in this verb, the continuance of the faith (Grammar). Jesus was not asking for short lived belief, but continued belief in what he was saying and teaching. It is important to note that Jesus says “or else keep believing me for the very works’ sake.” In other words, if you cannot believe in me (what I am saying) on its own, believe what I am saying based on the works that I do. The works are a witness to the teaching, and vice versa. Many people today want to “just do good works,” if that were enough. But that does not point to right doctrine, only to the kind heart of a good person. We must, like Jesus, let our good works testify to what we are saying.

“I am in union with the Father, and the Father in union with me.” See commentary on John 10:38 “the Father is in union with me, and I am in union with the Father.”

14:12. “continues to believe.” The Greek uses the present participle in the active voice. R. C. H. Lenski (The Interpretation of St. John’s Gospel) correctly writes: “The substantivized present participle characterizes the person as one who continues in this faith.”

“in me” This does not mean just that Jesus existed. In the biblical culture, to believe in someone meant that you believed, and thus acted upon, what the person said. So, for example, Jesus said to pray. If a person never prays, then he does not believe “in me,” even if he thinks Jesus existed as a person.

“he will do also.” The Greek is poieō (ποιέω) in the indicative future, so there is no question or argument: the one who is believing in Jesus will do what he did.

“because I go to the Father.” Jesus would not be on earth, so if good works are going to be done, believers must do them. Furthermore, Jesus knew that the gift of holy spirit would be poured out (Joel 2). Jesus did not know about the Christian Church at that time (the Sacred Secret), and that holy spirit would be poured out as it was on the day of Pentecost, but he did know that holy spirit would be poured out after he was raised.

14:14. “If you…. John 14:14 is in the original text. Although the last words of verse 13 and all of verse 14 are omitted in a scattering of manuscripts, some of them ancient, scholars have concluded from the totality of the manuscript evidence that the omission was due to the fact that the Greek word poiēsō occurred in the middle of verse 13 and the end of 14. The lines in between the two uses of poiēsō were skipped by some scribes when they were copying the text. The copyist’s eye skipped from the first poiēsō to the second one. In textual studies that is something scholars see regularly, and they have named it “haplography.” Books on the text of the Bible have many examples of haplography occurring in the manuscripts, and thankfully due to the over 5,700 Greek manuscripts we currently have, by comparing them, scholars can usually spot the erroneous manuscripts and the original text can be reconstructed.

“ask me.” The manuscript evidence supports the word “me” being in the original text. Modern textual scholars have concluded that some of the scribes copying the Greek text either thought that the wording, “ask me anything in my name” seemed strange, or they wanted to avoid what they thought was a contradiction to John 16:23, so they omitted the word “me” from the manuscripts they were copying (but in a couple of manuscripts scribes changed “me” to “the Father”). This explains why “me” is not in the King James Version—the manuscripts used in making the King James did not have the “me.” However, the weight of the manuscript evidence supports the word “me” being original, which is why almost all modern versions include it.

Very strong evidence that the word “me” is in the original text is that we can see from Acts and the Epistles that the early Christians did indeed ask Jesus for things, which is what the phrase “call upon the name of the Lord Jesus” refers to (1 Cor. 1:2). [For more information on John 14:14 not contradicting John 16:23 see commentary on John 16:23. For more information on talking to and praying to Jesus as well as a further discussion of the manuscript evidence that “me” is original, see Appendix 15: “Can We Pray to Jesus?”.

14:17. “it...it...it...it.” The gift of holy spirit is an “it,” not a “he.” To understand why some versions differ from others in the translation of the pronouns associated with holy spirit, we must understand how pronouns are used in languages such as Greek. Unlike English, but like many languages, including Spanish, French, German, Latin, and Hebrew, the Greek language assigns a gender to all nouns, and the gender of any associated pronoun must match the gender of the noun. This gender assignment happened in ancient antiquity, and often there seems to be no reason why a particular noun has a particular gender assigned to it. The gender of nouns never changes.

In French, for example, a table is feminine, la table, while a desk is masculine, le bureau. Thus a strictly literal translation of a French sentence with nouns and matching pronouns might be, “I like the table, she is just right for the room, but I do not like the desk, he is too big.” In correctly translating from French to English, however, we would never translate the English as, “the table, she,” or “the desk, he.” Not only is it improper English, it misses the point. Even the French people do not think of tables and desks as being masculine or feminine. The gender of the nouns is simply a part of the language that has come down to them through the ages.

And just as we would not say, “the desk, he,” we would never insist that a table or desk was somehow a person just because it had a masculine or feminine pronoun associated with it. Furthermore, good English translators recognize that even though a noun is assigned a gender in another language and the pronoun follows the noun, their job is to bring the meaning of the original into English, not introduce confusion as they translate. Hence, someone translating from French to English would use the English designation “it” for the table and the desk, in spite of the fact that in the original language the table and desk have a masculine or feminine gender.

What is true in the examples from the French language is true in any language that assigns a gender to nouns and then uses pronouns with that same gender. For example, the Greek word for “lamp” is luchnos, a masculine noun, and therefore proper grammar dictates that any pronoun associated with it is masculine. Thus, if the Greek text of Matthew 5:15 were translated literally, it would read, “Nor do they light a lamp and place him under the bushel.” However, every version we checked said, “it,” as proper English dictates, and not “him,” which would have been literal. The Greek word for wine is oinos, a masculine noun, so it takes a masculine pronoun. Christ taught that no one puts new wine in old wineskins, because the wineskins would burst and the wine, “he will be poured out.” English versions, correctly, say “it” will be poured out.

The same grammatical rule that the pronoun must agree with the noun is followed when the noun is feminine. According to the literal Greek text, Christ told his disciples that when they entered a “city” (polin; a feminine noun) or “village” (kome; a feminine noun), they should “find out who in her is worthy” (Matt.10:11; literally translated). The English versions correctly read, “it” instead of “her.” Similarly, the Greek word for “fig tree” is sukē, a feminine noun. When Jesus was entering Jerusalem, he saw a fig tree, but when he came to “her” he found nothing but leaves (Mark 11:13). Again, all the English versions read “it,” not “her.” When translating from another language into English, we have to use the English language properly. Students of Greek, Hebrew, Spanish, French, German, etc., quickly discover that one of the difficult things about learning the language is memorizing the gender of each noun—something we do not have in the English language.

Once we clearly understand the gender of a pronoun is determined by the gender of the noun, we can see why one cannot build a doctrine on the gender of a noun and it’s agreeing pronoun. Only confusion would result from that kind of erroneous exegesis. For example, the noun pneuma (spirit) is neuter in gender and thus any pronoun associated with it is neuter and naturally translated “it.” However, because the holy spirit helps us in many ways, it is called the parakletos, (John 14:16, etc., “Helper;” or in some versions “Comforter” or “Counselor”), which is a masculine noun and takes a masculine pronoun.

Since parakletos is masculine, and spirit (pneuma) is neuter, are we to believe the gender of holy spirit changes somehow depending on what it is called? When it is “spirit” it is neuter and when it is “the helper” it is masculine? Of course not, that would be ridiculous. Worse, since “spirit” in Greek is neuter, but “spirit” in Hebrew is feminine, are we to believe the sex of the holy spirit changed after the time of Jesus when the believers started to speak and write in Greek? Of course not. Again, the gender of the noun is assigned in the language, and is not the “real” gender of the noun in question, which usually has no gender.

Another good example of how confusing things would become if someone tried to build their theology from the gender of pronouns involves nouns used to describe the Word of God. Sometimes the Greek word logos is used to refer to the Word of God (Luke 5:1), and logos is a masculine noun. Sometimes the Greek word rhema is used of the Word of God (Matt. 4:4), and rhema is a neuter noun. Are we to believe that, first, the Word of God even has gender, and second, that it somehow changes gender? Of course not. The gender of the noun was assigned in antiquity as a linguistic necessity, it is not designed to refer to some kind of actual sexual orientation.

The point is this: no translator should ever use the gender of the nouns or pronouns in a language to build a theology. Only error could result from that kind of exegesis. The way to properly translate the Scripture from a language that assigns gender to nouns is to study the subject matter and understand the subject being discussed, and then translate accordingly. Does pneuma hagion have a gender? We know people come in two genders, masculine and feminine, so references to people should be either “he,” or “she.” Animals also have a gender. Rocks do not, and should be “it” (by the way, in Greek, the noun “rock” is feminine, while in Hebrew it is masculine). In the case of pneuma hagion, when it is used as a name for God, and refers to God, it is proper to use the pronoun “he,” or other personal pronouns such as “who.” (There has been much discussion in recent years about the gender of God and if He is male or female, but this is not the place for a discussion about that. Although we believe that God has no actual gender, in Scripture He presents Himself as masculine. He presented himself as a man to Abraham (Gen. 18:1 and 2), and to many others (cp. Exod. 24:10; Dan. 7:9).

When it is referring to God’s gift, the gift of holy spirit, it is proper to use pronouns such as “it,” “which,” and “that,” because the gift of holy spirit is not a person. Trinitarians, of course, disagree with that conclusion. They view the “Holy Spirit” as the third person of the Trinity, so even though pneuma, spirit, is a neuter noun, they use masculine personal pronouns with it. If the Trinitarians were correct, then the fact that they translate the Greek neuter pronoun as the English masculine pronoun is the right thing to do. A good example is the NIV translation of John 14:17, which we have produced, showing in brackets the actual gender of the noun and pronoun.

John 14:17 (NIV): “the Spirit [neuter noun] of truth. The world cannot accept him [autos, neuter pronoun, not masculine], because it neither sees him [autos, neuter pronoun, not masculine] nor knows him [autos, neuter pronoun, not masculine]. But you know him [autos, neuter pronoun, not masculine], for he [pronoun not in Greek text] lives with you and will be in you.”

Almost every English version does what the NIV does, and uses the masculine personal pronouns “him” and “he,” even though the Greek pronouns are neuter. This shows that Trinitarian scholars do not use the gender of the pronoun, but the subject being discussed, to determine how the English should read, which is what every translator should do. However, it reveals an inconsistency in one of their standard arguments for the existence of the Trinity. Many Trinitarians say that because masculine pronouns are sometimes used when the subject is the “Holy Spirit,” it must be masculine and therefore the third person of the Trinity. But if that argument is valid, then it would be just as valid to say that because the Greek text has neuter pronouns referring to spirit (indeed, especially since the noun “spirit” itself is neuter) then “holy spirit” must be a thing, not a person. In reality, as we have seen, we must never build our theology from the gender of pronouns.

A case in point is the Greek word parakletos, which is masculine, and which is usually referred to as the “Helper,” “Comforter,” or “Counselor,” depending on the English version being used. Greek grammar demands the use of masculine pronouns, such as ekeinos, to describe the “Helper,” because of parakletos, which is masculine (John 14:26), but Trinitarians have said that the use of ekeinos is evidence that “the Holy Spirit” is masculine (cp. A. T. Robertson, Word Pictures in the New Testament; note on John 14:17). But the Trinitarians cannot have it both ways. If the gender of the pronoun is evidence for the actual gender of the noun, then the “helper” is masculine, but the “holy spirit” is neuter—certainly not a person.

Once the above information is understood, it becomes clear why some versions of the Bible use personal pronouns such as “who” or “whom” when referring to pneuma hagion, while versions such as the REV uses “it” and “that.” If the translators believe pneuma hagion refers to the third person of the Trinity, they will use masculine pronouns and personal pronouns. Thus, their versions read “the Counselor...he” in the Gospel of John, and “he” “who” or “whom” in other places in the New Testament. However, if pneuma hagion refers to the gift of God, which we believe it does, then pronouns such as “it,” “which,” and “that,” are the proper English pronouns to use. Since no one can conclude from the use of pronouns whether or not “spirit” refers to a person or a thing, the only way to find that out is by studying it through the whole Bible. After we discover what “holy spirit” is, then we will know how to translate the pronouns associated with it. (This entry has focused on noun-pronoun agreement. For the integration of pronouns into the translation of verbs, see commentary on John 16:13).

14:18. “orphans.” The Greek word is orphanos (#3737 ὀρφανός), and it means to be without parents, an orphan. Our English word “orphan” comes directly from the Greek orphanos. Someone could be an orphanos because the parents were dead or permanently gone, or because they were simply not functioning as parents. It was sometimes used on a more limited scale to mean without a father, because the father was the primary support and protection of the family. By extension, it was also used for someone who had lost a “father.” To the Jews, a trusted teacher and mentor was a “father,” and so the rabbis applied the word * orphanos* to those disciples who had lost their teacher (cp. Craig Keener, The Gospel of John). In that light, for Jesus to say, “I will not leave you as orphans” was very meaningful, because it communicated to the disciples that Jesus would not abandon his role of teacher and mentor, but they could expect that continued teacher/mentor relationship.

Jesus’ use of “orphan” in his teaching at the Last Supper was especially meaningful because orphans were often taken advantage of in society and needed an “advocate,” someone to support, guide, and protect them. In that light, it is a wonderful truth that it was at the Last Supper that Jesus introduced the coming holy spirit as “the paraklētos” (#3875 παράκλητος), and one of the primary meanings of paraklētos is “Advocate” (which the KJV calls the “Comforter,” the ESV and REV call the “Helper,” and the NET and NIV2011 call the “Advocate”). Although there had been a few teachings that mentioned the holy spirit before the Last Supper (cp. Luke 3:16; 11:12; 12:12), Jesus clearly referred to the paraklētos as “the spirit of truth” (14:17) and “the holy spirit” (14:26). It is also noteworthy that only at the Last Supper, just before Jesus would leave his disciples as “orphans,” that Jesus called the holy spirit “the paraklētos” (John 14:16, 26; 15:26, and 16:7; its only other use paraklētos refers to Jesus himself; cp. 1 John 2:1). The gift of holy spirit is the way that Jesus Christ will help and advocate for his followers. That is why Jesus said “it will not speak on its own, but whatever it hears it will speak” (John 16:13). Like the gift of holy spirit in the Old Testament that God put upon people that better allowed Him to communicate directly with them, the gift of holy spirit, the Helper, would allow God and Jesus to communicate more efficaciously with believers. [For more information on God putting holy spirit on people in the Old Testament, see Appendix 6: “Usages of Spirit.” For more information on how God and Jesus communicate with us via the gift of holy spirit, see the commentary on “revelation” in Galatians 1:12].

“I am coming to you.” The Greek is in the present tense, although in this case it refers to a future action, which is why most versions says, “I will come to you.” The present tense indicated that the disciples did not have to wait long until Jesus came, and indeed, they did not. This “coming” does not refer to the Second Coming, but to the fact that after his resurrection, and even after his ascension, Jesus would be “with” his disciples (cp. Matt. 28:20).

14:19. “will see... will see.” The Greek text has the verb for “see” in the present tense, so literally it reads, “Yet a little while and the world sees me no more, but you see me.” This is a clear example of the figure of speech heterosis of tense (Cp. Bullinger, Figures of Speech). In the Greek the present tense is used in place of the future.

When Jesus spoke of his disciples seeing him, he was not primarily speaking of the disciples seeing him during the forty days after his resurrection and before his ascension. Some theologians teach that the primary meaning of Jesus’ statement refers to the apostles being able to see Jesus after his resurrection and before his ascension. We do not think that is the case for a number of reasons. For one thing the verse says that the world will not see Jesus, but during the forty days after his resurrection the world was able to see him. But after his ascension his disciples see him (cp. Stephen, Ananias, Paul, and John), but the world does not see him.

Also, the word “see” does not necessarily mean to see with the physical eye, although many disciples have actually seen Jesus, but it means to see him via what he does and via our relationship with him. For example, Jesus often communicates with us directly via the gift of holy spirit. The promise that true disciples would “see” Jesus was more than just a way of saying we would “know about” him or recognize that he was at work in the world, although those things are included too.

When Jesus said that the disciples would see him, he also said he would not leave them as orphans but would come to them. But if they were only “orphans” for the three days he was dead, and then only not orphans for forty more days, and have now been orphans again for the last 2000 years, then Jesus’ statement that he would not leave us as orphans is hollow. We are not orphans because even though Jesus is not with us physically, he is still genuinely with us.

Jesus made a number of statements at the Last Supper that paralleled this one about “seeing” Jesus. These included: he said that he would not leave the disciples as orphans, but would come to them (John 14:18), the disciples would be in union with Jesus and the Father (John 14:20), he would show himself to them (John 14:21), he and the Father would make their home in them (John 14:23; monē means “home,” “residence,” “dwelling place”), he said that he and the disciples would be “friends” (John 15:14, 15), and they could ask him for what they needed (John 14:14). Jesus knew at the Last Supper that in only a couple hours he would be taken from the disciples and after that his relationship with them would change dramatically as he would be the risen, then ascended, Lord. He did not want them to think that after his ascension they would be without his help and guidance, so he told them they would “see” him.

14:20. “in union with.” See commentary on John 10:38 “the Father is in union with me, and I am in union with the Father.”

14:22. “how is it that.” An alternate translation could be, “what happened that?” (Cp. NASB; NET; NAB; NJB).

14:24. “the Father’s who sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

14:26. “And.” The Greek word de (#1161 δὲ) can express a small contrast, but can also just express a change of subject. In this case, “but” is too strong a contrast. Some English versions leave the de untranslated and just start the English sentence with the subject, the Helper (cp. CEB), Others translate it “And” (cp. Young’s Literal Translation; Lenski). Jesus was speaking with his disciples while he was still alive, and his point was that after he was personally gone from his disciples, the Helper would teach them what it heard.

“the holy spirit.” There is no definite article. This holy spirit is the gift of God, poured out on the Day of Pentecost. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”]

14:29. “believe.” The verb “believe” is in the subjunctive mood, thus many versions have “may” believe, but the Greek conjunction hina (#2443 ἵνα) that started the phrase is the reason the verb is subjunctive, and therefore we must get the sense of the verb from the context. In this case, Jesus’ purpose was to tell the disciples what would happen before it happened so that they “will” believe, not just so they “may” believe.” Versions that use “will” include (CEB; CJB; GWN; NIV; NLT; and The Source New Testament.) It was not that the disciples were not believing, but just as they had not understood what Jesus had told them about his death because it was so different than what they were taught, now they were about to expand what they believed and take it to new levels. 14:31. “Get up, let us go from here.” At this point the disciples started getting ready to leave the Upper Room and the Last Supper. However, Jesus continued teaching and praying, and the disciples did not leave until 18:1.

Chapter 15

15:2. “takes it away.” Some argue that “to take away” here means “to lift up.” Although that could be the case grammatically, it does not fit contextually. Verse 6 makes it clear that if a person does not bear fruit, he is cast into the fire. This parable parallels the parable of the servants in the talents. If a servant does not bear fruit with his talents and buries it in the ground, he is wicked and lazy, and is thrown out into the darkness.

15:4. “live.” For more on this translation, see commentary on 1 John 2:6.

In union with. See commentary on John 10:38 “the Father is in union with me, and I am in union with the Father.”

15:5. “lives.” For more on this translation, see commentary on 1 John 2:6.

15:7. “live.” For more on this translation, see commentary on 1 John 2:6.

In union with. See commentary on John 10:38 “the Father is in union with me, and I am in union with the Father.”

Want.” The Greek word is thelō (#2309 θέλω) and means want or desire.

15:10. “live.” For more on this translation, see commentary on 1 John 2:6.

15:14. “friends.” John 15:14 and 15 mark an important shift in the relation between Jesus and those who closely follow him and obey him. Jesus now says he will not call his close disciples “servants,” but friends, denoting an intimate and affectionate relationship. Jesus had referred to his disciples as friends earlier, in Luke 12:4, but that was in the context of his protecting and blessing them, and teaching them not to fear the world. He was not making the much more personal and intimate statement that he was making at the Last Supper, at most only a couple hours before his arrest.

To understand the importance of what Jesus says here at the Last Supper, it is important to understand the word “friend” and what it really implies. Since so much has been spoken of in the Christian world about agapē love, we will discuss that also. In American culture the word “friend” has lost some of its true meaning and value. Today we call people “friends” when we have only met them a few times. Biblically, a “friend” was someone you knew well and really trusted. It is exemplified by the word “companion,” which comes from the Latin, “com” (with) and panis (bread). A friend, a companion, was someone you would trust in your house and eat with. When Jesus calls us friends, he is referring to a deep and intimate relationship. In the Bible that deep relationship is represented by the word philos.

Greek has four different words for love, and the Greek word that refers to the God’s love for us is agapē (the verb form is agapaō, Strong’s number 25, ἀγαπάω, the noun form is agapē, Strong’s number 26, ἀγάπη). Agapē love is the very nature of God, for God is love (1 John 4:7-12, 16). The big key to understanding agapē is to realize that it can be known from the action it prompts. People today are accustomed to thinking of love as a feeling, but that is essentially not the case with agapē love. Agapē is love because of what it does, not because of how it feels (cp. the list of actions prompted by agapē in 1 Corinthians 13).

God so “loved” (agapē) that He gave His Son. It did not feel good to God to do that, but it was the loving thing to do. Christ so loved (agapē) that he gave his life. Agapē love is not simply an impulse generated from feelings, rather it is an exercise of the will, a deliberate choice. This is why God can command us to “love” (agapē) our enemies (Matt. 5:44). He does not command us to “have a good feeling” for our enemies, but to act in a loving way toward them (cp. the loving actions in Exod. 23:1-5). That is not to say the agapē love cannot have feelings attached to it, and the ideal situation occurs when the loving thing to do also is what we want to do, such that we combine the feeling of love with loving action.

The Greek word phileō, which is translated as “love” in many English Bibles, is different from agapaō love. Phileō means “to have a special interest in someone or something, frequently with focus on close association; have affection for, like, consider someone a friend” (William Arndt and F. Gingrich, A Greek-English Lexicon.) Phileō (#5368 φιλέω), is the verb form and philos (#5384 φιλός), is the noun form and refers to a “friend.”

It would be helpful if phileō were never translated “love,” because it refers to a strong liking or a strong friendship. Of course, phileō gets translated “love” because in modern culture we say we “love” things that we strongly like: “I love ice cream” or “I love my car.” The word phileō implies a strong emotional connection, and thus is used of the deep friendship, and it is also used of the way people “really like” things. Thus, we can agapē our enemies because we can be kind to them whether we feel like it or not, but we cannot phileō our enemies; we cannot be true friends with them.

In Christian circles it is very common to hear people compare agapē and phileō and disparage phileō as if it were a “lesser” kind of love. Nothing could be further from the truth. Phileō refers to that deep friendship relationship and the wonderful friendly feeling that everyone craves: we all want friends. Lenski writes about friendship, and says that the word philoi, friends, “denotes an affectionate and intimate relation” (note on John 15:14). Although agapē can have that deep friendly feeling, it can also be “cold love,” and manifest itself as godly acts done without a true “loving” feeling. Both agapē and phileō are very important. If we are going to win the people of the world, we must be able to “love” them even in the most unlovable circumstances, and that takes agapē. Agapē was the reason that Paul went to city after city to teach the Word, even though he was defamed, beaten, and jailed. He did not like those experiences, but he knew that given the specific ministry Christ gave him, it was how he was to obey God. In contrast, what we really crave in our hearts is the most intimate friendship relationship, and that is what phileō offers.
The difference between agapē and phileō becomes very important in John 21. Jesus was asking Peter if he “loved” Jesus (agapē) because Jesus wanted Peter to be committed to following Jesus even though it would often be neither easy nor likeable. Peter, on the other hand, used phileō because he wanted to see if his friendship with Jesus was still intact: was Jesus still an affectionate and intimate friend to him even though Peter had publicly denied him? Jesus wanted commitment no matter what the circumstances, Peter wanted close friendship with Jesus—and the Word tries to communicate their desires by the specific vocabulary it uses for their verbal exchange.

Here in John 15, Jesus now tells the apostles that they are his “friends” (philos), if we do what he commanded us. In fact, he shows his apostles what he means, and proves to them that they are indeed his friends by telling them that he has told them what he heard from his Father—intimate communication that he would only tell his friends about. Jesus’ invitation to be his friend is not only here in the Gospel of John, it is in the book of Revelation. Jesus says, “Look!, I am standing at the door and knocking. If anyone hears my voice and opens the door, I will come in to him and will eat with him, and he with me” (Rev. 3:20). Anyone in the biblical culture would immediately understand that for Jesus to come in to a home and eat would mean there was a deep friendship between Jesus and the person.

What Jesus said at the Last Supper, very shortly before his arrest, has huge implications for Christians, because he was telling his disciples things that would define their roles and relationship after his resurrection and ascension. Jesus has now opened the door for us to be “friends” with him. And nothing could be of greater worth. No wonder Paul said that he counted all his worldly credentials as dung in comparison to “knowing” Jesus, that is, having a firsthand, experiential relationship, or “friendship,” with Christ (Phil. 3:8-10, and see the commentary on those verses).

Having a genuine friendship relationship with Jesus Christ is part of the very fabric of Jesus’ teaching at the Last Supper. Jesus spoke of his relationship with his disciples in a number of different ways, including: he said that he and the disciples would be “friends” (John 15:14, 15), they would “see” him (cp. John 14:19), they would be in union with Jesus and the Father (John 14:20), he would show himself to them (John 14:21), he and the Father would make their home in them (John 14:23), and they could ask him for what they needed (John 14:14). Jesus knew what his disciples did not know: that in a few hours he would be arrested then crucified, and after that his relationship with them would be on a different level. Even with Jesus gone, his disciples had to be confident that he would be in close contact with them even though he was in heaven and they were on earth. That is why he took the time to communicate in many different ways that he and his disciples would be friends—ones who have an intimate and affectionate relationship. [For more on the difference between agapē and phileō, and information on all four Greek words for “love,” see commentary on John 21:15].

15:17. “These things I command you, so that you will love one another.” The grammar of the verse, and the context, favors this translation over something simpler, such as “This I command you: love one another.” “These things” comes from the Greek tauta, a plural pronoun, and the conjunction hina that starts the second phrase is most naturally “so that,” or “in order that.” It is not clear how far back in Jesus’ teaching he was referring to when he said “these things.” It is clear, however, that in the context,
Christ had been teaching and directing the disciples concerning love and his love for them. His discourse included commands, as well as general information. Now he tells them that he has said these things “so that” they will love one another. This is a wonderful demonstration of the principle in 1 John 4:19, that we love because he first loved us. Jesus clearly told the disciples of his love for them, and told them to remain “in” his love, i.e., connected to him and the blessings that would flow to them through him. Thus here, many years before 1 John was written, Jesus was telling his disciples about his love for them and commanding them to remain in him so that they would love one another.

15:19. “befriend you.” The Greek is phileō (#5368 φιλέω). Although most versions say “love,” doing so confuses agapē love (“love” in the REV) with phileō love. Phileō love has an attachment, and it is the attachment between good friends. The world “befriends” those who are of the world. For a more complete understanding of phileō, see the note on John 21:15.

15:21. “the one who sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

15:22. “they would not have had sin, but now they have no excuse for their sin.” This is a good example of how important it is to get the scope of Scripture and not “prooftext” to make a point. Jesus is not speaking of sin in general, as if the religious leaders would have had no sin at all unless Jesus had spoken to them. Rather he is speaking in the context of his life, and particularly being the Last Supper, his death, and saying that the sin of not believing and not obeying Jesus would now be reckoned to them, because they heard him, but turned away.

“but let the word…be fulfilled.” We feel this is a command clause rather than a purpose clause (see John 9:3 entry, “let the works of God be revealed in him”) or a result clause (cp. Matt. 1:22), although it could be a result clause. In the Greek there is no phrase “they have done this” which must be supplied for it to read either as a purpose clause: e.g., “But they have done this to fulfill the word that is written in their Law” (NASB), or as a result clause, “with the result that….”

We do not believe this could be a purpose clause. Why would these men hate with the purpose of fulfilling Old Testament prophecy? They wouldn’t. On the other hand, if it is God who instigates the purpose behind their hatred of the Messiah, then God would be making them hate just so a prophecy would be fulfilled, which goes against God’s character and nature. Although it could be a result clause, “This happened with the result that the word was fulfilled,” it does not seem as likely that Jesus would say that to his disciples, although he could have.

To us the reading that makes the most sense in the context is that Christ was making a simple statement in reaction to the men’s hatred; “let the word that is written in their law be fulfilled, ‘they have hated me without a cause.’”

Like our translation, the ESV renders the phrase as a 3rd person command but uses the word “must”: “The word that is written in their Law must be fulfilled.” This is a possible rendering of the command, just as using the word “let” and saying “let the word be fulfilled,” is possible. However, we believe that Jesus was not telling his disciples about what “must” happen, but pointing out what was happening. In that sense, this verse compares to the translation of hina with a verb in the subjunctive mood in Ephesians 5:33, which is also translated by “let”: “Let the wife see that she respects her husband” (ESV) and “the wife must respect her husband” (NIV). We feel the “let” translation is better because in English the word “must” could be misunderstood to be implying some metaphysical necessity for fulfillment, which is not being communicated by the Greek grammar of the command clause. See also entry on John 13:18, “let the scripture be fulfilled.”

15:27. “testify.” The verb “to testify” is in a form that can be either indicative (you will testify,” picking up “will” from the context), or imperative (“you must testify,” picking up “must” from the imperative form of the verb). The key to which is in the sentence itself. The word “because” dictates the imperative. Anyone could testify of Christ, whether they had been around since the beginning of his ministry or not. However, these apostles had been given much, and now much was required. “Because” they had been with Jesus since the beginning, they must now testify of him (or suffer severe consequences). This verse is also good evidence that the helper, holy spirit, will be poured out during the tribulation.

16:4. “will remember.” The verb “remember” is in the subjunctive mood, thus many versions have “may” remember, but the Greek conjunction hina (#2443 ἵνα) earlier in the sentence is the reason the verb is subjunctive, and therefore we must get the sense of the verb from the context. In this case, Jesus’ purpose was to tell the disciples what would happen before it happened so that they “will” remember, not just so they “may” remember.” Versions that use “will” include (CEB; CJB; NET; NIV; NLT; and The Source New Testament).

16:5. “to the one who sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

16:7. “I will send it to you.” The Greek pronoun translated “it” is αὐτὸν, the masculine singular pronoun that is associated with “helper,” which is the Greek noun paraklētos (#3875 παράκλητος). We translate it “it” because the “Helper,” the gift of holy spirit, is not a person but a thing, the gift of God. In inflected languages like Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Spanish, French, etc., the gender of the pronoun has to agree with the gender of the noun, so we do not learn the gender from the pronoun itself, but from what person, place or thing the noun is. See commentary on “it” in John 14:17.

16:8. “it.” In Greek, the pronoun ekëinos (#1565 ἕκτος) is masculine because it is governed by the Greek noun paraklētos (#3875 παράκλητος), which is masculine. However, the “Helper” is a word describing the gift of holy spirit (John 14:17), which is not a “he” but an “it.” See commentary on John 16:7 and John 14:17.

16:11. “has been judged.” This is the prophetic perfect, when something in the future is so certain it is spoken of in the past tense (see commentary on “seated,” in Ephesians 2:6). Lenski writes, “Jesus speaks of the devil’s final judgment as having already been effected because his own death and resurrection, which pronounced the final judgment on the devil, are already at hand, are as certain as though they had already been completed.”
(See Schoenheit, Graeser & Lynn, The Christian’s Hope, Appendix E.)

16:13. “it.” In Greek, the pronoun ekeinos (#1565 ἐκεῖνος) is masculine because it is governed by the Greek noun paraklētos (#3875 παράκλητος), which is masculine.
However, the “Helper” is a word describing the gift of holy spirit (John 14:17), which is not a “he” but an “it.” See commentary on John 14:17.

“it will guide...it will not speak...it hears, it will speak...it will declare.” Greek verbs have no gender, and therefore any gender associated with any given verb has to be assigned from the context and the subject being discussed. Usually this is not confusing to translators because the subject is understood. However, sometimes the context and subject matter of the verse is debated. For example, when a verb refers to something the “holy spirit” will do, then Trinitarians, who assert that the “Holy Spirit” is a person, assign a masculine pronoun to the verb. In contrast, Biblical Unitarians, who see the “holy spirit” as a gift from God or the power of God, assign a neuter pronoun to the verb.
Since almost all English translations of the Bible are done by Trinitarians, they almost all have masculine pronouns associated with verbs relating to holy spirit. This makes the average person reading the English Bible believe that “the Bible” says the holy spirit is a person. However, the masculine personal pronoun was placed in the text because of the theology of the translator, and not because the Greek text demanded it.

A verse where the different theology of Biblical Unitarians and Trinitarians greatly influences their translation is John 16:13. The NIV translation reads:
But when he, the Spirit of truth, comes, he will guide you into all truth. He will not speak on his own; he will speak only what he hears, and he will tell you what is yet to come.

Although the word “he” appears in the NIV translation six times, it is only in the Greek text one time, and that one time it is a translation of the pronoun ekeinos (#1565 ἐκεῖνος), which is masculine because it is governed by, and thus has to match the gender of, the Greek noun paraklētos (#3875 παράκλητος), which is masculine. The other times that “he” occurs in the NIV text are an assumption on the part of the translators. They assert that the “Holy Spirit” is a person and is masculine, and therefore a masculine pronoun would automatically be assigned to any verb associated with it. For example, the NIV translates the Greek verb hodegeō, as “he will guide,” even though it is simply a third person singular verb, and, as we said, Greek verbs have no gender. But since the verb hodegeō has no gender, it could just as easily be translated “it will guide” or “she will guide,” whichever is best supported by the context.

When we understand that any gender associated with verbs has to be assigned from the subject being discussed and the context, then proper translation work demands that we scrutinize the context to see whether the subject being referred to is a “he,” “she” or “it.” In the case of John 16:13, we believe that the context is God’s gift of holy spirit, which is not a person, and that the verse should be properly translated, “it will guide.”

Another example regarding “spirit” is in the Gospel of John. In this verse, Jesus is talking with his disciples about the spirit of truth, and he says, “but you know Him because He abides with you, and will be in you.” (John 14:17b, NASB). The words “he abides” are an interpretation of the Greek, which is simply, “abides” in the third person singular, and thus could be “he abides,” “she abides,” or “it abides.” In this case, because Jesus is speaking of God’s gift of holy spirit, which is a “thing” and not a person, it is proper to say, “it abides.”

The fact that Greek verbs do not have a gender, so any assigned to it is the interpretation of the translators, comes up in many areas besides holy spirit. For example, Luke 11:24 speaks of demons, and some versions say that when an unclean spirit comes out of a man, “he goes” through arid places. But are we sure the demon is a “he?” The Greek verb is genderless, and can be masculine, feminine, or neuter. Thus there are some versions that say “he” (cp. KJV; RSV) and some versions that say “it” (cp. NASB; NRSV), but because of mainstream theology, none say “she,” although bibliically that is a possibility. Although we usually think of angels and demons as masculine, there are both female good spirits (Zech. 5:9) and female evil spirits. The Hebrew word “Lilith” (Isa. 34:14) is the name of a female demon. “Lilith” gets translated many ways in the English versions, including “night monster” (ASV, NASB, Amplified), “night hag” (RSV), “night spectre” (Rotherham) and by her name, “Lilith” (NAB; Tanakh; The Message). Some translators apparently miss the point that Isaiah is referring to a demon at all, and have “screech owl” (KJV) or “night creature” (NIV). Lilith is “a malevolent supernatural being” (Bromiley, International Standard Bible Encyclopedia, “Lilith,” or “Night Hag”). Unless the context tells us the gender of a demon, using “it” in Luke 11:24 is our best choice because it allows for either male or female gender.

God’s holy spirit is a most amazing and valuable gift, and it behooves us as Christians, especially those who translate the Bible, to understand it. Bible students who are not familiar with the original languages can do only this when the Greek and Hebrew texts are properly translated. If the translation is not accurate, then we do not have the Word of God, we have the words of men. Translating Scripture is one of the most important and spiritual of all responsibilities, because millions of people who do not read the original languages trust the translation to accurately represent the original. When it comes to the subject of God’s gift of holy spirit, countless Christians have been misled or confused by the improper use of the pronoun “he,” or other personal pronouns. When the pronouns associated with pneuma, spirit, are translated correctly, it is much easier to see the love and mercy of God expressed to us by His giving to us the wonderful gift of holy spirit. (This entry has dealt with pronouns as they are assigned to verbs. For the agreement of Greek nouns and pronouns, see the commentary on John 14:17).

16:14. “it.” In Greek, the pronoun ekeinos (#1565 ἐκεῖνος) is masculine because it is governed by the Greek noun parakletos (#3875 παράκλητος), which is masculine. However, the “Helper” is a word describing the gift of holy spirit (John 14:17), which is not a “he” but an “it.” See commentary on 16:7 and John 14:17.

“it will take from what is mine, and will declare it to you.” This is describing a function of the gift of holy spirit; Christ proclaims that it will deliver messages to his disciples by means of taking them from him and declaring the messages to his disciples. The words “from what is mine” in the Greek is ek tou emou, “out from the thing of me.” It is the partitive use of the preposition ek (#1537 ἐκ), where the spirit takes a part of the things (messages) of Christ, and then heralds, anaggellō (#312 ἀναγγέλλω), it to the disciples. By using the phrasing, “what is mine,” Jesus naturally raises the question, “Do not these messages ultimately come from God, and not you, so why do you say, ‘what is mine?’” Jesus anticipates this concern and explains in verse fifteen: “All that belongs to the Father is mine. That is why I said the Spirit will take from what is mine and make it known to you” (NIV).

16:21. “sorrow.” The word means sorrow, grief, or pain. Here “sorrow” is dictated by verse 22. Christ is comparing the childbirth to what was about to happen to him.

“The woman” is Israel. In conjunction with “in that day” v. 23, it indicates the woman, Israel, in the tribulation. See Companion Bible verse.

“man.” The noun ἀνθρώπος is in the masculine singular, but the reason for the translation “man” is that it was the custom in Israel that when a baby boy was born there was music, shouting, and great celebration, but when a baby girl was born there was none. This was due to a number of factors. Boys added to the family, while girls were thought to take from it. When a boy was married, his wife came to live with his family, he did not go to hers, and the grandchildren, of course then, stayed within the man’s family circle. In days when travel was by foot or donkey-cart, if a man and woman lived even what to us would be a short distance apart, the families rarely saw each other. Also, when the girl got married, her family paid the dowry to the man’s family, not, as in the European tradition, the man’s family paying to the woman’s family. So the woman’s family did not just lose the girl herself, they also gave up wealth.

Also, men helped defend the family, which, in the turbulent times of the ancient world was no small help if the family was to survive. All of this contributed to the cultural excitement at the birth of a boy. Of course, after some initial sadness that the baby was a girl, the baby would be warmly accepted into the family. (See, Mackie, Manners and Customs).

16:23. “in that day you will not ask me anything.” This phrase is a wonderful example why we have to pay close attention to translation and the context if we are going to properly understand and interpret the Word of God. At first glance, this verse seems to be a clear contradiction of John 14:14, where Jesus said, “If you ask me anything in my name, I will do it.” Are we, or are we not, to ask Jesus for things?

A major part of resolving the apparent contradiction lies in the Greek words themselves. In John 14:14, Jesus is clearly speaking of being able to do the works that he had done so the Father would be glorified. And in that context the word “ask” is aiteō (#154 αἰτέω, pronounced eye-te'-ō), which means “ask” but very forcefully so. The BDAG Greek-English lexicon defines it as “ask for, with claim on receipt of an answer; …demand.” The Friberg Lexicon has “ask, request, demand.” In contrast, here in John 16:23 the Greek word “ask” is ἐρωτάω (#2065 ἐρωτάω, pronounced err-ō-tah'-ō) and it means “to put a query to someone, ask, ask a question” (BDAG); “ask, seeking for information; question (Friberg’s Lexicon).

In John 14:14, Jesus is speaking of his being gone after his ascension. This is very clear from reading John 13-16. In John 13:33 Jesus told the Apostles he was going away to a place they could not follow, and he continued teaching them he was going away right up through chapter 16 (cp. John 14:1-4, 18, 19, 28; 16:5-10, 16). After Jesus ascends to heaven, having been given all authority in heaven and on earth, we are to ask him for things. In John 14:14, Jesus told his disciples to ask him for things so they could do the works that he had done (14:12). If we just read John 14:12-14 we can easily see that. In 14:12 Jesus told the disciples that if they continued to believe in him they would do the works that he did, and even greater works. Then in 14:13 he told them that he would do those works (i.e., Christ would accomplish those works) so that the Father would be glorified. Then, continuing that thought he told his disciples that if they “asked” (asked expecting an answer; demanded) of him in his name, he would do it. [For more information on this point, see commentary on John 14:14].

In looking at John 16:23, we must remember that John 14:14 and 16:23 were both spoken at the Last Supper, perhaps only a very short while apart. The disciples were not confused by the “apparent contradiction,” and we should not be either. The disciples had been asking Jesus many questions, and there was a lot they did not understand. So, for example, they asked, “Where are you going” (13:36); “Why am I not able to follow you now” (13:37); “How are we able to know the way” (14:5); “Show us the Father” (14:8); “How is it you will reveal yourself to us and not to the world” (14:22); “What is this that he is saying, ‘A little while?’” (16:17, 18).

Jesus knew the disciples had lots of questions, and carefully navigated his way through them throughout the Last Supper, answering some while not answering others. As he got to the end of the Last Supper, he told his disciples, “In that day you will not ask me anything,” (perhaps Charles William’s translation is clearer: “At that time you will ask me no more questions”). The disciples would not have to ask questions because, for one thing, Jesus said, “I will no longer speak to you in figures of speech, but will tell you plainly of the Father” (16:25), plus, after Jesus’ death, resurrection, and ascension, they would understand all the things they had questions about—something that is quite plain in Acts, as we see the once-ignorant and dumbfounded apostles become bold proclaimers of the death, resurrection, and ascension of Christ.

16:24. “keep asking.” The verb for “ask” in this verse is in the active voice and present tense, and is what is known as a broadband present, or continuous present (Cp. Wallace, Greek Grammar, pg. 519-25). This form indicates a continual action that takes place over a long time, rather than a one-time-event. Williams translates the phrase, “But now you must keep on asking.” We are not to just ask once for the things we seek from God, but to repeatedly ask, as the widow asked the unjust judge (Luke 18:1-8). Wallace explains the present tense in Matthew 7:7 this way: “The force of the present imperatives is ‘ask repeatedly, over and over again…seek repeatedly…knock continuously, over and over again” (Wallace, Exegetical Syntax, 521). (Cp. Matt. 7:7, Luke 11:9, and commentary on 1 John 3:22.)

16:27. “treats you as friends…befriended me.” The two Greek verbs are both forms of phileō (#5368 φιλέω). Although most versions say “loves…loved,” doing so confuses agapē love (“love” in the REV) with phileō love. Phileō love has an attachment, and it is the attachment between good friends. For a more complete understanding of phileō, see the note on John 21:15.

16:30. “question you.” The Greek verb erōtaō (#2065 ἐρωτάω), translated elsewhere “to ask,” can mean to ask a question, or to ask a request. In this context Christ has no need for anyone to ask him questions, because he is speaking plainly, i.e., not in parables.

16:31. “Do you now believe?” Grammatically, in both Aramaic and Greek, this sentence can either be a statement or a question. Translated as a statement it would be something like, “You believe now” (cp. CJB; GWN; NIV 1984). Translated as a question it would be something like, “Do you now believe?” (HCSB; ESV; KJV; NASB; NET; NIV 2011). It is the context that determines whether Jesus made a statement or asked a question, and in this case the context is clear that he asked a question.
Starting in John 14:1, Jesus had been trying to tell his Apostles that he must go away to the Father. These are the same Apostles who could not grasp that he was going to die, no matter how often or clearly he told them. Since they did not know about his death, they certainly could not understand that he was going to ascend to heaven and be with the Father. It seems that Jesus told them so that they might understand at least part of what he was saying, but especially so that after his ascension they would remember that he had told them about it.

Evidence that the Apostles did not understand what Jesus was telling them is throughout the account. After Jesus said he was going to prepare a place for them, Thomas said, “Lord, we do not know where you are going” (14:5). A little later in the conversation Philip spoke up and said, “Show us the Father and that will be enough for us” (14:8). Other statements revealing that the Apostles did not understand what Jesus was talking about are in 14:22 and 16:17 and 18, culminating in them saying to each other: “We do not understand what he is saying” (16:18). At that point Jesus tried one last time to tell them he was going to the Father, but he put the emphasis of his comments on the subject of asking and receiving, God’s love, and his coming from God (John 16:19-28). At that point the Apostles said they understood, but what they understood was not that Jesus was going away to be with God, but rather that “you [Jesus] came from God” (16:30).

Jesus was no doubt pleased that his Apostles understood that he came from God, but was not fooled into thinking they understood about his ascension into heaven. Therefore, it was natural for him to challenge their confidence and try to keep them exploring what his words meant, which he did by asking the question, “Do you now believe?” We know from the Gospel records that Jesus was correct and the Apostles still did not believe Jesus would die, be raised from the dead, or ascend into heaven. Since at this Last Supper the Apostles did not know what Jesus meant when he told them he was going to the Father, it is certain that a few days earlier when they had asked him for signs of his “coming,” they did not mean his coming back to earth from heaven. They were referring to his “coming” (see commentary on Matthew 24:3).

16:32. “Take notice!” The Greek word is idou (ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

“each one for himself.” The Greek word eis in the phrase is the “eis of advantage,” with the sense being, each one for his own advantage. The Greek phrase does not include the word “home,” as many English versions have, and “home” is not accurate, unless it was taken as “the place they were staying.” Most of the apostles had their homes in the Galilee, yet they stayed around Jerusalem. However, they were so afraid that it is not likely that they went to where they were commonly known to be staying, but rather would have found a temporary place to be secluded and protected. Jesus said that the disciples would be “scattered,” and that is no doubt what happened when Jesus was arrested. The disciples “fled” (Matt. 26:56; Mark 14:50), but not as a group. In the panic of the moment, it was each man for himself. Although the Gospels do not track exactly where the disciples went, Peter and another disciple followed Jesus to the house of the High Priest. No doubt over the next days the disciples assembled again, and were together when Jesus came to them (John 20:19). The Complete Jewish Bible has, “each one looking out for himself,” which sums up the meaning very well.
16:33. “I have overcome the world.” This is the prophetic perfect idiom, when something that will happen in the future is spoken of has already being accomplished (see commentary on “seated,” in Ephesians 2:6).

Chapter 17

17:2. “life in the Age to come.” This is the everlasting life that begins with the new Messianic Age, the Millennial Kingdom. [See commentary on this phrase in Appendix 2: “Life in the Age to Come”.]

17:3. “life in the Age to come.” This is the everlasting life that begins with the new Messianic Age, the Millennial Kingdom. [See commentary on this phrase in Appendix 2: “Life in the Age to Come”.

“that they know you.” Not “that they may know you.” (See Lenski; Robertson, Grammar, p. 992).

“and him whom you sent.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

17:5. “And now, Father, glorify me together with yourself with the glory that I had with you before the world was.” God had planned to glorify His Son, and now that the time of Jesus’ death was drawing near, Jesus prayed that God would bring His plan to fruition.

This verse has been used to prove that Jesus is God because of the phrase, “that I had with you before the world was.” There is no question that Jesus “existed” before the world began. But did he exist literally as a person or in God’s foreknowledge, “in the mind of God?” Both Christ and those called to be in the Body of Christ, the Church, existed in God’s foreknowledge before being alive. Christ was the “logos,” the “plan” of God from the beginning, and he became flesh only when he was conceived. It is Trinitarian bias that causes people to read an actual physical existence into this verse rather than a figurative existence in the mind of God. When 2 Timothy says that each Christian was given grace “before the beginning of time,” no one tries to prove that we were actually alive with God back then. Everyone acknowledges that we were “in the mind of God,” i.e., in God’s foreknowledge. The same is true of Jesus Christ. His glory was “with the Father” before the world began, and in John 17:5 he prayed that it will come into manifestation.

Jesus was praying that the glory the Old Testament foretold he would have, and which had been in the mind of God the Father since before the world began, would come into concretion. Trinitarians, however, teach that Jesus was praying about glory he had with God many years before his birth, and they assert that this proves he had access to the mind and memory of his “God nature.” However, if, as a man, Jesus “remembered” being in glory with the Father before the world began, then he would have known he was God in every sense. He would not have thought of himself as a “man” at all. If he knew he was God, he would not and could not have been “tempted in every way just as we are” because nothing he encountered would have been a “real” temptation to him. He would have had no fear and no thought of failure. There is no real sense in which Scripture could actually say he was “made like his brothers in every way” (Heb. 4:17) because he would not have been like us at all. Furthermore, Scripture says that Jesus “grew” in knowledge and wisdom. That would not really be true if Christ had access to a God-nature with infinite knowledge and wisdom.

We believe that John 17:5 is a great example of a verse that demonstrates the need for clear thinking concerning the doctrine of the Trinity. The verse can clearly be interpreted in a way that is honest and biblically sound, and shows that Christ was a man, but was in the foreknowledge of God as God’s plan for the salvation of mankind. It can also be used the way Trinitarians use it: to prove the Trinity. However, when it is used that way it reveals a Christ that we as Christians cannot truly identify with. We do not have a God-nature to help us when we are tempted or are in trouble or lack knowledge or wisdom. The Bible says that Christ can “sympathize with our weakness” because he was “tempted in every way, just as we are” (Heb. 4:15). The thrust of that verse is very straightforward. Because Christ was just like we are, and was tempted in every way that we are, he can sympathize with us. However, if he was not “just as we are,” then he would not be able to sympathize with us. We assert that making Christ a God-man makes it impossible to really identify with him.

We can tell that Jesus was speaking of being in God’s foreknowledge from the immediate context. Just two verses earlier, in John 17:3, Jesus said that the Father was “the only true God.” Jesus could not have prayed that while at the same time thinking he was God too. The proper interpretation of John 17 is simple and biblical. Jesus knew he was the promised Messiah and Son of God, and God had spoken of his glory many centuries earlier. Now, on the eve of his arrest, he prayed to his Father, the “only true God,” and asked for God’s plan to come to pass.

It also should be noted that Trinitarians have quoted Isaiah 42:8 which says that God will not give His glory to another, to show that Jesus must be God since Jesus had glory from God. The argument is fallacious for a number of reason. First, the context of Isaiah 42 is idols, and that God will not share His glory with idols. The verse, taken in context, is not saying God will never share any glory with those who obey Him, because He clearly does give glory to those who obey him (cp. 1 Cor. 2:7). Furthermore, John 17:22 says that Jesus gave the glory he got from His Father to his disciples. But if Jesus was God, then he did not get glory “from” his Father, he would have had it all along, and furthermore, if “God” will not give His glory to another, then Jesus would never have given it to his disciples. God glorified His Son, who in turn gives glory to his disciples.

Jesus’ prayer in John 17 sets a wonderful example for us as Christians. He poured out his heart to his Father, “the only true God” (John 17:3), and prayed that the prophecies of the Old Testament about him would be fulfilled. [For more information on John 17:5, see The Racovian Catechism, written in Polish in 1605; in Latin 1609; in English 1818; reprinted by Spirit & Truth Fellowship International, pp. 144-146. Also, Don Snedeker, Our Heavenly Father Has No Equals, pp. 424, 425].

17:12. “son of destruction.” This is a literal translation of the Greek, huios tēs apōleias, composed of the word for “son” (#5207 hios) and “destruction” (#684 apōleia) in the genitive case. It is the genitive of character—he is described as a son characterized by destruction, in this case, his destructive behavior. Judas’ character came first, then the consequences of his character; first he was a son of destruction, then accordingly he went to destruction. In other words, this title does not describe how he was first to be destroyed.
and was thus a “son of destruction” but that he was a son of destruction and thus to be destroyed (Cp. Lenski). Many versions add “the one doomed” (NIV) or “the one destined” (NRSV; NET; NJB), but these words are not in the Greek text.

It was a common Semitic idiom to refer to an aspect of one’s character by referring to him as the “son of” some quality. Thus we have “son of eighty years” means someone eighty years old (Exod. 7:7); “son of stripes” is someone deserving to be beaten (Deut. 25:2); “sons of rebellion” (Num. 17:10); “sons of the army” are soldiers (2 Chron. 25:13); “sons of the pledges” are hostages (2 Kings 14:14); “sons of death” are those who are worthy of death or are going to die (Psalm 79:11); “son of Gehenna” (Matt. 23:15); “son of destruction” (2 Thess. 2:3); “son of encouragement” (Acts 4:36); “son of the devil” (Acts 13:10); this custom even applies to animals: “son of the herd” (Gen. 18:7), and objects: “sons of the flame” for sparks (Job 5:7). The exact meaning of the idiom “son of X” has to be determined from the context, as the examples above show.

“resulting in the Scripture being fulfilled.” This phrase should not be translated as a purpose clause, as most translations do: “so that the scripture would be fulfilled.” This would have the consequence of making Judas intentionally lost for the purpose of fulfilling a prophecy about him. But the text in no way requires such a reading. In the Greek it is a hina with a verb in the subjunctive mood clause, which could be read to indicate a purpose or simply the result with no intention. Here it would be a result clause; Judas of his own free will was lost, resulting in the scripture being fulfilled, his being lost was not for the purpose of filling scripture. For explanation of purpose and result clauses, see Matthew 2:15 entry, “resulting in...what was spoken being fulfilled.” For more on Judas see entry on John 13:18, “let the scripture be fulfilled.”

17:15. “Wicked One.” The Greek is poneros (#4190 πονηρός), which the BDAG Greek-English Lexicon describes as, “pertaining to being morally or socially worthless; therefore, ‘wicked, evil, bad, base, worthless, vicious, and degenerate.’” Poneros is an adjective, but it is a substantive (an adjective used as a noun; for more on substantives, see the commentary on Matthew 5:37).

The Slanderer is the fount and foundation of wickedness. It was in him that wickedness was first found, when he was lifted up with pride and decided to rebel against God. Ever since that time he has been true to his name, “the Wicked One,” and has been doing and causing wickedness wherever he can, which, since he is “the god of this age,” is a considerable amount of wickedness. [For more names of the Slanderer (the Devil) and their meanings, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”].

17:17. “by the truth.” The Greek reads, “in the truth” (en tē alētheia; ἐν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ). Although the translation “by the truth” is not bad, and the Greek word en (“in”) can mean “by,” the Greek is not just communicating that a person is made holy “by” the truth, as if the truth were a hammer pounding in a nail. Rather, en (“in”) indicates that the person is “in relation” to the truth, “in connection” with the truth, “in union” with the truth. It is as we are “in” the truth, in a relationship with it, submerged in it, if you will, that people truly become holy in the sight of God. And this use of holy is not just “holy enough to be saved,” but truly “holy,” truly like God. We believers should make it our goal to so immerse ourselves in the Word of God and the things of God that we become holy and like God in every aspect of our lives.

17:18. “Just as you sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

17:19. “by the truth.” The Greek reads, “in the truth,” or more literally, “in truth,” but the phrase makes more sense with the definite article, which it has in verse 17. Although the definite article “the” is not in the text in this verse, it does not have to be. In Greek, a preposition can make the noun it modifies definite without there being a definite article in the phrase. Whether the noun is definite or indefinite can usually be determined from the context, at which point it can be translated in the best way to fit the receptor language (Daniel Wallace, Greek Grammar Beyond the Basics; Zondervan Publishing House, Grand Rapids, MI, 1996; p. 247). For an explanation of the phrase “in the truth,” see commentary on 17:17.

17:21. “in me and I in you.” See John 10:38 commentary “the Father is united with me, and I am united with the Father.”

“believe that you sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

17:23. “that you sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

17:25. “these knew that you sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

Chapter 18

18:1. “he went out.” Jesus and his disciples had gotten ready to leave the Last Supper in 14:31, but Jesus had continued to teach (chapters 15 and 16), and then pray (chapter 17). Now he goes out of the Upper Room, and out of the walled city of Jerusalem, and heads east across the Kidron Valley to the Garden of Gethsemane.

18:3. “Roman cohort.” Not necessarily the traditional 1/10 of a legion, or 600 men. At this time period, the word was sometimes used of a representative number of a cohort. Thus it could have been part of the cohort, but they were Roman soldiers, not just the guard of the High Priest. They were under the command of their “chiliarch”—translated as “military commander”—see verse 12. They would have come from the Antonia fortress. To get the Roman soldiers, the priests would have gone to Pilate, or even just to the chiliarch himself in Antonia under pretense of stopping a fomenting revolution. Some commentators think the entire group is Jewish, but this is not likely for a number of reasons. First, the vocabulary, especially chiliarch, is specific to the Roman army. Second, the cohort and the Temple police are mentioned as separate groups. If they were all Temple police, saying it once would have been enough. Third, the Temple police had already been sent to arrest Jesus once, and failed (John 7:45). The priests would take no chance this time, especially after they paid all that money to Judas to set the arrest up.
After the mobs had proclaimed him the Messiah (a great crowd yelled “Hosanna” (Save!), and called him the King of Israel; John 12:12 and 13), it would not have been difficult to persuade the Romans to arrest Jesus to keep a riot from occurring.

“Temple police.” The Greek word huperetai originally referred to the “under-rowers” in a galley, then it was generalized to mean any servant or underling under a superior. Thus it has a broad usage, and one that may or may not be demeaning, depending on the context. It applies to servants in different capacities: prison guard (Matt. 5:25), minister of Christ (Luke 1:2; 1 Cor. 4:1); Synagogue attendant (Luke 4:20), etc. Here it applies to a police force of sorts that was dedicated to keeping the peace in the Temple, so “Temple” is supplied from the context, and put in italics. See Vincent, Word Studies; Robertson, Word Pictures in the New Testament; Lenski, Commentary.

18:9. “so that the word that he spoke was fulfilled.” The Greek is a hina with a verb in the subjunctive mood purpose-result clause (see Matt. 2:15 entry, “resulting in…what was spoken being fulfilled”). Jesus said “let the men go” with the intention of fulfilling his words in John 17:12, and it also resulted in them being fulfilled.

18:11. “Am I not to drink…” The strong ou me in the Greek has been left as a simple “not.”

“drink the cup.” “Drinking the cup” was a common idiom meaning to experience, whether that experience was good (cp. Ps. 16:5; 23:5; 116:13; Jer. 16:7) or bad (cp. Ps. 11:6; 75:8; Isa. 51:17; Jer. 25:15). See commentary on Matthew 20:21.

18:12. “commander.” The Greek word chiliarchos (#5506 χιλιαρχος) designates a specific rank, namely, a “chiliarch,” which is the rank of a commander of a cohort; it is equivalent to a Roman tribune. We might say, the platoon and the sergeant. Thus the Romans not only sent soldiers, but the commander came along also.

18:13. “And they led him to Annas.” The events of the last week of Jesus Christ’s life are spread throughout all Four Gospels, and different Gospels give different details, which is why we have to be familiar with all four Gospel records to properly reconstruct what happened that week. Every Gospel is written from a different point of view: Matthew portrays Jesus as a king, Mark as a servant, Luke as a man, and John portrays Jesus as the Son of God [for more on these four viewpoints, see commentary on Mark 1:1].

In the case of Jesus’ arrest, only the Gospel of John records Jesus being taken to Annas, and makes it clear that he was taken to Annas first. Annas had been the High Priest from 6-15 AD, which meant Annas had been the High Priest when Jesus was in the Temple at twelve years old (Luke 2:41-52). At that time in the history of Israel, the High Priest was placed in office, or removed, by the Roman governor. Quirinius installed Annas, and Valerius Gratus deposed him, replacing him with Ismael son of Phabi. However, Annas’ power, wealth, and political adroitness were such that five of his sons, then his son-in-law Caiaphas, then a grandson, were all High Priests. Thus there is little doubt that Annas was the power behind the High Priest’s office, and so Jesus was first taken to Annas before he was taken to Caiaphas.

It makes sense that the Gospel of John would record Jesus being taken to Annas, because he did not have an official position, but no doubt had set the tone for the High Priesthood for many years, and in the epic struggle between good and evil and between religion and truth, it would make sense that the Son of God would stand before the “real” spiritual authority in Israel and be rejected by him before being taken to the “official” authorities. From Annas, Jesus was taken to Caiaphas, the “official” High Priest (John 18:24).

“first.” The events of the last week of Jesus’ life are the pivotal events of history. It was late Monday night when Jesus was arrested in the Garden of Gethsemane (Matt. 26:47-56; Mark 14:43-52; Luke 22:47-53; John 18:2-12). After that, the following events take place, culminating in Jesus’ death.

1. Late Monday night: After his arrest, Jesus was taken “first” to Annas, who would have been at his own home (John 18:13-23).
2. Very late Monday night or early Tuesday morning: Jesus was taken to Caiaphas, the High Priest, who had called together many of the chief priests and Jewish leadership (Matt. 27:57-68; Mark 14:53-65; Luke 22:54-65; John 18:24-27).
3. Tuesday sunrise: Jesus was taken to a dawn meeting of the Sanhedrin, the ruling council of the Jews, and this meeting would have been in a chamber inside the Temple (Matt. 27:1; Mark 15:1; Luke 22:66-71).
4. Tuesday morning: The Sanhedrin took Jesus to Pilate early in the morning (John 18:28). This early meeting was not unusual because Roman government conducted business early, and usually quit in the early afternoon. Pilate would have been in the Western Palace, which had been the Palace of Herod the Great (Mark 15:1; Luke 23:1-6; John 18:28-38).
6. Tuesday, close to noon: Herod sent Jesus back to Pilate. This second trial before Pilate occurred about 12 noon (John 19:14). Matthew, Mark, and John do not clearly show that Jesus’ trial before Pilate was in two parts, an early morning part (Mark 15:1; John 18:28) and a later part about 12 noon. They show the two trials as one record (actually, it seems that Matthew leaves the early trial out completely, and just focuses on the second trial before Pilate). From the record in Luke, we can see that Barabbas was offered as part of Pilate’s second trial (Luke 23:18), which is helpful in determining the chronology of the other Gospels. Also, Luke notes that at the start of the second trial, Pilate had to call together the chief priests again (Luke 23:13), which makes sense because they would have left his palace and gone about their duties when Pilate sent Jesus to Herod.
7. Tuesday afternoon, night, and Wednesday morning: After Jesus’ second trial before Pilate, Pilate handed him over to his soldiers. They took him to the Praetorium, gathered the entire Roman cohort, and then beat and tortured him through the afternoon and night (Matt. 27:26-31; Mark 15:16-20; Luke and John omit Jesus’ overnight torture by the whole Roman cohort of soldiers).
8. Wednesday morning: Jesus is led out to be crucified about 9 AM (Mark 15:25), and about 12 noon a darkness came over the land that lasted until 3 PM, when Jesus died (Matt. 27:31-45; Mark 15:20-33; Luke 23:26-44; John 19:17-29)

Jesus died Wednesday afternoon and was raised from the dead three days and three nights later, on Saturday at sunset. [For information on the events and chronology of Jesus’ death and resurrection and his being in the tomb from Wednesday night to Saturday night, see commentary on Luke 23:50].

18:14. “Caiaphas who advised.” This was back in John 11:50.
18:17. “slave-girl.” In this context, slave-girl is the most likely translation of paidiskē (#3814 παιδίσκη, the feminine of paidiskos, a young boy or slave; a diminutive of παῖς. Cp. Thayer’s Greek-English Lexicon). She could have been a “servant-girl” or a “slave-girl,” but given the wealth and social status of the High Priest’s family, it is more probable that this woman was a slave-girl. The Greek word was used of a young girl, a servant girl, or a young female slave.

18:18. “servants and the Temple guard.” The Greek words are both general. Douloi is slaves or servants, and huperetai is also servants or underlings. So what are the specifics of these words? The context would indicate the servants and the Temple guards.

18:21. “Why do you ask me?” Jesus was correct and following the Law by saying this. He knew he was on trial, and the prosecution is supposed to produce witnesses, not try to get self-incrimination. This was one of the many inconsistencies or illegalities with the trial of Jesus. That is also why, after one of the police struck him in the face for supposed impertinence, Jesus said, “If I have spoken wrongly, testify to the wrong, but if rightly, why do you strike me?”

18:24. “Annas sent him, still tied up, to Caiaphas the high priest.” It is likely that the two of them lived in the same palace-like complex or adjoining homes, with only a courtyard dividing them. It was common for relatives to share a living space, or live close together, and there is no indication that Peter moved from one courtyard to another in the trial of Jesus. Peter was only able to get into the High Priest’s courtyard because of a connection that one of the disciples had with the High Priest (John 18:16), and Peter never again had to ask to gain entrance to another courtyard. After his arrest in Gethsemane, Jesus was taken to Annas first, then sent to Caiaphas. From there he was taken to a dawn meeting of the whole Sanhedrin (Matt. 27:1; Mark 15:1; Luke 22:66-71). Caiaphas was the son-in-law to Annas, and the designated High Priest at that time. The trial of Jesus (indeed, the whole conflict between Jesus and the religious leaders), reveals the extent to which tradition often takes precedent over truth, and how some religious people will go to great lengths to protect their traditions, even at the expense of people’s lives. It was against Jewish Law to conduct a capital trial at night. According to law, any capital trial had to be held during the full light of day, but in this case Caiaphas tired Jesus at night. His “reason” was likely that a full daylight trial of Jesus in Passover season would attract large crowds of his followers, and the uproar might require Roman troops and lead to more Roman control and restrictions, which the Jewish ruling council did not want.

18:28. “the Praetorium.” “Praetorium” was a term used for wherever the governor or the current military commander was staying, so the word itself does not tell us where it was. In this case, it was most likely the Western Place, which had been the residence of Herod the Great.

Scholars are divided over whether Jesus was tried at the Western Palace, or at the Antonia Fortress (the traditional start of the Via Dolorosa). Alfred Edersheim writes: “Although it is impossible to speak with certainty, the balance of probability is entirely in favor of the view that, when Pilate was in Jerusalem with his wife, he occupied the truly royal abode of Herod, not the fortified barracks of Antonia…the inference is obvious that Pilate, especially as he was accompanied by his wife, stayed there [the Western Palace] also” (Life and Times, Book 5, p. 566). The Antonia was not at all lavish, and it is hard to believe that Pilate would subject his wife to staying there when Herod’s Palace was another residence of his in the same city barely a half mile away. We must keep in mind that Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread was over a week long, and Pilate likely came from Caesarea to Jerusalem for at least a couple weeks.

Many people believe that the Praetorium was in the Antonia Fortress. One reason, though usually unspoken, is that it is the traditional location, and many people believe that there had to be a good reason for the tradition to get started, which actually there does not. In fact, if tradition is the test, the fact that the Antonia Fortress is the traditional location would witness against its being the actual site. The traditional site of the Transfiguration, the Ecce Homo arch, the stops on the Via Dolorosa, the Pool of Siloam, and much more have all been disproven. The tradition of the current pathway of the Via Dolorosa starting at Antonia started during Medieval time. When Christian pilgrims began coming to the Holy Land in the fourth century, the site of the Praetorium of Pilate had been forgotten. The earliest pilgrims of this period located it below the Jewish Quarter in the Tyropoeon Valley just east of the temple area. Later the pilgrimage site was moved to the Church of Holy Sion on “Mount Zion,” which is actually not far south of where Herod’s palace had actually stood. Then the “traditional site” was reassigned a third time, this time to the site on which now stands Convent of the Sisters of Zion in Jerusalem.

Another reason the Antonia is sometimes favored is that it is said that the governor had to stay close to the troops so he could be firmly in command in case of trouble. But the Western Palace is only about 600 yards (less than 600 meters) from the Temple, so Pilate’s staying there would not be a problem.

Modern historical and archaeological evidence is favoring the Western Palace as the Praetorium where Jesus was taken to Pilate. John 19:13 mentions “the Pavement” (Greek: lithostrotos; #3038 λιθόστρωτος). There is a supposed “lithostrotos” under the Convent of the Sisters of Zion in Jerusalem, but this has been conclusively dated as being constructed after the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 AD. For one thing, the pavement covers the “Struthion Pool,” which Josephus, speaking about it before 70 AD, said was open to the air. Thus any pavement covering it post-dates the Jewish revolt of 70 AD. In contrast, the huge paved area in the Western Palace dates to the time of Christ, and is so huge it is genuinely worthy of getting the name, “the Pavement.”

Philo of Alexandria, in his Delegation to Gains, says Pilate’s residence during the feasts was in “Herod’s palace,” and Josephus makes the point that the governor Florus also stayed at the Palace, and says it had a bema (place of judgment) in front of it and a place where criminals could be whipped (War: 2:301ff). The evidence leans strongly that Jesus was tried in Herod’s Palace on the Western side of Jerusalem.

18:29. “Pilate.” Pontius Pilate was the Roman governor of Judea from 26 to 36 AD. [For more on Pilate, see commentary on Matt. 27:2].

“What accusation are you bringing against this man?” This was a standard opening of a trial, and no doubt Pilate had spoken the same words many times before. 18:32. “with the result that.” In the Greek a hina with a verb in the subjunctive mood result clause. See Matthew 2:15 entry, “resulting in…what was spoken being fulfilled.”

“clearly indicating by what manner of death he was about to die.” Jesus had spoken of being lifted up from the earth, which meant he would be crucified. See John 12:32, 33; and 3:14 and 8:28.

18:34. “Do you say this of yourself.” The disciples did not expect Jesus to be killed and then raised from the dead. That is simply not what most first-century Jews believed about the Messiah, so they did not understand what Jesus was speaking of when he spoke of being raised from the dead (cp. Matt. 16:22; Mark 9:10; John 20:9).

18:36. “My kingdom is not of this world.” What Jesus means is that his kingdom and “this world” (not “the world,” but “this world”) have little in common. “This world” is a fallen world, under the control of the Devil (John 14:30; 1 John 5:19). Jesus’ enemies were “of this world” (John 8:23), and were children of the Devil (John 8:44). The wisdom of “this world” is foolishness with God (1 Cor. 3:19). Thankfully, the present shape of “this world” is passing away, and one day will be gone altogether (1 Cor. 7:31; Rev. 21:4, 5). Jesus’ kingdom was going to be established on earth by the power of God when he came from heaven (Rev. 19), and his authority was going to come from God, not from “this world’s” system of things.

We must be careful when reading “My kingdom is not of this world” that we do not think it is saying, “My kingdom will not be on earth,” because Jesus will set up his Millennial Kingdom on earth [For more on Christ’s earthly kingdom, see Appendix 3: “Christ’s Future Kingdom on Earth”].

“in fact.” This is the logical, not the temporal, use of the Greek word nun (#3568 νῦν). It can be confusing to translate this as “now,” because people might take it to mean “not now, but later,” but that is not its meaning here. Jesus was not telling Pilate that he would later have a kingdom. He had just told Pilate he did have a kingdom but it was not of this world. Now he was saying that in different words: The fact is that my kingdom is not from here. He was not a rival to Pilate or Rome.

18:37. “You rightly say.” See Matthew 27:11 note on “It is as you say.” In verse 36 and 37 Pilate discovers that, although Jesus is claiming to be some kind of king over something with which he is unfamiliar, the Jews’ blanket accusation that Jesus was making himself a king in a sense that would be threatening to Caesar was false. Thus he reports in verse 38 that he finds no cause for death in Jesus.

Chapter 19

19:4. “to let you know.” The verb “know” is ginōskō (#1097 γινώσκω), and it is in the subjunctive mood, which is why many translations have “that you may know.” However, the Greek conjunction hina (#2443 ἡν), which is a word introducing a purpose, earlier in the sentence, is the reason the verb is subjunctive, and therefore in these cases we must get the sense of the verb from the context. In this case, there is no reason to use the awkward translation, “so that you may know,” when the meaning is simply “to let you know” (cp. HCSB; NIV; also see CJB and NJB).

19:5. “See!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

19:6. “reason for a charge.” The Greek is aitia (#156 αἰτία), and means that which is responsible for a condition, cause, reason; the actual state of affairs, case, circumstance, relationship; a basis for legal action, charge, ground for complaint; accusation (BDAG). In this verse, Pilate was telling the Jews he found no reason for a charge against Jesus.

19:14. “sixth hour.” This is about our 12 noon. Both the Jews and Romans divided the day into 12 hours, starting at daylight, roughly 6 AM. [For more information on the hours of the day and the watches of the night, see commentary on Mark 6:48].

There has been much discussion about the chronology used in the book of John, but there is no genuine reason to believe that John used a different standard of chronology and timekeeping than all the Gospels. The reason some theologians have questioned the timekeeping in John is to try to explain how the Gospel of John can say that Jesus was still with Pilate about noon, the 6th hour, (John 19:14) when other Gospels have him being crucified at the third hour (our 9 AM; Mark 15:25), then darkness coming over the land at the sixth hour (our noon; Luke 23:44), then Jesus dying around the ninth hour (our 3 PM; Matt. 27:46-50; Mark 15:24-37). Obviously, if Jesus was still with Pilate at noon, and then he was handed over to the soldiers who tortured him, he could not have been crucified at 9 AM, and in fact it would have even been difficult to get him crucified by about 3 PM, when Matthew and Mark say he died.

The answer to the “problem” created by trying to make Jesus’ crucifixion on Friday is that Jesus was not arrested Thursday night and crucified Friday morning, as most Christians suppose. The primary reason that historically people have believed the crucifixion had to be Friday is that it occurred the day before the Sabbath. But Passover Day was a Sabbath, a special Sabbath according to the Law of Moses (see commentary on John 19:31). The accurate chronology is:

- Jesus was arrested Monday night and taken to Annas (John 18:12-14)
- There was a night trial at Caiaphas’ house at which Jesus was condemned to death for blasphemy (Matt. 26:59-67; Mark 14:55-65).
- After the night trial, Jesus was taken at daybreak to a trial before the whole Sanhedrin and was condemned by them (Matt. 27:1; Luke 22:66-70).
- After the daybreak trial before the Sanhedrin, Jesus was taken before Pontus Pilate (Matt. 27:2; Mark 15:1; Luke 23:1-6; John 18:28).
- Pilate sent Jesus to the tetrarch Herod Antipas to be tried by him (Luke 23:7-12).
- Herod sent Jesus back to Pilate, so Jesus was before Pilate about noon (John 19:14). Most of the Gospels do not have Jesus going back and forth between Pilate and Herod, but blend Jesus’ two trials before Pilate into one record.
- Pilate hands Jesus over to the soldiers who torture him through the night (Matt. 27:26-31; Mark 15:16-20; John 19:16).
- Jesus is crucified around 9 AM Wednesday morning (Mark 15:25).
• Darkness comes over the land from 12 noon to 3 PM (Matt. 27:45; Mark 15:33; Luke 23:44).
• Jesus dies sometime around 3 PM (Matt. 27:46-50; Mark 15:34-37; Luke 23:44-46).

The only way to make the traditional chronology work is to say that the “sixth hour” in John 19:14 somehow does not refer to noon, but much earlier. But how could that be? The Gospel of John clearly uses the standard Roman and Jewish hours, as we can see from John 1:39, 4:6, and 4:52. It is sometimes taught said that the Romans reckoned their hours from midnight, and that was technically true or their civil day, but, as R. C. H. Lenski points out, “for ordinary purposes they [the Romans], too, reckoned twelve hours from sunrise to sunset” (The Interpretation of St. John’s Gospel, commentary on John 1:39).

John would not use a “special” chronology just in this one verse. R. C. H. Lenski, who believes in the traditional Friday crucifixion, is honest enough to say, “No solution [to the John 19:14 problem] has yet been found.” The solution to the problem is actually simple. Jesus was before Pilate at 12 noon, but on Tuesday. Then, after the trial, Pilate turned Jesus over to the soldiers who tortured him through the night, and he was crucified on Wednesday morning, Passover Day, 28 AD. He arose from the dead three days and three nights after he was buried, so he got up on Saturday evening just before sunset (Matt. 12:40 says Jesus was 3 days and 3 nights in the heart of the earth). Then Jesus first appeared to his disciples on Sunday morning, just as Scripture says (the Bible never says Jesus got up Sunday morning. That is an assumption. It says he appeared to his disciples on Sunday morning). [For more information on the events from Jesus’ arrest to his death, see commentary on Luke 18:13. For information on the events and chronology of Jesus’ death and resurrection and his being in the tomb from Wednesday night to Saturday night, see commentary on Luke 23:50].

19:15. “crucify him.” This is not the same crowd that had said, “Hosanna,” and “Son of David” some days earlier. See commentary on Luke 23:21.

19:17. “cross.” The Greek word is stauros (#4716 σταυρός; pronounced stau-ros’). The “cross” that Jesus was executed on has been a subject of scholarly debate for many years. The problem is that stauros can mean several things, including a cross, a single stake, or even just the horizontal cross-piece that was attached to something that was fixed in place such as an upright stake or even a tree. Similarly, the verb stauroō (#4717 σταυροῦμαι pronounced stau-ro’-ô) often translated as “crucify,” has a number of meanings, such as “drive a stake” or “crucify” (i.e., execute on a stauros), but as with stauros, the Greek word itself does not describe the shape of the execution device.

In spite of the ambiguity of stauros and stauroō, the Bible does give us some help with how Jesus died. John 19:17 says that Jesus started out carrying his own cross, that most likely indicates he was carrying a cross-piece of some kind that would then be attached to an upright stake that was already in place. At some point along the way to Calvary, Jesus could no longer carry his stauros, and it was transferred to a man called Simon of Cyrene who carried it after Jesus (Matt. 27:32; Mark 15:21; Luke 23:26). It is possible that the stauros Jesus carried was a large upright stake that he was then crucified on. However, this is not as likely as him carrying just the cross-piece, because if he carried a large single stake the Romans would have had to have gone out much earlier and dug a hole for that upright stake to fit in securely, which would have been quite difficult. The rocky ground would have made trying to dig a hole right at that time very unlikely. Nevertheless, scholars such as E. W. Bullinger think Jesus was crucified on a single upright stake.

The Greek text also says Jesus was crucified on a “tree” (Acts 5:30; 10:39; 13:29; 1 Pet. 2:24). The Greek word is xulon (#3586 ξύλον pronounced zoo-lon) and it means a tree, log, a piece of timber or wood, or something made from wood such as a beam or cross or club (Mark 14:48), or even the stocks that Paul’s feet were placed in (Acts 16:24). The use of xulon to describe the way Jesus died has caused some scholars, such as Earnest Martin, to say that Jesus carried his cross-piece, but when he got to the place of crucifixion, it was nailed to a living tree. However, the word xulon, like the word stauros, has so many different meanings that we cannot tell from it the exact shape of the “cross” Jesus was crucified on.

From a practical point of view, it is unlikely that Jesus was crucified on a single upright stake that was dropped into a hole that had already been dug. It is also unlikely that Jesus was nailed to a piece of wood that then had to be nailed to a living tree. That would have required a lot of manpower and at least a few living trees, because others were crucified with Christ. It is much more likely that the Romans already had upright stakes in the ground waiting for Jesus and the others who were crucified with him that day, and that they nailed the men to horizontal cross-pieces that were then hoisted into place and secured. If that is the case, then the crosses on which Jesus and the other men were crucified were quite “standard” in shape, looking like a regular tee: “†”. The fact is, however, that we cannot be sure of the exact shape of the cross on which Jesus was crucified.

19:20. “the Place of the city.” The word “place” was a designation of the Temple, see commentary on topos at Matthew 24:15.

19:24. Quoted from Psalm 22:18. “so that.” In the Greek a hina with a verb in the subjunctive mood purpose-result, or simply result clause. See Matthew 2:15 entry, “resulting in...what was spoken being fulfilled.” God could have worked in these men—in a way that did not inhibit their free will—to want to draw lots, or it could just be a result clause. The rendering “so that,” is an ambiguous translation in that it could be read as either purpose or result.

“Now this is what the soldiers did.” The context demands that this phrase goes with verse 24, not verse 25. Parting with the ASV, NASB, and NRSV, we followed the verse pattern of the Nestle-Aland Greek text. Although the Greek, oi men sun that opens the phrase can be causal, i.e., “so...,” it can also simply be a mark of continuation of the dialogue, in this case sort of a summation of the action of the soldiers. The soldiers did act by their free-will. It is not as if God forced the soldiers to act in a manner that fulfilled the prophecy. Between God’s foreknowledge and Him working behind the scenes in history, the prophecy is fulfilled without curtailing anyone’s freedom of will.

19:26. “Woman.” The Greek is gunē (#1135 γυνή; goo-nay’), a woman of any age, a wife. It was a blessing that Jesus referred to Mary as “woman” and not “mother.” Calling Mary “mother” would have only heightened the horrible emotional pain she was already feeling, but more than that, it would have taken her focus in the wrong direction. Jesus, although her biological son, was her Lord, and she his disciple. She needed to begin to think of Jesus’ crucifixion as the will of God and the obedience of her Lord, and as God’s provision of restoration for the whole world.
19:27. “your mother!” As part of his last acts before his death, Jesus took care of his family, which was an important duty, especially since he was the oldest son. Thus he shows by example what the Bible says clearly: “But if anyone does not provide for his own, and especially his own household, he has denied the faith and is worse than an unbeliever” (1 Tim. 5:8). It is fair to ask, why Jesus would have told John to take his mother Mary home with him. Although the Bible does not tell us directly, we can deduce that Jesus’ father, Joseph, had died. It also seems certain that Jesus’ brothers still did not believe in him (see commentary on John 7:5).

The Bible does not say directly that Joseph died, but that is the logical conclusion from the scope of Scripture. It seems unlikely that Joseph, who had been a good husband and father, had abandoned the family. Yet he is obviously not around when Jesus told John to take Mary home. We know that in Nazareth, Jesus’ hometown, Joseph took care to raise his boys in a traditional way. He was considered “the carpenter” (or perhaps more accurately, “the builder”), and he had raised Jesus to be a carpenter too. We know this because in the Gospel of Mark, Jesus is called a carpenter (Mark 6:3).

By the time Jesus started his ministry, however, there is a complete absence of Joseph. When the family thought Jesus had gone insane, Mary and his brothers came to get him without Joseph (Matt. 12:47; Luke 8:19). As his ministry progressed, his brothers are mentioned, but not his father. In fact, when the Scripture says that “his brothers” did not believe in him, it seems unlikely that the opinion of his father Joseph would have been omitted if he had still been around. The most conclusive evidence that Joseph was dead, however, was that Jesus told John to take Mary home. That would have been unthinkable if Joseph were alive.

The other reasons Jesus would have asked John to take care of Mary is that Jesus’ own brothers were continuing to reject him (see commentary on John 5:7). Scripture says that Jesus was tempted in every way just as we are, and the disbelief of his brothers would have certainly been a source of pain to Jesus. All of us want the love and support of our family members, but in the case of faith in Jesus, his brothers having faith in him meant more than just family unity, it meant their salvation. There is no scriptural evidence that any of Jesus’ brothers believed he was the Messiah until after his resurrection, and that may have been part of the reason that Jesus went to Galilee after his resurrection. Thankfully, at least some of Jesus brothers came to believe in him after his resurrection. In fact, his brother James rose to lead the Church in Jerusalem after the Apostle James was killed by Herod Agrippa (cp. Acts 12:2, 17; 15:13), and he wrote the Epistle of James. Also, his brother Judas rose to prominence and wrote the Epistle of Jude.

19:28. “in order to.” The Scripture that was fulfilled was Psalm 69:21: “for my thirst they gave me sour wine to drink.” In the Greek a hina with a verb in the subjunctive mood purpose clause. See Matthew 2:15 entry, “resulting in…what was spoken being fulfilled.” By this time Jesus’ mouth would have been utterly dry, not having had any water for over 24 hours. As scripture says of the suffering Messiah, “my mouth is dried up like a potsherd, and my tongue sticks to my jaws; you lay me in the dust of death” (Psalm 22:15, NRSV). Now seeing that all things were completed, he had only to die. But in a last act of grace towards those standing near, he desired to quote Psalm 22 to the onlookers, that they may see he is clearly fulfilling scripture. “My God, my God, why have you forsaken me,” quotes Jesus (Matt. 27:46; Mark 15:34), but some of those standing by misheard “Eli, Eli” to be a call for “Elias,” due to the difficulty Jesus would have had in speaking. Therefore, Jesus says, “I am thirsty,” not as a statement of fact, but “in order to fulfill the scriptures,” and also for the purpose of wetting his mouth to allow for annunciation. Having received the sour wine and feeling the unconsciousness of death creeping on, Jesus exclaims, “It is finished” (John 19:30), which the other gospels only record as a “loud cry” (Matt. 27:50; Mark. 15:37). Luke 23:46 gives the further information that during this time he also said, “Father, into your hands I commit my spirit” (from Psalm 31:5).

19:30. “It is finished.” This phrase is the translation of the one Greek word teleō (#5055 τελέω; pronounced “tel-eh'-ŏ”). It means “to complete an activity, thus, to finish, to close; to carry out an obligation, thus to accomplish, perform, fulfill; to pay what is due” (BDAG). Interestingly, it has been found in the papyri on tax receipts where it was used as “paid in full,” just as we put “paid in full” on paid receipts today. Thus, this statement is pregnant with meaning. It did mean, “It is finished,” because every obligation and prophecy of the Law, every requirement that was necessary for the salvation of mankind, was finished when Jesus ended his life. It also meant, “Paid in full,” because Jesus was the payment, the sin offering, for mankind’s sin (Rom. 3:25; 2 Cor. 5:21).

19:31. “the high day.” The Jews did not want the bodies to remain on the crosses on that special Sabbath that started the Feast of Unleavened Bread, so they wanted to have the legs of the criminals broken. Then the criminals would not be able to support their weight on their legs and would quickly asphyxiate.

The Passover lamb was always killed on the 14th of Nisan (Nisan is the first month of the Jewish year), and the sunset after the Passover lamb was killed started the 15th of Nisan. The 15th of Nisan was the first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread, and it was always a Sabbath, no matter on which day of the week it occurred (Lev. 15:7). The Law of Moses decreed that the 15th of Nisan was a special Sabbath, which is why Luke 23:54 says the “Sabbath” was beginning, even though the day that was beginning was a Thursday. We need to be clear on the fact that the “Sabbath” here in John 19:31 and in Luke 23:54 is not the weekly Sabbath, Saturday, but Thursday, the 15th of Nisan (see commentary on Luke 23:54). This point is made clear here in John 19:31, which tells us specifically that this Sabbath was a “high day,” meaning a special Sabbath, not the regular weekly Sabbath.

Most Christians do not realize that when the Bible says Jesus was crucified the day before the “Sabbath,” it does not mean the regular weekly Sabbath, but rather the Sabbath that starts with sunset after the Passover sacrifice. Sunset on the 14th of Nisan, the day the Passover sacrifice is killed, starts the Feast of Unleavened Bread, the 15th of Nisan, and that day is always a special Sabbath, a high day.

The Jews had no love for Jesus, and stories about him got confused as time went on. Yet apparently they retained the historic memory of him dying the day the Passover Lamb was killed, just before the Feast of Unleavened Bread started. Thus they write in the Babylonian Talmud: “On the eve of Passover Yeshu was hanged. For forty days before the execution took place, a herald went forth and cried, ‘He is going forth to be stoned because he has practised sorcery and enticed Israel to apostacy. Any one who can say anything in his favour, let him come forward and plead on his behalf.’ But since nothing was brought forward in his favour he was hanged on the eve of the Passover!” (Babylonian Talmud, Sanhedrin 43a (uncensored version) [Soncino Translation]).
“so that.” In the Greek a hina with a verb in the subjunctive mood purpose-result, or simply result clause. See Matthew 2:15 entry, “resulting in...what was spoken being fulfilled.” God could have brought it about that none of messiah’s bones were broken, or it could just be a result clause. The rendering “so that,” is an ambiguous translation in that it could be read as either purpose or result.
19:38. “Joseph...asked Pilate’s permission so that he could take away the body of Jesus.” Joseph of Arimathea asked for the body of Jesus. See commentary on Matthew 27:58.
19:39. “But Nicodemus also came.” The Greek has the particle de (#1161 δέ; pronounced deh), often translated “but,” at the beginning of the sentence. However, the de in the Greek text has been basically ignored by translators due to the tradition that Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus worked together to bury Jesus, even though they did not (see commentary on John 19:40). The most common use of the de is to either mark a contrast or mark the start of a new subject. In this verse, it could be translated as a contrast, as in the REV, or it could be seen to start a new subject, but we do not have a good English word that does that (Rotherham’s Emphasized Bible uses “Moreover”). Many English versions show the change in subject by not translating the de at all, but we did not feel that was strong enough in this context. We should read John like, “Joseph took down the body of Jesus, but Nicodemus came with spices to bury him.” Although it is true that grammatically there are times when the de can be translated “and,” that would be misleading in this case because it would connect Joseph and Nicodemus too closely.
Translations of John 19:39 such as the NIV’s “he [Joseph] was accompanied by Nicodemus,” are in error. They are not what the Greek text says, and thus are not translations, but interpretations, and erroneous ones at that.
“about seventy-five pounds.” The Greek is 100 litra (#3046 λίτρα), and a litra is a Roman pound of 12 ounces, while the American pound is 16 ounces. Thus 100 Roman pounds is 75 American pounds. Quite a few English versions read, “100 pounds,” which is confusing to English readers who only think in terms of American pounds.
This is a huge amount of spices. It is likely that Jesus’ body did not even weigh much more than twice that amount. It has been suggested by many scholars that this large amount was actually fitting for a royal burial, and thus although Jesus’ birth was in less than royal circumstances, it seems his burial, in the tomb of a rich man and with a royal amount of spices, was a royal burial. Had the women watching the burial seen Nicodemus, they would not have gone and bought spices themselves, and we can bet that even though they did buy spices, they did not buy nearly 75 pounds worth, which would have cost a lot of money.
19:40. “they.” Joseph of Arimathea got the body of Jesus down from the cross, wrapped it in clean linen cloth, put it in a tomb, rolled the stone over the door of the tomb, and left, and the women watched him (Matt. 27:58-61). After Joseph of Arimathea left the tomb, Nicodemus and his servants arrived. Nicodemus and his servants are likely the “they” in John 19:40.
We know that Nicodemus and Joseph did not work together because Joseph closed the tomb and left while the women were still watching him (Matt. 27:60, 61). But if the women had seen Joseph and Nicodemus work together to bury Jesus, which is what the traditional teaching says, then the women would have seen that Jesus had been properly buried, even royally buried, with 75 pounds of spices (see REV commentary on John 19:39). The fact that the women left the tomb after Joseph did, and still thought they needed to buy spices is conclusive evidence that Joseph and the women had left the area before Nicodemus arrived with the spices.

Nicodemus needed to have servants with him for a number of reasons. For one thing, to help him carry the spices, which weighed about 75 pounds (John 19:39). Also, he would have needed help rolling away the stone from the door of the tomb. Also, it was likely that as a member of the Sanhedrin and a wealthy man, he would have traveled with a bodyguard anyway, especially when it was close to dark, and very especially when he was carrying what certainly was thousands of dollars’ worth of valuable spices.

Nicodemus brought the traditional burial spices with him, and re-wrapped Jesus’ body with them. It is likely that Nicodemus’ work was completed after dark, which was the first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread, which was always counted as a Sabbath, no matter what day of the week it fell on. Nevertheless, he would have had some light even without torches because it was the 14th day of the Jewish lunar month, so there was a full moon. Nicodemus touched Jesus’ dead body, making himself unclean for the Passover meal, and this showed how much he loved Jesus.

One reason that tradition teaches that Joseph and Nicodemus worked together is that it seems unlikely that the only two followers of Jesus on the Sanhedrin would not have collaborated together on the burial of Jesus. Even if Joseph and Nicodemus knew about each other, it is possible that they did not find out about each other until the trial of Jesus, when they were asked to vote for his death. It does seem that they both had been very quiet about being followers of Jesus, so much so that it seems that none of the other members of the Sanhedrin knew they were disciples.

It occurs occasionally in the Gospels that even though there are two or more people involved in doing something, some Gospels mention only one of the people while others mention both people. So, for example, when it comes to the men who lived in the tombs who Jesus healed, Matthew mentions both men (Matt. 8:28), while Mark and Luke mention only one of the two men (Mark 5:2; Luke 8:27). However, that kind of scenario does not work for Joseph and Nicodemus, because had they worked together they would have closed the tomb and left together, but the women saw Joseph close the tomb and leave, and the body of Jesus had not yet been properly buried with spices, according to the Jewish custom.

It is possible that Joseph and Nicodemus conferred about the burial of Jesus, but disagreed about how it was to be done. It is more likely, however, that they were supposed to meet at the tomb and work together but Nicodemus got delayed, so Joseph wrapped the body, put it in the tomb and left just before the Sabbath started. Nicodemus, arriving later, realized what happened and went ahead with the royal burial of Jesus. If that is the case, the “they” in John 19:40 could refer to both Joseph and Nicodemus, even though they did not work on the burial of Jesus at the same time. What is clear from the Gospel records is that the women saw Joseph close the tomb and leave without properly burying Jesus, and were not there when Nicodemus came with the spices, which is why they went and bought spices for his burial.

19:42. “because the tomb was nearby.” This phrase starts out with the Greek word hoti (#3754 ὅτι), which is a conjunction that in this context means “because, since, for.” This little phrase in John is a huge key to properly understanding Jesus’ burial. Matthew 27:57-60 informs us that the tomb belonged to Joseph of Arimathea, who was wealthy, while Mark 15:43 informs us that Joseph was a member of the Sanhedrin, the Jewish ruling council of Israel, so he was indeed a wealthy and powerful man. Although he was from Arimathea, his position on the Sanhedrin would have been a reason for him to move to Jerusalem. That is no doubt why he had a tomb already cut out and prepared, surely for him and his family.

Although the exact location of Arimathea is uncertain, it is most likely the modern town of Rentis, about 20 miles (32 km) NW of Jerusalem, and even if Joseph had a family tomb there, it is understandable that he would have wanted a family tomb in Jerusalem that would have been fitting both to his wealth and social status. Also, since at that time people were buried the same day they died, and Arimathea was at least a day’s journey, that would have been another reason Joseph would have wanted a tomb in Jerusalem, and why he would have had it prepared long before any of his family died. Death often came suddenly and unexpectedly in biblical times.

Joseph’s tomb just happened to be nearby the place where Jesus was crucified, and since he was a disciple of Jesus he willingly allowed his tomb to be used for Jesus’ body, including using his position and influence to get the body from the Romans. By the time Pilate’s permission could be obtained to claim Jesus’ dead body, it was very near sunset, which started the Passover, so there was no time to move the body far.

It has sometimes been taught that Joseph prepared the tomb for Jesus, but that would not be the case. Joseph would have no idea where Jesus was going to be crucified (and most likely, like the Apostles, did not even understand that he would be crucified), and this verse tells us that Jesus was buried there “because” it was near to the crucifixion site.

“So they laid Jesus there.” John 19:41 and 42 are a summary describing the burial place of Jesus. The “they” in verse 42 is simply referring to the fact that Jesus was placed in the tomb by people. It does not have to mean that Joseph and Nicodemus worked together. “They” placed him in the tomb: Joseph brought his body there, wrapped it, and shut the tomb door. Nicodemus and his servants opened the tomb, wrapped the body of Jesus with spices, and rolled the stone back over the door (see commentary on John 19:40). [For more information on Jesus being crucified and buried on Wednesday and being three days and three nights in the grave, see commentary on Matthew 12:40].

20:1. “on the first day of the week.” John chapter 19 ended with Jesus being buried, which was Wednesday close to sunset. John chapter 20 starts on Sunday morning before Sunrise, so there has been more than three days and nights between John 19:42 and 20:1.

“Mary Magdalene comes to the tomb early.” Mary had seen the tomb just before sunset the night before (see commentary on Matt. 28:1). Now she came alone to the tomb “early, while it was still dark.” The Greek for “when it was still dark” indicates that the darkness was ending and the daylight was coming on. Biblically, the dimness of just before sunrise was still “dark.” We in the Western world tend to think of “dark” as “black-dark,” but in the biblical world before artificial lights, “dark” meant when it was not yet clearly bright out yet. The haze before sunrise was “dark” to them.

The trip from Bethany, which was on the east side of the Mount of Olives and apparently where Peter and the others were staying, to the tomb area, which we believe was on the west side of the Mount of Olives, is quite short, probably no longer than a 20 minute walk. Even if the tomb is in the vicinity of Gordon’s Calvary (a traditional Protestant site of the tomb) or at the location of the Church of the Holy Sepulcher (the traditional Catholic and Orthodox site of the tomb), the walk would have only taken perhaps a half hour.

It is likely that the other women, who had the spices, were going to meet Mary at the tomb, and arrived at the tomb only a little while later, shortly after sunrise, carrying the spices they had prepared on Friday (see commentary on Mark 16:2; Luke 24:1; cp. Matt. 28:5; see commentary on Matt. 27:58). It is also possible, however, that Mary was going early to see if the guard was gone or would let them properly bury Jesus, and return to tell them not to go if they could not get to the body of Jesus. Once Mary saw the open tomb, she completely forgot about the spices and preparing Jesus’ body, and ran off to tell Peter and John that Jesus’ body was missing. The Bible never actually says Mary looked in and saw Jesus’ body was missing, but it seems likely that she did, because she told the disciples it was gone. Mary’s going to tell Peter and John meant that by the time the other women arrived at the tomb, Mary Magdalene had already been startled by the empty tomb and left the area.

20:2. “was a friend.” The Greek is φιλέω (#5368 φιλέω). It is hard to translate the verb φιλέω in this context and keep the English as a verb. If we say, “loved,” as most versions do, we lose the meaning of φιλέω here, and confuse it with ἀγαπέ love. We could say that Jesus was “friendly” or the disciple whom Jesus was “fond of,” but these seem too weak. We meet “friendly” people all the time, but they are not “friends.” It seems that changing the verb “befriended” to the phrase, “was a friend,” is the best way to handle this. For a more complete understanding of φιλέω, see the note on John 21:15.

“They have taken away the Lord out of the tomb.” This seemed totally ridiculous to Peter and the other disciple. For one thing, the tomb had been guarded by Roman soldiers. Secondly, who would take Jesus’ body? Not the Romans, they thought he was a common criminal. Not the religious leaders. They had the tomb guarded so no one would take the body and claim Jesus was resurrected. The Jews wanted there to be a body in the tomb to prove he was not the Messiah. Not the disciples. They were not expecting a resurrection themselves, and were more honest than to try to perpetrate some false plot about Jesus being raised. Besides, if Peter and the other disciple (almost certainly John) were not in on such a plot, it was bound to fail anyway. At this point, neither Peter nor the other disciple believed Mary’s report, but they went to check it out. When they saw the empty tomb with their own eyes, they believed Mary was telling the truth about the body being gone (see commentary on John 20:8).

Although the text does not say that Mary entered the tomb, we have to assume that she did. It was dark out and she would not have been able to testify that Jesus’ body had been taken unless she actually saw that it had been taken.

20:3. “So Peter went out, and the other disciple…to the tomb.” Although it does not say so in this verse, we know that Mary Magdalene also went back to the tomb, although she would have walked or slowly ran behind. She may have even arrived at the tomb very shortly after Peter and the other disciple left, which could have been possible because they were running while Mary was more likely walking. In the biblical culture it was customary for women to follow behind the men, so Peter and John would not have waited for her.

The presence of the angels in the tomb did not startle Mary, so she must have thought they got there after Peter and the other disciple left, or, if she arrived at the tomb while Peter and the other disciple were still there, she likely thought that they did not say anything to her about them being there because they were focused on the missing body of Jesus.

20:5. “stooping down and looking in.” The Greek word is parakuptō (παρακύπτω), and it means to stoop down or towards something in order to look at it, or to look at something with the head bowed forward or with the body bent over. It is also used metaphorically for looking at or into something carefully or intently (cp. Thayer, Freiberg, Bullinger). There is a metaphorical use of the verb in which it is used for a rapid or cursory glance, and some commentators have taken that to be the sense in which Peter, Mary, and the other disciple looked into the tomb, as if they quickly glanced into it. However, that does not fit the situation. When Jesus’ followers looked into the tomb, they were studying it intently, barely believing what they saw, or rather, did not see.

“and looking in, he sees the linen cloths.” There are three times when people who are outside the tomb are said to be able to see where Jesus lay: here, John 20:11 and 12, and Luke 24:12. We believe that the tomb was a standard wealthy person’s tomb, since Joseph of Arimathea was wealthy. That meant it would have had a “weeping chamber” before the room or rooms that had the benches on which to lay the dead. In Joseph’s tomb, the set up was such that a person could stand outside the tomb and see through the weeping chamber to the place where Jesus’ body would have been placed.

20:7. “handkerchief.” The Greek word is soudarion (σουδάριον), a widely used Latin loan-word. The Latin word is sudarium, from the Latin root sudor, “sweat” (Thayer). As well as being used as a loan-word in Greek, the Romans also introduced it into Palestine where it was picked up and used by the Jews, even appearing in the Mishnah and Talmud (Smith’s Bible Dictionary; “handkerchief;” BDAG). A soudarion, as the name implies, was usually our equivalent to a handkerchief or sweat cloth, and was used for wiping sweat from the body and cleaning the nose. Due to the heat in Palestine, a word that uniquely described a piece of cloth to wipe sweat from the body was readily assimilated into the culture. Besides being used for wiping sweat, it was also useful for wrapping things (Luke 19:20 records a man hiding money in one, but the rabbinical writings show that practice was considered unsafe; ISBE “napkin”). Furthermore, because it was a face cloth, it was used to cover the face of a dead body, something apparent from the record of Lazarus (John 11:44), and Jesus (John 20:7).

The facecloth was folded, or rolled up (the Greek word can mean either), apart from the rest of the grave wrappings, but the Bible does not explain why. Two plausible theories have been set forth: the first is that it shows the orderliness of the situation, that things were not done haphazardly or in haste, but that, just as with the rest of God’s creation, things are done in an orderly way. The second is that it was folded as further proof that the body was not stolen. If thieves had indeed stolen the body, they likely would have stolen the small face cloth too, but even if they did not want to steal it too, they certainly would not have taken the time to fold it up and set it aside.
In recent years a teaching has arisen in Christianity that the “napkin” (KJV) covering the face of Jesus’ dead body was folded by itself as an indication that Jesus Christ would come back. The teaching goes like this: in biblical times if a master was eating at the table and got up to leave, if he was done eating, he would just throw the napkin down in a heap and the servants knew he was completely finished. If, however, the master folded the napkin and left, the servants knew not to clear the table, because he was coming back. So, it is concluded, Jesus carefully folded the napkin to show us he was coming back. There are a number of problems with this teaching. The first and foremost is that there is absolutely no evidence from ancient times that it is true. There is no ancient evidence that there was any such custom associated with eating, in fact, what we know about ancient meals contradicts this new teaching. People in the East ate with their hands, and after eating they cleansed them by washing in water, not by using a “napkin” (cp. James Freeman, Manners and Customs of the Bible, #329). Second, the word “napkin” is used in the KJV, and from that people get the idea of our table napkin. But as we have seen, the people of the East did not use “table napkins,” and the Greek word used in the verse does not mean “table napkin.” This whole new teaching is presented as if it happened in today’s culture. Even a wealthy man in the ancient Near East would not sit in a chair at a table, use silverware, and wipe his hands with a napkin. He would sit or recline on the floor or a low pillow and eat primarily with his right hand. When he was ready to leave the table for any reason, a servant would clean his hands by washing them in water.

This new “urban legend” about Jesus shows what can happen when a word in the Bible is mistranslated in such a way that the meaning chosen in English (in this case, “napkin”), does not accurately represent the meaning of the word in the biblical culture. 20:8. “and he saw, and he believed.” Peter and the other disciple both “saw,” and both “believed.” If we read John 20:8 without paying attention, and especially without seeing the Greek text, it can seem like the other disciple was the one who saw and believed. However, the double use of kai (and, also) in the Greek text makes it clear that both Peter and the other disciple saw and believed. The other disciple arrived at the tomb first, but did not go in, and hence could not see where the body would have been laying. Peter arrived and went right in, and saw that Mary had been telling the truth: Jesus’ body was gone. Then the other disciple went in, “and he saw and he believed,” or “he also saw and he also believed.” The two of them both believed that the body was actually gone.

“believed.” Believed what? Many people say Peter and the other disciple believed in the resurrection, but that cannot be the case. For one thing, the next verse says they did not know about the resurrection. Although Jesus had tried to tell them he would be killed and raised, there is not one time the Bible indicates they understood what he meant, and they even argued among themselves as to what he was saying (cp. Matt. 9:22; Mark 9:10; Luke 18:34). It was only after the resurrection they understood the death and resurrection of the Messiah (Luke 24:45). In fact, when Jesus did show himself to them when they were behind locked doors, they were frightened and thought they were seeing some kind of spirit (Luke 24:37).

After the crucifixion the tomb was closed, sealed and guarded. So when Mary said Jesus’ body had been stolen, they did not believe her at first (see commentary on John 20:2). Nevertheless, when they went to the tomb themselves, they “saw” it was empty and they “believed” what Mary had said, that the body had been taken. The next verse confirms this by saying that they did not know the scripture that he would rise from the dead. Peter and John went back home, but Mary remained at the tomb crying, more evidence they did not believe in the resurrection. If she believed Jesus was resurrected, she would have been rejoicing. Even after the whole group of women said they saw Jesus, Peter still did not believe in the resurrection (Luke 24:12).

Also, although they saw the grave clothes with the spices were in the tomb, that would have only been more confusing to them, not conclusive. We must remember that neither the women nor Peter and John knew Nicodemus had come and wrapped Jesus with spices. The women (and hence the disciples), thought Jesus was buried in a simple linen cloth by Joseph of Arimathea. Thus, the wrappings and spices would have been just one more thing that did not make sense, so the disciples went home and Mary just stayed and wept.

20:9. “did not yet know.” The disciples did not expect Jesus to be killed and then raised from the dead, so they did not expect an empty tomb. (See commentary on Luke 18:34).

“out from among the dead.” See Romans 4:24. Wuest: “out from among those who are dead.”

20:11. “crying.” Mary was crying because she believed someone had taken the body of Jesus (see commentary on verse 8, and the reason she gave to the angels as to why she was crying, verse 13).

“stooped down and looked.” The Greek word is parakuptō (#3879 παρακύπτω), and it means to stoop towards something in order to look at it (see commentary on John 20:5). The Bible never says that Mary actually went into the tomb. In contrast, the Bible clearly says the other women who came with the spices shortly after sunrise did enter the tomb (Mark 16:5; Luke 24:3).

20:12. “[Mary] sees two angels in white, sitting, one at the head, and one at the feet, where the body of Jesus had been lying.” After seeing the empty tomb, Peter and John went back to where they had been staying, but Mary Magdalene stood outside the sepulcher weeping. As she was crying, she stooped down and “looked” into the sepulcher (she did not go in). Mary had a completely different experience at the tomb than the group of women who arrived at the tomb after she had left. Mary only looked into the tomb, but the group of women went into the tomb. Mary looked in and saw two angels sitting, one at the head and one at the feet of where the body of Jesus had been. When the group of women entered the tomb, they saw only one angel sitting (Mark 16:5; Luke 24:3, 4a), but while they were in the tomb with that angel, two other angels suddenly appeared and stood by them (Luke 24:4b).

The angels asked Mary Magdalene why she was crying, they did not tell her Jesus was raised from the dead. It was as Mary started to walk away from the tomb that she met Jesus. In contrast, the angels in the tomb told the group of women that Jesus had been raised from the dead (Matt. 28:6; Mark 16:6; Luke 24:6), but then those women also met the Lord personally as they were going to tell the disciples what the angels said (Matt. 28:9, 10).

The presence of the angels in the tomb did not startle Mary, so she must have thought they got there after Peter and the other disciple left, or, if she arrived at the tomb while Peter and the other disciple were still there, she likely thought that they did not say anything to her about them being there because they were focused on the missing body of Jesus. (See commentary on John 20:3).
“in white.” Many clothes in the biblical world were white, such as linen garments and clothes made of white wool, so the white garments were not out of the ordinary and did not indicate to Mary the men she was talking to were angels. The white garments were appropriate to signify the righteousness and purity of the risen Lord, and it also helped Mary to see the men in the dark tomb, which would have been especially dark before the sun was up.

20:13. “Woman, why are you crying?” The greeting, “Woman,” is colder today than it was in biblical times, when it was a proper and respectful way to address a woman, particularly one with whom you were not on familiar terms. The angels only asked Mary why she was crying, they did not tell her Jesus had risen from the dead. This is different from the experience the other women had when they came to the tomb. Angels told the other women that Jesus was not there because he had risen from the dead (Matt. 28:6; Mark 16:6; Luke 24:6). After the angels spoke to Mary she turned from the tomb and saw the Lord, but did not recognize him at first.

20:17. “Do not touch me.” John 20:17 is a difficult verse, and to understand it we must pay attention to everything in the verse, the context, and the scope of Scripture. To start our commentary, we should look at the word translated “touch.” The word “touch” is haptomai (#680 ἁπτομαι), and in the Greek text it is in the imperative mood, present tense, middle voice. Haptomai means “touch,” or “grasp,” and in this verse can legitimately be translated in one of two broad categories. One is, “Do not touch me,” (NET; i.e., Mary has not yet touched Jesus and he is stopping her from touching him). The other is, “Stop clinging to me” (NSAB; i.e., Mary has already taken hold of the Lord and he is asking her to stop). Although some commentators assert that the present tense indicates that Mary was already touching him, that is not correct. Bultman writes: “The present imperative does not necessarily imply that she [Mary] has already touched him, but is need only presuppose that she is trying to do it, and is in the process of doing it” (The Gospel of John: A Commentary).

Many scholars say that Mary was already clinging to Jesus based on the fact that haptomai usually refers to a firm grasp and not just a light touch. They say that if Mary had not yet touched Jesus, then he would not have used haptomai, but would have used another word for touch that referred to a lighter touch. However, that is not a good argument for why haptomai was used in the verse. Jesus stopped Mary from doing what she intended to do, and given the circumstances and her relief at seeing Jesus alive, she would not have “lightly touched” him, she would have grabbed him and held him. So it was appropriate for Jesus to stop Mary by saying, “Do not grasp me.”

In the final analysis, because haptomai can be translated either as “Do not touch me,” or “Stop touching me,” we must decide how to translate it from understanding the context and what the verse is talking about. In other words, when we discover what Jesus is talking about when he says he is going up to the Father, then we will see how to translate haptomai. Jesus then explains why he does not want Mary to touch him when he says that it is because he has not yet “gone up” to the Father (see explanation below).

“For I have not yet gone up to my Father.” Jesus told Mary, “Do not touch me, for I have not yet gone up to my Father.” The Greek word gar, translated “for,” is vital to understanding this verse. The normal reading of gar is that it gives the reason that Mary cannot touch Jesus. In today’s modern English we might use “because” instead of “for,” and say, “Don’t touch me because I have not yet gone up to the Father.” This is a very simple sentence. It gives the reason that Mary cannot touch (or hold on to) Jesus, which is “because” he had not yet gone up to his Father. If we find out what Jesus’ going up to the Father is, we will understand the verse and also understand whether to translate _haptomai_ as “Do not touch me” or “Do not hold on to me.”

Almost every commentator seriously misunderstands this verse because they assume that “going up to the Father” refers to Jesus’ ascension into heaven. This problem is made worse by the fact that most English versions of the Bible translate the common Greek word _anabainō_, which means “to go up” or “to come up,” as “ascended.” This makes it seem like the verse is referring to Jesus’ ascension into heaven, which it does not.

If Jesus told Mary not to touch him because he had not yet ascended into heaven, then why did he allow or invite others to touch him before he ascended? The same morning he told Mary not to touch him, he allowed the other women to touch him and hold on to his feet (Matt. 28:9). Then later that same day Jesus appeared to his disciples when they were behind locked doors and told them, “Look at my hands and my feet, that it is I myself. Handle me, and see” (Luke 24:39). The word translated “handle” is _psēlaphaō_ (#5584 Ψηλαφάω; pronounced tsay-lä-fä’ō), and it means to handle, to touch and feel. Thus, the same day Jesus told Mary not to touch him, he allowed the other women to not only touch him but to hold on to him, and he also invited all the disciples to handle him to be sure it was him. Then, eight days later, he told Thomas to touch him (John 20:26, 27).

Rudolf Bultman is a commentator who saw the problem about Mary touching Jesus, and wrote: “If the wording were pressed, it would follow that when he had gone to the Father he would subsequently present himself to his followers for fellowship and physical contact…. “(The Gospel of John: A Commentary). Bultman is correct. If Jesus says the reason not to touch him is that he had not gone to the Father, then once he had “gone up” to the Father, people could touch him. Of course that is exactly what happened. Once Jesus had “gone up” to his Father, which, as we will see, he did when he went “up” to the Temple and then presented himself to the Father there, he allowed people to touch him.

D. A. Carson, thinking the “ascension” was Jesus’ ascension into heaven, saw the problem and wrote: “And why should being ascended make a difference? …the implication is that the disciples are permitted to touch Jesus after the ascension but not before—exactly the reverse of what might have been expected” (The Gospel According to John). Carson is correct that the implication of the verse, indeed, we would say the very meaning of the Greek text, is that people cannot touch Jesus before he “goes up,” but can touch him after he “goes up.” From that evidence alone, we can see that Jesus’ “going up” is not his ascension into heaven. As Carson has seen, if no one was supposed to touch Jesus before the ascension, then he should not have let anyone, including the women and his disciples, touch him. On the other hand, if the women and the disciples can touch Jesus before his ascension, then he should have let Mary Magdalene touch him too. And also as Carson has seen, if we were not supposed to touch Jesus before his ascension into heaven, but we can afterward, how are we supposed to do that? How can we touch Jesus after he goes to heaven?

Thankfully, there is a simple and biblical answer to why Jesus did not let Mary touch him. But before we study it, we should note some of the unsatisfactory solutions have been postulated to solve it. One is that Jesus did not let Mary touch him because she was touching him out of doubt, not faith. She doubted he was “real” or that it was really him. But the other disciples and Thomas doubted too, in fact, the very reason Jesus told them to touch and handle him was to get rid of their doubt, so that “solution” does not work.

Another unsatisfactory solution is that Mary had grabbed Jesus so she would not lose him again, but if that were the case he would have simply told her she could let go “because” he would be with her forever. Instead he told her to let him go “because” he had not yet gone up to his Father. But if his going up to God is the ascension, then the reason he told Mary to let him go would be incorrect since he let others touch him before his ascension.

Yet another unsatisfactory solution postulated by some Bible teachers is that Mary must have grabbed him in worship, and Jesus was telling Mary not to worship him at that time. But why would he not allow her worship and why would his being in heaven be a better time to worship him? Besides, he let other people worship him before his ascension, including the women who grabbed his feet and the people he met in Galilee (Matthew 28:9, 17).

Still another proposed solution is that he told Mary to let him go so that he was then free to ascend to the Father in heaven; as if he could not ascend while she was holding him. But then when she supposedly let go, he stayed on earth for another forty days. So that “solution” cannot be correct.

Another solution, a quite inventive one, is that the phrase “I have not yet gone up to my Father,” is parenthetical. Removing the words in the parenthesis would make the verse read: “Do not cling to me, for…go rather to my brothers and tell them I am going up to the Father.” In other words, “Let me go so you can go tell my brothers I am going up to the Father.” However, that proposed solution has many problems. Not the least of them is that it requires a very unusual and unnatural way to read the Greek text. Also, if Jesus was going to be around for forty more days, why would Mary have to let go of him and hurry off to tell the disciples about the ascension? Jesus’ allowing Mary to hold him for a few more minutes would not change anything. Also, why would Jesus want Mary to give the disciples a message about his ascension, when they did not understand there would even be ascension? (There will be more on this point later). This solution does not work.

Some scholars explain the verse in a totally different manner, and say that “going up” to the Father refers to some kind of progressive glorification of Christ. These scholars correctly note that the word that most English Bibles translate as “ascended” (anabainō; #305 ἀναβάνω), is a very common Greek word. It occurs more than eighty times in the New Testament, and refers to all kinds of ways of “going up” or “coming up.” In essence, the reasoning of these scholars is that after his resurrection, Jesus went through a progressive glorification, which John 20:17 refers to as an “ascension,” a “going up” (cp. Frederic Godet, Commentary on John’s Gospel). In other words, according to this interpretation, after his resurrection, over a period of time, Jesus “went up” to greater and greater state of glorification, and he had just started the process when he met Mary, so he did not want her to touch him. We reject this proposed solution for a number of reasons. The first is that we assert that when God raised Jesus from the dead he was fully glorified and given all authority in heaven and on earth. Also, it does not make sense that after his resurrection he was not glorified enough to let Mary touch him, but perhaps only about an hour later he was glorified enough that other women could touch him, and by the end of the day he was so glorified that any disciple could touch him.

None of the above explanations of the verse are satisfactory. However, the number of explanations and the wide variety of them shows us that properly understanding the verse will require good translation work, an understanding of the scope of Scripture and Jewish laws and customs, and sound logic. What we will now see is that the solution to the problem is biblical, but to understand it, there is some important background we must understand.

One thing we must understand is that the Greek word most English Bibles translate as “ascended,” is anabainō, which is a common Greek word and is used of many types of “going up” in the New Testament. Examples of anabainō in the New Testament include when Jesus “went up” out of the water at his baptism (Matt. 3:16); when Jesus “went up” a mountain (Matt. 5:1; 14:23; 15:29), when thorns “came up” out of the soil (Matt. 13:7); when Jesus and the disciples “went up” into a boat (Matt. 14:32); when Jesus and his apostles “were going up” to Jerusalem (Matt. 20:17); and when the multitude “went up” to Pilate (Mark 15:8). The point is that anabainō is the common word for “going up” from one place to another. Since the Bible uses anabainō for the times when Jesus climbs up a mountain, it would be the normal word the Bible would use to say that Jesus “went up” from the area of the tomb to the Temple, because the Temple was on top of Mt. Moriah. In John 20:17, anabainō does not refer to Jesus’ ascension into heaven, and should not have been translated as “ascended.”

Another key to understanding the verse is in the last sentence of the verse: “But go to my brothers and say to them, ‘I am going up to my Father and your Father, and my God and your God.’” Jesus said “I am going up,” using the present tense verb. That indicates that going up to his Father was something that Jesus was in the process of doing or just starting to do. Although there are times when the present tense of a verb is used as a generalization for the future tense of the verb, that does not seem likely here. After all, if Jesus was speaking of his ascension into heaven, then he would have been speaking of an event that was forty days away, so it would have been more natural for him to use the future tense of the verb and said, “I will go up to my Father.” The simple and straightforward reading of “I am going up to my Father” is that his “going up,” was something that was happening or going to happen right then.

Another key to understanding what Jesus meant when he said he had not yet “gone up” to his Father is that Mary knew what he was talking about. Even though the meaning of what Jesus said may not be immediately apparent to us, it was clear to Mary. She was certainly glad (and astounded!) to see Jesus. However, once she grasped that she was really speaking to the resurrected Christ, there is no evidence that she was confused by his message to tell the disciples he was going up to the Father. This should have signaled us from the start that the “going up to the Father” did not refer to his ascension into heaven, because the disciples did not know about his ascension into heaven.

Whenever Jesus spoke of his death or resurrection, the disciples were confused and did not know what he meant (see commentary on Luke 18:34). Similarly, they did not understand what he was talking about when he spoke of his ascension into heaven (John 14:5; 16:17-19). Even after his resurrection, when they finally understood about his death and resurrection, there is no indication they understood about his ascension. As late as Acts 1:6 the disciples were asking Jesus if he was going to restore the kingdom to Israel at that time, and they were speaking of his kingdom on earth (see commentary on Matt. 5:5). They were not expecting him to leave earth, even though he had told them he was going to, which is why they were so caught off guard when he did leave, and angels had to appear and tell them he was coming back (Acts 1:9-11).

Since Jesus told Mary to tell to the disciples that he was “going up,” he could not have been speaking of his ascension into heaven because neither she, nor the disciples knew about the ascension. Even if Jesus had taken time to explain to Mary about his ascension into heaven, she could not have then told the disciples about it. She could not even get them to believe she had seen the risen Christ! How could she have gotten them to believe that this risen Christ was going to go up into heaven?

From the evidence we can see that the “going up” in John 20:17 had nothing to do with Jesus’ ascension into heaven, but instead was something that Jesus told Mary to tell the disciples that would help them believe that they had really seen the resurrected Christ. It had to be something the disciples would have understood and something that they knew he had to do on that Sunday. We will see that what Jesus had to do was present himself in the Temple as the High Priest and the Firstfruits offering.

The Messiah was the fulfillment of the types and symbols in the Old Testament. For example, he was the true Passover Lamb; the true acceptable sacrifice; the true Sabbath rest for God’s people; and the true High Priest. He was also the true “firstfruits” to God, that is, the first of God’s true harvest (God’s true harvest is the harvest of people who get up from the dead to everlasting life, and Jesus was the first one to be raised from the dead to everlasting life). After his resurrection, Jesus was both the High Priest (Ps. 110:4; Zech. 6:13; Heb. 5:5; 8:1) and the firstfruits (1 Cor. 15:20, 23), and he had to go to the Temple and show himself in both those roles.

According to the Law of Moses, the firstfruits of the harvest were shown to God during the Feast of Unleavened Bread “on the day after the Sabbath.” On that day, the High Priest was to wave firstfruits of the harvest in the Temple (Lev. 23:10, 11). The day after the Sabbath is Sunday, and in the year Jesus was crucified it was Sunday the 18th of Nisan [For more on this occurring the Sunday after the Saturday Sabbath, see commentary on Acts 2:1]. Sunday was the day Jesus first appeared to Mary Magdalene, but when Jesus met Mary at the tomb, it was still dark and before sunrise (see commentary on John 20:1). It would be proper for him to wait until after the sun had risen before showing himself to God in the Temple. That is because, “the purpose of such [waving] rites was to show the offering to God,” which would logically be after the sun came up (The JPS Torah Commentary: Leviticus, Baruch Levine, p. 157.) The firstfruits were publicly waved “so it will be accepted on your [the people’s] behalf” (Lev. 23:11). In other words, the High Priest waved the firstfruits offering publicly and so that it was accepted for the people.

After the sun came up, Jesus Christ, as the acceptable firstfruits, went up from the tomb area to the Temple on Mt. Moriah and showed himself publicly to God and was acceptable in God’s sight to represent the rest of the harvest—all the believers who will be raised from the dead. The High Priest showing the firstfruits in the Temple was something all the Apostles and disciples understood from their Jewish upbringing, and knew was supposed to happen that very day. So if they believed Mary’s testimony that Jesus had been raised from the dead, they would also understand he had to go up to the Temple and show himself to God there. Therefore, when Mary appeared to them and told them Jesus was alive, she bolstered her statement by telling them that he had to “go up to the Father,” that is, appear in the Temple. We know she told them Jesus had to go up to the Father (in the Temple) because when Mary got to the disciples, she not only told them she had seen Jesus alive, but she also told them what he had said to her (John 20:18).

As both the High Priest and the Offering, Jesus had to remain Levitically clean until after he offered himself, and he would not be Levitically clean if Mary touched him (Lev. 22:1-8). Mary was uncleanness by virtue of the fact that she had been in the tomb that morning and seen that the body of Jesus was gone. However, after Jesus had fulfilled his role as High Priest and firstfruits offering by showing himself in the Temple, he could let people touch him—and he did. As we saw in Matthew 28:9, the first people he allowed to touch him were the women who came to the tomb to anoint his body with spices. However, the Bible makes it clear that he came to them after the sun had come up (Mark 16:2). So Jesus had time to go to the Temple before the time he saw Mary Magdalene and told her not to touch him and the time he saw the other women and allowed them to grab his feet. We should remember that when Jesus saw Mary he was in the process of starting up to the Temple (“I am going up to my Father;” John 20:17). So by the time he allowed the women to take hold of his feet later that morning, he would have been finished with his brief priestly duties. Also, he could invite the disciples to “handle” him later that day when they were behind locked doors (Luke 24:39).

20:18. “went and announced to the disciples.” After seeing Jesus alive, Mary went back to the disciples and told them that she had seen the Lord, but they did not believe her. Since Jesus had met Mary before he met the other women, Mary would have arrived where the disciples were hiding some time before the other women. It is quite possible that Mary arrived to tell the disciples just about the time Jesus was appearing to the other women.

20:19. “Jesus came.” Jesus appeared to the apostles and disciples as they were gathered together behind locked doors. John 20:19 lets us know it is in the evening on Sunday, because it was still the first day of the week. If it was after sunset, then Monday, the second day of the week, would have started.

This was the first time Jesus appeared to the disciples as a group, but Thomas was not with them (John 20:24). Jesus had already appeared to people a number of times: to Mary Magdalene; to the women who came with spices to the tomb, to Peter, and to the two men that he met on the road to Emmaus. All these people were present when Jesus appeared in the room, and we can tell from Luke 24:34 that the people in this room full of disciples were quite convinced that Jesus was alive. Still, he now appeared inside the locked room, which startled and frightened the disciples. This was likely due to the fact that he simply appeared in the room, whereas the Jesus they were used to would have had to knock on the door. Jesus tried to calm them by saying “Peace be unto you,” but they thought they were seeing a spirit. Nevertheless, he corrected them and told them that a spirit did not have flesh and bone like he had. He then showed them his hands and feet.

Jesus had just taught the scriptures about himself to the two men to the road to Emmaus and now he opened the scriptures to these disciples who were gathered together, thus giving them a scriptural as well as an experiential reason to believe that he was alive.

20:21. “as the Father has sent me.” The teaching that God sent Jesus Christ occurs over forty times in the New Testament, and can have different meanings in different contexts. For in-depth commentary on Jesus Christ having been sent by the Father, and its different meanings and nuances in context, see John 6:57.

20:22. “breathed on them.” The Greek word for “breathed on” is emphusaō (#1720 ἐμφυσάω; pronounced em-foo-sah'-o), and it means to breathe on or to blow on. The word “them” is correctly supplied because the Greek reads, “blew on and says ‘to them’” (autois), and the dative pronoun autois (to them) governs both the verb “blew” and the verb “says.” When understood as “blew on” we can see that Jesus was instructing his disciples about the Day of Pentecost, when the Temple was filled with the sound of a mighty wind.

The beauty of the two meanings of emphusaō is that the Greek text is showing the two things Jesus is doing for his disciples. He is giving instruction for the Day of Pentecost when the Temple will be filled with the sound of a rushing, mighty wind, because he breathed on them, blew on them, and said, “Receive holy spirit.” At the same time, Jesus is making a powerful association between what happened in Genesis, what is foretold in Ezekiel, and what will happen on the Day of Pentecost when he pours out the gift of holy spirit. The use of emphusaō here in John 20:22 takes us back to its use in Genesis 2:7 in the Septuagint, where God formed Adam from the dust of the ground and “breathed” into him the breath of life, and he became a living soul. In Genesis, God breathed natural life into Adam, now Jesus foretells when spiritual life will be breathed into the disciples. Also, the Bible foretells that believers will receive resurrection life when the ruach (“spirit, breath, wind”) “breathes” on the dead bodies of Israel, and they come to life. “Then said he unto me, Prophesy to the wind [ruach], prophesy, son of man, and say to the wind [ruach], ‘Thus saith the Lord Yahweh: Come from the four winds [ruach], O breath [ruach], and breathe upon these slain, that they may live’” (Ezek. 37:9; cp. 9-14).

It is important to realize that the disciples did not receive the gift of holy spirit at this time, which was the Sunday that he first appeared to his disciples, starting with Mary Magdalene early that morning. Jesus was giving them instructions for when the holy spirit would be poured out in the near future, which we know from Acts occurred some 50 days later on the Day of Pentecost. Jesus breathed or blew out, making a wind-like sound, and said, “Receive holy spirit.” Some 50 days later, on the Day of Pentecost, the disciples were in the Temple when it was filled with the sound of a rushing, mighty wind (but there was no wind; only the sound; Acts 2:2), and the gift of holy spirit was poured out on the Apostles who were filled with it and began to speak in tongues; the first time in history anyone had spoken in tongues (Acts 2:4).

“holy spirit.” There is no definite article. This holy spirit is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’.”]

20:25. “I will not ever believe.” At some point after Jesus left the disciples, Thomas rejoined them. The Bible does not give us a specific time, so it could have been just before sunset and still on Sunday the 18th of Nisan, or after sunset and thus on Monday the 19th of Nisan (this is very likely), or even in the next few days. Even though everyone would have testified to Jesus’ being alive, Thomas did not believe what they said.
20:26. “eight days later.” The Lord appeared a second time in a locked room to all the disciples (including Thomas) eight days later, that is, eight days after he appeared to them the first time. Generally in the biblical culture, when counting set numbers of something, the first and last thing are both counted, so “eight days later” is Sunday to Sunday, eight days. Thus the Lord appeared the first time to the disciples on a Sunday the 18th of Nisan, and they were behind locked doors. Then he waited a week before appearing a second time. His second appearance to all the disciples was also on a Sunday, the 25th of Nisan, and the disciples were still behind locked doors. This time, however, Thomas was with them.

We cannot be sure, but it is possible that the fact that Jesus appeared to the disciples on Resurrection Sunday, then not again until the following Sunday, helped establish the tradition of holding Christian meetings on Sunday.

20:28. “my god.” Any good Greek-English lexicon will give examples of the Greek word theos, often translated “God,” also referring to a pagan “god” or “goddess” (Acts 19:37), the Devil or a demon (2 Cor. 4:4), or of people who represent God in some way (John 10:34). The fact that Thomas called Jesus “God” does not mean he thought Jesus was part of the Triune God, but he did think of him as God’s highest representative and worthy to be called “god.”

To understand what Thomas said there is some background information that we must understand. For one thing, Thomas was almost certainly speaking Hebrew or Aramaic, and thus the flexibility of the word “God” in those languages will be covered in some detail below. It is also important to know that the early manuscripts of the Bible were written in all capital letters. That means that technically, both Elohim in Hebrew and Theos in Greek should always be translated “GOD,” in all capital letters. Since the biblical languages used the word “GOD” to refer to God, lesser divinities such as the Devil, angels, and demons, and also to rulers, judges, and people who represented God Him in some way, Bible readers are forced to use the context and scope of Scripture to determine whether the modern English translation should be “God,” “god,” or “gods.”

[For more information on this, see commentary on Hebrews 1:8].

The following few paragraphs are about the biblical, especially the Semitic, way of using the words for “God.” It is quite detailed, but in light of the huge Trinitarian bias to make Thomas say that Jesus is “God,” it seems necessary to quite fully show that in biblical language you could call someone Elohim or Theos without meaning they were the Most High God. It is helpful in understanding the Bible to know that the Hebrew word Elohim (“God”) is a plural form—Elohim is always plural. It is a uniplural noun like our English word “deer” or “fish,” and so it has to be translated according to the context and can mean “God,” “a god,” or “gods.” When we see the word “fish” we must determine from the context if it is singular or plural. In a sentence like, “Did you eat the fish?” there may not be enough context to determine whether the person ate one fish or more than one. This problem can occur in the Hebrew text as well, although we sometimes get help in the Hebrew from the accompanying verb.

Elohim is not the only uniplural noun in Hebrew. Two others are “water” and “heaven” (cp. Gesenius’ Hebrew Grammar, 2nd addition by A. Cowley, pp. 244, 246). Trinitarians assert that the reason Elohim is plural is because it refers to the plurality in the Trinity, but even if there was a Trinity, and we do not believe there is, that would not be likely. For one thing, God gave the Hebrew language to the Jews, so they should be the experts in their own language, and they have never believed Elohim referred to any plurality in God. Just as “water” and “heaven” are plural in part because they are so vast, Elohim seems to be plural because of the vastness and greatness of God.

The majority of the times Elohim occurs in the Bible, it refers to the true God. However, even a brief glance through a Hebrew concordance will show that many times it refers to false gods. Dozens of verses could be cited as examples, but a few are: “have no other gods [Elohim] before me” (Exod. 20:3); “Do not bow down before their gods [Elohim]” (Exod. 23:24); “they chose new gods [Elohim]” ( Judges 5:8); and, “[Solomon’s] wives turned his heart after other gods [Elohim]” (1 Kings 11:4).

There are times when Elohim is used to refer to a specific pagan god: for example, Dagon (Judges 16:23, 1 Samuel 5:7), Chemosh (Judges 11:24), and Baal (1 Kings 18:24-27).

Elohim, “God,” can also refer to angels or other spirit beings. One example is Psalm 8:5, which says God made mankind a little lower than Elohim. Given the flexible meaning of Elohim, the verse could be saying that God made mankind a little lower than He Himself, or it could be saying that He made mankind a little lower than his representatives in the spirit world, i.e., angels. Thankfully, the interpretation is not in doubt because the verse is quoted in Hebrews 2:7, which says “angels,” letting us know that in Psalm 8:5, Elohim refers to God’s representatives, the angels. Thus Psalm 8:5 is an excellent example of how the New Testament clarifies our understanding of the Old Testament. Another example is Judges 13:22, where Manoah and his wife saw an angel, but exclaimed, “We have seen God [Elohim.]” Their statement made perfect sense in the biblical culture because they saw God’s representative.

There are times when God’s representative are called “God” (Elohim and even Yahweh!) when they represent God and speak on His behalf. This is referred to as “agency.” The essence of the principle of agency is: “a person’s agent is regarded as the person himself” (Werblowsky and Wigoder, The Encyclopedia of the Jewish Religion, p. 15). The principle of agency is well attested by scholars and occurs quite a few times in the Bible. For example, in Genesis 16:13, even though Hagar was speaking to an angel, she referred to him as Yahweh and El (God). In Genesis 31:11 an angel speaks to Jacob, but in verse 13 he says, “I am the God [El] of Bethel.” In Genesis 32:28 and 30 it seems Jacob is wrestling with God [Elohim], but we learn from Hosea 12:3 that it was an angel representing God. Another example is that Exodus 13:21 says “Yahweh” went before Israel in the pillar of fire, but 14:19 and 23:20-23 let us know it was an angel, a representative of God. So “Yahweh” did go in front of Israel as represented by his angel protector. Similarly, if you read Judges 2:1-4, an angel speaks to the Israelites, but his speech is in first person as if he were God Himself.

Elohim, “God,” can also refer to human rulers, kings, prophets, and people who represent God in some way. Thus Exodus 21:6; 22:8 and 9, almost certainly refer to God’s representatives as Elohim, “God” (Exod. 22:27 likely does too). In those verses the accompanying verb is plural, not singular, so the traditional teaching of the Rabbis, that the meaning is “judges,” which is also in the KJV, is almost certainly correct. Psalm 82:1 is noteworthy because it uses Elohim twice; at the beginning of the verse to refer to the true God, and at the end of the verse to refer to rulers and people who represent him. The verse says, “Elohim [“God”] stands in the congregation of the mighty; he judges among the “Elohim” [“gods”].” Furthermore, verse 6 says, “You are Elohim [“gods”]; and all of you are sons of the Most High.” As sons of the Most High, these rulers are qualified to be called Elohim, [“gods”]. Psalm 97:7 also calls rulers Elohim.

There are times when specific individuals are called Elohim, “God.” One example is Moses. In Exodus 7:1, God is speaking to Moses and says, “See, I have made you God [Elohim] to Pharaoh” (Darby). Given the uniplural nature of Elohim, another translation is, “See, I have made you a god [Elohim] to Pharaoh” (BBE, KJV), but the fact is that Moses, who represents Elohim (“God”) can legitimately be called Elohim (“God”) in the biblical culture. Another example is when King Saul wanted to speak to the dead prophet Samuel and went to a woman who was a medium and necromancer (1 Sam. 28:7-15). When she conjured up “Samuel” (actually a demon impersonating Samuel), the woman said, “I see Elohim coming up from the ground” (1 Samuel 28:13). This is a good example of a person being called Elohim, and we could translate it “God” and understand the custom of God’s representatives being called “God,” or a more easily understood translation for the English reader is simply, “a god;” the woman saw “a god” coming up who she thought was Samuel.

Given the language of the time, and given that Jesus did represent the Father and have divine authority, for Thomas to refer to Jesus as “god” is certainly understandable. In contrast, to assert that Thomas said that Jesus was “God,” and thus 1/3 of a triune God, seems incredible. As was noted above, in biblical times it was common to call God’s representatives “God,” and the Old Testament contains quite a few examples, such as when Jacob wrestled with “God” and it is clear that he was actually wrestling with an angel (Hosea 12:4).

It is common to read commentaries that assert that Thomas shifted from the depths of unbelief to the height of faith and called Jesus his “God.” But on what basis would Thomas do that? The commentators point out John 1:1, that the Gospel says “the Word was God.” First, there is solid evidence it does not actually say that (see commentary on John 1:1). More to the point, however, the Gospel of John was not written until decades after Thomas spoke, and there no evidence that Jesus ever taught the Trinity or that he was “fully human and fully God.” Quite the opposite. He called God, “the true God” (John 17:3); he said the Father was greater than he was (John 14:28); and he referred to the Father as his God both before and after his resurrection (Matt. 27:46; John 20:17). Also, when he did have chances to “correct” people’s understanding about him or to teach the Trinity, such as with the woman at the well (John 4), or the Pharisee who asked him about the first and great commandment (Mark 12), he did not teach about the Trinity or say that he was man but also God. Very importantly, the few verses in the Gospels where Jesus said something that Trinitarians use to show Jesus is God can all be interpreted in a non-Trinitarian way. There is just no evidence that people at the time of Jesus knew about the Trinity or that Jesus was fully God and fully man—there was no teaching about it.

There are many Trinitarian authorities who admit that there was no knowledge of Trinitarian doctrine at the time Thomas spoke. For example, if the disciples believed that Jesus was “God” in the sense that many Christians do, they would not have “all fled” just a few days before when he was arrested. The confession of the two disciples walking along the road to Emmaus demonstrated the thoughts of Jesus’ followers at the time. Speaking to the resurrected Christ, whom they mistook as just a traveler, they talked about Jesus. They said Jesus “was a prophet, powerful in word and deed before God…and they crucified him; but we had hoped that he was the one who was going to redeem Israel” (Luke 24:19-21). The disciples thought Jesus was the Messiah, a “prophet,” and the Son of God, but not God Himself.

Even in realizing that Jesus was the Christ, they knew that according to the Old Testament prophecies, the Christ, the anointed of God, was to be a man: he was to be an offspring of Eve (Gen. 3:15) and through the line of Abraham and David, and “God” did not fit that description. He was to be anointed with holy spirit by God as foretold in Isaiah 61:1, a verse Jesus quoted about himself (Luke 4:18); whereas God does not need to be anointed with holy spirit. The Messiah was to be “one of their own” (Jer. 30:21), not God. We know how hard Jesus worked to teach the disciples that he would die and be resurrected—how many different times he taught it—and the disciples never did “get it.” Are we to believe that somehow Jesus taught the Trinity, something that went against everything the disciples were taught and believed, but there is no mention of Jesus ever teaching it anywhere and yet the disciples somehow “got” that teaching? That seems too incredible to believe. There is no evidence from the gospel accounts that Jesus’ disciples believed him to be God, and Thomas, upon seeing the resurrected Christ, was not birthing a new theology in a moment of surprise.

Besides the biblical use of the words for “God” being used for God’s representatives, there is a contributing cultural reason Thomas may have used the word “god” to refer to Jesus when Jesus appeared to him. In the Greco-Roman culture it was becoming customary to refer to the emperor as “god,” but usually only after he was dead. So, for example, after Julius Caesar was murdered in 44 BC, the Roman senate voted that he was a god. Elevating great people into the ranks of the gods is a process scholars refer to as “deification.” If dead Roman emperors were “gods,” it is reasonable that Thomas, knowing Jesus had been dead but now seeing him alive, referred to him “god.”

The context of the verse shows that its subject is the fact that Jesus was alive. Only three verses earlier, Thomas had ignored the eyewitness testimony of the other apostles when they told him they had seen the Lord. The resurrection of Christ was such a disputed doctrine that Thomas did not believe it (the other apostles had not either), and thus Jesus’ death would have caused Thomas to doubt that Jesus was who he said he was—the Messiah. Thomas believed Jesus was dead. Thus, he was shocked and astonished when he saw—and was confronted by—Jesus himself. Thomas, upon being confronted by the living Christ, instantly believed in the resurrection, i.e., that God had raised the man Jesus from the dead, and, given the standard use of “God” in the culture as one with God’s authority, it certainly makes sense that Thomas would proclaim, “My Lord and my god.” There is no mention of the Trinity in the context, and there is no reason to believe that the disciples would have even been aware of such a doctrine. Thomas spoke what he would have known: that the man Jesus who he thought was dead was alive and had divine authority. [For more information on this verse and further references, see Graeser, Lynn, Schoenheit, One God & One Lord: Reconsidering the Cornerstone of the Christian Faith].

20:31. “will have life.” The verb “have” is in the subjunctive mood, thus many versions have “may” have life, but the Greek conjunction hina (#2443 ἢνα) that started the phrase is the reason the verb is subjunctive, and therefore we must get the sense of the verb from the context. In this case, what is written in the Word of God is written so that we will have life if we believe, not that we “may” have it (cp. A. Nyland, The Source New Testament).

“name.” See 1 John 3:23 note “on the name of his son Jesus Christ.”

Chapter 21

21:1. “After these things Jesus revealed himself again to the disciples…” After appearing to the disciples as a group on Sunday, Nisan 25, Jesus appeared to the Apostles on the Sea of Galilee. The trip to Galilee usually took three days, so this meeting could have been close to the 28th of Nisan, but judging by the fact that Peter started fishing again, it was likely a while after that. It seems likely that after Jesus appeared to the group of disciples a second time and then them leaving for Galilee, that Peter would have waited a while for the Lord to show up. However, when that did not happen as quickly as he expected, and not being sure of what to do, he went back to fishing.

We should remember that the general populace did not yet believe Jesus had been raised from the dead, so most of the Apostles’ source of money had dried up. Peter therefore took the lead and said he was going fishing, the job he knew. However, Jesus appeared to them, which was the third time Jesus appeared to all the apostles at one time. The first time was the Sunday after his crucifixion (John 20:19-24), and Thomas was not there at the time. The second was the following Sunday, and this time all the apostles, including Thomas, were there (John 20:26-29). Jesus’ meeting the apostles on the Sea of Galilee is the third time he appeared to all of them together (John 21:14), and got them refocused on ministry.

21:3. “I am going fishing.” Jesus appears to the Apostles on the Sea of Galilee. The Apostles finally obeyed and went to Galilee, but seemed unsure of what to do once they got there. With Jesus dead, and the general populace not yet believing that he had been raised from the dead, it seems most of their source of money had dried up, Peter took the lead and said he was going fishing, the job he knew. Jesus appeared to them and got them refocused on ministry.

21:15. “do you love me more than these?” Jesus was asking Peter if he loved Jesus more than he loved fishing. Jesus was asking Peter if he would leave the security of his fishing trade to go into ministry full time. Some people think that Jesus was asking Peter if he loved Jesus more than the other disciples did. That is not the case. First, that is the kind of question that fosters division between people. It leads to a proud, braggart position of the heart and sometimes then even gets manifested among the people. Jesus never fostered division among the apostles. Second, the extent that someone loves the Lord is a matter of the heart. We cannot look at other Christians and tell whether we love Jesus more than they do. Jesus knew this, and would never ask Peter to evaluate the love that the other apostles had for him. Third, the context makes it clear what Jesus was asking Peter to do: give up fishing and take on full time ministry, because three times Jesus asked Peter to feed his sheep, i.e., the people.
“I am your friend.” This is the best rendition of the Greek we could think of to keep the meaning. To understand this verse, and the ones that follow, it is important to understand the difference between agapē love and phileō love.

There are four Greek words for love that are important for Christians to understand. They are agapē, philos, storgē, and eros. Three of them appear in the Bible. If we are going to understand the Bible and the biblical world, it is important that we understand what these four words mean and how they differ.

The Greek word that refers to the love of God is agapē (the verb form is agapaō [#25 ἀγαπάω], the noun form is agapē [#26 ἀγάπη]). Agapē love is the very nature of God, for God is love (1 John 4:7-12, 16). The big key to understanding agapē is to realize that it can be known from the action it prompts. In fact, we sometimes speak of the “action model” of agapē love. People today are accustomed to thinking of love as a feeling, but that is not necessarily the case with agapē love. Agapē is love because of what it does, not because of how it feels.

God so “loved” (agapē) that He gave His Son. It did not feel good to God to do that, but it was the loving thing to do. Christ so loved (agapē) that he gave his life. He did not want to die, but he loved, so he did what God required. A mother who loves a sick baby will stay up all night long caring for it, which is not something she wants to do, but is a true act of agapē love. Agapē love is not simply an impulse generated from feelings. Rather, agapē love is an exercise of the will, a deliberate choice. This is why God can command us to love our enemies (Matt. 5:44; Exod. 23:1-5). He is not commanding us to “have a good feeling” for our enemies, but to act in a loving way toward them. In fact, Luke 6:27 says to love our enemies and then tells us how to love them, which is by doing good to them: “love your enemies, do good to those who hate you.”

Agapē love is related to obedience and commitment, and not necessarily feeling and emotion. “Loving” someone is to obey God on another’s behalf, seeking his or her long-term blessing and profit. The way to know that we love (agapē) God is that we keep His commandments. Jesus said, “Whoever has my commands and obeys them, he is the one who loves me (John 14:21). There are Christians who say they love God, but their lifestyle is contrary to the will of God. These people mistake their feeling of affection for God for true agapē love. Jesus made this clear: “He who does not love me will not obey my teaching” (John 14:24). Love is the distinctive character of the Christian life in relation to other Christians and to all humanity. The “loving” thing to do may not always be easy, and true love is not “ mushy sentimentalism.” There is often a cost to genuine love. For example, asking someone to leave your Christian fellowship because he persists in flagrant sin is loving, but never easy (1 Cor. 5:1-5). That is not to say the agapē love cannot have feelings attached to it, and the ideal situation occurs when the loving thing to do also is what we want to do. Christians are to be known for their love to one another (John 13:35).

Phileō, which is translated as “love” in many English versions, is different from agapaō love (philos is the noun form [#5384 φιλός], and phileō, [#5368 φιλέω]) is the verb form of the root word.) Phileō means “to have a special interest in someone or something, frequently with focus on close association; have affection for, like, consider someone a friend” (William Arndt and F. Gingrich, A Greek-English Lexicon). It would probably be helpful if phileō were never translated “love” in the New Testament, because it refers to a strong liking or a strong friendship. Of course, we see how phileō gets translated “love,” because in modern culture we say we “love” things that we strongly like: “I love ice cream” or “I love my car.” The word phileō implies a strong emotional connection, and thus is used of the deep friendship between friends, and is used of the way people “really like” things, or get mentally attached to them. Thus, you can agapē your enemies, but you cannot phileō them.

The difference between agapē and phileō becomes very important in John 21, but unfortunately it is obscured in most English translations. After being raised from the dead, Jesus met Peter. Here is the short version of what they said to each other.

Jesus: Simon…do you love (agapē) me more than these [fish?].
Peter: Yes, Lord; you know that I love (phileō) you.
Jesus: Simon…do you love (agapē) me?
Peter: Yes, Lord, you know that I love (phileō) you.
Jesus: Simon…do you love (phileō) me?
Peter: [Grieved] “Lord, you know that I love (phileō) you.”

Why did Jesus use agapē and Peter use phileō? Jesus was asking Peter if he loved him with the love of God, a love that may require sacrifice. After all, Jesus had just gone through something he did not want to do but did anyway because of his agapē love. In contrast, Peter avoided possible torture by denying Jesus. Thus, Jesus twice asked Peter, “Do you agapē me?” In other words, “Are you willing to do things for my sake that you do not want to do?” Peter, on the other hand, still felt the sting of having denied Jesus, and was hopeful that their friendship was intact. Peter wondered if Jesus held Peter’s denial against him. Would Jesus still treat Peter as a close friend? Peter was not sure where he stood with Jesus, so he was trying to let Jesus know that he was still a true friend, and had phileō love for Jesus.

The third time Jesus spoke to Peter, he came to Peter’s level and asked if Peter were indeed a true friend (phileō), which grieved Peter. Nevertheless, it was important, because Jesus knew what Peter did not know—that Jesus would ascend into heaven, and Peter and the others would be left to carry out his work on earth, which would require that they do things they did not want to, even, it turned out, die as a martyr.

The third Greek word for “love,” which refers to sexual love or passionate love is eros, and we get English words such as “erotic.” When Eros was used as a proper noun, it referred to the Greek god of love. The Greek word eros does not appear in the Bible, so we will only just mention it here, but it has had such an impact on English and our view of sexual love that it is important to mention.

The fourth Greek word we need to understand is storgē, which is the love and affection that naturally occurs between parents and children, can exist between siblings, and exists between husbands and wives in a good marriage. It occurs in Romans 12:10, and for more on storgē see the note on that verse.

If one is going to have a wonderful Christian life, obedient to the voice of God and have rich fellowship with other Christians, he or she will need to exercise all three kinds of love that are in the Bible. We need agapē love because some of the things that God requires of us are not fun or easy, but need to be done. We need to have phileō love because we need true friends to stand with us, people who are emotionally connected to us and with whom we can share our deepest thoughts and feelings. Lastly, we Christians need to have storgē love between us, a deep family affection that comforts us and helps us feel connected to all our spiritual family.
21:17. “are you my friend…are you my friend…I am your friend.” See the note on John 21:15.
21:22. “You follow me!” Jesus did not reveal the Sacred Secret. He still spoke as if his return was imminent.
Acts

Chapter 1

1:1. “All.” Figure of speech synecdoche (the whole for a part), for “all that was necessary.” John 21:25 makes it clear that there is no way “all” that Jesus did could be recorded.

1:2. “until the day in which he was taken up.” This sets the parameters for the book of Luke. It covered all Jesus’ life until he was taken up (which is covered in Acts), including the things Jesus received from his Father via holy spirit.

“he, having given commandments.” The Greek verb entellomai (#1781 ἐντέλλομαι) is in a masculine singular aorist participle, and thus can be translated “he, having given commandments.”

“after he, through holy spirit, had given the commandments to the apostles whom he had chosen.” God, via the gift of holy spirit on Jesus, gave him what to say, and how and when to say it. Jesus did not just tell his apostles what he thought was important, he gave them the commands that God told him to give them. Jesus had gotten what to say to them from God, just as he said in John 12:49: “For I did not speak of my own accord, but the Father who sent me commanded me what to say and how to say it.”

Having this in the introduction to Acts gives us the proper emphasis in the book of Acts. Luke writes that in his former book he covered what Jesus did and taught. From that broad starting point, Luke could have emphasized anything about Jesus’ life: his miracles, his holiness, his love, etc. However, what Luke states, and thus emphasizes, is that Jesus gave the commandments that he received from God via holy spirit, to the apostles. This launches the Book of Acts, and gives unprecedented credibility to the apostles, who now take off where Jesus left off. If there was any doubt that the apostles were qualified to continue the ministry of Jesus, it is now removed.

“holy spirit.” There is no article “the” in the Greek text, although one could be supplied because of the preposition dia if that made the sentence clearer, which in this case it does not seem to. Daniel Wallace writes in Greek Grammar Beyond the Basics (p. 247): “There is no need for the article to be used to make the object of a preposition definite.” A. T. Robertson writes: “…the article is not the only means of showing that a word is definite. …The context and history of the phrase in question must decide. …[As for prepositional phrases], these were also considered definite enough without the article.” Robertson then cites some examples (Grammar of the Greek New Testament, pp. 790-792).

In this verse, the “holy spirit” refers to the gift of holy spirit that God put upon some believers before the Day of Pentecost. See Graeser, Lynn, Schoenheit, The Gift of Holy Spirit: The Power to be Like Christ from Spirit & Truth Fellowship. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.

1:3. “appearing to them over a period of forty days.” This does not say 40 days from Jesus’ resurrection, which was on Saturday, the 17th on Nisan (Nisan was the first month of the Jewish year), but 40 days of Jesus’ “appearing” to the disciples. His first “appearance” was on Sunday morning, the 18th of Nisan. If we take the number 40 literally, and also realize that when counting a number such as the number of days in a period of time the first and last day are counted, 40 days from Sunday, Nisan 18 (counting that day) brings us to the 27th day of the second Jewish month (called both Zif and Iyyar), which was a Thursday. Thus, the ascension was Thursday, the 27th of Zif.

Pentecost fell on Sunday, the 8th day of the third Jewish month, Sivan. We would say Pentecost fell 10 days after the ascension (because in our normal English counting we would not count the day of the ascension, but would start on the next day). We should remember, however, that although the Bible tells us that Jesus appeared to the disciples for 40 days, it does not tell us how long after that was the Day of Pentecost, we have to know that from the ancient sources (and they disagree; see commentary on Acts 2:1).

1:4. “being assembled together.” This verse has a textual variant that is not easily dealt with, leaving us with three alternatives: assemble together, spend the night together, or eat salt together (which is the literal, usually translated simply “eat together”). The scholars are divided. Less think that “spend the night together” is the meaning here, and we agree. Those who say, “eat salt together,” do so because of the parallel record in Luke 24:43-53, and this may in fact be the record being referred to in Acts 1:4, but it may also be, not the same record, but a similar one. Jesus no doubt spoke of the coming holy spirit on a number of occasions. “Being assembled together” is very likely, it is the choice reported in A Textual Commentary of the Greek New Testament (Metzger); and would also have to be the case even if Jesus and his disciples were eating together, so that is the variant we went with in our version.

“to wait for the promise of the Father.” The “promise” is the figure of speech metonymy (cp. Bullinger, Figures) for that which was promised, the gift. The apostles did not have to wait for the promise; it had been given long ago. They had to wait for what was promised, i.e., the gift of holy spirit. Dynamic Equivalent versions such as the NIV or paraphrased versions such as the Good New Bible, add the word “gift” so the English reader is not confused.

“which, said he, “you heard from me.” The REV translates this as an ellipsis, adding, “said he.” However the Greek text is the figure of speech anacoluthon, non-sequence. In this case, the indirect address of the first part of the verse suddenly becomes a direct quotation of Jesus.

1:5. “because.” The Greek is hoti (#3754 ὅτι), and it means, “that, because, or since.” Lenski (Commentary; Acts) and Robinson (Greek Grammar) refer to this as the consecutive hoti. The question we must ask, and answer, is why did Jesus command his disciples to stay in Jerusalem? It was to wait for what the Father had promised, i.e., the gift of holy spirit. The disciples had already been baptized in water. If water baptism was all that was important and necessary for salvation, there would have been no need for the disciples to stay in Jerusalem or receive the gift of holy spirit. Sadly, many people reverse what Jesus said here in Acts. They say water baptism is essential for the believer and act as if baptism in holy spirit is not really essential but perhaps “nice to have,” or valuable in many ways. Jesus was teaching quite the opposite. He knew the disciples had already been water baptized. He also knew it would no longer be intrinsically valuable after the Church started on the Day of Pentecost. Thus, he commanded his disciples to stay in Jerusalem and receive baptism in holy spirit “because” John [only] baptized in water, but holy spirit was going to be first poured out in Jerusalem.

“with water.” The Greek is hudōr (#5204 ὕδωρ) in the dative, thus, “with water.” Thus it is clear that the element that people were baptized with was water. However, in the later part of the verse, the specific word “in” (ἐν, #1722 ἐν) is used, emphasizing that the Christian is baptized “in” holy spirit. There is one baptism for the Christian, and it is spirit, not water (cp. Eph. 4:5). John’s baptism was a shadow of what was to come, and even John himself said this (Matt. 3:11; etc.). There is no reason to baptize in water today. Nevertheless, the practice continues, and sadly some even teach that it is necessary for salvation. [For more on baptism, see John Schoenheit, The History & Doctrine of Christian Baptism (Spirit & Truth Fellowship, 2011).]

“in holy spirit.” There is no definite article. This holy spirit is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’.”]

1:6. “is it at this time you are going to restore the kingdom to Israel?” The question is logical. Jesus had just recently (most likely even that day) spoken to them about the coming holy spirit (Acts 1:5). The disciples were well acquainted with the Old Testament prophecies that the gift of holy spirit would be poured out in association with judgment upon the nations and the Messianic Age (Isa. 32:15-18; Joel 2:28-3:17). Therefore when Jesus told them that the gift of holy spirit was going to be poured out, it was natural for them to assume that the Messianic Kingdom was at hand.

“restore.” The Greek verb is apokathistēmi (#600 ἀποκαθίστημι), and it means to restore, to restore to a former state. The restoration of Israel and indeed, the earth itself, was foretold in Scripture (cp. Ps. 14:7; Hosea 6:11; Matt. 17:11; 19:28; Mark 9:12). Apokathistēmi is in the present tense, active voice, so some versions have translated it, “are you restoring,” but that very literal translation is misleading. The present tense verb is used to help show that the essence of the disciples’ question was “Is this going to happen now?” English also uses the present tense verb for something that might happen soon. For example, if a man is going to build a deck on his house, and a friend come over to visit, the homeowner might say, “I am going to build a deck.” The friend might then ask, “Are you building it today,” using the present tense “are…building,” instead of the future tense. If the friend was using strict English grammar he would use a future tense and say, “Are you going to build it today,” but in common English, as in common Greek, a present tense verb was sometimes used for something that was going to happen soon. The disciples knew the coming of holy spirit was associated with the Messianic Kingdom, so when Jesus said the holy spirit was going to be poured out, the disciples wanted to know if the Kingdom was going to be restored also.

1:8. “when the holy spirit.” Acts 1:8 is one of the clearest verses that show us that when a person gets born again and receives the gift of holy spirit, that person gets spiritual power, and thus the ability to operate the manifestations of holy spirit right then, not later. However, this fact has been confused, and the translation of this verse in the King James Version is partly to blame. The KJV reads: “But ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you.” What modern readers usually do not understand is that in 1611, the phrase “after that” is not a good translation of the Greek participle in this verse. The Greek text clearly indicates the power comes “when” holy spirit comes, which is at the time a person is saved via being born again. The modern versions we checked all had “when,” including the New King James Version, which has updated the English of the King James Version. When a person receives the gift of holy spirit, at that time they are spiritually powerful (cp. commentary note on Eph. 1:13). [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’.”]
“witnesses.” The Greek is martus (#3144 μάρτυς), from which we get our English word, “martyr.” The word “witness” became martyr, because in the great persecutions of the Church in the first three centuries after Christ, many people gave a clear witness of Christ by standing firm in their faith even through torture and death, becoming martyrs for Christ.

1:10. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

1:12. “a Sabbath day’s journey.” The original Sabbath day’s journey set by tradition was 2000 cubits (about 3000 feet, or slightly over one half mile), which the rabbis took from Joshua 3:4 and 5, that there was to be 2000 cubits between the “place” of the people and the ark of the covenant. Since we know the distance between the Mount of Olives and Jerusalem is about one half mile, we know that the Sabbath day’s journey in Acts 1:12 is the 2000 cubit journey. However, later the rabbis decided the “place” of Joshua 3:4 could be the city where a person lived, and thus the Sabbath day’s journey was lengthened to 2000 cubits from the outside of your city. Then the Rabbis decided that if a person put food somewhere, that became his abode and thus his “place,” so a person could walk up to 2000 cubits to where his food was and then another 2000 cubits, for a total of over 1.1 miles (1.7 km).Sometime around New Testament times (the exact times these traditions changed is hard to pin down), the rabbis decided that if a person had to walk 4000 cubits away from home on the Sabbath, he had to be able to get back, so the Sabbath day’s journey was lengthened to 8000 cubits, or over 2 miles (3 km). These types of traditions which were not based in Scripture were part of the burdens that the religious leaders put on people.

1:14. “of one accord.” homothumadon (#3661 ὁμοθυμάδων). From homos (the same) and thumos (related to the soul, the life, the feelings, the passions). “Old adverb in -don from adjective homothumos and that from homos, same, and thumos, mind or spirit, with the same mind or spirit. Common in ancient Greek and papyri. In the New Testament eleven times in Acts and nowhere else save Ro 15:6” (Robertson, Word Pictures in the New Testament). It means to be of one mind, one passion.

1:15. “names.” The word “names” is used idiomatically for “people.” This kind of idiom poses a difficulty to translators. If we translate literally, people could be confused and not know what the verse was saying. In fact, in modern English we sometimes use “name” to refer to important people, but that is not the meaning here. The Bible is not saying there were about 120 important people and an uncounted number of unimportant people gathered there. However, the use of “names” has an emphasis that we should not miss, because it points to the importance of every individual. Every person gathered there was special and important to God.

“together at that one place.” The phrase occurs in the Septuagint as an idiom for “together,” which is why so many Bible versions read “together” (HCSB; KJV; NASB; NRSV). However, in this case the text is giving us more than just a statement that the people were together, although that is clearly also part of the meaning of the word. By the one phrase in Greek, God communicates that the people were “together at that one place.” This immediately shows us that they are not in the “upper room.” For one thing, the houses in Jerusalem were quite small; it would not have been possible to get about 120 people in a room in a house. Second, and fatal to the argument that the 120 were in the upper room, was that it was where the men, the Apostles, were living in Jerusalem.
They would not have had a mixture of men and women up in the room where the men were staying.

The “one place” where the disciples “continued steadfastly in prayer” was the Temple. Luke 24:53 says the disciples were “continually in the Temple,” and the 37 acre Temple complex was the main place where groups of people gathered. For more on the Pentecost event happening in the Temple, see commentary on Acts 2:2, “house.”

1:16. “Men, brothers.” The Greek word “men” is ἀνήρ (#435 ἀνήρ), the standard Greek word for an adult male. It is used in formal address, and so in the Book of Acts it occurs in combination with “brothers” (as here, 2:29, etc.; “Men, brothers”), “Jews” (2:14; “Men, Jews”); “Israel” (2:22; “Men; Israelites”); “Men, brothers and fathers” (Acts 7:2); “Athenians” (17:22; “Men, Athenians”); “Ephesians” (19:35; Men, Ephesians). Lenski says, “The assembly consisted of men, otherwise andres could not have been used; adelphoi [brothers] might include adelphai [sisters], just as today ‘brethren’ may include ‘sisters,’ but andres [men] could not include gunaikes [women], just as to this day the address ‘men’ omits ‘women.’” (Lenski; note on Acts 1:16). We agree that Peter was only addressing the men, which is why he specifically used the term “men.” However, it seems clear from the context, especially the previous two verses, that there were women in the audience. However, according to the Jewish custom of the day, they would have been protected from freely interacting with the men, and certainly excluded from voting for a replacement for Judas.

It was a common custom in the ancient Middle East to only address the men in an audience, and often, only to count them (which is why in cases such as the record we know as “The feeding of the 5000,” the number 5000 included only men. The women and children were stated to be there, and likely outnumbered the men, but were not counted [Matt. 14:21]). As the Christian faith developed through the first century, and God revealed that there was neither male nor female in Christ (Gal. 3:28), women took on greater roles of responsibility in the Church. Thus, Romans 16 mentions Phoebe, a deacon, and Andronicus and Junia, who were apostles (Rom. 16:7; although some theologians dispute that interpretation). Sadly, the chauvinism in the Church regained ascendancy, and so for most of the time since Christ, the Church has denied proper recognition and leadership roles to women. We feel that it is important to understand the Bible in the context of the times it was written and properly reflect the biblical customs.
Therefore, we have decided to retain the biblical phrase “Men, brothers,” rather than to change it to something like “brothers and sisters.” We feel it is more helpful to both Christian men and women to properly understand the biblical customs and thinking of the times, than to artificially include women and thus make Peter (and Paul, and others) say something he really did not say.

“Holy Spirit.” This seems to be more of a reference to God, the Holy Spirit, than it is to the gift of God, which is “holy spirit.” However it is possible that it is a reference with more emphasis on the gift than on God Himself, in which case, “holy spirit” would make more sense in English.

There are a couple difficulties in translating this phrase. The first is the English forces us to make a choice between “Spirit” (God) and “spirit” (the gift from God). The original texts would have either all capital or all lower case letters, and thus the copyist would not have to make a decision whether or not God or His gift of holy spirit was indicated, he could leave that decision to the reader. The second difficulty is that a person who really understands the subject, and also knows that God always placed His gift of holy spirit upon them when He wanted to inspire them with a prophetic word, would realize that “SPIRIT” in this kind of context really meant “The Spirit (God) by way of His gift of spirit.” Thus the one word “SPIRIT” actually covered both the Giver and the gift in the original understanding of the text, which cannot be easily done in English, which forces us to either read “Spirit” (God) or “spirit” (His gift to us). Many people spoke or acted prophetically when the spirit came upon them (cp. Num. 11:17, 24, 25; 24:2, 3; Judg. 3:10; 1 Sam. 10:6, 10; 1 Chron. 12:18; 2 Chron. 15:1; 24:20; Joel 2:28). Nevertheless, it was always God who put the holy spirit upon people and who was the origin of the message. This is clearly recognized by the people and in the prophetic messages themselves when the message is from God, not from His gift of spirit (cp. 2 Chron. 20:14, 15; 24:20; Isa. 59:21). Other times David is said to have spoken by the spirit are Matthew 22:43; Mark 12:36, and Acts 4:25. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’.”]

1:18. (“Now this man acquired a field… the field of blood.”) This verse and verse 19 are the figure of speech parenthesis, in this case a parenthetical (a parenthesis complete in itself). This parenthesis was added by Luke for the benefit of his wide audience over the whole Christian world. Many of them would not have heard what happened to Judas and why there needed to be a replacement for him. Peter did not speak the words in verses 18 and 19 to his audience, for they all perfectly understood why Judas needed a replacement. The reason we are sure the verses are a parenthetical is in the note on verse 19.

There is very much discussion about the differences in the account of Judas’ death here in Acts and the account in Matthew 27:5 which simply states that Judas “hanged himself.” Most commentators simply say there were two accounts of his death, and Matthew and Luke recorded different traditions. However, first, the Bible is authored by God, and He would know how Judas died and what His inspired writers would put down. Second, it is unlikely that Luke and Matthew, both very familiar with the apostles and many people who knew Judas and what happened personally, would write differing accounts. Judas was an infamous person, and if his death was gory as Acts describes, Matthew would certainly have known about it. There is no need to see a contradiction between Matthew and Acts. Matthew says Judas hanged himself. What happened in Acts seems clear enough: Judas fell down prone, broke open in the middle (with a noise), and all his bowels gushed out.

The problem Christians face is how to harmonize the record in Acts with what Matthew says. There are two ways that have been proposed. The first is that at some point when Judas was hanging from a tree, the rope gave way and he fell down prone onto the ground, and the impact of the fall caused him to burst open. This seems unlikely, but it would be more possible if there were roots or rocks on the ground that Judas’ body would have hit, and there were plenty of those around the trees in Judea. Furthermore, if the tree was an olive tree, it would almost certainly have little protrusions, such as one often sees around cypress trees. Also, Judas may have hung for a couple days before the rope broke, making his body more susceptible to bursting open.

Another proposal, by Victor Wierwille (Jesus Christ Our Passover) is that Judas “hanged” himself by falling on his sword, much like Saul had done many years before (1 Samuel 31:4). Being impaled was a common form of suicide and execution in the ancient biblical world. For example, when Haman was hanged, what happened was a typical execution in the Assyrian and Persian world; he was impaled on a giant stake (Esther 7:10; 8:7; 9:13, 14). The Assyrians used this type of hanging to intimidate their enemies, and it is portrayed on Assyrian rock cuts (Herbert G. May, Oxford Bible Atlas, p. 105. Both the second and third editions have the picture, but it is redrawn and therefore much easier to see in the second edition). The problem with that explanation is that when Matthew says that Judas hanged himself, the Greek word is apagchomai (ἅπαγχομαι), a word that only occurs one time in the NT, and means, to strangle oneself, (Bullinger, Vine, Zodhiates). There is another word for hanging that refers to being suspended, and it is used of the criminals and Jesus hanging on the cross, being suspended there by the nails that were through the wrists and feet. That word is kremannumi (κρεμάννυμι) and it is used in verses such as Luke 23:39 and Acts 5:30. It seems unlikely that Matthew would say that Judas went out and strangled himself by hanging if he could have used a word “hang” that meant to be suspended, i.e., suspended on the stake on which he fell. Interestingly, the Hebrew also makes a difference between hanging that would take place on a stake, i.e., impaling, and hanging that involves strangling. When Haman was hanged, almost certainly by impaling, the Hebrew is talah (תלאר), “to hang, to hang up any object, to hang up for display,” but when Ahithophel hung himself, the Hebrew is chanaq (ךנהק), to strangle, or to die by hanging. It is appealing to think that when Matthew wrote that Judas hanged himself, what he meant was that Judas fell on a stake, because then Matthew and Acts would harmonize beautifully. However, given the meaning of apagchomai in the Greek from classical times on down, it seems more likely that Judas must have hung himself from a tree and then dropped down prone, bursting in the middle. There would be no need for that whole account to occur in Acts, because the emphasis in Acts was that Judas was a privileged apostle, but due to his selfishness he even acted as the guide of those who arrested Jesus. Thus he met a very ignoble end, broken apart in the middle of a field he had purchased with the money he has stolen from the believers. (The money he got for betraying Jesus he returned to the priests; Matt. 27:3. He had other money that he stole from the gifts given by believers; John 12:6).

“falling down prone.” The Greek reads ginomai prenes (ginomai (#1096 γίνομαι) means to become; prenes (#4248 πρηνής) means, “prone, headlong, head-first”). Judas “became prone,” which we understand from the context was to fall down prone, or fall down prostrate.

“burst open.” The Greek is laschō (#2997 λασχω (λακάω), and it means to break open, break apart. Meyer gives evidence from Homer and other ancient Greek writers that this is an expression that means to burst open with a noise (Meyer’s Commentary, Acts, p. 33).

1:19. “in their language…Akeldama.” The word “Akeldama” is Aramaic. Verses 18 and 19 are a parenthesis, added by Luke to explain why there needed to be a replacement for Judas (see commentary on verse 18). Luke was a native Greek speaker, and wrote in Greek. In contrast, Peter’s native language was Aramaic, and he would have spoken Hebrew as well. Peter would never have called “akeldama” a word “in their language,” because he was speaking to a room full of Aramaic speaking Jews, and “akeldama” was their language. Luke added “in their language” to clarify the meaning of “akeldama” to his Greek-speaking audience. This verse shows that the Book of Acts was originally written in Greek.

1:24. “You, Lord.” The evidence shows that this prayer is to Jesus, not to the Father. By far the most certain evidence that this is a prayer to Jesus has to do with who would choose the apostle that would replace Judas. Jesus “chose” the original twelve apostles. Luke 6:13 says, “he called his disciples, and he chose twelve of them, whom he also named apostles.” The word “chose” is eklegomai (ᵉᵏˡᵉᵍᵒᵐᵃⁱ), and although it is not an unusual word, it is important, because it was used of Jesus’ original choosing, then it is used in Acts 1:2, referring to “the apostles whom he [Jesus] had chosen.” Jesus had chosen the Twelve, and Acts confirms that in its opening verses. So it makes sense that when Peter prays, “You, Lord, who know the hearts of all, show which one of these two you have chosen,” that he would be asking the Lord Jesus to now reveal the man who he chose to replace Judas—simply continuing the Lord Jesus’ process of choosing apostles. This also fits with Ephesians 4:11, which says that it is Jesus who gives the equipping ministries to the Church. Thus it is the Lord Jesus who chose the original Twelve Apostles, and also is who appoints apostles to the Church, so it would be unusual if in this one case asked God who He had chosen to replace Judas.

It is clear from the prayer in Acts 1:24 that the apostles knew that Jesus already “had chosen” a replacement for Judas. They did not pray, “help us choose a replacement for Judas,” they prayed, “show us which person you have chosen.” In contrast to Jesus choosing a replacement for Judas, it does not flow well that Jesus would choose the original apostles, then Acts 1:2 would confirm that fact, but then Peter would suddenly pray “You, Lord,” and ask God whom He had chosen.

Peter was likely the one to lead the prayer, although there may have been “congregational prayer” as well, with other people praying after Peter took the lead. Peter was the recognized leader of the Church at this time and he stood up to speak about a replacement for Judas (Acts 1:15). A piece of contributing evidence that this prayer was to Jesus is that it is unlikely that the apostles would address the Father in such a familiar manner as to open a prayer with “You, Lord” (су курiOS). On the other hand, the apostles had a very familiar relationship with Jesus, whom they had just seen on earth some ten days earlier, and addressing him that way would be more natural to them.

Chapter 2

2:1. “Pentecost.” The Greek word pentēkosτē (ᶜ⁴⁰⁰⁵ πεντηκοστῆ; pen-tā-cos- tā’), was the Greek name of the Jewish feast that came 50 days after Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread. Technically the word is the substantive feminine form of pentēkostos, (πεντηκοστός), “fiftieth.” The Feast of Pentecost had several names. It was called the “the Feast of Weeks” (Exod. 34:22; Deut. 16:10); the “Feast of Harvest” (Exod. 23:16) and the “Day of Firstfruits” (Num. 28:26). Traditionally, Pentecost ended the wheat harvest, and wheat was the last of the grains to be harvested in Israel.

God chose the Day of Pentecost to be the day on which He started the Christian Church and made the New Birth available for the very first time [see Appendix 1: “The Permanence of Christian Salvation”]. Pentecost was a one day feast, whereas “Passover” and the Feast of Tabernacles were seven day feasts (“Passover” became the general term for the total time that involved the day of the Passover sacrifice and then the seven-day Feast of Unleavened Bread). Pentecost was the second of the three main Jewish feasts, and fell 50 days after the “day after the Sabbath” in the Passover. The fact that Pentecost was only a one day feast meant that all the worshippers would be in the Temple on that one day, whereas for the Passover Feast and the Feast of Tabernacles, worshippers might be in the Temple on one day, but miss another. All the devout Jews in the area were assembled in the Temple at the time of the morning sacrifice when the gift of holy spirit was poured out from heaven.

Although the Old Testament is clear that Pentecost falls fifty days from the first day “after the Sabbath,” during the seven-day Feast of Unleavened Bread, there has always been disagreement among the Jews as to when to start counting the 50 days. That is because the OT does not seem to be clear on which “Sabbath” to start the counting after—the special Sabbath that was the first day of the feast, or the regular weekly Sabbath that came during the feast. In biblical times, there were at least four major views on counting the days (Goudoever, Biblical Calendars). Does “the day after the Sabbath” refer to the 16th of Nisan, the day after the first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread, which was always a special Sabbath (Lev. 23:7)? If it does and the Pharisees thought it did, then “Pentecost” did not fall on a set day of the week, but varied from year to year. On the other hand, many people, including the Sadducees, believed that “the day after the Sabbath” referred to the day after the weekly Sabbath that occurred during the seven-day Passover feast. If that were the case, then the counting started on the Sunday after the weekly Sabbath and continued for seven Sabbaths (49 days), and then ended on the 50th day, which was always a Sunday. The Counsel of Nicaea 325 AD, decided that was going to be the way the Christian Church would count the 50 days, and it has been that way ever since for the Orthodox Church, which accounts for our modern reference to “Pentecost Sunday.”

Many qualified commentators (and the Pharisees), start the counting the 50 days on the 16th of Nisan, the day after the “Special Sabbath” that begins the Feast of Unleavened Bread. However, in this case we have to agree with the Sadducees and the many qualified commentators who say that the “Sabbath” in Leviticus 23:11 is the weekly Sabbath, and who start counting the 50 days to Pentecost starting with the regular weekly Sabbath that falls during the Feast. Goudoever agrees that the 50 day counting begins on Sunday after the weekly Sabbath, and says, “this is the original meaning of Leviticus 23:11” (Biblical Calendars, p. 19). The JPS Torah Commentary on Leviticus by Baruch Levine agrees, and says that Leviticus 23:11, “uses the abbreviation Shabbat in its normal sense of a particular day, the Sabbath.” Some commentators try to use Joshua 5:11 to try to show that the 50 days should be counted from the 16th of Nisan, but that verse says nothing about waiving the grain offering.

Very convincing evidence that we gain from the scope of Scripture that the 50 days of Pentecost are counted from the day after the weekly Sabbath is the fact that the waive-sheaf was a type of Christ. Both the waive-sheaf that was the first of the harvest, and the harvest it represented, were types and symbols of future events. The true harvest of the earth is those people who will be raised from the dead to everlasting life. Jesus fulfilled the type of the waive-sheaf by being the true firstfruits of the harvest, because he is the firstfruits of the dead (1 Cor. 15:20, 23). Jesus presented himself in the Temple as the High Priest and the firstfruits on Sunday, the 18th of Nisan (the first month of the year), shortly after he met Mary Magdalene at the tomb (see commentary on John 20:17).
Then, counting that day as day one, we can see that Pentecost fell 50 days later, on Sunday the 8th day of the third month, Sivan.

We can now set some firm dates concerning Jesus’ last week on earth. His crucifixion would have been Wednesday, the 14th of Nisan. The day of his resurrection was Saturday the 17th of Nisan just before sunset. His appearing to Mary Magdalene and then going up to God in the Temple was Sunday, the 18th of Nisan. So the Day of Pentecost was 50 days later, on Sunday the 8th of Sivan.

There were many “hidden types” in the Pentecost Feast; however, we should be aware that it seems Jews did not understand the meaning of many of the types associated with their feasts. During the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Passover), only one sheaf of grain was waived and that one sheaf was acceptable for all the people (Lev. 23:11). This symbolized that the one true sheaf, Jesus Christ, was the acceptable firstfruits for everyone else. During the feast of Pentecost, there were two loaves of bread offered (Lev. 23:17), which could symbolize the Jews and Gentiles both being acceptable to God.

At Passover the bread that the people ate was made without yeast, and yeast is usually a type for sin. So at Passover the people ate the bread that had no “sin,” and the true bread without sin was Jesus Christ. In contrast to Passover, at the Feast of Pentecost, the two loaves were made with yeast (Exod. 34:22). This symbolizes that Jews and Gentiles are acceptable to God in spite of our sin when we accept Christ as Lord.

Also, the Feast of Pentecost was called, “the Day of Firstfruits” (Num. 28:26) even though it was the end of the grain harvest, but God knew that the Day of Pentecost would be when He would give the “firstfruits of the gift of holy spirit” to God’s people (Rom. 8:23). Thus it was that on the Day of Pentecost, Jesus Christ poured out from heaven the promised gift of holy spirit and started the Christian Church.

“they.” The Twelve Apostles, not the 120 disciples. See commentary on 2:3.

“in one place.” Almost certainly the Temple, not a private house. See commentary on Acts 2:2, “house.”

2:2. “house.” In this verse, “house” refers to the Temple. The Greek word is oikos (#3624 οἶκος) and its primary definition is “house,” a building in which people live. However, oikos was applied to all kinds of dwellings, including the king’s palace (Matt. 11:8), the Temple of God (Matt. 21:13 [from Isa. 56:7]; Luke 11:51; John 2:16; Acts 7:47, 49), temples of idols (Jud. 9:27, 46; 16:27, 29, 30; 1 Sam. 5:2, 5; 31:9, 10; 2 Kings 5:18; 10:21); the human body as a house of something living in it (Matt. 12:44); a family or extended family (Heb. 3:6), descendants from a common ancestor (Matt. 10:6, “the house of Israel”), a family, kingdom, or nation (Luke 11:17); the Christian believers (1 Pet. 2:5), a household including the possessions and property (Acts 7:10).

Many times in the Old Testament the word “house” was applied to the dwelling of God, both when it was just a tent in the wilderness, and when it was the large and stable Temple in Jerusalem. Sometimes the house referred to the Tabernacle or Temple in the phrase “house of the Lord” (cp. Exod. 23:19; 34:26; Judg. 19:18; 1 Sam. 1:7; 3:15; 2 Sam. 12:20; 1 Kings 3:1, 2; 5:3, 5; 6:1). Sometimes the phrase was “house of God” (cp. Judg. 18:31; 20:18, 26, 31; 21:2). Many times, however, the word “house” was used alone and it is from the context that we know it referred to the Temple (cp. 2 Sam. 7:5-7, 13; 1 Kings 5:17, 18; 6:2-10; 8:16; 9:3; 2 Kings 22:6; Ezra 1:2; 3:12; 6:15; Neh. 11:12). As we saw above, the New Testament continued referring to the Temple as the “house.”
There are a number of reasons that lead us to conclude that the “house” where the outpouring of holy spirit on the Day of Pentecost occurred was the Temple. For one thing, Jesus had instructed his disciples to stay in Jerusalem until the gift of holy spirit was poured out (Acts 1:4). The two closing verses of the Gospel of Luke tell us where the Apostles stayed during that time. After the ascension, they “returned to Jerusalem with great joy. And they stayed continually at the temple, praising God” (Luke 24:52, 53). For them to be continuously in the Temple meant that they would be there when the Temple was open during the day.

We must also remember that this particular day was the Day of Pentecost, which was one of the three feasts of the Old Testament when Jews were commanded to travel to Jerusalem. In contrast to Passover and the Feast of Tabernacles, which were seven-day feasts, Pentecost was a one-day feast. It is inconceivable that the Apostles and disciples who were dedicated Jews, and whom Luke says were continuously in the Temple, would not have been in the Temple on Pentecost at the time of the morning sacrifice, about nine o’clock in the morning.

Another reason that the “house” would have been the Temple was the sound that was like a rushing wind filled the entire “house.” This was a very impressive event, and it was the first thing that caught the attention of the crowd. If the Pentecost experience had been in a private home in Jerusalem, and the sound filled that “house,” there is no reason to believe any other Jews would have heard the sound or been interested—certainly not a “multitude” as Acts 2:6 states. In contrast, the Temple complex was about 37 acres, and packed with Jews from every nation, who had all come to Jerusalem for the Feast of Pentecost in obedience to the Mosaic Law.

There is no reason to doubt that this Pentecost was a typical June day in Jerusalem: a hot, cloudless day with no wind or perhaps only a slight breeze. Yet at about nine in the morning everyone in the Temple heard a loud sound as if there was a violent wind—but there was no wind. What could that mean? Everyone would have been curious; wondering about it, talking about it, and looking around. Then it would not have been missed that it looked like fire was falling from heaven, spreading out into separate tongues, and coming to rest on a small group of men. That would have brought the crowd running in the direction of the Apostles. As the crowd got close, however, what they heard was those Apostles speaking out in the different languages of the crowd present—languages the men from Galilee did not themselves know!

That phenomenon would have bewildered and amazed the crowd, likely numbering in many thousands, and Peter took the opportunity to speak to the huge crowd. So now we have seen some more things that make it almost impossible for the “house” to be the upper room. The huge crowd of unbelieving Jews in the Temple would not have heard the sound of the wind if it had only filled a local house. Then, the crowd could not have gotten through the streets of Jerusalem, which were very narrow then just as they are today. Lastly, there would have been no place for Peter to address a crowd that was so large that three thousand people believed. No doubt there were thousands who did not believe as well.

It has been suggested that many houses had a courtyard, and that is where the 120 could have gathered and thus where the Pentecost experience occurred. However, modern day archaeology, and well as testimony from ancient sources, shows us that at the time of Christ, the larger houses in Jerusalem were generally on the far western side of the city, while around the Temple the houses were smaller and the streets very narrow. No one in the Temple could have heard the sound of wind in a house on the west side of Jerusalem, perhaps a half mile away, especially given the walls of the Temple. In contrast to a house somewhere in Jerusalem that could not accommodate a multitude, the Temple had many acres of open space and the crowd could have easily heard the sound, seen the “flames of fire,” heard the Apostles speaking in tongues, and then heard Peter speak.

While most scholars recognize that there is enough lack of clarity in Luke’s writings that we cannot say for certain where the Pentecost event occurred, a number of scholars recognize that the Temple is much more likely to be the “house” in Acts 2:2 than a private home in Jerusalem. The NIV Study Bible note reads: “Evidently not the upstairs room where they were staying (1:13) but perhaps some place in the Temple precincts....” The New King James Version Study Bible note reads, “The place may have been part of the temple. It is difficult to imagine how the large crowd mentioned in v. 5 could have observed the activities in the upper room or congregated in the narrow streets outside the house where the disciples were meeting.” F. F. Bruce compares the upper room with the Temple and concludes that the Temple is the more likely place for Pentecost (New International Commentary: Acts).

“They were sitting.” The Twelve Apostles, not the 120 disciples. See commentary on 2:3. 2:3. “they...each of them.” This is referring to the Twelve Apostles, not the 120 disciples. The thing that looked like fire that was divided into different flame-tongues, came to rest on each one of the Twelve Apostles, and it was the 12 who first spoke in tongues on the Day of Pentecost. The context switched from the 120 disciples to the decision to get a twelfth apostle in 1:16. By 1:26, Matthias was added to the eleven, making twelve. Then we must remember that in the original text there were no chapters and verses, so when 2:1 says “they were all together,” the “they” refers to the eleven and Matthias, from the verse before. We get a better picture of the way the text reads by taking out the chapter and verse numbers, and also the punctuation, all which have been added by translators to add clarity, but sometimes they misguide us.

“And they gave forth their lots and the lot fell upon Matthias and he was numbered with the eleven apostles and when the day of Pentecost was fully come they were all with one accord in one place” (Acts 1:26-2:1 KJV without punctuation).

Acts 2:1 does start with “and,” even though it is not translated in many versions. Besides the grammatical evidence that “they” refers to the Twelve Apostles, not the 120 disciples, there are at least two more important pieces of evidence. The first is that Acts 2:1 says, “they were all together in one place.” The Temple complex was almost forty acres, and getting 120 people together there would have been difficult. Not impossible, but difficult. However, the much more conclusive evidence that only the Apostles had the initial experience of Pentecost is in Acts 2:7, “are not all these that speak Galileans?” The Twelve Apostles were all Galileans, but not all of the 120 disciples were Galileans.

“spreading out.” The Greek word is diamerizō (#1266 διαμερίζω). In the passive voice, which it is here, it means to be divided off or divided into separate parts, to be separated or separated away from, to be dispersed, “to spread out” (Louv-Nida), to be distributed. Here, as in many places, the Greek says more than we can easily say in English. What the people saw was the tongues that looked like tongues of flame coming down and spreading out such that each apostle had a tongue of flame resting on him. What is also contained in the Greek word is that these tongues of what looked like flame were “distributed,” by the Lord (see commentary on Acts 2:33). This was no random event. The apostles were selected by the Lord and received his sign of approval. Fire from heaven was always a sign of divine presence or action. God’s fire was used in judgment to consume his enemies, and it was also used as a sign of divine approval. For example, fire on Mt. Sinai signaled divine presence (Exod. 19:18). A pillar of fire over the Tent of Meeting (Tabernacle) signaled God’s presence there (Exod. 40:38; Num. 9:16).

God lit the Tabernacle altar with fire from heaven (Lev. 9:24), which is why the Levites were told to keep the fire going and never let it go out (Lev. 6:12, 13). God accepted Gideons’ offering with divine fire (Judg. 6:21). Elijah’s sacrifice was accepted by fire from heaven (1 Kings 18:38), as was David’s (1 Chron. 21:26). God also lit the fire on the altar of the Temple with fire from heaven (2 Chron. 7:1-3). The Jewish audience collected there at the Temple on the Day of Pentecost understood all this, and had the opportunity to see that God (and His Messiah) accepted the Apostles.

2:4. “they were all filled.” The Twelve Apostles, not the 120 disciples. See commentary on 2:3.

“with holy spirit.” The Greek has no definite article, and spirit is in the genitive case. This is not confusing to the Greek reader. We say “filled with,” while the Greeks indicated that by saying “filled of” (Cp. Luke 4:28; 5:26; Acts 3:10; 5:17; 13:45 and 52; 19:29). [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.]

“speak in tongues.” For a much fuller explanation of speaking in tongues, see commentary on 1 Corinthians 14:5.

“the Spirit.” The Greek word translated “Spirit” is pneuma (#4151 πνεῦμα). This use of “the Spirit” refers to Jesus Christ, who was pouring out the language of speaking in tongues (see v. 33). Jesus is also called “the Spirit” in Romans 8:26 and 27, 2 Corinthians 3:17 and 18; Revelation 2:7, 11, 17, 29; 3:6, 13, and 22 (see commentary on Revelation 2:7).

After his resurrection Jesus is sometimes called “the Spirit.” That is because when God raised Jesus from the dead, He gave him a spiritually powered body. His body was flesh and bone (Luke 24:39), but it was not made alive by “soul,” but by spirit; he was raised “a spiritual body (see commentary 1 Corinthians 15:44).

This verse in Acts has both the gift of holy spirit and “the Spirit,” Jesus, who pours out the language to those who speak in tongues. This may seem confusing to us today, but among the first century Christians, who were accustomed to the gift of holy spirit and to Jesus being called “the Spirit,” it was clear.

We believe that the second pneuma, “the pneuma,” is Jesus for a couple reasons. For one, the Bible says that Jesus, “the Spirit” “poured out what you now...hear (Acts 2:33).” It was Jesus who gave the tongues. It comes from Jesus, through the gift of holy spirit to our mind, but Jesus is the source. Another reason is that the Bible makes it clear that the gift of holy spirit inside us never “speaks of itself” but only “speaks what it hears” (John 16:13). Thus the one who “was giving them” tongues would have been Jesus. Furthermore, note that the Spirit was “giving to them” what to say. “Them” is most naturally the apostles, not the minds of the apostles. If the second spirit in Acts 2:4
is holy spirit, then the holy spirit was giving the minds of the apostles what to say. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”].

The verb, “was giving them” is imperfect, showing that the giving continued over a period of time. It was not “given” as a one-time thing. Jesus continued to give the language as long as the people spoke in tongues.

2:5. “deeply religious.” The Greek is eulabēs (#2126 εὐλαβής); see commentary on “godly man” in Acts 10:2.

2:7. “Galileans.” The gift of holy spirit was first poured out on the Twelve Apostles, not the 120 disciples. The Twelve were from Galilee, but not all the 120 would have been. See commentary on 2:3.

“Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

2:9. “Parthians.” Parthia was in what is Iran today, and where Persia had been before it. The natives spoke a Persian dialect.

“Medes.” Media was not a country at the time of the New Testament. The Persians had united with the Medes to form the larger Persian Empire (cp. Esther 1:3, 18, 19; Dan. 5:28; 6:8, 12, 15; 8:20). These people were Jews who were apparently descended from the Jews of the time of Daniel who were carried as captives to that area.

“Elamites.” Elam was not a country at the time of the New Testament. The Elamites occupied the area north and west of the Persian Gulf. Elam had become part of the ancient Persian Empire.

“those who live in Mesopotamia.” At the time of the New Testament, this area between the Tigris and Euphrates rivers was part of the Parthian Empire. Today it is Iraq.

“Judea.” This most probably does not mean what we usually think of as Judea, the area in southern Israel. It likely means the areas where the Jews had settled (or been deported to), and in this case refers to areas in what we know as Syria today.

“Cappadocia.” A Roman province in the southeast of what we know as Turkey today.

“Pontus.” A Roman province in what is now northern Turkey, on the Black Sea.

“Asia.” A Roman province that was on the far southwest of what we call Turkey today. The important city of Ephesus was in Asia.

2:10. “Phrygia.” An area in that is now in central Turkey. In New Testament times, eastern Phrygia was in the Roman province of Galatia, while the western part was in the province of Asia.

“Pamphylia.” A Roman province in what is today southern Turkey.

“Egypt.” The country of Egypt.

“parts of Libya near Cyrene.” The city of Cyrene was the capital of Libya in northern Africa on the Mediterranean Sea, which in 27 BC was made, together with Crete, the Roman province of Cyrenaica.

“visitors from Rome.” In other words, not true Roman citizens, but Jews and proselytes who lived in Rome, and who would have likely spoken Latin and Greek.

“proselytes.” This is almost certainly referring to those Gentiles who were fully proselytes, and not just “proselytes of the gate.” For information on the two different kinds of proselytes in Judaism at the time of Christ, see commentary on Acts 10:2.

2:11. “Cretans.” People who live on the Island of Crete, which in 27 BC was made, together with Cyrene in Libya, the Roman province of Cyrenaica.
“Arabians.” Likely people of the Nabatean kingdom of Arabia, mostly in what is Saudi Arabia today.

2:13. “sweet new wine.” It is not “new wine” as in wine that was freshly pressed (which would have been neos oinos in the Greek); rather this comes from gleukos (#1098 γλεῦκος). Most lexicons define this word as “sweet new wine” (BDAG; Thayer; Louw-Nida; Friberg; Gingrich), that is, wine that is still in the process of fermenting. The grape harvest in Palestine ended in August, or September at the latest, which by the time of Pentecost (usually June but sometimes May) would have been some eight months past, so the fermentation would have been over. However, the ancients had ways to keep the wine sweet and from turning to wine vinegar, such as adding honey to it, which would also prolong the fermentation process.

These mockers are typical of unbelievers. They ignore the facts (like the fire from heaven and the fact that no group of drunken people speaks fluently in other languages) and instead just voice their doubt and unbelief. Sadly, the mocking deters many Christians from getting involved in the conflict of the faith, since most people dislike and avoid conflict. The Adversary wages a harsh and relentless war of words, and often these empty arguments sound so plausible they stop Christians. For example, a dedicated Christian who prayed daily, gave regularly, and went to meetings regularly might have someone say to him, “You don’t have to be legalistic about your faith.” That almost sounds persuasive, until we really stop to think that being dedicated is not being “legalistic.” Many such hollow accusations have hindered Christians in their walk with the Lord.

2:15. “third hour.” This is about our 9 AM. Both the Jews and Romans divided the day into 12 hours, starting at daylight, roughly 6 AM. [For the hours of the day and the watches of the night, see commentary on Mark 6:48].

“a portion of my spirit.” The Greek of this phrase gives the sense of God having a large amount of spirit from which he pours some out upon mankind. Literally, it reads, “I will pour out from my spirit.” The preposition apo (“from; away from”) combines with the genitive “of my spirit,” to make the equivalent of a partitive genitive, showing that God is taking some of, or part of, His spirit, and putting it on people. Thayer’s Greek-English Lexicon notes that the apo in Acts 2:17 is used of “the separation of apart from the whole; where of a whole some part is taken.” The BDAG Greek-English Lexicon and the Exegetical Dictionary of the New Testament both reference Acts 2:17 as a case where the genitive with apo is a substitute for the partitive genitive. The NAB agrees, and translates the phrase, “I will pour out a portion of my spirit.” The Septuagint has the partitive idea in Joel, the idea being, “some of my spirit,” (The Acts of the Apostles: The Anchor Bible commentary; Joseph A. Fitzmyer). Some translations simply have “I will pour out of my spirit” (Darby; Douay-Rheims; KJV; Rotherham), which could be more clearly translated as, “I will pour out some of my spirit.” Thus the concept that God only pours out part of His spirit upon people is inherent in the text.

It is important that we recognize that there is a difference between what we today hear in Peter’s teaching and what Peter’s Jewish audience would have heard. Because of the Epistles to the Church, we today know that when the gift of holy spirit was poured out, it came as the New Birth and was sealed inside the believers. Although that is quite true, Peter’s audience did not know about that.
That God was now “pouring out” his spirit (i.e., giving it abundantly), would have meant two distinct things to Peter’s audience. Although they did not yet understand the New Birth, they did know from Joel that, if Peter was correct about the timing (which he was), God would give spirit to everyone. This is in contrast to how things were in the Old Testament. For example, in Numbers 11, God only put the gift of holy spirit on 70 men out of all the millions of Israelites. Moses said that he wished “that all the people of Yahweh, were prophets! Yea, let Yahweh put his spirit upon them” (Rotherham), but that did not happen. Throughout the history of the Old Testament right up until the day Peter was speaking, God had only given His holy spirit to a relatively few individuals. But now on the Day of Pentecost, the ascended Christ would pour out the gift of holy spirit upon anyone who believed (Acts 2:38; Eph. 1:13).

The second thing that the words “poured out” indicated to Peter’s Jewish audience would be that God would work powerfully through His spirit and energize many prophecies, miracles, etc. The connotation of “pour out” was that the energizing of the spirit would not be just a trickle of prophecies and power, but a great flowing of the manifestations of holy spirit, which is what we should still be seeing today. That is also clear in the immediate context, which we can see because Peter spoke of prophecy, visions, and dreams.

Although many English versions capitalize the word “Spirit” as if it referred to “the Holy Spirit,” clearly it does not. This “spirit” is the gift of holy spirit that each person gets when he or she is born again.

2:18. Quoted from Joel 2:29 with some variation.
2:19. Quoted from Joel 2:30

“the sun will be turned into darkness.” This is not a regular reoccurring eclipse, but a special supernatural occurrence in the time of Tribulation that precedes the Second Coming of Christ when he comes from heaven to earth and fights and wins the Battle of Armageddon (Rev. 19). This prediction, as the quotation itself, is in Joel, and Jesus spoke of the sun being darkened when he taught his disciples about the Great Tribulation (cp. Matt. 24:29), and the book of Revelation says the sun will be darkened (Rev. 6:12; 8:12). The sun being darkened is connected to the wrath of God, not just in these verses, but in the ninth of the ten plagues that struck Egypt at the time of the Exodus, which was a plague of darkness (Exod. 10:21).

“the moon into blood.” The moon does not literally become “blood,” but becomes blood colored. This is well described in Revelation 6:12, which uses the word “like” to describe the appearance of the moon: “and the full moon became like blood.” The verb metastrephō (#3344 μεταστρέφω), translated “turned” governs both the nouns sun and moon, so that we understand the moon is “turned” into blood, i.e., turned into blood from the point of view of someone looking at it from earth, i.e., it becomes blood colored. In a lunar eclipse, the moon can take on a dark red appearance, but this verse is not referring to a lunar eclipse, but to a full moon, which is usually brilliant white. Instead, at this time in the Tribulation, the full moon is blood red. Although Acts 2:20 simply says “moon,” the book of Revelation specifically says, “whole moon,” which we refer to as a “full moon.”

2:21. Quoted from Joel 2:32
2:26. “rest.” From the Greek kataskēnoō (#2681 κατασκηνόω), literally meaning “to pitch one’s tent,” that is to dwell, settle, or live. However, the translation “live” (NIV) could give the misleading impression that David was “alive” while resting in death. Rather, the sense is that after David had died, his flesh would “tent,” that is, dwell, settle down, or better, “rest” (cp. HCSB, KJV, NIV2011, YLT), in the hope of resurrection.

The point of the passage is not that David was “living” but exactly the opposite, as verses 29 and 34 make clear: “he both died and was buried… [and] did not ascend into the heavens.” BDAG points out how early Christian gravestones used this word as a euphemism for “resting.”

2:27. “soul.” The Greek word often translated “soul” is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoo-kay’), and it has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person or animal; an individual person; and attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. Here psuchē is used of the person himself. Thus, the HCSB and NIV use the word “me” instead of “my soul.” This is one of the many verses that prove the soul is not immortal, although to understand that point clearly, we must understand what “the grave” is in the last part of the verse. [For a more complete explanation of “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’”]

“the grave.” The Greek word we translate “grave” is hadēs (#86 ᾧδης). Hades was the Greek word used to represent the Hebrew word sheol, which was the state of being dead. When the Hebrew Old Testament was translated into Greek around 250 BC, the Hebrew word sheol was translated by the Greek word hades. Sheol was not the physical grave itself, but the state of being dead (the actual physical grave was referred to as the qeber; #6913 קֶבֶר). Some theologians refer to sheol as “gravedom” (the reign of the grave; or the reign of death). It is not a place, but a state of being—the state of being dead. In the Hebrew Old Testament, dead people are said to be in sheol (cp. 37:35; 42:38; 1 Kings 2:6; Job 7:9; Ps. 6:5; 16:10; Prob. 7:27; etc.).

It was actually a bad choice to translate sheol as hadēs, because in sheol people are dead, whereas in the Greek mythology, hadēs was a place where the souls of dead people are alive. So when the Greeks translated sheol as hadēs, it introduced great confusion about the state of the dead into Judaism and then into Christianity, and that confusion still exists today. It would have been better if the Greeks had simply transliterated sheol into Greek and brought it into the Greek language as a loan-word. The Bible, properly translated, makes it clear that dead people are dead until the Rapture or a resurrection. [For more on hadēs being equivalent to sheol, see Bullinger, A Critical Lexicon and Concordance; “hell”].

This verse shows how mistranslation can skew theology. If this verse were being read by a first-century Greek who did not know that hadēs was the Greek translation of sheol, he would be led to think that people, including Jesus, had gone to the hadēs of Greek mythology, ruled by the god Hadēs, which is not even close to what the text is saying. However, something similar has happened today, because many Christians think that hadēs is another name for the place in Christian mythology called “Hell,” which is ruled by the Devil and his demons, and is where evil people go when they die. Jesus certainly did not go to a place where there are dead people being tormented by demons. He died and was dead. We need to be clear on this point: the New Testament hadēs is the same as the Old Testament sheol, and it was not a “place” at all, but a state—the state of being dead. That is why the prophecy was that God would not abandon people to sheol (hadēs). If God did not raise people up from being dead, they would stay dead forever. The soul does not live on after the body dies. When the body dies, the soul is dead; gone [for more on the dead being dead and not alive in any form, see Appendix 4: “The Dead are Dead”].

2:30. Quoted from Psalm 132:11.

2:33. “the promised holy spirit.” The holy spirit was called “the promised holy spirit” because God had promised to send His gift of holy spirit in the Old Testament. The Old Testament prophets had foretold that a new spirit was coming in the future, one that was different from the spirit God gave in Old Testament times. It was foretold to come as part of the Messianic Kingdom and the New Covenant that God would make with Israel (Isa. 32:15-18; 44:3-5; Ezek. 11:17-21; 36:26, 27; Joel 2:28, 29). The Old Testament prophets said the spirit would be “poured out” (i.e., given in fullness) into all the believers (Ezek. 39:29; Joel 2:28, 29), which came to pass (Acts 2:33; 10:45; Titus 3:6). Jesus knew that it would come before his kingdom, perhaps to help believers to endure the Great Tribulation (John 15:26-16:16).

Although the Christian Church was a sacred secret, hidden in God and not foretold in the Old Testament, in His wonderful grace God has given the Christian Church the gift of holy spirit that He promised to give in the Millennial Kingdom. That is why in Acts and the Church Epistles this new holy spirit is sometimes referred to as “the promised holy spirit (Eph. 1:13; cp. Acts 2:33; Rom. 8:23).

The Greek text places “holy spirit” as the object of the preposition “of”: saying, “the holy spirit of promise.” This is a common construction, particularly in the Semitic languages but used in Greek also. Grammatically, nouns have more force than adjectives, so saying, “the holy spirit of promise” places more emphasis on “promise” than does the phrase, “the promised holy spirit.” However, due to the Trinitarian teaching that “the Holy Spirit” is a person and not the gift of God (a belief promulgated and supported in most versions by the translation “the Holy Spirit”), the phrase “the holy spirit of promise” tends to be unclear, while “the promised holy spirit” is much clearer. For more on the promised holy spirit, see commentary on John 7:39 and commentary on Ephesians 1:13.

[For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.

2:34, 35. Quoted from Psalm 110:1.

2:38. “in the name of Jesus Christ.” This phrase means, in essence, “by the authority of Jesus Christ.” It is a cultural phrase that refers to the authority a person has due to his relationship with the one being named, who in this case is Jesus Christ. In Christian culture, “the name of Jesus Christ” gave the user authority, just as using the name of any other ruler or great person would give the one who used it authority. [For more on the name of Jesus Christ, see commentary on Acts 3:6].

“the gift of the holy spirit.” This holy spirit is the gift of God, poured out on the day of Pentecost. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.

2:39. “As many as the Lord our God calls.” Many theologians assert that this verse means a person cannot be saved unless God first calls him, at which point the person can then decide to call upon God and be saved. That is not what this verse is saying. Peter did not know the Christian doctrine set forth by Augustine, Calvin, and others, that a person could not exercise his free will and be saved unless God first gave him saving grace.

Peter was a Jew who had been taught from the Old Testament that God chose and called the nation of Israel, but not the Gentile nations, and Peter thought of “calling” in this context in terms of groups of people, not individuals. Peter did recognize that an individual Gentile could be saved even if God did not call the Gentiles as nations. He certainly would have recognized that Ruth the Moabite, for example, was saved. Furthermore, he was aware that there were many proselytes to Judaism from the Gentile nations. In this address in the Temple, Peter says, “the promise [of the holy spirit] is to you [Jews] and your children,” because he was aware that the holy spirit had been promised to Israel. Furthermore, when he said the promise of holy spirit was to “you,” the word is plural, meaning “you as a group.” The promise was not given to “each of you individually,” even though each person would have to receive the spirit by their own faith.

In spite of the fact Peter was addressing a group of Jews, and knew the holy spirit had been promised to Jews, he also knew that Joel had said the spirit would be poured out on “all people” (Joel 2:28). Thus, likely by revelation he added, “and to all who are far off.” He himself was not thinking of the Gentiles at that time, because years later he argued with the Lord about entering the house of a Gentile (Acts 10:14). Nevertheless, he was inspired to say in his message that God can call whatever peoples or nations He wanted, and that they too could be baptized and receive holy spirit. This would occur individual by individual for the nations, just as it had for Israel.

2:41. “souls.” The Greek word often translated “soul” is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoo-kay'), and it has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person or animal; an individual person; and attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. Here psuchē is used of the person himself. Thus, many versions, including the HCSB, NAB, and NET, say “people” instead of “souls.” [For a more complete explanation of “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’”].

2:42. “fellowship.” The Greek word is koinōnia (#2842 κοινωνία; pronounced koy-no-nee'-ä). Like many words, it has a range of meanings and uses, so it is important to pay attention to the context to determine which meaning it has in that particular context. Koinōnia refers to a close association involving mutual interests and sharing; a close relationship characterized by involvement and sharing. From that basic definition it came to refer to the love or good will that comes with a close relationship, and thus was used of “generosity” or “participation,” and it also came to refer to the result of close association, which is sharing, giving, and was even used of “a gift” or “a contribution” (2 Cor. 9:13). Thayer’s Greek-English Lexicon offers one definition of koinōnia as: “joint participation,” and another as “intimacy.” The Internet encyclopedia Wikipedia says, “The essential meaning of the [word] koinōnia embraces concepts conveyed in the English terms community, communion, joint participation, sharing and intimacy.” We, as well as other Christians who have studied the subject, have come up with the useful definition to describe fellowship among Christians: “intimate joint participation.” The beauty of having a definitive definition of koinōnia is that it allows us to tell if we are actually having true Christian fellowship or not. To help us understand “intimate” in a social context, someone once defined “intimacy” as “in-to-me-see,” which is accurate and clear. It is amazing the extent to which we can be with others and never let them see into us. Many people can talk for hours without ever letting the listener “see” into them. That may be wise to do “on the street,” but it is certainly not how fellowship, koinonia, is supposed to work among Christians.

For example, a person may go to a large church and sit in the auditorium and listen to the pastor or teacher. That person may well be learning valuable things, but that is not “fellowship” because it is not intimate (no sharing of hearts), and it is not “joint participation,” it is one-way communication. Listening to a lecture on television is not “fellowship,” and sitting and listening to one in an auditorium is not either. One-way communication is not fellowship. Listening to teachings is important for building the like-mindedness necessary to have fellowship, but it is not itself “fellowship.” Similarly, a person who goes to a church but just chats and “makes small talk” may be engaging in “joint participation” but that is not true “fellowship” either because there is no “full sharing,” no “intimate joint participation” in which people open their hearts to each other.

We all know when we have genuine fellowship with others, that is, true, “intimate joint participation.” We let people into our hearts and lives, and are with people who open their hearts and lives to us, and that happens among people who are in close association and when we are with people we trust.

The New Testament has several of the different uses of koinōnia. Here in Acts 2:42, koinōnia refers to all the aspects of “fellowship”: there was the intimate joint participation among the believers, the love and good will that comes with that relationship, and also sharing, giving, gifts, and contributions among the community of believers. In 2 Corinthians 6:14, “…what fellowship does light have with darkness,” koinōnia primarily refers to the intimate joint participation that is unavailable in that unbalanced relationship. In Romans 15:26 we see koinōnia used to mean a gift or contribution, which is also its meaning in Hebrews 13:16. In 1 Corinthians 10:26, koinōnia is used as to refer to participation, as it does in Philippians 1:5.

The basis of true koinōnia among Christians is our love of God, and our commitment to Him. Beyond that, it is important that we agree on certain basics of the Faith. If we do not, there is often enough discord to produce lack of trust and no true intimate joint participation.

The epistle of 1 John lays out the relationship between teaching and “fellowship.” 1 John 1:3 says, “that which we have seen and heard we also declare to you, so that you also may have fellowship with us.” Note that John does not think that telling people what he had seen and heard was “fellowship,” but rather John taught what he had seen and heard “so that” there could be “fellowship.” The teaching produced the like-mindedness that was necessary for intimate joint participation to occur.

“prayer.” The Greek word for “prayer,” proseuchē (#4335 προσευχή), is in the plural, but it is a collective singular, like the English word “deer” or “fish,” which can be one or more than one. In this case, the disciples devoted themselves to the practice of prayer, which would include all kinds of prayer.

2:43. “every soul.” This means every person. See commentary on Acts 2:41.

2:46. “from house to house.” The emphasis is that each house was involved. Some versions read that they broke their bread “at home,” but this misses the point. It is not that each one ate at home, but rather that every home was involved, and they shared with each other.
“in the Temple.” These early Christians were all Jews, so they continued worshipping in the Temple.

“sincerity.” The Greek is ἀφελότης (#858 ἀφελότης), and means “simplicity.” The root word comes from a description of land that was without rock, hence smooth. Thus the idea is simplicity, or humility of heart. Sincerity captures this feeling more than simplicity, which could be read in a negative sense.

2:47. “and having favor with all the people.” The italics make clear who “all the people” are: the people of the city, in this case, Jerusalem. This tells us a lot about the early Christians. They were all Jews at this point, and they commended themselves to both God and man. They were joyful, full of praise, often in the Temple, sharing and helping each other and others out, so no wonder they had the favor (grace) of all the people of the city.

3:1. “at the hour of prayer, the ninth hour.” The ninth hour corresponds roughly to our hour from 3 to 4 PM. The Jews counted twelve hours in the day, with the first starting at what is roughly equivalent to our 6 AM. As early as the time of David (c. 950 BC) the Bible alludes to there being three daily hours of prayer among the Jews: “Evening and morning and at noon I will utter my complaint….” (Ps. 55:17). By the time of Daniel (c. 500 BC) the three times for prayer each day seems to be quite well established, because Daniel prayed upon his knees three times each day (Dan. 6:10).

However, ancient sources disagree as to exactly when the three hours of prayer were observed. According to the Talmud, the Jewish people prayed three times each day: morning, afternoon, and evening. John Lightfoot says that the prayers coincide with the morning and evening sacrifice, and that prayers were also made between those times, “from the sixth hour and a half,” which would be close to noon, around 12:30 PM. Yet he also points out that the Jerusalem Talmud says the practice was “The recital of the Shema in bed is the foundation; that is, after the stars have begun to appear.” After the stars had begun to appear is certainly later than the evening sacrifice, however. F.F. Bruce writes, “a service of public prayer accompanied these two sacrifices [the morning and evening] and there was a further service at sunset.” Acts 3:1 confirms that the ninth hour, about 3 PM, was in fact an hour of prayer.

Adam Clarke refers to rabbis who teach that people should pray when the sun rises, when it reached meridian [i.e., noon], and when the sun has set, “passed just under the horizon (see Adam Clarke, The New Testament with a Commentary, Vol. 5, Matt.-Acts, p. 704.) Lange writes: “…in the later age of the apostles, custom had firmly established the three hours of prayer, namely, the third hour of the day, in the morning…the sixth, at noon; and the ninth, in the evening. The first and third coincided with the hours in which the morning and the evening sacrifices were, respectively, offered.”(John P. Lange, Commentary on the Holy Scriptures: John-Acts, Acts 3:1.) In conclusion, it seems clear that the ancient sources testify to there being three hours of prayer, one of them coinciding with the morning sacrifice and one coinciding with the evening sacrifice. The sources disagree as to whether the third hour is close to noon, or after the evening sacrifice close to when the stars appear in the evening.
In Acts 10:3 the angel appeared to Cornelius at the hour of the evening sacrifice (the ninth hour). In Acts 10:9 Peter went up to the roof of the house in which he was staying and prayed at the sixth hour, about noon, and some commentators have used that to support the idea of an hour of prayer being around noon, but the Bible never says Peter prayed at a recognized hour of prayer, he may have just been moved to pray about that time.

Both the Jews and Romans divided the day into 12 hours, starting at daylight, roughly 6 AM. [For the hours of the day and the watches of the night, see commentary on Mark 6:48].

3:6. “I have no silver and gold.” The Greek literally reads, “silver and gold do not exist/are not present for me.” The Greek word translated “have” is huparchō (#5225 ὑπάρχω), which means, “to exist,” or “have at one’s disposal” (BDAG). The use of this verb does not mean Peter is denying money even exists to him, rather, he is saying he does not have any. There is no money present at his disposal. Thus the translation, “I have no silver and gold.”

“In the name of Jesus Christ.” This phrase means, in essence, “by the authority of Jesus Christ.” It is a cultural phrase that refers to the authority a person has due to his relationship with the one being named, who in this case is Jesus Christ.

Because of the patron-client society of the biblical cultures, including the Greek and Roman cultures, “who you knew” was extremely important in day-to-day life. Personally knowing a socially powerful and well-connected person had all kinds of advantages. For example, if a person was in need or in trouble, he could use the name of his powerful friend to gain favor and influence. It was actually that very custom that led rulers such as Solomon to acquire hundreds of wives and concubines (Solomon himself had 700 wives and 300 concubines; 1 Kings 11:3). Families would encourage the marriage of a daughter to a ruler because they knew that they would then have a valuable social connection, and even have the potential of having the next ruler or powerful person in the kingdom come from the family.

In the Roman society, the patron-client relationship was very important and often somewhat formalized. The patron supported the client with influence and often money as well, and the client looked out for his patron’s interests and watched for ways to spread his influence, acted as “eyes and ears” for him, and might accompany him from place to place as a vocal supporter and bodyguard.

Legal trouble was one kind of trouble that knowing a powerful person could help with. In our modern times, we like to think that “the rule of law” provides protection to the innocent, and the courts are only interested in who is “right” according to the law of the land. In biblical times judgment was much more arbitrary, and often the judges did what was expedient for themselves without much attention to the guilt or innocence of the parties involved. This shows up throughout the Bible, which is why the Bible is so explicit about bribery. Paul spent two years in a Roman prison in Caesarea because the governor wanted a bribe (Acts 24:26). Also, in the “Parable of the Persistent Widow,” the judge “neither feared God nor cared about men” (Luke 18:1-8), and the widow had to beg for justice over and over. The judge finally judged the case, but for his own good, not hers. So it was that in biblical law courts, whether Eastern (Israel, Syria, Egypt, etc.) or Western (Greece, Rome), having the influence of a powerful person in the courtroom could win the case.
In Christian culture, “the name of Jesus Christ” gave the user authority, just as using the name of any other ruler or great person would give the one who used it authority. It is important to realize that “the name of Jesus Christ” is not a “formula,” that is, it is not like a “magic formula” that has to be said at the right time in the right order with the right emphasis or it won’t work. There is no magic behind the words, “the name of Jesus Christ.” The name represents authority only because the one being named, Jesus Christ, exists and has authority, and also the one using the name has an actual relationship with the one whose name he is using. This is very clear from the culture. If a person tried to get out of trouble by using a name he invented, he would not have any authority. The person has to exist and genuinely be a powerful person. Similarly, if someone used the name of a powerful person, but had no relationship with the person, the “name” would not work, in fact, he would be in serious trouble for using it. We see that exact scenario in Acts 19:13-16 when some exorcists who were not Christian tried to use the name of Jesus Christ to gain authority over demons because they knew about Paul using it, and the demon hurt them badly.
The proof that “the name of Jesus Christ” is not some kind of formula is in the Bible itself. As we saw above, using the name of Jesus without a relationship with Jesus does not work, and can even by harmful. In contrast, if a person has a relationship with Jesus Christ, then although “the name of Jesus Christ” can be used, sometimes it is not necessary to speak the name out loud. The simple fact that the person has a relationship with Jesus is enough. Thus, in Acts, sometimes we see the name of Jesus Christ being used, and sometimes not. Peter said to the lame man, “In the name of Jesus Christ, rise up and walk,” and he did (Acts 3:6). But in Acts 9:40, Peter raised the dead by just saying, “Tabitha, get up!” Similarly, in Acts 16:18, when Paul was delivering a woman from a demon, he said, “In the name of Jesus Christ come out of her,” and the demon came out, but Paul healed a lame man in Lystra by just saying, “Stand up on your feet” (Acts 14:10).
The idea of authority is also present when Christians baptize people “in the name of Jesus Christ.” For example, if a minister says, “I baptize you in the name of Jesus Christ,” he means that it is in his authority as a minister of Christ that he can baptize. When Peter told the people to be baptized “in the name of Jesus Christ” (Acts 2:38), he meant that the people would be baptized by those people using the authority of Jesus Christ. Jesus had authorized his disciples to baptize people (John 4:1, 2), and his disciples still had his authority to baptize people.
3:13. “Servant Jesus.” Jesus was the great servant of God, as the prophets had declared.
The greatest of these declarations are the “Servant Songs” of Isaiah. Isaiah presents the Messiah as the “servant” of God and foretells much of what he will do. The servant songs in Isaiah do not have definitive “stop” verses, so scholars differ as to when they end but our studies lead us to conclude that the four songs are: Isaiah 42:1-7; 49:1-7; 50:4-11, and 52:13-53:12. The most famous Servant Song is Isaiah 52:13-53:12, and it describes the torture, death, burial, and resurrection of Christ. Isaiah 52:13 begins, “Behold, my servant,” and tells how Jesus will bear our sins and sicknesses.
A verse that ties the role of the Servant foretold in Old Testament prophecy with Jesus Christ in his ministry is when he quoted Isaiah 42:1 concerning himself: “Here is my servant whom I have chosen…I will put my spirit on him” (Matt. 12:18). It is clear that when the disciples prayed to God and referred to Jesus as “your holy servant Jesus, whom you anointed” (Acts 4:27), they were making a reference to the prophecy in Isaiah 42:1. This is confirmed by the fact that in the very next verse the prayer continues that the rulers gathered against Jesus: “to do whatever your hand and your council decided beforehand would happen.” Of course, people knew what God has planned beforehand for the Messiah because it is clearly laid out in the Servant Songs, especially Isaiah 52:13-53:12.

Acts


Both Hebrew and Greek have several different words that can mean “servant.” Here in Acts 3:13 the word translated “Servant” in most versions, but “Son” in the KJV, is παῖς (παῖς), and it has a range of meanings that include an infant; a boy or girl child (depending on the gender of the noun); a servant; a slave; or an attendant or minister, such as a king or lord might have. The exact meaning was determined by the context. In this case, the clear reference in Acts to the Servant Songs of Isaiah shows us that “servant” is the proper translation of παῖς in Acts.

Here in Acts 3:13 the context of παῖς is the suffering and subsequent glorification of Jesus, clearly a subject to the Servant Songs, and not something the Jews would readily identify with the “Son.” R. C. H. Lenski writes: “Pais is never used in the sense of “Son of God;” that thought is always expressed by huios theou.” Simon Kistemaker (New Testament Commentary: Acts), writes: “God has glorified Jesus, whom Peter deliberately calls “servant” to remind his listeners of Isaiah’s prophecy concerning the suffering and glory of the Lord’s servant (Isa. 52:13-53:12). They should know that Jesus fulfilled this messianic prophecy (cp. Matt. 12:18).” Actually, the fact that Peter deliberately called Jesus the “servant” is even clearer than Kistemaker says, because Peter had everyone’s attention due to the fact that he had just healed a man who was over 40 years old. The prophecy in Isaiah included the suffering of Jesus, but it also specifically said that we are healed through his wounds—and here was living proof the prophecy was correct! We should also note that the majority of the modern translations read “servant.”

3:15. “out from among the dead.” See Romans 4:24. Wuest: “out from among those who are dead.”

3:21. “restoration of all things.” Peter is speaking of the Messianic Age, when the heavens and earth will be restored to an Edenic state. Jesus called this the “New Beginning” (see commentary on Matthew 19:28 and Matthew 5:5).

3:21. “from ancient times.” The Greek reads apo aiōn, more literally, “from the ages,” but it means “throughout the ages” or more understandably, “from ancient times.” The rendering in some versions, “from the beginning,” is not clear, especially in light of the Old Testament. The restoration of all things, which will occur when Christ comes back and conquers the earth and begins the Messianic Age (Millennial Kingdom), was implied but not clearly laid out in Scripture until after the times of Moses, which is why the Sadducees did not even believe in a resurrection, much less a restoration of Eden. In fact, in Acts 3:24, Peter clarifies that it is from the time of Samuel that the prophets have clearly spoken of these things. [For the comparison of the Millennial Kingdom and Eden, see commentary on Luke 23:43].

3:22. Quoted from Deuteronomy 18:15.

3:23. Quoted from Deuteronomy 18:19.

3:24. “Samuel.” Although the resurrection and Millennial Kingdom was implied in the books of Moses and Joshua, it was not clearly taught in those Scriptures. It was certainly known about, because Job, a contemporary of Abraham, knew about it (Job 19:25-27). Furthermore, Hebrew 11 tells us that people living before the time of Samuel and David knew about it, people such as Abraham, Joseph, and Moses. Nevertheless, it was during the time of Samuel and David when the restoration of the earth was more clearly taught (cp. Ps. 37:9-11, 22, 29, 34), and then as time progressed the prophecies became clearer and clearer. For example, Ezekiel 37 clearly teaches about the resurrection of the dead and their return to the land of Israel (Ezek. 37:11-14).

Chapter 4

4:1. “commander.” The Greek word is stratēgos (#4755 στρατηγός), in the singular form, and the “commander of the temple” was the top commander of the Temple police. In the Jewish writings he is called, “the man of the Temple Mount.” The Temple police were a large number of hand-picked Levites who kept order at the Temple. They had the power to arrest people, which is what they were sent to do to Jesus but were unable to do (John 7:30, 32, 45).

At night the Temple police were placed in twenty-four stations around the Temple and its compound. Twenty-one of the stations were occupied by Levites, while three were occupied by both Levites and priests. There were ten men at each station except for the three innermost to the Sanctuary, which had ten Levites and ten priests. Thus, there were 240 Levites and thirty priests on guard in the Temple every night. [For more on the Temple police, see commentary on Luke 22:4].

4:2. “out from among the dead.” See Romans 4:24. Wuest: “from among the dead.”
4:7. “in the midst.” The Greek word is mesos (#3319 μέσος), and means midst or middle. Acts is historically accurate in this description, for the Sanhedrin met in a semicircle on a raised semicircular platform so that all the members could see one another, while the accused stood on a lower level, but clearly “in the midst” of them.

“By what power or in what name.” Annas, Caiaphas, and the rest of the Sanhedrin knew that a miracle had been done. While it was proper according to the law to use the name of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Solomon, or some other well-accepted names to appropriate the power or authority of God, it was against Jewish law to use magic. The point of their “investigation” was to discover if the apostles had done the miracle by magic and thus broken any laws, at which point they could imprison them or even perhaps kill them. However, no specific regulation apparently existed concerning the name of Jesus, and the miracle was a great one and well known to all the people of Jerusalem (v. 16), so they felt that all they could do was threaten them not to use “this name” any more (v. 18). We Christians need to realize that there is great power in using the name of Jesus Christ when we walk by revelation and faith.

4:8. “holy spirit.” There is no definite article. This holy spirit is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”].
4:10. “in the name of Jesus Christ.” This phrase means, in essence, “by the authority of Jesus Christ.” It is a cultural phrase that refers to the authority a person has due to his relationship with the one being named, who in this case is Jesus Christ. In Christian culture, “the name of Jesus Christ” gave the user authority, just as using the name of any other ruler or great person would give the one who used it authority. [For more on the name of Jesus Christ, see commentary on Acts 3:6].

“out from among the dead.” See Romans 4:24. Wuest: “out from among those who are dead.”

4:11. Quoted from Psalm 118:22.

“rejected.” From exoutheneō (#1848 ἐξουθενέω), See commentary on 1 Thessalonians 5:20.

4:13. “uneducated.” Greek is agrammatos, (#62 ἀγράμματος). “Illiterate, without learning: (i.e. unversed in the learning of the Jewish schools)” (Thayer). This does not refer to having no education. It means that the apostles had not gone to the schools for “higher education,” i.e., in Rabbinic training.

“ordinary.” The Greek word idiotēs (#2399 ιδιώτης), a word “very common in Greek writings from Herodotus down; properly, a private person, opposed to a magistrate, ruler, king.” (Thayer). They held no public office, were not of a noble class, etc. They were regular people. They did not do a miracle because they had special rank or privilege.

4:24. “Master.” The Greek is despotēs (#1203 δεσπότης) and means master or lord, and it refers to someone who has legal control and authority over others, such as subjects or slaves (cp. 1 Tim. 6:1; Titus 2:9). It is used both as a title for God (Luke 2:29; Acts 4:24), and a title for Jesus Christ (2 Pet. 2:1; Jude 1:4). See commentary on Luke 2:29.

4:25. Quoted from Psalm 2:1.

“through holy spirit.” This is God (cp. v. 24) energizing David through His gift of holy spirit. In the Old Testament, when God wanted people to speak for Him, He put His spirit (His gift) upon them and gave them revelation via that gift of holy spirit. David had the spirit of God upon him (1 Sam. 16:13), and God energized David through that spirit. (Cp. commentary Matt. 22:43; Mark 12:36; and Acts 1:16). [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.]

“Peoples.” This refers to the tribes of the People of Israel. See commentary on Matthew 2:5.

4:26. “The kings of the earth took their stand…” The quotation continues from Psalm 2, and is of 2:2.

4:31. “filled with holy spirit.” This holy spirit is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.]

4:32. “And the multitude.” This verse begins a new topic, which includes the death of Ananias and Sapphira, and actually this verse should have been 5:1. The Ananias and Sapphira record would generally be better understood if people saw that what it involves begins in Acts 4:32 with the Christians being of one heart and one mind, and sharing their possessions. See commentary on Acts 5:5.

“soul.” The Greek word often translated “soul” is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoo-kay’), and it has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person.
or animal; an individual person; or attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. Here it refers to the thoughts, feelings, and emotions of the person himself. All of the believers had the same attitude and feelings about their material possessions. [For a more complete explanation of “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’”]

“had all things in common.” It has been said that this was the first example of communism. It is truly much more noble than that because it was for a much higher purpose than political stability, a political system, or a humane society that was egalitarian. The sharing was not to produce “equality” of what was owned, but to make sure that everyone in the Christian community had what they needed so they could focus on God and the things of God, especially evangelism. This communal sharing was not to redistribute wealth so everyone could have a good time in life. Verse 34 indicates that those who owned lands or houses sold them. The Expositor’s Greek Testament notes that, “The language shows that we are not meant to infer that the men sold all that they had.” In other words, people did not give away everything and then share and share alike. They gave their plurality to those who needed things to survive. A.T. Robertson (Word Studies) notes that this giving occurred over a period of time and was based on need. As the need arose something would be sold to fill that need by way of the apostles’ distribution.

Chapter 5

5:3. “How is it.” The Greek is the idiomatic phrase, dia ti, which can often mean “why?” However, in this case Peter is not asking “Ananias, ‘why’ has Satan filled your heart?” That would be asking what motivated Satan to fill your heart, and the answer would be: “For the same reason Satan does everything he does: to steal, kill, and destroy” (John 10:10). This question is deeper. Peter likely did not realize Ananias would drop dead; and the question is: “How is it that the Adversary has filled your heart?” In other words, what did you think about, wish for, want, and covet, that gave Satan such a foothold in your life? The question, quickly made rhetorical by Ananias’ death, should not be rhetorical to us. We are responsible to guard our minds and lives against the work of the Adversary.

“the Adversary.” The Greek word for Adversary is Satanas (#4567 Σάτανᾶς), which has been transliterated into “Satan” in most versions. This causes the meaning of the word, which is important, to be lost. For more information on it, see the note on Mark 1:13. For information on the names of the Devil, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”.

“the Holy Spirit.” “The Holy Spirit” is the name for God that emphasizes His power in operation. God is called “the Holy Spirit” in a number of verses in the NT, including Matthew 1:20; 12:32; and Hebrews 9:8. [For more information on the uses of “Holy Spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”]

5:4. “unsold.” Cp. Robertson and ESV; NIV; NASB; NRSV; NET; NAB. Although there is no Greek word for unsold, this is clearly the meaning. The literal reading is, “remaining for you did it not remain?” The NASB, like the REV, puts “unsold” in italics, “While it remained unsold, did it not remain your own?”

“contrived.” The Greek word is tithemi (#5087 τίθημι), and means, “to set, put, or place; to make or to make (or set) for one’s self or for one’s use; to set, fix, establish.” Although many versions have “conceived,” Lenski points out that this is not broad enough, and it is more than conceive, it is to think through the entire process. The argument could be made that the translation could be “put,” or “placed,” with the idea that the plan was not started in the heart but “placed” there as it developed, but it makes more sense that the idea was both conceived and planned in the evil hearts of Ananias and Sapphira.

5:5. “fell down and breathed out his last breath.” When Ananias heard Peter’s rebuke, he fell down dead. Why? To get the fullness of this, it helps if we read the whole record. The context of the Ananias and Sapphira record begins in Acts 4:32 with the Christians being on one heart and one mind, and sharing their possessions, and in fact a good argument could be made for the fact that the whole Ananias record would be better understood if the Acts 5:1 was where Acts 4:32 is now.

Many people assume God killed Ananias because of his sin, but the Bible never says that. The Bible is full of sinners who God does not kill, so why would He kill Ananias and Sapphira? After all, basically all they did was lie. They sold a piece of land for an amount of money, then told the Apostles they had sold it for less than they actually sold it for, and they did that so they could keep part of the money. But the money was theirs to keep if they wanted; they were under no obligation to give any of their money to the apostles. Their sin was to lie about the amount they gave. Frankly, this sin probably happens almost every Sunday in our churches: people say they tithe (give 10%), when actually they give less than the tithe. Yet we do not see Christians dying in churches every weekend.

The Bible never says God killed Ananias and Sapphira, so how did they die? Although it is possible that they both died of heart attacks from the shock of being publicly discovered and reproved, that is not likely. What almost certainly happened is that Satan killed them. That would be consistent with the scope of Scripture. Hebrews 2:14 says that Satan holds the power of death (Heb. 2:14). Furthermore, Scripture says Satan controls this fallen world (1 John 5:19), and that he has authority over the world (Luke 4:6).

It is precisely because Satan controls the world that it is such a dangerous, heartless place. If God controlled the world, it would be a wonderful place. The world reflects the nature of the one who controls it. Before the Fall of Adam and Eve, the world was a wonderful and safe place because God was in control. After the Fall, when Satan became “the god of this world” (2 Cor. 4:4) and the “ruler of the authority of the air” (Eph. 2:2), the world became a difficult place to live. For example, animals became dangerous and plants developed thorns. After Jesus Christ conquers the world in the Battle of Armageddon and controls it, and Satan is no longer in control, the world will return to being a wonderful and safe place (Isa. 11:1-9; see commentary on Matt. 5:5, the meek will inherit the earth).

The Bible shows that when demons get into the mind or body of a person, there are times when they exert a lot of power over that person. They can cause physical diseases such as epilepsy (Matt. 17:15), muteness (Matt. 9:33), or deformities (Luke 13:11). They can occupy the mind and feed it information (Acts 16:16; this is how psychics and false prophets operate). They can also produce wild behavior and insanity (Mark 5:1-15). What happened to Judas is in some ways close to what happened to Ananias. When Satan entered into the heart of Judas, he betrayed Jesus and later killed himself (Luke 22:3, 4; John 13:2).
The Bible does not tell us every detail about the Devil and his demons, but it tells us enough that we can surmise what happened to Ananias and Sapphira. Just as a demon can cause disease and cripple the body, a demon can shut down organs and produce death. There is evidence in the Old Testament that there is a demon of death. The Hebrew word “death” in Isaiah 28:15 and 18, and Jeremiah 9:21, is maveth (4194), and it is personified, as if it was a living being, a demon. The Holman Christian Standard Bible handles the personification very well by having “Death” with a capital “D.” Furthermore, Proverbs 16:14 mentions an angel of death, and Revelation 6:8 mentions a demon named “Death.” These verses, in combination with the New Testament statement that the Devil holds the power of death, are good evidence that there is a demon of death. Still further evidence for a demon of death is that lots of ancient mythologies had a “god” of death, and in Ugaritic mythology there is a “god” of death that had a similar name to maveth. In studying Isaiah and Jeremiah, we see they are an example of the word “death” referring to the natural event, death, and also the demon that often causes it.

In reading Acts 5 in light of the scope of Scripture about the Devil and demons, we can see that Satan killed Ananias and Sapphira, and his reason for killing them, and his timing, could not have been better to fulfill his purposes. The Church had been growing consistently since the Day of Pentecost, when about three thousand people got saved (Acts 2:41). A couple thousand more were added by Acts 4:4. Satan was no doubt very upset about the spread of the Gospel, and looked for a way to stop it. That opportunity presented itself when Ananias and Sapphira, who had allowed Satan into their hearts and had plotted together to lie about their gift to the Church, went in to see Peter.

What Peter spoke by revelation when he spoke to Ananias is a very important key to knowing what happened to Ananias and Sapphira. First, we must remember that the only way Peter knew Ananias lied and kept part of the money for himself was by direct revelation from God. He had no other way to know Ananias was lying. Second, we need to notice that Peter said, “Why has Satan filled your heart...?” Like Judas, Ananias was demonized, “possessed,” by a demon, and Satan took advantage of the opportunity and killed Ananias. Why would Satan do that? The results speak for themselves.

If newspapers existed at the time of Christ, we can imagine the headline in the Jerusalem Gazette the next morning: “Cult leader kills faithful followers after they donate their life savings!” Remember, everyone thought Ananias and Sapphira gave all the money they had from the sale of their land; no one knew they were hiding part of the profit. Furthermore, medical forensics were not very developed in those days. All people knew was that Ananias, and later Sapphira, went to see Peter and other Church leaders to give them a lot of money, and then turned up dead later that day.

The result of the death of Ananias and Sapphira was immediate and profound. The Word of God had been spreading rapidly since the Day of Pentecost, but now, “great fear came upon the whole Church and upon all those who heard these things” (5:11), and “no one dared join himself to them” (5:13). The word “fear” in the Greek can mean either “fear” or “respect, awe,” and here it likely means both. Faithful Christians who believed what the Apostles said, that Ananias had lied about his gift to the Church and had “just dropped dead” were filled with awe, while borderline Christians and unbelievers were filled with genuine fear, which is why no one else dared to join the Christians. Thus the spread of the Gospel in Jerusalem was stopped—at least for a while.
The paragraph structure in most versions of Acts, and the paragraph headings that many versions have to help the reader understand the Bible, are misplaced in Acts 5, and actually make the Bible harder to understand. Most Bibles start a new paragraph with Acts 5:12, and in doing so break away Acts 5:12 and 13 from the record of Ananias and Sapphira. But verses 12 and 13 are not a new subject; they are the conclusion of the Ananias and Sapphira record. Bibles that have paragraph headings make the division in the record even worse. For example, the NIV has a break before verse 12, with a paragraph heading that reads, “The Apostles Heal Many.” The ESV, NET, NKJV, and most other English versions make their paragraph break in the same place, and also add a paragraph heading that makes a clear split between verses 11 and 12.

The result of the paragraph break and the paragraph title is that almost no one connects verses 12 and 13 with the death of Ananias and Sapphira. Almost no one connects their death with the fact that the Church stopped growing for a time. However, there is no reason to separate Acts 5:12 and 13 from the Ananias and Sapphira story except the tradition that breaks the paragraph in that place. Nothing in the Greek text dictates a split between verses 11 and 12, and the context dictates that the new paragraph should start with verse 14, not verse 12.

If we put break in this section after verse 13, the effect that the death of Ananias and Sapphira had on the spread of the Gospel becomes much clearer. Also, we can more clearly see how the Apostles continued to showcase the power of the Gospel in spite of the setback. Here’s the progression: in verse 10, Sapphira died. In verse 11, great “fear” came upon the people—both Christian and non-Christian. In verse 12, the Apostles countered the Adversary’s attack by gathering the Church together in the Temple and doing signs and wonders. In verse 13 we learn the unbelievers were still fearful and would not join the Christians, but they saw the miracles and held them in high regard. The Bible does not say how long there was a pause in the growth of the Church, but by verse 14 we see that the people’s fear subsided and the church was expanding again. With the death of Ananias and Sapphira and the temporary pause in the growth of the Church, the peaceful “honeymoon period” that the Church had enjoyed since it began on the Day of Pentecost was over. The Church was in a spiritual and physical war. Soon after Satan killed Ananias and Sapphira to stop the move of the Word, the High Priest, the one who had had Jesus executed, put the Apostles in prison (Acts 5:17–42). Although the Apostles were released from prison, they were publicly whipped, a harsh action that would have caused more timid Jews not to join the Church. By Acts 6, there was a division in the Church over the distribution of goods that came to the Church. In Acts 7 and 8, Stephen, one of the leaders of the Church, was stoned to death. In Acts 9 there was a “great persecution” against the Church. And the controversies and persecution of Christians has never stopped since that early time.

5:9. “See!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

5:10. “breathed out her last breath.” See commentary on 5:5; “fell down and breathed out his last breath.”

5:20. “all the words.” The full message. The Apostles were not to reduce the message to what was acceptable and what might keep them out of trouble. They were to speak “all the word,” that is, the whole message.
“of this life.” The context of the angel’s message is clear. The Apostles were telling about the new and everlasting life a person could have through Jesus Christ when they were arrested, and now the angel tells them to proclaim the full message “of this life,” that is, of the life they had been talking about that got them into trouble in the first place. That the word “life” is sometimes used for “life in the Age to Come” or “everlasting life,” see commentary on John 5:40.

5:25. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

5:28. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

“strictly command you.” The Greek represents the phrase “strictly command you” by the figure of speech polyptoton: “command you with a command.”

5:30. “Tree.” The Greek word is xulon (#3586 ξύλον pronounced zoo'-lon) and it means a tree, log, a piece of timber (1 Cor. 3:12), a piece of wood (Rev. 18:12), or something made from wood such as a beam, a cross, a club (Mark 14:48), or even the stocks that Paul’s feet were placed in (Acts 16:24). Since Jesus carried his cross for a distance, then it was given to Simon of Cyrene, the translation “tree” is not exactly correct, since Jesus did not carry a tree. This has caused some translators to use the word “cross” (Darby, NASB; NIV11). However, xulon can mean “tree,” and Peter was making a point to the religious leaders that they had taken the Messiah and hanged him on a “tree” as if he was accursed of God, since the Law said that anyone who was hanged on a tree was accursed (Deut. 21:23). Thus we can assume that Peter used “tree” deliberately, to heighten the sense of evil committed by the religious leaders. For what we know about the shape of the wood Jesus was crucified on, see commentary on John 19:17, “cross.”

5:31. “He is the one.” This is emphatic in the Greek; the sentence starts with “This one.” It is less wordy to say, “God exalted him,” but it loses the emphasis of the Greek text.

5:32. “the holy spirit that God has given.” Refers to the gift of holy spirit poured out on the Day of Pentecost. [For more information on the uses of “Holy Spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.]

5:34. “People.” The Jews were referred to as “the People.” See commentary on Matthew 2:5.

5:35. “consider carefully.” Cp. NIV; NRSV. Literally, the phrase is “pay close attention to yourselves”, “take care to yourselves,” but the meaning is “consider carefully” what you are going to do.

Chapter 6
6:5. “and of holy spirit.” This refers to God’s gift of holy spirit. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.

6:7. “And the word of God increased.” The primary meaning of this phrase is that the Word of God continued to spread as more and more people got saved. However, it also almost certainly includes the increase, or growth, of the Word of God in the believers as they kept on growing spiritually.

“of the priests.” The majority of the priests in Jerusalem were Sadducees, and the Sadducees traditionally believed that there was no resurrection from the dead (see commentary on Matthew 22:23). For them to go from believing that there was no resurrection to believing in the resurrection of Christ and then, of course, to believing they would be themselves resurrected, was a huge shift. The Word of God makes no statement about the impact that converting a large number of the priests to the faith had on the Temple services there in Jerusalem, or even whether or not some of them quit working in the Temple or were forced to leave.

6:13. “Place” is capitalized (and in v. 14) because it is a designation of the Temple. The word “place” was a designation of the Temple. See commentary on topos in Matthew 24:15.

6:15. “the face of an angel.” There are times when the passage of time and different cultural norms affect the way we think about the Bible. In the Western world in modern times, when we think about someone “being an angel” or “looking like an angel,” we think of soft, pleasant smiles, kind eyes, and an innocent looking face. Thus, when we think of Stephen, about to die, having “the face of an angel,” we think of an innocent, pleasant face gazing up into heaven. This is not, however, what someone from the culture of the first century would think. Angels appear many times in the Bible, and are never portrayed with pleasant, innocent faces. John Calvin, writing around 1550, pointed out that people who were condemned on court usually became pale, stammered, and showed signs of fear, but “Luke teacheth that there was no such thing in Stephen, but that there appeared rather in him a certain majesty” (Calvin’s Commentaries, Acts 6:15).

When angels appear to man, they either blend into mankind so well they are unnoticed (Gen. 19; Lot and the angels), or they inspire awe and even fear in those who see them. Samson’s mother was told by an angel she would have a son, but she did not know she was speaking to an angel. She thought she was speaking to a man of God, but she reported the incident to her husband, saying, “A man of God hath come unto me, and his appearance is as the appearance of a messenger of God, very fearful…” (Judges 13:6 Young’s Literal Translation). We would not say “fearful,” we would say, “causing fear.” The modern translations usually say something such as “awesome” or “awe inspiring.” When the angel appeared to Cornelius, he became afraid even though he was a Roman centurion trained to look death in the face without fear (Acts 10:4). Psalm 103:20 refers to angels as “mighty ones,” and no doubt the expression of their face reflects their power. They are often portrayed as being God’s warrior’s, ready to fight for Him (Num. 22:31; 2 Sam. 24:16; 2 Kings 19:35; Ps. 35:5, Dan. 6:22). When they do appear to people, they often cause them to be afraid, and have to calm them down, usually by saying “Fear not” (Matt. 28:5; Luke 1:13, 30; 2:10).

From what we know of angels, Stephen’s face would have reflected the majesty that Calvin pointed out, and supernaturally radiated with power, determination, resolute confidence—an awe inspiring sight.
Chapter 7

7:3. Quoted from Genesis 12:1.
7:5. Quoted from Genesis 17:8.
7:6. 7. Quoted from Genesis 15:13, 14.
7:14. “seventy-five.” Stephen was disputing with Jews who were part of the diaspora, the Jews who had been dispersed over the Mediterranean world. They were from Cyrene in North Africa, Alexandria Egypt (where the Septuagint was translated), Cilicia, a Roman province in what is southeast Turkey today, and Asia, the Roman province on the far west end of what is Turkey today (Acts 6:9). Because these Jews were part of the diaspora, their “Bible” would have been the Septuagint, and Stephen accommodated their beliefs by quoting from the Septuagint when he spoke. So, for example, the Septuagint says that 75 people of Jacob’s family went to Egypt, while the Hebrew text says 70 people went to Egypt. For more on the Septuagint and the original text of the New Testament being in Greek, see commentary on Luke 3:4.

7:33, 34. Quoted from Exodus 3:5, 7, 10.
7:37. Quoted from Deuteronomy 18:15.
7:38. “words.” The Greek word is logion (#3051 λόγιον; pronounced log’-ee-on), and it is the diminutive of logos, “word” or “message.” Literally, it is “little words.” We can see why the Bible uses the word logion for communications from God, because the Greeks used logion for the divine utterances of the oracles, particularly the Oracle of Delphi. The reason for that was that the messages from the oracles were typically short. Thus in time, logion was used of the communications that come from the gods. We felt the translation “oracle” was too obscure for our English translation, although it occurs in many English Bibles, because the English word “oracle” has many meanings that do not apply. We went with “words” because it accurately represents that it is the words coming from God, and whereas the “word” of God means His entire communication, “words” of God can refer to smaller pieces of His revelation. The word occurs 4 times in the New Testament: Acts 7:38; Romans 3:2; Hebrews 5:12, and 1 Peter 4:11.
7:40. Quoted from Exodus 32:1.
7:42. Quoted from Amos 5:25-27.
7:43. Quoted from Amos 5:25-27.

“worship.” See commentary on Matthew 2:2.
7:45. “Joshua.” Joshua brought the Israelites into the Promised Land. The King James Version makes this verse a little hard to understand because it says “Jesus” was the one who brought the Israelites into the Promised Land. This is a case of mistranslation. The name “Jesus” and the name “Joshua” are the same in Hebrew and Greek, even though they are different in English. On two occasions the translators of the KJV put “Jesus” when they should have put “Joshua,” and Acts 7:45 is one of them. This point is well established by William Barclay, a professor and author at Trinity College in Glasgow. He writes:
To us the name Jesus is a holy and sacred name, and we would count it almost blasphemy to give it to any child or call any person by it. But in New Testament times it was one of the commonest of names. It is the Greek form by which three Hebrew Old Testament names are regularly represented—Joshua (e.g., Ex. 17:10); Jehoshua (e.g., Zech. 3:1); Jeshua (Neh. 7:7). There are indeed two occasions in the AV [the KJV] in which Joshua is very confusingly called “Jesus.” In Acts 7:45, we read that the fathers brought the tabernacle into the land of Palestine with Jesus. In Hebrews 4:8, it is said that if “Jesus” had been able to give the people rest, there would have been no need to speak of still another day. In both cases, “Jesus” is Joshua, a fact which is made clear in all the more modern translations. By the second century, the name “Jesus” was vanishing as an ordinary name. Amongst the Jews it vanished because it had become a hated name by which no Jew would call his son; and amongst the Christians it has vanished because it was too sacred for common use.

One of the easiest and most accessible keys to correct biblical interpretation is the context. Examine the context of Acts 7:45, and it becomes exceedingly clear that the verse is not speaking of Jesus.

“possession of the nations.” The “possession of the nations,” until Israel took it back from them, was the Promised Land, which we know as Israel today, although modern Israel is not nearly as large today as the land promised to Abraham.

7:49. Quoted from Isaiah 66:1.
7:50. Quoted from Isaiah 66:2.
7:51. “resist the Holy Spirit.” Here, Holy Spirit is referring to God. “The Holy Spirit” is the name for God that emphasizes His power in operation. God is called “the Holy Spirit” in a number of verses in the NT, including Matthew 1:20; 12:32; and Hebrews 9:8. [For more information on the uses of “Holy Spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit.’”]

7:53. “delivered.” The Greek word is diatagē (#1296 διαταγή), and it refers to the fact that the Law was given to the Jews by angels who were under the direction of God (cp. BDAG Greek-English lexicon). Although the Old Testament is clear that some of the Law, such as the Ten Commandments themselves, were given by God, the Jewish belief was that the Law came through angel intermediaries (cp. Heb. 2:2).

7:55. “saw the glory of God.” This verse, and there are many others like it, is a problem for Christians who have been taught that no one has ever seen God. The key to understanding what Stephen saw is realizing that God does come into concretion in a human form that we (and angels) can see and understand. He does this so that He can better relate to, and fellowship with, His creation. God created mankind so He could intimately fellowship with us, so it is reasonable and scriptural that He occasionally becomes visible and takes on human form to be intimate with His creation. There are Old Testament verses in which Yahweh appears in the form of a man, and those appearances continue in the New Testament. In fact, Scripture records a number of people to whom God appeared: Adam and Eve (they heard His footsteps, Gen. 3:8), Abraham (Gen. 12:7; 15:1; 17:1;18:1), Jacob (Gen. 28:13), Moses and the elders of Israel (Exod. 24:9-11), Samuel (1 Sam. 3:10), Solomon (two times: 1 Kings 3:5; 9:2; 11:5), Micaiah (1 Kings Acts 22:19-22), Isaiah (Isa. 6:1-5), Ezekiel (Ezek. 1:26-28), Amos (Amos 7:7), Daniel (Dan. 7:9-14), Stephen (Acts 7:56) and the Apostle John (Rev. 5:1-8). In contrast to many great men and women of God who saw God in a visible form, Jesus upbraided the unbelieving Jews by saying: “You have never heard his voice at any time, nor seen his form” (John 5:37).

Much of the confusion about the subject of God appearing as a man comes from John 1:18, which says, “no one has seen God at any time.” It is helpful to read the context to understand the verse. John 1:17 and 18 say: “For the law was given through Moses; grace and truth came through Jesus Christ. No one has ever seen God, the only begotten Son, who is at the Father’s side, has made him known.” In Don’t Blame God!, the language of that phrase is examined and explained. We write:

Please note that truth, in its fullness, came not with Moses, but with Jesus Christ. It was he who for the first time in history made God truly understandable. It is not that the Old Testament believers knew nothing of God, but rather that their knowledge and understanding of Him were quite limited (“veiled”). Since truth came by Jesus Christ (“For the law was given through Moses; grace and truth came through Jesus.”), we believe that the first part of John 1:18—“no man hath seen God at any time”—means that no man had “known” God (as He truly is) at any previous time. It is Jesus Christ who reveals, or makes known, God to man. In many languages, “to see” is a common idiom for “to know.” In the Hebrew language, one of the definitions for “see” (Hebrew = ra’ ah) is “see, so as to learn, to know.” Similarly, the Greek word translated “see” in verse 18 (horaō) can be “to see with the eyes” or “to see with the mind, to perceive, know.” Even in English, one of the definitions for “see” is “to know or understand.” For example, when two people are discussing something, one might say to the other, “I see what you mean.”

The usage of “see” as it pertains to knowing is found in many places in the New Testament. Jesus said to Philip, “Anyone who has seen me has seen the Father” (John 14:9). Here again the word “see” is used to indicate knowing. Anyone who knew Christ (not just those who “saw” him) would know the Father. In fact, Christ had made that plain two verses earlier when he said to Philip, “If you really knew me you would know my Father as well” (John 14:7) (Don’t Blame God! Spirit & Truth Fellowship, pp. 59,60).

Further evidence that “see” means “know” in John 1:18 is that the phrase “no man has seen God” is contrasted with the phrase “has made Him known.” So from the context and vocabulary in John 1:18, we can see that it is not talking about “seeing” God with one’s eyes; it is saying that the truth about God came by Jesus Christ. Before Jesus Christ came, no one really knew God as He truly is, a loving heavenly Father. We agree with the text note on John 1:18 in the NIV Study Bible, which says, “Since no human being can see God as He really is, those who saw God saw Him in a form He took on Himself temporarily for the occasion.”

The Bible also calls God “the invisible God.” This is true, because God’s natural state is invisible to us. However, that does not prevent Him from occasionally becoming visible. Angels and demons are also naturally invisible, but they become visible at certain times. If angels and demons can become visible, then God certainly can too.

It is often stated that the people could not have really seen God because a person will die if he sees God. This idea comes mainly from the conversation Moses had with God. Moses asked to see the glory of God, and God responded, “You cannot see my face, for no one may see me and live” (Exod. 33:20). It is clear from the context that the “face” of God was the “glory” of God, because that is what Moses asked to see. We agree that human beings are not equipped to comprehend God in all His fullness, and exposure to all that God is would be lethal. However, we know that God created mankind so He could fellowship with us, and we assert that the human-like form that He has sometimes assumes so we can relate to Him is not His fullness in any way.

It is important that we realize that when the Bible says that people saw God, they saw “God” and not Jesus Christ in some other form. There are two records that clearly show both God and Jesus at the same time; one record is in the Old Testament, and one is in the New Testament. The first of these two records is Daniel 7:9-14, in which “the Ancient of Days” is God and “the Son of Man” is Jesus Christ. The second record is in Revelation 4 and 5. Those two chapters portray God sitting on a throne surrounded by elders and other spiritual creatures, and He is holding a scroll in His right hand. Then “a Lamb,” which the context makes clear is Jesus Christ, approaches God and takes the scroll from Him. Records like this are very clear that God can and does occasionally take on the form of a human being, and it is clear He does that so we can better identify with Him.

Once we understand that God can and does take on a human form so that we can relate to Him, we can understand the passages that show God as if He were a man. We can also better understand what “heaven,” the place where God and angels live and demons go to accuse us (Rev. 12:10), may look like. We know that angels come into concretion like humans, and the Bible gives us a picture of “heaven” that contains a Tent of Meeting (“Tabernacle”), and also a throne room.

Our first glimpse of the heavenly throne room is in Exodus 24:10, when the elders of Israel climbed part way up Mt. Sinai, “and saw the God of Israel. Under his feet was something like a pavement made of sapphire, clear as the sky itself.” Here we see God in human form, and He has feet and a “hand” (24:11). The pavement of heaven is blue in color. We again see blue in Ezekiel 1:26, where it is the color of the throne of God. Also in Ezekiel, in the radiance around God, who is sitting on His throne, we see colors like those of a rainbow.

The blue pavement, with the great throne on it, must have looked like the “floor” of heaven to anyone who saw it in a vision. Jacob was one such person, who saw a great staircase going into heaven (not a “ladder” like a fireman’s ladder), with angels walking up and down it, some going down to earth and some going back up to heaven (Gen. 28:12). At the top of the staircase stood Yahweh, the God of Israel, who spoke to Jacob. God would have been standing on some kind of floor at the top of the staircase, and although the Bible does not give the color in Genesis, it would make sense that, if it appeared in Jacob’s dream vision, it was blue.

In Revelation 4 we again see God on the throne, and again we see the colors of a rainbow around Him (Rev. 4:3). In fact, Revelation 5:13 refers to God as “him who sits on the throne” letting us know that it was a common understanding that God would take on human form and sit on His throne. Revelation also clearly shows us that there is a temple in heaven (Rev. 11:19; 14:15, 17; 15:5-8; 16:1, and 17), and Hebrews 8:1-5 indicates that the Tent of Meeting (Tabernacle) and Temple on earth were made after the pattern of the Temple that already existed in heaven.

Having seen that God appears in human form, and also that the “picture” of heaven the Bible paints for us both in Old and New Testament is consistent, we are in a position to understand more about what likely happened in Acts 7:55 and 56. Stephen was being stoned by the religious Jews, and God gave him a revelation vision of the situation in heaven. Stephen saw God, surrounded by glory, and Jesus standing at His right hand, the way any oriental vizier would do. From that short vision, we get the idea that God, the Creator and One True God, was sitting on his throne, and Jesus Christ, to whom He had given “all authority,” was standing at His right hand. The text does not say, but we can bet the “floor” looked blue, and the throne was surrounded by the colors of the rainbow, as we saw in Exodus, Ezekiel, and Revelation.

There is much information wrapped up in Stephen’s vision. From a fleshly perspective it certainly looked like the Jews had the upper hand, but God shows that although sin and death are powerful now, God is the Power, and will have the last word. By his very presence in the vision, Jesus shows that the Devil’s “best punch,” which is death, has been overcome—he is alive, not dead. The vision was certainly an inspiration to Stephen, the first martyr of the Christian Church, and it should be an inspiration to us as well.

Also part of the vision was God’s love for His enemies, and His efforts to bring them to Himself. Although many in the audience seemed hardened beyond repentance, there was one man anyway whose heart was stirred. No one in the audience could doubt that the vision was real to Stephen, and therefore possibly a genuine reality, and if that were the case, then Jesus was not a dead imposter but the living Messiah. Sometime later, when Saul met Jesus face to face, he said, “Who are you, Lord?”

Another message of hope we should get from this record is that God will not always remain as distant as He now sometimes seems. The Bible tells of a time when “the dwelling of God is with men, and He will live with them. They will be his people, and God himself will be with them and be their God” (Rev. 21:3). The future will not be like today, when God is mostly invisible to us but rarely, oh so rarely, appears in a form we can relate to. In the future, God will dwell openly with us.

“full of holy spirit.” This refers to the holy spirit that is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.

7:56. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

7:59. “he was calling on the Lord and saying, “Lord Jesus.” To “call on” was a common prayer formula. Stephen was asking the Lord Jesus for help, as we all should. For more on the formula, “calling on,” see commentary on 1 Corinthians 1:2. [For more information on prayer to Jesus, see Appendix 15: “Can We Pray to Jesus?”.

“receive my spirit.” The Greek word for “spirit” is pneuma (#4151 πνεῦμα). Here “spirit” refers to the natural life of the body. Stephen was being stoned to death, and made a last cry to the Lord Jesus to receive his “life.” Although the vocabulary is different, this is in essence what Jesus said on the cross when he said to God, “into your hands I commit my spirit” (Matt. 27:50; Luke 23:46). Jesus would “accept” or “receive”
Stephen’s life in the sense that he would remember it and restore it at the resurrection. In that sense, Stephen’s life would be similar to the treasure we store up in heaven as we live for God (Matt. 6:20). There is no actual “treasure” in heaven being stored for us. Rather, saying that we store up treasures in heaven is a way of saying God remembers what we do and keeps an account, and we will be given treasure at the Judgment. Similarly, Stephen saying “receive my spirit” does not mean his “spirit” goes to the presence of Jesus and lives there. Rather, Stephen is asking Jesus to accept his life and remember it, and give Stephen life again in the resurrection. For more on “spirit” in this sense see the note on Luke 23:46.

7:60. “fell asleep.” Falling asleep or being asleep was a common biblical euphemism and metaphor for death. Note that the text says, “he” fell asleep. It is the person who dies, and he dies in every sense of the word; he is totally dead. The life in his body is gone, and his soul and spirit are both gone, they cease to exist. [For more on the dead being dead and not alive in any form, see Appendix 4: “The Dead are Dead”. For more on “soul” and that soul and spirit can cease to exist, see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’”].

Death is so horrible that we can understand why people use the euphemism and say “asleep” rather than “dead.” Although death is called “sleep,” the metaphor, like all metaphors, is imperfect. There are similarities, which is why “sleep” is used for death, but there are also big differences. We will examine the similarities first.

• Both death and sleep are overpowering forces. We cannot prevent our death, and we cannot help falling asleep when we are tired. Even if we try to force ourselves to stay awake, eventually sleep will overpower us.
• There is no awareness of time in either death or sleep. Time passes and we do not know it. Those who are dead and those who are asleep may have been so for a few minutes, a few hours, a few days, or many years, but they are not aware of the passing of time.
• No productive work can be done when we are dead or asleep. The Bible warns people not to be lazy and sleep instead of getting work done, and the dead do no work either.
• In both death and sleep there is a continuity of the person. We know that when a person falls asleep, he is the same person when he wakes up. The process of sleep did not change him into someone else. Similarly, the person who dies and is resurrected is the same person, which is why after the resurrection we will be repaid for what we did in this life. We see this in Jesus Christ. He was the same person after his resurrection as he was when he was alive on earth, he just had a different body and more capabilities.
• Both death and sleep come to an end. Our death ends when we are resurrected, just as our sleep ends when we wake up.

Now that we have seen the similarities between sleep and death that are the reason death was called “sleep,” we must keep in mind that the metaphor is not totally accurate: death is not sleep. In sleep, the person’s bodily functions continue, and he will wake up on his own when his body is rested. In death, the body, soul, and spirit are all dead. The person cannot wake up on his own but must await the resurrection power of God.

Sometimes people use the phrase “soul sleep.” That was a term that was popularized by John Calvin (1509-1564), who used it in a pejorative way, criticizing the belief. Calvin believed that the soul lived on after a person died. Due to the pejorative nature of the term “soul sleep,” people who believed the soul ceased to exist when the body died generally referred to their belief in other ways, including “materialism,” “conditional immortality,” and since the 1970’s, “Christian mortalism.” Some of the “greats” of Christianity believed the soul did not live on after a person died, including William Tyndale, John Wycliffe, and Martin Luther.

Not only was the term “soul sleep” pejorative, it is not accurate. The phrase “soul sleep” never occurs in the Bible. It is always the person, the individual, who sleeps, and he is said to be asleep because he is dead—every part of him. It is inaccurate to suggest that only the soul sleeps as if the rest of the person did not. [For more on the fact that when people die they are totally dead and awaiting a resurrection, see Appendix 4: “The Dead are Dead”].

Chapter 8

8:2. “deeply religious.” The Greek is eulabēs (εὐλαβής); see commentary on “godly man” in Acts 10:2.

8:5. “a city.” There is a textual variant that reads “the city,” rather than “a city.” This reading is portrayed by such versions as ESV, NASB, NRSV, KJV, and ASV. In this case “the city of Samaria” would not be referring to the city Samaria itself, because by New Testament times the city no longer went by that name; it had been called Sebaste since the time of Herod the Great (BDAG). All through the NT, Samaria refers to the district and not the town. So the understanding would be “the (main) city of Samaria” (Metzger, Textual Commentary; BDAG; NET translation note), which is how the NET translates the phrase.

We feel, however, that the original reading was most likely “a city” (cp. NIV, HCSB, NJB, YLT). As Kistemaker notes, “the historical context seems to favor a less important city, perhaps Shechem (or Sychar).” Shechem would have been the center of religious activity of Samaria, it is “here the magician Simon would most naturally establish himself” (Lenski). Given the fact that it was most likely not the “main” city of Samaria, and given the problems with the textual witnesses for the reading “the city” (“‘Aleph has the reading ‘Caesarea’ in place of ‘Samaria,’ and B has ‘Paul’ instead of ‘Phillip’ in v.6” [Lenski]), we have rendered the phrase “a city of Samaria.”

8:12. “in the name of Jesus Christ.” This phrase means, in essence, “by the authority of Jesus Christ.” It is a cultural phrase that refers to the authority a person has due to his relationship with the one being named, who in this case is Jesus Christ. In Christian culture, “the name of Jesus Christ” gave the user authority, just as using the name of any other ruler or great person would give the one who used it authority. [For more on the name of Jesus Christ, see commentary on Acts 3:6].

8:15. “receive holy spirit.” A section of Scripture that has caused people to think that someone may receive the holy spirit as a separate event after they are saved is Acts 8:14-17.

Acts 8:14-17 REV
14) Now when the apostles who were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received [dechomai] the word of God, they sent to them Peter and John,
15) who, when they had come down, prayed for them in order that they might receive [lambanō] holy spirit,
16) for as yet it was fallen upon none of them, they had only been baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus.
17) Then they laid their hands on them, and they received [lambanō] holy spirit.

These verses seem to say that the disciples in Samaria “received” the Word of God but had not received holy spirit. The reason for the confusion is that in most English versions two different Greek words are translated by the same English word, which hides the clearer meaning of the Greek text and causes the whole passage to be misunderstood. The two Greek words that need to be properly understood in the context of the gift of holy spirit are dechomai and lambanō. Both words have a wide range of meaning, and both can mean “receive.” However, there are some important differences. Lambanō has an emphasis on the action taken by the one receiving. Vine’s Dictionary of New Testament Words notes:

“There is a certain distinction between lambanō and dechomai (more pronounced in the earlier, classical use), in that in many instances lambanō suggests a self-prompted taking, whereas dechomai more frequently indicates “a welcoming or an appropriating reception”

“Self-prompted taking” is a key phrase, and in this context it refers to outwardly manifesting the gift of holy spirit that was already born on the inside. It is a sad fact that many Christians do not outwardly manifest holy spirit because they are waiting for God to move them when they should take hold of what God has already given them and use it. Thayer’s Greek-English Lexicon adds, “...the suggestion of self-prompted taking still adheres to lambanō in many connections ...in distinction from [dechomai being] a receiving of what is offered.”

Studying the uses of lambanō in connection with the gift of holy spirit shows us that when someone “receives” or “takes” the holy spirit, there is often a visible manifestation of it. The record in Acts 8 is a case in point. Under the ministry of Philip, many people in the city of Samaria were saved. This is quite clear because Acts 8:14 says they “had received the word of God.” However, the word “received” (“accepted” NIV) is dechomai. The people of Samaria had accepted the Word of the Lord and were saved, but there was something missing, there was still a “self-prompted taking” that had not occurred. The people were saved, but they had missed doing something, that is, “receiving” the gift of holy spirit into manifestation. However, we need to remember that since the gift of holy spirit can be received in the New Birth without any awareness on the part of the one who is saved, without an outward manifestation, it is completely possible to deny the reality of having inwardly received holy spirit at all.

Peter and John came to Samaria and ministered to the people who were saved and had “received” (dechomai) the gift of holy spirit, and when Peter and John personally ministered to them, then the Samaritans “received” [lambanō] the holy spirit, that is, they actively took the gift of God that was inside them and manifested it outwardly.

When the people of Samaria “received” [lambanō] the holy spirit, something visible in the senses world occurred, because Simon the sorcerer “saw” that the people “received,” and you cannot see when someone gets saved (Acts 8:18). In fact, Simon offered Peter and John money to buy the power to lay hands on people and have them “receive” [lambanō], outwardly manifest, holy spirit. This record in Acts 8 is similar to what happens in the lives of many Christians today. They are born again under the preaching ministry of one person, but they do not outwardly manifest holy spirit at that time. Then later, after being ministered to by someone else, they go ahead and “receive,” actively take and manifest holy spirit, often by speaking in tongues.

God’s gift of holy spirit is not something a person receives after he is saved. We Christians receive it when we are saved. No one has to earn holy spirit because, like salvation, it is a free gift (Acts 2:38; 10:45), not a reward for good works. We do not earn it, we do not have to pray for it to come into us, and we do not have to be “spiritually qualified” to receive it. It was God’s idea to give it to us as a free gift at the moment we are born again. However, as we have seen, it is possible to have the gift of holy spirit born inside and not “receive” (lambanō) it into manifestation, i.e., outwardly manifest it.

[For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.

8:17. “received holy spirit.” This refers to the holy spirit that is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.

8:19. “receives holy spirit.” This refers to the holy spirit that is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.

8:22. “Therefore, repent of this wickedness of yours, and pray to the Lord that the intent of your heart may be forgiven you.” Cp. F.F. Bruce’s translation: “So repent of this wickedness and pray to the Lord that the intent of you your heart may be forgiven” (see also HCSB). The Greek of this phrase has a condition, the sense of which most versions misunderstand entirely. It is often rendered as something like the NIV: “Repent of this wickedness and pray to the Lord. Perhaps he will forgive you for having such a thought in your heart”; or the NASB: “pray the Lord that, if possible, the intention of your heart may be forgiven you.” This gives the impression that God might not forgive Simon, or that it might not be possible for Simon to be forgiven. Neither is true. 1 John 1:9 affirms that “If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness.” There is no question as to if God will forgive. Scripture tells us he is faithful and just to do so. The question lies in whether Simon will perform the prerequisites for forgiveness. As Lenski has written, “The implication of this conditional form is not regarding the Lord’s willingness to remit but in regard to Simon’s contrition and begging as being necessary for enabling the Lord to extend remission. Unless Simon’s heart changes, he himself will prevent the Lord’s remission.” Likewise, Kistemaker writes, “This conditional statement relates not to God’s ability to forgive sin but to Simon’s willingness to repent.” In this case the doubt is not placed on God, but on whether or not Simon will fulfill his part.

Because of the great potential for misunderstanding, we have translated the sense of the conditional phrase, rather than to stick with a more literal rendering, “repent… and pray… if perhaps the intent of your heart will be forgiven you [depending upon whether you fulfill the conditions].”

8:27. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἴδον), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look”).

“worship.” See commentary on Matthew 2:2, “pay him homage.”

8:30. “heard him reading.” It was very common in ancient times to read to oneself out loud. This was due to the fact that the writing was all upper case letters with no punctuation, and not even spaces between the words. All the letters, line after line, were just in a string. Thus, Isaiah, which the Eunuch was reading, if it were English, would have looked like this:

HEWASLEDLIKEASHEEPTOTHESLAUGHTERANDASALAMMBBEFOREIT
SSHEARERSISSILENTSOHEIDIDNOTOPENHISMOUTH.

Reading out loud helped keep the eye and mind from being confused or losing the place, so as Philip approached the chariot, he could hear the eunuch reading.

8:32, 33. Quoted from Isaiah 53: 7, 8.

8:36. “See.” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

8:37. “And Philip said, “If you believe with all your heart, you may.” And he answered and said, “I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God.” This verse is not in the original Greek text. Metzger (Textual Commentary) writes:

Verse 37 is a Western addition…There is no reason why scribes should have omitted the material, if it had originally stood in the text…The formula…was doubtless used by the early church in baptismal ceremonies, and may have been written in the margin of a copy of Acts. Its insertion into the text seems to have been due to the feeling that Philip would not have baptized the Ethiopian without securing a confession of faith, which needed to be expressed in the narrative. Although the earliest known New Testament manuscript that contains the words dates from the sixth century, the tradition of the Ethiopian’s confession of faith in Christ was current as early as the latter part of the second century, for Irenaeus quotes part of it (Against Heresies, III.xii:8). Although the passage does not appear in the late medieval manuscript on which Erasmus chiefly depended for his edition, it stands in the margin of another, from which he inserted it into his text because he “judged that it had been omitted by the carelessness of scribes.”

8:39. “stepped up out of the water.” The words in many versions, “came up out of the water” (HCSB, ESV, NIV, NASB), do not make it clear that the verse is not referring to Philip and the Eunuch breaking the surface of the water of the Jordan, but rather to them walking out of the water and up the bank of the Jordan River after the baptism was completed. The Greek text reads anebēsan ek tou hudatos (ἀνέβησαν ἐκ τοῦ ὕδατος), and the word “ek” means “out of,” in the sense that they were getting “out of” the water, not standing in it. The water of the Jordan River was below the level of the bank, so in order to get into the river to perform the baptism, Philip and the Eunuch had to dismount the chariot, and they both “went down [the bank and] into the water” (v. 38). Then, after the baptism, they came up “out of” (ek) the water, which they did by stepping up onto the bank of the Jordan. If Philip and the Eunuch were standing waist deep in water, then they were not “out of” the water, but still in it.

The Greek word anabainō (#305 ἀναβαίνω) means “to go up,” “to come up,” and so saying that Philip and the Eunuch “came up” out of the water is very literal, but is too often misinterpreted to mean that they were both still in the Jordan River, so given the context, saying they “stepped up out of the water,” is a very acceptable translation, especially in light of the fact that it exactly describes what they did. Matthew 3:16 and Mark 1:10 speak of Jesus stepping up out of the Jordan River after his baptism (see commentary on those verses).

9:2. “the Way.” This was one of the earliest, if not the earliest, formal designations of the Christian Faith, and it is used in Acts 9:2, 19:9, 23; 22:4; 24:14, 22). Jesus had said he was “the Way,” so a follower of Jesus was a follower of “the Way;” also, since it was common to use the word “way” (the Hebrew word is derek) in the metaphorical sense of a way of life or way of doing things, scholars have postulated that “the Way” may be short for “the Way of Salvation” or “the Way of Life,” but there is no way to confirm that.

9:7. “hearing the sound of the voice.” There are three accounts in the book of Acts of Paul’s encounter with Jesus Christ on the road to Damascus (Acts 9:3-8; 22:6-10; 16:13-18). As they are translated in most English versions, the two accounts of Paul’s conversion in Acts 9 and Acts 22 contradict each other, because Acts 9:7 says the men with Paul heard the voice, but Acts 22:9 says they did not hear the voice. However, there is no contradiction between the two accounts, instead an apparent contradiction has been caused by not properly understanding and translating the Greek text. The Greek word akouo (#191 ἀκοοω) has a large semantic range, and can refer to both “hearing” a noise and also to “understanding” what one has heard.

Akouo can mean simply hearing the sound of something, as it does in Matthew 11:5, “the deaf hear.” This is how akouo is used in Acts 9:7; the men with Paul heard a sound. Akouo can also mean “understand,” as it does in 1 Corinthians 14:2, “For he who speaks in a tongue does not speak to men, but to God, for no man understands.” From reading and comparing the records in Acts 9 and 22, we discover that although the men with Paul “heard” something (Acts 9:7), they did not “understand” what they heard (Acts 22:9). Since the English translators translated akouo as “understand” in Corinthians, they knew it could mean “understand,” and had they translated it that way in Acts 22:9, English readers would not have to sort out the apparent contradiction the translators created. The truth of the situation would be readily apparent. The men with Paul “heard” something, but did not “understand” what was said.

It might be helpful for us to know that the semantic range of akouo is wider than just “hear” and “understand.” It can mean “learn” about something (cp. Matt. 14:13, “Now when Jesus heard it [that John had been executed], he withdrew from there”). It can mean to pay close attention to (cp. Matthew 17:5, “This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. Hear him”). Furthermore, akouo is sometimes used as a legal technical term for hearing in a judicial sense so as to be able to pass judgment (cp. Acts 25:22, “And Agrippa said to Festus, ‘I would also like to hear the man myself.’ ‘Tomorrow,’ he said, ‘you will hear him.’”).

9:10. “certain disciple.” The Greek is tis mathetes (τις μαθητης), “someone, a disciple;” or “a certain disciple.” The Word is making a very important point here. The Lord Jesus appeared in a vision to Ananias even though Ananias did not have any particular qualification to receive that blessing other than being a faithful Christian, a “disciple.” He was not an apostle, nor did he have one of the other equipping ministries of Ephesians 4:11. Furthermore, he was apparently not the local leader in Damascus, he was “a certain disciple.” This should be great encouragement to every Christian, because this is an example of the Word teaching us how the Lord works with people and what we can expect from him. The Bible says we are to have “fellowship” with Jesus, (1 John 1:3), and that means we should communicate to him and expect him to communicate with us, just as we expect that out of anyone else with whom we have fellowship [For more on our fellowship with Christ, see commentary on 1 John 1:3].

One of the great lessons we should learn from this record of Ananias is how intimate and “natural” his relationship was with Jesus Christ. When Ananias saw Jesus and heard him calling his name, he spoke to him respectfully, but like he would to a friend. He simply said, “See, I am here, Lord.” He did not fall down, faint, or become overcome by excitement or anxiety. Ananias’ conversation with Jesus was normal, casual, and comfortable. And that was the case even though what Jesus asked Ananias to do caught Ananias off guard. Jesus told Ananias what to do (9:11, 12); then Ananias questioned the Lord about the situation (9:13, 14); then Jesus reaffirmed his instructions (9:15, 16); then Ananias obeyed (9:17ff).

This record of Ananias factors in to what we should understand about fellowship with Jesus and praying to Jesus. Ananias must have had a close relation to Jesus to feel so comfortable talking directly to him. Some people who say we cannot pray to Jesus have dealt with this record by saying that since Jesus appeared to Ananias first, then Ananias could talk with him directly. But Jesus told us he is with us all the time (Matt. 28:20), and that is true whether we actually see him or not. The fact that he is with us means we can openly communicate with him.

“and in a vision the Lord said.” This phrase needs explaining because it is not immediately clear how the Lord “said” something in a “vision.” The answer is that the Lord Jesus appeared in a vision to Ananias, and in that vision the Lord spoke. This is a familiar scene to those who read the whole Bible, because similar visions are recorded a number of times from Genesis onward.

In order to be intimate with His creation and fellowship with us, God sometimes appeared to people in human form. In fact, Scripture records a number of people to whom God appeared: Abraham is one such person, and the fact that Yahweh had appeared in human form to Abraham several times earlier explains how Abraham knew the “man” who approached his camp in Genesis 18:1 was Yahweh—Abraham recognized him the same way we recognize people whom we have met before (Gen. 12:7; 15:1; 17:1; 18:1). God also appeared to Jacob (Gen. 28:13), Moses and the elders of Israel (Exod. 24:9-11), Samuel (1 Sam. 3:10), Solomon (two times: 1 Kings 3:5; 9:2; 11:5), Micaiah (1 Kings 22:19-22), Isaiah (Isa. 6:1-5), Ezekiel (Ezek. 1:26-28), Amos (Amos 7:7), Daniel (Dan. 7:9-14), Stephen (Acts 7:56) and the Apostle John (Rev. 5:1-8). In contrast to many great men and women of God who saw God in a visible form, Jesus upbraided the unbelieving Jews who thought they knew God so well, saying to them: “You have never heard his voice at any time, nor seen his form” (John 5:37). (It is not well known among Christians that God Himself appears to people in human form, so for more on that, see commentary on Acts 7:55).

There are times when God or Jesus “appear” to people and times when they “appear in a vision.” The difference is that if God or Jesus are really present, then other people could see them too, but if it is a vision, even though they can be plainly seen by the one having the vision, no one else could see them. Thus, Stephen saw a vision of God and Jesus (Acts 7:55), because although he could clearly see them, no one else could. In Genesis 15:1, “the word of Yahweh came to Abram in a vision,” that is to say, Abram received instruction from Yahweh, who appeared to him in a vision. In Acts 10:3, an angel appeared to Cornelius in a vision and spoke to him. In Acts 16:9 a man from Macedonia appeared to Paul in a vision and spoke to him. In Acts 18:9 the Lord Jesus appeared to Paul in a vision. Here in Acts 9:10, the Lord Jesus appeared to Ananias in a vision and spoke to him.

“See.” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

9:11. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

9:14. “call upon your name.” This phrase refers to prayer, and here people in Damascus were praying to Jesus. [For more on “call upon” the name of, see commentary on 1 Corinthians 1:2; for more on prayer to Jesus, see commentary on John 14:14].

9:17. “filled with holy spirit.” This refers to the holy spirit that is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”].

9:28. “going in and going out.” This phrase is both an idiom and the figure of speech polarmerismos. Polarmerismos occurs when two extremes are put for what happens between them, thus indicating a totality. A polarmerismos in English is, “That is the long and short of it,” meaning that is all there is to the situation. A polarmerismos in the Bible occurs in Genesis 1: “And there was evening, and there was morning.” The evening and morning are put for the whole day. In the case of “going in and going out,” the reference is an idiom and primarily refers to the daily life of going in to one’s house, and out of it, in other words, living all of daily life. Solomon used almost the exact words when he became king. He prayed, “And now, O LORD my God, thou hast made thy servant king instead of David my father: and I am but a little child: I know not how to go out or come in” (1 Kings 3:7, KJV). Solomon said to God he was not confident as a king, he did not know how to live his life in front of the people, but God stepped in and gave him great wisdom. Here is Acts, the verse is saying that Paul lived daily life with the apostles; he went in and out with them.

9:31. “encouragement of the holy spirit.” This refers to the holy spirit that is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”].

9:38. “Lydda was close to Joppa.” Joppa is 9-10 miles (14.5-16 km) northwest of Lydda, and could have been easily reached in a 3-4 hour walk.

“sent two men.” Although the record in the Bible seems to indicate that Dorcas was already dead, she may have not be dead when they left, but only really sick and failing fast. This is indicated by the fact that they said, “Do not delay.” Of course, it is possible that she was dead, and the men wanted Peter to have an opportunity to raise her before she was buried, which would have happened by nightfall. It seems the disciples would have had more confidence that Peter could heal her than raise her from the dead, since there is no record Peter had raised anyone else from the dead before Dorcas.

“Do not delay.” A litotes (meiosis), in this case a nice way to say, “Hurry up.”

10:2. “godly man.” The word comes from eusebes (#2152 εὐσεβής), which emphasizes the outward actions of one’s devotion. It can be contrasted with eulabes (#2126 εὐλαβής), a similar word that denotes one’s inward attitude of reverence and devotion to God. Vine writes, “While eulabes especially suggests the piety which characterizes the inner being, the soul, in its attitude towards God, eusebes directs us rather to the energy which, directed by holy awe of God, finds expression in devoted activity.” Bullinger points out that eulabes is more about the “avoidance through godly fear of doing anything contrary to right,” than performing one’s devotion in deeds; thus it concerns the type of person one is. On the other hand, he writes that eusebes is “reverence for God which shows itself in actions, practical piety of every kind.”

“a God-fearer.” This means that Cornelius was what the Jews referred to as a “proselyte of the gate.” The Jews had two different categories of proselytes: “proselytes of righteousness” and “proselytes of the gate.” A “proselyte of righteousness” was someone who became circumcised and fully kept the Law. Except for their non-Jewish heritage, they were considered fully Jews. These are apparently the proselytes mentioned in Acts 2:10. In contrast, a “proselyte of the gate,” also known as a “God-fearer,” was a Gentile who did not get circumcised, and these proselytes were restricted in their worship. They were called, “proselytes of the gate” because although they kept much of the Law, they were still thought of as Gentiles, and so when they were in the Temple in Jerusalem, they could not enter the Temple area restricted to Jews, but had to remain in the court of the Gentiles. According to Acts 10:2, Cornelius and all his household were God-fearers. However, when he gathered his family and friends to meet with Peter, we do not know if the entire group were God-fearers as his family was. God-fearers are also mentioned in Acts 13:16, 26.

10:3. “ninth hour.” This is roughly our 3 PM. Acts 3:1 tells us it was an hour of prayer (see commentary on Acts 3:1).

10:9. “sixth hour.” This is roughly our 12 noon. Both the Jews and Romans divided the day into 12 hours, starting at daylight, roughly 6 AM. [For the hours of the day and the watches of the night, see commentary on Mark 6:48].

10:10. “a state of suspended consciousness.” One of the definitions of ekstasis is a “state of suspended consciousness.” Most versions say “trance.” The word “trance” is correct in some contexts, but not in this one. There are many reasons for suspended states of consciousness, but the two we are concerned with as students of Scripture are those caused by God or the Lord Jesus when they give a person an experience by revelation, and the kind caused by demons, which we refer to as a “trance.” When God or the Lord Jesus give such a profound and inclusive revelation that a person’s conscious experience of the other things happening around him are suspended, the person still maintains control of themselves, is aware of what is happening, like Peter can participate in the experience by talking, etc., and will remember what has occurred. In contrast, a demonically produced trance is a type of suspended consciousness, but the person is usually not in control of himself, and frequently has no memory of what happened, including any actions he took while in the trance.
10:13. “Kill.” The word is from the Greek word thuo (#2380 θύω), meaning “to sacrifice.” It is used to refer both to the Pascal Lamb (Mark 14:12; Luke 22:7) and pagan sacrifice (Acts 14:13, 18; 1 Cor. 10:20). The same word can describe “pure” and “impure” religious sacrifice. Nevertheless, the Jews had very strict rules as to which animals were clean and able to be offered as sacrifice, and which animals were unclean and thus unfit for sacrifice. It is also helpful to remember that many of the animals that were sacrificed were eaten by the people in part, or in whole. The Lord is making a point in a way that would be very powerful to Peter, a first century Jew. By telling Peter to kill as a sacrifice and eat these unclean animals, Jesus was showing Peter that even things that had been considered unclean were acceptable to God; even though he had felt they were unfit for religious use, the Lord was showing he had made them clean.

10:14. “Lord.” This refers to the Lord Jesus, not the Lord God. Peter was in the habit of dialoging with Jesus, and referring to him as Lord, which in part explains the tenor of the conversation, and Peter’s willingness to argue, i.e., ‘Surely not, Lord,….” It is difficult to imagine Peter arguing with God in that manner. Further, verse 19 say “the Spirit said…,” which would be Jesus Christ. See commentary on Romans 8:26.

10:17. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

10:19. “the Spirit.” In this case “the Spirit” refers to Jesus. Peter spoke frankly with him just as he had when Jesus lived among the apostles. Here the Bible refers to Jesus as “the Spirit” as it does in many other places after the resurrection. See commentary on Revelation 2:7.

“bowed down before him.” See commentary note on Matthew 2:2.

10:30. “ninth hour.” This is about our 3 PM. Both the Jews and Romans divided the day into 12 hours, starting at daylight, roughly 6 AM. [For the hours of the day and the watches of the night, see commentary on Mark 6:48].

“Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

10:36. “who is.” The Greek is more literally, “this one is Lord of all,” but it is awkward at the end of a written statement. Some versions put it in parenthesis, but that is confusing and leaves us to wonder if it was Peter’s statement or Luke’s commentary. It clearly seems to be Peter’s statement to the Gentiles about Jesus being Lord of all, and beginning. with the “who” and ending with an exclamation point brings out the emphasis (cp. Stearns, Complete Jewish Bible).

10:38. “God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with holy spirit.” Jesus’ being anointed with the holy spirit is after his baptism by John. For the complete record, see commentary on Matthew 3:16. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.

“the Slanderer.” This is “the Devil.” The Greek is diabolos (#1228 διάβολος). The Greek word diabolos means “slanderer,” the one who slanders others, and that is a primary characteristic of the Devil. He has no regard for a person’s reputation or the illicit means he uses to discredit and destroy people. Slander is a primary tactic of the Devil. [For information on the names of the Devil, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”].

10:39. “Tree.” The Greek word is xulon (#3586 ξύλον pronounced zoo’-lon) and it means a tree, log, a piece of timber (1 Cor. 3:12), a piece of wood (Rev. 18:12), or something made from wood such as a beam, a cross, a club (Mark 14:48), or even the stocks that Paul’s feet were placed in (Acts 16:24). However, xulon can mean “tree,” and Peter was making a point to the Gentiles that the religious leaders had taken the Messiah and hanged him on a “tree” as if he was accursed of God (see commentary on Acts 5:30, “tree”).

10:44. “the holy spirit.” This refers to the holy spirit that is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.

10:45. “the gift of holy spirit.” This refers to the holy spirit that is the gift of God, poured out on the Day of Pentecost. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.

10:46. “speaking in tongues.” For a much fuller explanation of speaking in tongues, see commentary on 1 Corinthians 14:5.

10:47. “received the holy spirit.” This refers to the holy spirit that is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.

10:48. “in the name of Jesus Christ.” This phrase means, in essence, “by the authority of Jesus Christ.” It is a cultural phrase that refers to the authority a person has due to his relationship with the one being named, who in this case is Jesus Christ. In Christian culture, “the name of Jesus Christ” gave the user authority, just as using the name of any other ruler or great person would give the one who used it authority. [For more on the name of Jesus Christ, see commentary on Acts 3:6].

Chapter 11

11:2. “those who were of the circumcision.” Peter was criticized by the Apostles and elders, who were Jewish Christians. There is an element of euphemism in the phrase, because the ones who would feel free to criticize Peter were his peers, who would include those who had been the Apostles with him, likely including John and James (James was shortly martyred in Jerusalem; Acts 12:2). In fact, when 11:17 says “he [Jesus] also gave to us when we believed,” the text could well indicate some of the original Apostles who spoke in tongues on the Day of Pentecost.

Acts 11:11. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (ιδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

Acts 11:15. “the holy spirit.” This refers to the holy spirit that is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”].

Acts 11:16. “how he used to say.” A more literal rendition of the Greek would be, “how he was saying,” using the perfect tense, active voice of the verb. We might idiomatically say something like, “he was always saying….” The NASB does the same thing we do in this verse.

“baptized in holy spirit.” This refers to the holy spirit that is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”].

Acts 11:17. “I, who was I.” There is a double use of I here. Lenski notes that there are two questions fused into one: “Who was I” and “Was I able.” (cp. Robertson; Word Pictures in the New Testament). Peter aggressively defends his actions to the Jews, as well he should. However, his humanity shows through later when he gives in to pressure from the Jews about eating with Gentiles (Gal. 2:11).

Acts 11:23. “the purposes of their hearts.” The Greek word translated “purposes’ is prothesis (πρόθεσις), and here means, that which is planned or purposed in advance. The heart can have plans or purposes, things it plans for the future.

Acts 11:24. “full of holy spirit and trust.” This refers to the holy spirit that is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”].

Acts 11:26. “called.” The Greek word is chrematizō (χρηματίζω), and it meant “to transact business,” or “to transact business under the name of,” thus, go under the name of or simply “to be called.”

“Christians.” According to the chronology in Acts, the name “Christian” was coined in either 43 or 44 AD, 16 or 17 years after the crucifixion (given a 28 AD crucifixion). The name would have been coined by the Greeks, because the Jews would never have given the people whom they thought were heretics a name that meant a follower of their Messiah—they thought the Christians were deceived and deceivers.

It is unknown whether the name “Christian” was given to the believers by the unbelieving Greeks or if the believers called themselves Christians to identify themselves, but it seems more likely that since they had been already known as disciples or followers of “the Way” (cp. Acts 9:2), that the term “Christian” was given to them by unbelieving Greeks who wanted an easy way to identify them. Much has been written on the grammatical form of the Greek and Latin words for “Christian,” but the basic meaning is “follower of Christ.”

Since the term “Christian” was coined by Greeks in Antioch of Syria in 43 or 44 AD, Jesus never called himself a Christian, neither did the early Apostles and disciples.

It is not known how quickly the name “Christian” spread, but it did spread. It is only used three times in the New Testament, but all three are significant. The first use tells us how the term came into existence. The second use is by Herod Agrippa II, great grandson of Herod the Great and the man appointed by the Romans to be the ruler of territory in northern Israel (Acts 26:28). Herod Agrippa II may have more or less passed himself off as a Jew, but he was living in incest with his sister Bernice, and their relationship was part of the society gossip even back in Rome. The fact that Agrippa would use the term “Christian” in his dialogue with Paul indicates that it was a clear descriptor for those people who believed in Jesus and followed a specific set of beliefs. Agrippa said, “You are trying to persuade me to become a Christian,” and by that he meant all that “Christian” stood for. He did not say, “You are trying to get me to believe Jesus was raised from the dead,” which is a vital part of Christianity, but not all there was to “Christianity” even at that time.

The third and last time “Christian” appears in the Bible is in the first epistle of Peter. Peter wrote to the Jewish Christians scattered throughout the area we know as Turkey today (1 Peter 1:1). The fact that Peter used the term “Christian” when writing to the Jewish Christians shows that they had wholeheartedly accepted Jesus as the Messiah, and also were well known to be distinct from the Jews who did not accept Jesus as the Messiah. The way Peter used “Christian,” in the phrase “if a person suffers as a Christian,” shows that the term Christian was well-known and Christians were known to suffer persecution.

We do not know why Paul did not use the term “Christian in any of his writings. Perhaps because he was trying to win Jews to Christ, he did not want to immediately alienate them by referring to himself by a term they would likely find offensive. It is also possible that if it was of pagan origin that he felt it best not to use the term.

The term “Christian” was generally known by the time of Josephus (Antiquities, xviii. 3.3) because he uses it without much description, and shortly thereafter it was used by Pliny the Younger, Tacitus, and Suetonius. Since we have these widespread surviving references to the name, with the understanding that the people who read them would know what “Christian” means, we can assume that at least by the end of the first century and early in the second, people knew who a “Christian” was. Actually, it was likely that during the persecution started by Nero that the term “Christian” came to widespread notice.

Nero did something that no emperor had done before him—he made a religion illegal. There had been occasions in Roman history when the practitioners of a given religion got out of the bounds of decency and certain religious practices were outlawed. There were other times when the religious practitioners of a certain location became rebellious and were executed, as happened when the Jews in Jerusalem rebelled against Rome, and Rome responded by killing those Jews and burning their temple, but Rome did not also make Judaism illegal—it was based on the worship of a god. It was always assumed that religion was based on the existence of a god or goddess, so you could not make the belief system itself illegal. In contradiction to that logic, Nero made the belief in Christ as Messiah illegal, and all practices and worship associated with belief in Christ illegal too. That act no doubt caught the attention of the average Roman—it certainly did with the various Roman senators, prefects, procurators, governors, etc., who had to carry out Nero’s orders. By Nero’s time, or in Nero’s time, the common people knew the term “Christian.” The term “Christian” had been coined at least 20 years earlier (coined in 43 or 44, the fire of Rome was in 64), and the Roman historian Tacitus (c. 56 – c. 120) wrote: about Nero’s torture of “people hated for their shameful offenses, whom the common people called ‘Christians.’” So by the time of Nero’s persecution the common people referred to followers of the Way as “Christians.”

At this point it is helpful to understand why Christian were considered so hateful. Of course there were many lies and exaggerations being told about them, but also the Christians were a new group, and new groups were always held under suspicion. Beyond that, however, they would not participate in, or spoke out against, many of the Greco-Roman customs, such as the gladiator games, drinking bouts, and orgies and the common sexual customs of prostitution, homosexuality, having sex with one’s slaves, etc. Also, they refused to sacrifice to the Emperor of the gods. This was very offensive, because the Romans were very superstitious and believed that without the favor of the gods there would be famine, plagues, defeat in battle, and all sorts of horrible consequences. Since the favor of the gods was essential to national well-being, any group that refused to honor the gods was considered unsociable and dangerous to Rome. Thus the Christians were held in suspicion and hated for their beliefs and practices (the Jews were also disliked by the Romans for many of the same reasons, but there were mitigating factors. First, Judaism was an ancient religion, and thus gained respect on that account. Also, they had a Temple, priests, sacrifices, and things that the average Roman could identify with. Lastly, many Jews did not practice their religion and went to the games, the theater, etc., and thus assuaged the fears of the Romans.

The one problem with the word “Christian” being in the Bible is that there is a danger of historic anachronism if people think a first century Christian believed what a modern Christian did. The “Christians” at the time of Paul did not have big churches (they were persecuted and usually met secretly or at least quietly in houses or other places), their worship and beliefs had not been diluted or changed by thousands of years of “orthodoxy,” so, for example, they did not believe in the Trinity, or transubstantiation, or that Jesus was born on December 25th, etc. The Bible was not even completed when many of them lived, so they focused on good works and turning from evil practices like idolatry and sexual immorality, and they focused on Jesus Christ being raised from the dead.

12:1. “Herod Agrippa.” “Herod Agrippa I” (reigned 37-44 AD) was the grandson of Herod the Great (the Herod who tried to kill Jesus as a baby). He was the son of Aristobulus (the Son of Herod the Great and Mariamne) and Berenice (daughter of Herod’s sister Salome and Costobarus). Herod Agrippa was born in 10 BC, and died in 44 AD. The Roman emperor Caligula liked him and gave him the region of Philip the tetrarch, and the territory of Lysanius, and gave him the title “king.” He eventually gained the territory of Herod Antipas (who imprisoned and executed John the Baptist) as well. The emperor Claudius added Judea and Samaria to Agrippa’s domain, so he ended up with the territory of his grandfather, Herod the Great.

12:2. “James.” This is the Apostle James, who was the brother of the Apostle John (Matt. 10:2). This was a huge loss to the Church. James was not just one of the Twelve Apostles; he was one of the three who were closest to Jesus. Jesus often took Peter, James, and John to places that he did not take the other apostles. For example, only Peter,
James, and John went with Jesus to the Transfiguration (Matt. 17:1); only those three were with Jesus when he raised the synagogue leader’s daughter from the dead (Mark 5:37; Luke 8:51); and he took those three away with him to pray on the night of his arrest (Mark 14:33). James is mentioned with Peter, John, and Andrew as being in Jerusalem before Pentecost.

Only after the Apostle James is killed is James the Lord’s brother mentioned as an elder in the Church (see commentary on Acts 12:17).

12:3. “Jews.” This is the restricted use of the word “Jews,” referring only to the religious leaders of the Jews and those who oppose God and Christ. [For more information, see commentary on John 1:19].

12:7. “look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἴδοù), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

12:17. “James.” This is James the Lord’s brother. This is the first time he is mentioned as a leader in the Church. The Apostle James had been killed by Herod (see commentary on Acts 12:2). James was leading the church at Jerusalem by Acts 15:13. It is worth noting that it is almost certain that James did not believe that his half-brother Jesus was the Messiah until sometime after the resurrection. He did not believe in Jesus as late as the Feast of Tabernacles, less than a year before Jesus’ death (John 7:5). Furthermore, the evidence is that when Jesus was dying on the cross, James still did not believe, which is why Jesus told John to take care of Jesus’ mother Mary (John 19:27). The first time we see James with the believers is in Acts 1:14, when James is with his mother Mary and the other disciples in Jerusalem in the days before Pentecost. It is generally believed that James and the other brothers of Jesus saw him after his resurrection when he went to Galilee, and believed at that time.

It is generally believed that by Acts 12:17, the persecution against the Church was so heavy that the original apostles could not stay in Jerusalem and so James was leading the church there, which is why Peter told the disciples to tell James he had gotten out of prison (Acts 12:17).

It seems that James did not have the heart to move forward with the revelation that his half-brother Jesus was giving from heaven. While Jesus was giving wonderful revelation to the Apostle Paul about the Church and there being neither Jew nor Gentile in Christ, James was still pressing Christians to keep the Law (Acts 21:20). For more on James and the Church, see commentary on Galatians 2:2.

Chapter 13

13:2. “the Holy Spirit.” We have punctuated this like it refers to God, which is does. However, built into the vocabulary is that it may also be referring to God’s gift of holy spirit. The early Greek texts did not have lower case letters, and so the meaning of the phrase, “THE HOLY SPIRIT” needed to be determined by the context. In this case, God is clearly directing His church by speaking to them via His gift of holy spirit, so in a sense both meanings are built into one phrase. [For more information on this kind of construction, see commentary on Acts 16:6. For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”].
Acts 13:4. “the Holy Spirit.” This meaning is derived primarily from “the Holy Spirit” in verse 2, which we felt primarily refers to God. [For more information see commentary on Acts 13:2]. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”].

“Seleucia.” This is Seleucia Pieria, which served as a sea port of Antioch about 16 miles (26 km) further upstream, at the mouth of the Orantes River.

13:9. “filled with holy spirit.” This refers to the holy spirit that is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”].

13:10. “the Slanderer.” This is “the Devil.” The Greek is diabolos (#1228 διάβολος). The Greek word diabolos means “slanderer,” the one who slanders others, and that is a primary characteristic of the Devil. He has no regard for a person’s reputation or the illicit means he uses to discredit and destroy people. Slander is a primary tactic of the Devil. [For information on the names of the Devil, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”].

13:11. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδοὺ), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

“the hand of the Lord.” This is common idiom for the power of the Lord.

13:12. “teaching about the Lord.” A very good example of a genitive of relation, well translated as “the teaching about the Lord” (NIV).

13:16. “Gentiles who are God-fearers.” The Jewish religion had much that was attractive about it. In contrast to the religion of the Greeks, Romans, and pagan, which was generally cruel and cold and did not have any kind of “manual” from the gods that told people how to live, the Jews had a “manual,” a book of clear do’s and don’ts (the Old Testament), and their religion was full of mercy and goodness. Thus there was a great interest in Judaism among the Greeks and Romans, some of whom became full proselytes (the men got circumcised) and some of whom were called “God-fearers.”

A “God-fearer,” also known as a “proselyte of the gate,” was a Gentile who followed the Law but did not get circumcised, and so God-fearers were restricted in their worship. They were called, “proselytes of the gate” because although they kept much of the Law, they were still thought of as Gentiles, and thus when they were in the Temple in Jerusalem, they could not enter the Temple area restricted to Jews, but had to remain in the court of the Gentiles (see commentary on Acts 10:2). It shows how much Paul wanted everyone to believe in Christ that when he went into the synagogue to teach, he spoke directly to everyone there, both the Jews and the God-fearers, who were still thought of as Gentiles.

13:25. “take notice!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδοὺ), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

13:26. “Gentiles who are God-fearers.” A “God-fearer,” also known as a “proselyte of the gate,” was a Gentile who followed the Law but did not get circumcised, and so these proselytes were restricted in their worship. See commentary on Acts 13:16 and Acts 10:2.

13:29. “Tree.” The Greek word is xulon (#3586 ξύλον pronounced zoo'-lon) and it means a tree, log, a piece of timber (1 Cor. 3:12), a piece of wood (Rev. 18:12), or something made from wood such as a beam, a cross, a club (Mark 14:48), or even the stocks that Paul’s feet were placed in (Acts 16:24). However, xulon can mean “tree,” and Paul was making the point that the religious leaders had taken the Messiah and hanged him on a “tree” as if he was accursed of God (see commentary on Acts 5:30, “tree”).

13:30. “out from among the dead.” See Romans 4:24. Wuest: “out from among those who are dead.”

13:33. Quoted from Psalm 2:7. Psalm 2:7 is also quoted in Hebrews 1:5 and 5:5.

“Today I have become your Father.” The Greek for “have become your Father” is γεννάω (γεννάω) and Friberg correctly notes that when it is used of men, it means to become the father of; and when used of women it means to give birth to (Friberg, Analytical Lexicon of the Greek New Testament).

The understanding of this verse is debated by scholars, but the context seems to make the meaning quite clear. Although there are some very competent scholars (cp. Fitzmyer; Haenchen; Meyer; etc.), who believe that anistemi (“raised up”) refers to the resurrection of Christ, there are also some very competent scholars (cp. Lenski; F. F. Bruce), who believe that in verse 33 the word anistemi (ἀνίστημι), “raised,” does not refer to Jesus’ resurrection, but his birth. We think it is clear that the word anistemi refers to the resurrection in verse 33 as well as 34.

It is true that anistemi is a very general term for rising up, getting up, put up (a building), and appearing in history (“there arose another Pharaoh”). However, many things militate against it being used for Jesus’ physical birth in this verse. First, the next verse (Acts 13:34) uses anistemi of the resurrection of Christ (“raised [anistemi] him out from among the dead”), and it seems unlikely that two uses of anistemi in such close conjunction would refer to two different events.

Second, if 13:33 were about Jesus’ birth, it would be out of place in Paul’s teaching. Paul was teaching the people of Antioch about Jesus. In 13:27 he spoke of the trial and condemnation of Christ; then in 13:28 he spoke of Jesus’ being put to death; then in 13:29 he said Jesus was placed in a tomb; then in 13:30 he said God raised Jesus from the dead; then in verse 31 he said Jesus appeared to many people who are now witnesses; then in 13:32 and 33 he said God had fulfilled his promises by “raising up” Jesus. It seems that if Paul wanted to make the point that it was the birth of Christ that fulfilled the promises, he would not have presented the facts about Jesus the way he did, nor mention the birth of Christ between verses about his resurrection (13:30 and 13:34). People who say 13:33 is about the birth of Christ are forced to say that Paul started his argument over again, but this seems like a weak argument, especially since Paul never mentioned Jesus’ birth earlier, but started with his arrest and condemnation.

Third, the New Testament never uses anistemi of anyone’s birth, but uses it 25 times for Jesus’ resurrection from the dead, and many other times for other people, such as Lazarus, being raised from the dead. This is strong evidence that anistemi is used for the resurrection in 13:33.

Fourth, Acts 13:33 says God has “fulfilled” His promises “by raising up Jesus.” Even in the context it is clear that Jesus’ birth did not “fulfill” the promises made to Israel. One of the promises was that Jesus would be condemned so that he would die for the sins of all people, and that promise was “fulfilled” when the religious leaders in Jerusalem condemned him, as Paul told the people in 13:27. Meyer writes: “By this resurrection of Jesus, God has completely fulfilled to the promise” [Meyer’s Commentary on the New Testament. Emphasis his]. It was Jesus’ resurrection from the dead that “fulfilled” the promises to Israel, not his birth.
We must not be confused by thinking that “become your Father” in this context has to refer to Jesus’ birth. It is clear in Psalm 2 that God is not only speaking with Jesus, but that he was established as king (Ps. 2:6). The word “today” in the quotation from Psalm 2 helps us understand the figurative use of “have become your Father.” If Jesus is reigning as king when God says, “Today I have become your Father,” then “have become your Father” is not speaking of the day of Jesus’ birth. Meyer writes that “have become your Father” here means, “installed Thee into this divine Sonship by the resurrection, Romans 1:4, – inasmuch as the resurrection was the actual guarantee, excluding all doubt, of that Sonship of Christ.” Bengel agrees and says the phrase, “Today I have become your Father,” in this context means: “This day I have definitely declared that Thou art my Son” (Bengel’s New Testament Commentary). On the day of Jesus’ resurrection, God did not literally become Jesus’ Father, but He did from the standpoint that because of Jesus’ resurrection, God’s being the Father of Jesus could no longer be logically doubted, nor could Jesus’ authority as the Son of God be denied. From the people’s perspective, it was the resurrection that declared beyond a shadow of a doubt that Jesus was the Son of God.

“by raising up Jesus.” In the Greek text, anistemi (#450 ἀνίστημι; “raise, raise up”) is a participle, and this is the instrumental use of the participle, thus, “by raising up” (cp. HCSB; ESV; NAB; NET; NIV).

13:34. Quoted from Isaiah 55:3. “out from among the dead.” See Romans 4:24. Wuest: “up from among those who are dead.”

13:35. Quoted from Psalm 16:10.

13:36. “sleep.” The Greek verb is koimaō (#2837 κοιμάω), to fall asleep, to be asleep. Sleep is used as a euphemism and metaphor for death. See commentary on Acts 7:60.

13:41. Quoted from Habbakuk 1:5.

13:43. “God-fearing.” The Greek is sebomai (#4576 σέβομαι). In the New Testament sebomai is always used of worship or veneration of a god or deity, but in the Greek literature it is also used of veneration or respect of a person. It has two distinct meanings in the New Testament: the basic meaning in the Greek literature—and the one that occurs in Matthew 15:9; Mark 7:7; Acts 18:13; and Acts 19:12—is “worship; venerate.” However, the Rabbis used the word in a specific sense, usually to indicate a Gentile who worshipped the God of Israel, but usually without becoming circumcised and thus becoming a full-fledged proselyte, and that use of the word spread throughout the Biblical world, even appearing in the New Testament. Robertson says the word sebomai was used “of the uncircumcised Gentiles who yet attended the synagogue worship…the rabbis used it also of proselytes of the gate who had not yet become circumcised” (Robertson; Word Pictures in the New Testament). “God-fearers, worshipers of God is a term applied to former polytheists who accepted the ethical monotheism of Israel and attended the synagogue, but who did not obligate themselves to keep the whole Mosaic law; in particular, the males did not submit to circumcision (Jos., Ant. 14, 110)” (BDAG). These “God-fearers,” or “God-fearing Gentiles,” are mentioned six times in the book of Acts (Acts 13:43, 50; 16:14; 17:4, 17; 18:7), and often their connection with the Jews in the synagogue shows up in the context. For example, in Acts 13:43, these God-fearing people obviously heard Paul speak in the synagogue, and followed him after the service ended. In Acts 13:50 the Jews agitated the God-fearing women. The Jews had significant influence over those particular women because they were the ones who worshipped in the synagogue. In Acts 16, Lydia, a seller of purple cloth, was worshipping outside the city of Philippi (which did not have a synagogue), and was open to Paul’s teaching about the Messiah, because she herself was already a God-fearing Gentile (Acts 16:14). At Thessalonica, Paul went into the synagogue and taught. Quite a few people believed, not only among the Jews, but of the God-fearing Gentiles as well, who were in the synagogue and heard Paul teach (Acts 17:1-4). In Athens, Paul went into the synagogue and talked with “the Jews and God-fearing Greeks” (Acts 17:17). In Corinth, Paul went into the house of Titus Justice, a God-fearing Gentile whose house was right next to the synagogue ( Acts 18:7). Once we know that the “God-fearing” Gentiles were not just “devout” as some versions say, but were actually committed to the God of Israel, we can better understand the verses that mention them. It would be possible for a Gentile to be “devout” to pagan gods without having any relationship to the God of Israel; however, that is clearly not the case with these Gentiles who were devoted to Yahweh.

13:45. “Jews.” This is the restricted use of the word “Jews,” referring only to the religious leaders of the Jews and those who oppose God and Christ. [For more information, see commentary on John 1:19].

“speaking defaming words.” Greek verb is blasphēmeō (#987 βλασφημεω; pronounced blas-fay-meh'-ō). The Jews contradicted Paul, “blaspheming.” Blaspheming is a general word that means to defame someone, to hurt someone’s reputation (see commentary on Matt. 9:3). Although some versions say “insulting him” or “reviling him” (i.e. Paul), that is not in the text and is an assumption. Paul was preaching Christ, who the Jews took to be an impostor and now a dead criminal, so in the general use of “spoke defaming words,” we should realize that they were defaming, trying to destroy the reputation of, both Paul and Christ.

13:46. “life in the Age to come.” This is the everlasting life that begins with the new Messianic Age, the Millennial Kingdom. [See commentary on this phrase in Appendix 2: “Life in the Age to Come”.

“look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

13:48. “as many as appointed themselves to life in the Age.” It is very important to properly understand this phrase. The verb is tasso (#5021 τάσσω), and the form of the verb in this verse can be either middle voice or passive voice (cp. Lenski; and Expositor’s Greek Testament; although the lexicons say it is passive, but note Friberg).

The verb tasso means, “to place in a certain order,…to arrange, to assign a place, to appoint...to consecrate (R. V. set) oneself to minister unto one, 1 Cor. 16:15...Middle [voice] (as often in Greek writings) properly, to appoint on one’s own responsibility or authority,” (Thayer’s Greek-English Lexicon).

This verse is a great example of the importance of utilizing the scope of Scripture to help translate and understand a word. The translation and interpretation of the verse depends on whether the verb tasso is in the passive or middle voice. But in this case, both forms are the same, so that determination cannot be made from the Greek text itself, but from the context and scope of Scripture.

If the verb is in the passive voice in this verse, then versions such as the NASB properly represent the text: “and as many as had been appointed to eternal life believed”
Of course, the theology that usually develops from that rendering is that God chooses, or “appoints,” who will be saved and who will not. This is clearly expressed in the NLT (New Living Translation), which reads, “and all who were chosen for eternal life became believers.” This is exactly what those who follow the theology set forth by Augustine, John Calvin, and Jonathan Edwards, teach, and it is the formal theology of denominations such as the Roman Catholics and Presbyterians. It also is the reason why denominations such as the Roman Catholics and Presbyterians do not have altar calls for salvation as a part of their church services. Their official doctrine is that people do not have the ability or power to decide whether to be saved or not. They assert that salvation God’s choice, not the individual’s, so any altar call would be pointless.

There are commentators who do not see the need to draw that conclusion, however, even though they take the verb to be in the passive voice: “There is no countenance here for the absolutum decretum [absolute decree] of the Calvinists, since ver. 46 had already shown that the Jews had acted through their own choice. …the Jews as a nation had been ordained to eternal life—they had rejected this election” (Expositor’s Greek Testament). In this theology, being “ordained” or “appointed” to everlasting life does not mean one has to accept the ordination. This is more correct than believing God only appoints some people to everlasting life, and all those who are appointed believe. However, on a practical note it seems to miss the point. First, because actually God appoints everyone to everlasting life. It is quite unthinkable that God would want all men to be saved (1 Tim. 2:4), but then only appoint some to everlasting life. But if all who were appointed to life believed, all those present to hear Paul, both Jews and Greeks, would have believed. Secondly, if the verb is read as a passive, then the verse does in fact say that all those who were “appointed” to everlasting life believed, as if some were appointed and some were not. Yet it is clear from the scope of Scripture that God wants all people to be saved, but only some accept the invitation.

We assert that in this verse, the verb tasso is in the middle voice, and thus the meaning is reflexive. It is we humans who respond to God’s call and believe unto salvation. God’s desire is that all people would be saved, but only some will “appoint themselves” to everlasting life by answering the call. Many commentaries note that the context (v. 46) shows that the Jews “judged themselves” unworthy of life. We agree, and point out that in contrast to those Jews, the Gentiles “appointed themselves” to life in the Age to come. “The meaning of this word [tasso] must be determined by the context. The Jews had judged themselves unworthy of eternal life; the Gentiles, as many as were disposed to eternal life, believed” (Alford, The Greek Testament, cp. the translation, “as many as had set themselves for eternal life,” New International Biblical Commentary).

No doubt some people will take exception to our translation, “appoint themselves,” but we feel it is a good representation of both the Greek text and the scope of Scripture. God offers everlasting life to anyone who will accept it, and so we “appoint ourselves” for it, just as we might appoint ourselves to any other job or position. Especially since some very notable translations use the word “appointed” as a passive, our using “appointed themselves” (the middle voice) seems quite appropriate. Furthermore, it is exactly what happens when we decide to make Christ our personal Lord and savior. The Living Bible catches the sense of this, even though in our opinion their translation is too liberal a departure from the meaning of the Greek word tasso: “and as many as wanted eternal life believed.” That translation expresses what happened in Antioch in Pisidia (Acts 13:14) some 2,000 years ago: Paul taught the Word of God in the Synagogue to the Jews and Greeks assembled there. The Jews judged themselves unworthy of eternal life by rejecting both the message and the messengers. However, the Gentiles wanted it and appointed themselves to everlasting life by believing.

The point of the verse is that each person has the opportunity to accept or reject God, and in this case, the Jews, by their actions, rejected life, but the Gentiles appointed themselves to everlasting life by accepting God’s call.

“life in the Age to come.” This is the everlasting life that begins with the new Messianic Age, the Millennial Kingdom. [See commentary on this phrase in Appendix 2: “Life in the Age to Come”.

13:50. “Jews.” This is the restricted use of the word “Jews,” referring only to the religious leaders of the Jews and those who oppose God and Christ. [For more information, see commentary on John 1:19].

13:52. “filled with joy and holy spirit.” This refers to the holy spirit that is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.

Chapter 14

14:2. “souls.” The Greek word often translated “soul” is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoo-kay'), and it has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person or animal; an individual person; or attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. Here it refers to the thoughts, feelings, and emotions of the person himself, so many versions have “minds” instead of “souls,” but properly understood, “souls” is more inclusive of the feelings and emotions as well as the thoughts. [For a more complete explanation of “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of Soul’”.

14:3. “Therefore.” This important word shows that Paul and Barnabas stayed in Iconium because of the persecution by the Jews mentioned in verse 2. Paul and Barnabas were not ones to abandon their new converts to the pressures and persecutions of the Jews and unbelievers. They stayed “a long time,” and fought for them, “speaking boldly for the Lord.” The Lord Jesus honored their fearless, selfless commitment by energizing signs and wonders that further testified to the truth of what they were teaching. This verse teaches a wonderful lesson about how important it is to raise up new converts in the Lord, and help them grow in the faith.

14:12. “chief” is actually a participle, “leading speaker.”

14:15. “worthless things.” The Greek is mataios (#3152 ματαιος), and it means, devoid of truth, or force, or success; worthless, useless.

14:19. “Jews.” This is the restricted use of the word “Jews,” referring only to the religious leaders of the Jews and those who oppose God and Christ. [For more information, see commentary on John 1:19].

“having persuaded the multitude.” The Scripture does not elaborate as to how this was done. We surmise it was a combination of things. Lies and exaggerations as to what Paul and Barnabas were teaching, lies about how they had destroyed the peace of the places they had recently been and divided the people, pointing out that they defamed traditional worship and called the traditional gods “worthless,” and likely threw in that since they were not gods come in the flesh, they healed by witchcraft, using names that were not lawfully recognized.

“dragged.” The Greek is συρῶ (#4951 σύρω) to drag or to draw.

14:21. “returned to Lystra, and to Iconium, and to Antioch.” Paul and Barnabas had just been driven out of Antioch (Acts 13:50); had to flee Iconium (Acts 14:6), and Paul was stoned on Lystra (Acts 14:9), so how could they return to those cities so quickly?
Although some commentators have suggested that the leadership in those cities changed even in that short time, that is unlikely, and besides, not everyone who was in leadership and who had participated in getting rid of Paul and Barnabas would have been gone. The answer is in Acts 14:22, which says that Paul and Barnabas strengthened the disciples. So when the two missionaries returned to those cities they had just been ousted from, they kept to themselves and just met quietly with the disciples, whereas on the earlier visit they had openly proclaimed Christ in public places. Paul and Barnabas understood that if the disciples were strong and felt supported, evangelism would continue, and they used wisdom in the way they journeyed instead of acting with reckless bravado in the name of Christ.

“It is unavoidable.” The Greek word is δεῖ (#1163 δεῖ; pronounced day). It expresses compulsion, necessity, or inevitability (Friberg). The Greek text of this verse is arranged in such a way it is hard to put literally into English and have a clear meaning.
The KJV follows the syntax of the Greek text fairly closely: “we must through much tribulation enter into the Kingdom of God,” and the NIV follows that pattern in more modern English: “We must go through many hardships to enter the Kingdom of God.” A problem with literally following the syntax of the Greek text like those versions do is that the verse can then be misinterpreted to mean that if we do not go through many hardships, we cannot enter the Kingdom of God, which is not at all what the verse is saying. The HCSB gets much of the sense of the verse well: “It is necessary to pass through many troubles on our way into the Kingdom of God.”

Another problem with bringing the Greek into English is translating the Greek word δεῖ. Saying that “it is necessary” to go through many hardships to enter the Kingdom of God is not bringing the meaning of the Greek into English as clearly as possible, because the Greek δεῖ refers to necessity, inevitability, or unavoidability, while the English word “necessary” has a connotation of both need and even desirability (Merriam Webster’s Dictionary of Synonyms). It is only “necessary” that we have hardships because of the fallen nature of the world, our enemy the Devil, and our own sin nature, not because of the will or plan of God.

Many versions say “we must” go through hardships to enter the Kingdom of God, which is better than “it is necessary,” but “we must” makes it sound like something we could avoid if we did not want to get into the Kingdom, which is not the message. “Much hardship” is an unavoidable part of life whether a person is saved or not.

The REV could have used “inevitable,” and stayed with a definition of δεῖ that is found in the lexicons, but “unavoidable” seems clearer and carries the sense in this context. It is “unavoidable” that we experience “many hardships” on our way into the Kingdom of God.
Chapter 15

15:2. “no small.” Figure of speech, Tapeinosis (demeaning, or understatement).
15:3. “sent.” The Greek word is propempō (#4311 προπέμψω), and it has two distinct meanings: “to send on ahead, send on one’s way;” and “to accompany or escort.” The KJV and the ASV of 1901 opted for the second definition, “to accompany.” However, that does not fit this particular context, which is why other versions opt for the first definition, “send on one’s way.” Verse 2 makes it clear that Paul, Barnabas, and a few others were appointed to travel from Antioch to Jerusalem. Since they were specifically appointed for the journey, it makes no sense that others in the congregation who were not appointed to go would go anyway, even part of the way.
15:5. “rose up.” Although this certainly refers to standing up, which is how many versions translate it, it may refer to more. It probably also refers to a “rising” of indignation, self-righteousness, etc. In that case, simply saying “stood up” is weak.
15:8. “testified on their behalf.” God “bore witness to” the Gentiles, that He had accepted them, by giving them the gift of holy spirit. “Bore witness to” is a good translation here, because it allows both that God bore witness to the Gentiles themselves, and that He also bore witness to the acceptance of the Gentiles to the Jews. The concrete evidence that the Gentiles had received holy spirit was that they spoke in tongues.
15:9. “by trust.” This refers to the holy spirit that is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.]
15:12. “as they were recounting.” See commentary on “related” in Luke 24:35.
15:14. “Simeon.” “Simeon” is the Hebrew form of Peter’s Jewish name. “Simon” (#4613 Σίμων) was considered the equivalent of the Hebrew patriarchal name Symeon (#4826 Συμεών), and was widely used by both Greeks and Jews. It is likely that Simon Peter acquired the name “Simon” due to the Greek influence in the Galilee and in his hometown, Bethsaida. It is noteworthy that his brother also has a Greek name. “Andrew” means “manly” in Greek. Peter is usually referred to as “Simon,” but here and in 2 Peter 1:1, Simeon is used instead of Simon. It is likely that James used “Simeon” to good effect on his Hebrew audience, anchoring Peter’s good Hebrew name to the perspective he had just given on the subject (vs. 7-11).
“a people.” Israel had been the “people” of God. Now God was making his “people” out of both Jews and Gentiles.
15:16-17. Quoted from Amos 9:11, 12.

15:17. “called, even over them—says the Lord.” The figure of speech anacoluthon, or non-sequence. A breaking off of the sequence of thought. See Bullinger, Figures.

The ending of the verse 17 and how it relates to verse 18, and what is the proper Greek text of verse 18, are debated by scholars. Verse 18 is almost certainly textually, “γνωστὰ ἀπ᾿ αἰῶνος” (“known from the ages,” i.e., “known from long ago.”) This short sentence was expanded in time to make the longer ending that appears in the Byzantine text (cp. KJV), and other longer textual variants were produced as well (cp. Metzger, Textual Commentary; and cp. the apparatus of NA-27 or UBS 4). The problem is that the quotation from Amos was well known, and ended with the Greek words “ὁ θεὸς ὁ ποιῶν ταῦτα” (“God, who makes all this” or “God, who does all this” (the Greek word ποιῶν can be “do” or “make”). However, that makes verse 18 the short and disconnected sentence, “known from the ages.” The question is, when James quoted Amos, did he modify it, giving it a new ending, and making it end: “the Lord, who is making this known from long ago” (as per ESV, NASB, RSV), or would James have left the quotation from Amos intact, and then said something that is represented in the NT text with the figure of speech ellipsis, thus making the end of 17 and verse 18 read, “the Lord who had done all this. This has been known from long ago” (Metzger, Textual Commentary).

To us it makes more sense that James would quote Amos as it was known, and then add his point, that “This has been known from long ago.” James is arguing to make a point, and it would weaken his argument to misquote an OT verse, trying to make a point using his changed verse. We believe that James would correctly quote Amos (except he changed “God” to “Lord,”) and then add the fact that what he was saying had been known for a long time. The real confusion, then, is caused when Acts is written, and Luke (by revelation) uses the figure ellipsis in recording James’ words, leaving out “This has been.” The figure ellipsis emphasizes what is in the text, and de-emphasizes what is left out. To God, the fact that it was known for a long time that God would rebuild the tent of David is very important, so that gets emphasized.

15:18. “This has been known from of old.” See commentary on verse 17 above.

15:20. This verse has many textual variants, and there has been much theological discussion on what this Apostolic Decree means. Metzger (Textual Commentary) has a well written section on the most probable original text (represented in the REV).

“pollutions of idols.” This refers specifically to food sacrificed to idols, as verse 29 and 21:25 make clear. It would not refer to idolatry as such, because the Gentiles had forsaken their idols. This was a huge part of the decision to become a Christian in the first century, because other religions did not ask anyone to forsake idols. In the Roman religions, for example, if you worshipped one god you could and should still recognize other gods. What set Christianity and Judaism apart was that in those religions a person rejected other gods and exclusively recognized the God of the Bible. This was a major reason Jews and Christians were persecuted by pagans.

15:22. “decided.” This is an idiom used at the start of decrees (Robertson, Word Pictures in the New Testament). Lenski writes, “doko with the dative means that the assembly passed a formal resolution.” This was probably done by a show of hands as in 14:23.

15:23. “They wrote through them.” This is an anacoluthon, and the figure of speech idiom. The Greek is literally, “having written through their hand.” The anacoluthon is “having written, and sending the letter through their hand.” The idiom is the use of “hand” as power or agency. “Through their hand” is a very Hebraic way of saying, through them, i.e., by their power.

15:26. “risked.” The Greek word is paradidomi (#3860 παραδίδωμι) and means “to hand over, give over, deliver, entrust.” Most of the commentators say it means “risk” in this context, but there is certainly the overtone that Paul had more than just “risked” his life. He had “given over” (Field says “pledged” see BDAG), fully to the Lord.

“lives.” The Greek word is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psou-kay’), often translated “soul.” The Greek word psuchē has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person or animal; an individual person; or attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. Here it refers to the physical life of the body, which is why most versions translate it “life,” which is accurate in this context. [For a more complete explanation of psuchē, “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’”].

15:28. “the Holy Spirit.” Here “the Holy Spirit” is a name or title of God. The use of “Holy Spirit” as an appellative for God is directly related to the subject at hand, which is the obedience of some of the parts of the Levitical Law by the Gentiles. They were directed to avoid food sacrificed to idols, sexual immorality, things strangled, and blood, which are all commandments mentioned in the OT, given by God. Obedience to these commandments would not be a factor in the salvation of the Gentiles, but in their holiness, and their ability to fellowship with Jewish Christians, who at this time in Acts were still keeping the Law. The emphasis on “Holy Spirit” would bring to mind statements such as “Be holy because I, the LORD your God, am holy” (Lev. 19:2b). [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”].

15:34. “But it seemed good to Silas to remain there.” This verse should be omitted from the text. It was a late addition, and even so it has several variations. It was added to explain how Paul could have traveled with Silas if Silas went back to Jerusalem. However, Silas did go back to Jerusalem. First, it was “a necessary exigency of the commission which he had received” (Meyer). Silas would have to report back to Jerusalem about how things went in Antioch. Also, the fact that verse 33 says “they were sent off” makes it clear that Silas traveled back with Judas to Jerusalem. Thus the attempt of some scribe to explain the apparent contradiction in Acts actually creates a contradiction. Silas may have returned on his own to Antioch some time later, or Paul could have sent for him before starting his missionary journey.

15:39. “sharp disagreement.” The Greek is paroxusmos (#3948 παροξύσμος) and it has three distinct definitions: 1. A rousing to activity, stirring up, provoking. 2. A state of irritation expressed in argument, sharp disagreement. 3. A severe fit of a disease, attack of fever, esp. at its high point: convulsion (BDAG). Here it means a sharp disagreement, in Hebrews 10:24 it means to stir up to action.

Barnabas was a pastor, and a Jewish Levite. His original name was Joseph, which means “He will add,” but the apostles recognized his pastoral ministry and renamed him. Acts 4:36 says: “Joseph, a Levite from Cyprus, whom the apostles called Barnabas (which means Son of Encouragement).” Although Barnabas disappears from Acts here, it does not necessarily mean he was wrong. He was a better judge of character than Paul in this case. Barnabas took John Mark and went to Cyprus (his home country) where he continued the work of the ministry. Paul later writes about Barnabas in 1 Corinthians 9:6, written later than this record in Acts. As for John Mark, he later became one of Paul’s helpers (Col. 4:10), and was very dear to Paul by the end of his life (2 Tim. 4:11). Mark was also with Peter (1 Pet. 5:13), who calls him a “son.” John Mark is best known for the Gospel of Mark, which he wrote.

Chapter 16

16:1. “Look!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

16:2. “spoken of.” The Greek is martureo (#3140 μαρτυρέω), to witness or testify to or about. Timothy was recommended by others, who gave a good testimony about him.

16:4. “decrees.” The Greek is dogma (#1378 δόγμα), a noun that occurs 5 times in the New Testament and means: a formal statement concerning rules or regulations that are to be observed; an imperial declaration, a decree; something that is taught as an established tenet or statement of belief, doctrine, dogma (BDAG). The English word “decree” means an order having the force of law; a religious ordinance enacted by a council. Hence, “decree” is a good translation here.

16:6. “by the Holy Spirit.” The Greek is hupo ho hagios pneuma (ὑπὸ τοῦ ἅγιου πνεύματος) with hupo being with a genitive (the holy), thus meaning “by.” Paul was either forbidden by “the Holy Spirit” (i.e., by God); or he was forbidden “by way of the holy spirit,” referring to the gift of holy spirit. In the Greek the verse can be read either way, and it is hard to tell which is the “primary” meaning, although if there is one, the context and scope of the Scripture would point to it being “God.”

In the first century, before the doctrine of the Trinity confused Christian doctrine by making “the Holy Spirit” a separate Person in the Trinity, the distinction between “the Holy Spirit” and “the holy spirit” was not often as critical as we think it is today. In fact, in many cases it actually could be somewhat helpful to leave the meaning slightly ambiguous. Most of the time when it comes to guiding Christians, God (“the Holy Spirit”) or Jesus direct us by way of the gift of holy spirit (“the holy spirit”). Thus just having the phrase “THE HOLY SPIRIT” (in all capital letters as the early Greek texts would be) enabled readers to see both meanings, the Giver and the Gift, in the same phrase.

The Greek here in Acts 16:6 is the same as in Acts 13:4, where Barnabas and Saul were sent out, “by the Holy Spirit.” In that verse, as here, the gift of holy spirit could have been meant, but the more probable meaning, especially given the early Greek text, was God [the Holy Spirit], who communicated via His gift [the holy spirit]. Supporting evidence that the best way to translate Acts 13:4 is “the Holy Spirit” is Acts 13:2, where, τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον [“the Spirit, the Holy’,” a more certain designation of God] spoke regarding Barnabas and Saul. Since God spoke in verse 2, that increases the likelihood that it is God being referred to in verse 4. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’.”]
16:7. “the spirit of Jesus.” This is a very Hebraic way of saying the power and presence of Jesus Christ. It is very similar to Genesis 1:2, which states, “And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters” [but “Spirit” should be “spirit,” with a lower case “s.”] In Genesis 1:2, the “spirit of God” the active power and presence of God, moved upon the water. Here, Jesus, in his active role as head of the Church, guided Paul.

It is possible, but less likely, that “the spirit of Jesus” refers to the gift of holy spirit that Jesus received from God and started pouring out into believers when the Church started on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2:33). Although we today seem to have some major problems sorting out what is meant in the verses that mention “spirit,” the believers in the first century were less confused. They understood that God gave the gift of holy spirit to Jesus, who gave it to his Church (Acts 2:33). They also understood that God and the Lord Jesus communicate with people through the gift of holy spirit. As the gift that Jesus gave, and the gift through which he operates, calling the gift of holy spirit, “the spirit of Jesus” seemed very natural. It was the spirit promised by, and sent by, Jesus to his Church (John 16:13; Acts 1:5, 8, 33). It seems very awkward to us to think that “the Holy Spirit” in verse 6 is God, and “the spirit of Jesus” in verse 7 is the gift of holy spirit that Jesus gives us, but it was not as awkward for the early readers of the Greek text who would seamlessly see both God and the gift of holy spirit in verse 6 and Jesus working in concert with God and via the gift of holy spirit in verse 7.

16:11. “So.” The Western Text (see Stephen’s text) replaces the de (but, now, so, and) with oun (therefore). Later scribes changed the text in an obvious attempt to make Paul look better (cp. Metzger, Textual Commentary). There is no necessary immediacy in de, but there is much more so in oun. That is not to say that de cannot happen immediately, or on the basis of verse 11, but it is not demanded by the word, whereas oun directly connects verses 10 and 11. This change is relatively small, but changing Scripture to make our heroes look better is bad business. Besides, as we stated earlier, the “so” does not preclude Paul’s immediate attention to the task at hand.

“ran a straight course.” Paul would have been in a sailing ship, not one driven by oars, and it is common in sailing to speak of “running before the wind.”

16:12. “Neapolis.” Neapolis (neos = new; polis = city; “New City”) was a port city of the Roman province of Macedonia (before the Roman conquest it had been a Greek city of Thrace) on the western side of the Aegean Sea. It is about 10 miles (16 km) southeast of Philippi. Neapolis has the honor of being the first city in Europe ever reached by the Apostle Paul. Besides being a port city, it was on the Egnation Way, which was one of the major roads of the Roman Empire. The Appian Way (“Way” = Road) and the Egnation Way were land and sea roads/routes. These two major routes joined together to form the Great East Road, which connected the Roman Empire and the Middle East.

The Appian Way began in Rome at the miliarium aureum, i.e., the “Golden Milestone” (many major Roman roads were marked by milestones, allowing travelers to tell how far they had traveled or how far they had to travel). From the Golden Milestone it went south along the Italian coast, eventually cutting east across the Italian peninsula to Brundisium. East bound travelers then had to decide to cross the Adriatic Sea to either Dyrachium or Apollonia, cities in Macedonia (northern Greece), both of which were on branches of the Egnation Way (the road was called the Egnation Way as it crossed Greece). From the Adriatic coast of Greece, the Egnation Way went east across the Balkan Mountains to Thessalonica. From Thessalonica there were two routes heading east that travelers could take. They could go east through Macedonia into Thrace and to the strait of the Bosphorus, or they could go south, hugging the Grecian coastline and heading down into Achaia (usually Athens or Corinth), and then travel east to the Roman province of Asia and the rest of what is now Turkey.

The Appian Way was started in 312 B.C. by the Roman Caesar Claudius, who thought it would help Rome to establish trade with the Mediterranean cultures, and knew a paved, well-maintained road made it easier for people and goods (and armies) to travel through the empire. The Appian Way and Egnation Way took generations to build, but provided easy and usually safe east-west travel by the time of the Apostle Paul.

16:13. “habitually used for prayer” (International Commentary, Acts, F.F. Bruce). The word “nomizo” relates to law, custom, habit. We translate it “assume” many times in our version because people make assumptions based on what is done by law or custom. However, in this case, Paul did not “assume” there was prayer by the riverside. He would have asked in Philippi, and been told that prayer was made “by custom” at the riverside, thus the translation “habitually.”

“whose heart the Lord opened.” The Lord Jesus cannot make someone believe, but he can work, in the person or through the circumstances, to open people to pay attention to the message of the Word. The Bible does not say specifically how he did that with Lydia to the end that she paid attention to Paul, but he did. Part of our prayers for “everyone” (1 Tim. 2:1) should be that the Lord opens their hearts to pay attention to the things of God, and then go on from that point to salvation and living the Christian life.

“pay attention to.” The Greek is prosechō (#4337 προσέχω), and according to BDAG, has three basic definitions: 1) to be in a state of alert, i.e., be concerned about, care for, take care; 2) to pay close attention to something, i.e., pay attention to, give heed to, follow; 3) to continue in close attention to something, i.e., occupy oneself with, devote or apply oneself to. As with any word with multiple meanings, the meaning in any given verse must be determined by the context and the scope of the subject. Since we know that the Lord always honors a person’s free will, he cannot open a person’s heart to “respond” to the message, as some versions translate the verse, instead, he must wait for the person to believe. However, many theologians (Calvinists, etc.) teach that a person cannot believe in God unless God first gives them the power to believe, and so according to that theology, “respond” would be an accurate translation of prosechō here, although we assert that kind of Calvinist theology is in error.

16:16. “slave-girl.” The Greek word can mean a servant-girl or a slave-girl. The context determines which is more likely. Here, the woman was owned, so slave-girl is correct.

“spirit of divination.” The Greek reads pneuma puthoma, “spirit of python.” The python spirit was the spirit that was reputed to possess the oracle of Delphi, the most famous oracle in ancient Greece. According to legend, a serpent, Python, lived in Phocis, a district of ancient Greece. Python was killed by Apollo, whose followers built a city and Temple to honor Apollo on the southern side of a limestone mountain called Parnassus. The city was called Pytho at first, and Delphi later. A natural cave in the mountain, called Pythium, was part of the Temple. Over the roof of the cave was placed a tripod throne, on which the priestess of Delphi sat. A hole in the roof of the cave and beneath the tripod supposedly brought the breath of Apollo up to the priestess, who then spoke at the inspiration of Apollo (hence the saying, ex tripodē, used of obscure sentences spoken dogmatically). When the demon took control of the priestess, “Her face changed color, a shudder ran through her limbs, and her mouth. This excitement soon turned to fury. Her eyes sparkled, her mouth foamed, her hair stood on end, and almost suffocated by the ascending vapor, the priests were obliged to retain the priestess on her seat by force; then she began, with dreadful howlings, to pour forth detached words, which the priests collected with care, arranged them, and delivered them in writing to the inquirer… [The oracle] enjoyed the reputation of infallibility for a long time;…” (Encyclopedia Americana, 1947, p. 626, 627). The designation “python spirit” was later used of anyone who revealed the future, then it eventually degenerated to refer to ventriloquists as well. This slave girl had a python spirit, and was delivered of it.

16:18. “in the name of Jesus Christ.” This phrase means, in essence, “by the authority of Jesus Christ.” It is a cultural phrase that refers to the authority a person has due to his relationship with the one being named, who in this case is Jesus Christ. In Christian culture, “the name of Jesus Christ” gave the user authority, just as using the name of any other ruler or great person would give the one who used it authority. [For more on the name of Jesus Christ, see commentary on Acts 3:6].

16:19. “had gone out.” The owners of the slave girl were not Christian, but they clearly understood that their slave had the power she had because of an indwelling demon. They were very angry when Paul commanded it to leave in the name of Jesus. This is a good example of how ignorance and greed can be very hurtful to people. The owners did not care about the woman, and actually probably thought that the demon was a blessing of some sort, bringing her notoriety.

“agora.” The Greek word is agora (#58 ἀγορά; pronounced ā-go-rā’ (not, ā-gor’- ā)), and the Greek word is simply transliterated into English. Agora is an interesting word to translate because it has two distinct meanings in the Bible: an oriental marketplace and a Greek or Roman agora.

When it is used in the Gospels, agora refers to the oriental marketplace, or bazaar. In the oriental marketplace there were rows upon rows of shops, all crowded together, or else there were narrow streets lined with shops. Thus “marketplace” is a good translation of “agora” in the Gospels.

In contrast, in a Greek or Roman city, the “agora” was the name of a specific part of the city (the Latin word is forum, from which we get our English “forum.” It is related to the word foris, meaning “outside,” because it was an outside area). The agora was the center of town and public life. It was an open area surrounded by shops. In larger towns it could be an acre or more in size. The open area usually had an altar (for divining the will of the gods by sacrificing an animal and looking at its liver, or some other similar ritual), statues of the gods or prominent people, a judgment seat or place for a tribunal (which is why the people dragged Paul to an agora to be judged; Acts 16:19).

Like our “malls” today, the agora in a Greek or Roman city was more than a place to shop. It was a place to meet people, hang out, get the news, see what the local government was doing, eat, and, of course, shop. Translating agora as “marketplace” in Acts does not accurately communicate the meaning of the word, because it gives a wrong impression. Since “agora” referred to a specific place in town, we should learn what it is and what usually happened there. One final note: although it is true that Herod the Great did try to model some Jewish cities after Roman cities and build agoras in them, those cities were few, and the nature of the Jewish religion, being against pagan sacrifice, divining, and statues, made the Jewish agoras more like the oriental marketplaces than the agoras in Greek and Roman cities.

In the REV there are a number of verses in which agora is translated as “marketplace,” reflecting the oriental marketplace or bazaar of the typically eastern city (Matt. 11:16; 20:3; 23:7; Mark 6:56; 7:4; 12:38; Luke 7:32; 11:43; 20:46), and there are also verses in which agora was left untranslated, reflecting the Greek agora or Roman forum which was in those cities (Acts 16:19; 17:17; and Acts 17:5, which mentions the agoraios, those who loiter at the agora. For more information on the agora, see: The Interpreter’s Dictionary of the Bible; The Zondervan Pictorial Encyclopedia of the Bible; Holman Bible Dictionary).

16:30. “what must I do to be saved?” In the Greek this is a purpose-result clause with hina and the subjunctive mood. See Matthew 2:15 entry, “resulting in…what was spoken being fulfilled.” The man was asking, “What must I do for the purpose of getting saved, which results my salvation?” There is both the sense of purpose and result in the jailor’s question.

16:34. “because.” The participle is sometimes causal, and that is the case here. The jailor rejoiced, “because he had believed.” Belief in Christ should bring us great joy. The NIV gets the sense of the participle: “he was filled with joy because he had come to believe in God.”

Chapter 17
17:1. “Now when they had traveled through Amphipolis and Apollonia.” Both cities were on the Egnation Way, the great Roman road that connected Rome with the Eastern Empire, but the reason Paul did not stop to evangelize there is clear from the last half of the verse and the first part of Acts 17:2. Apparently, neither city had a synagogue. Paul’s custom was to go into synagogues in cities he visited, because that is where he could be most immediately effective. He had a common background with the Jewish people; the God fearing Greeks who were there would have already been looking to the Law for truth, and his credentials of being from Jerusalem and even being trained by the well-known and greatly respected Rabbi Gamaliel (Acts 22:3) would have given him some credibility.

17:3. “explaining and setting before them that it was necessary…” Paul worked hard to get the people in the places he visited saved; born again. This verse records him teaching in the synagogue in Thessalonica, and his message contains both elements of what it takes to be saved according to Romans 10:9: that Christ is Lord, and that God raised Jesus from the dead. That Jesus was lord is not explicitly stated in the verse because it did not need to be in the context of a first-century synagogue. The first century Jews to whom Paul was speaking knew very well from many verses in the Old Testament that the Messiah (the Christ) would be “lord” and would rule over God’s creation (cp. Ps. 2:7-12; 110:1; Isa. 9:6-8; 11:1-5; Dan. 7:13, 14; Micah 5:2-5). What they needed to know was that the man named Jesus was in fact their Messiah, that the Messiah had to suffer and die (many Jews did not know this about the Messiah; cp. Matt. 16:22; John 12:34) and that God had raised Jesus from the dead. Paul specifically taught all those things.

“out from among the dead.” See Romans 4:24. Wuest: “out from among the dead.”

“not a few.” Figure of speech; Tapeinosis (demeaning, or understatement). The number of prominent women who believed Paul is understated to magnify it.

“prominent women.” Women may not have had an outwardly prominent place, such as a seat in the senate, but as always, they had great influence. Not unexpectedly, some scribes had a problem with that and altered the text to “wives of prominent men.” (Ehrman, Misquoting Jesus). The alteration is easily dismissed, but is shows that there has been a bias against women in the Church.

17:5. “Jews.” This is the restricted use of the word “Jews,” referring only to the religious leaders of the Jews and those who oppose God and Christ. [For more information, see commentary on John 1:19].

“those who loitered at the agora.” The Greek is agoraios (#60 ἀγοραῖος), and means those who stood idle at the market, those fellows who have nothing to do but to hang around waiting for daily work, or to cause trouble. For a study of the Agora see commentary on Acts 16:19.

17:6. “dragged.” The Greek word is surō (#4951 σύρω), and means to “drag, drag away, pull, or draw.” The Jews fomented a mob which was angry and dangerous, and “assaulted” (“to come near with the intention of harm; attack” BDAG) the house of Jason. When they could not find Paul, they grabbed the disciples they could find and dragged them to the agora (where the Jews got the rabble in the first place) before the rulers. There is every indication the “dragging” was literal. Although we today use “drag” as a hyperbole to indicate we did not want to go (“I got dragged to the mall by my sister”), there is no indication that it was used that way in the first century, especially in this context.

17:9. “had taken money as a security.” Literally, the words mean “had taken enough.” The Greek word ikanos (#2425 ἱκανός; pronounced hi-ka-nos) means “enough, sufficient, adequate, considerable,” but the phrase, λαβόντες τὸ ἱκανὸν, is an idiom in the Greek, and referred to the sufficient amount of money that had to be given for a bond, bail, or security. Idioms in any language do not usually make good sense when translated literally, so it is the meaning of the idiom in the original language must be translated into the receptor language.

In this instance, the Jews had incited a mob against Paul and his companions, who could not be found at the time, so the mob brought Jason to the rulers. Especially since Thessalonica was the largest city in Macedonia and the Roman capital of the province, the rulers did not want any trouble with Rome, especially when Paul was, according to the speakers of the mob, promoting that there was another king besides Caesar, one Jesus. The rulers of the city took a large sum of money from Jason to assure (or secure) that nothing would happen, which meant that Paul’s activities in the city would have to stop. This put both Paul and Jason in a bind, because if Paul did defy the rulers and continue to preach, Jason would lose a sizeable amount of money. Paul had to leave Thessalonica at night to protect both himself and Jason (Acts 17:10), and it may also explain why Paul wrote that he was “orphaned” from the Thessalonian believers, as if he had been forcibly torn from them (1 Thess. 2:17 and 18). The literal meaning of aporphanizo (#642 ἀπορφανίζω) in 1 Thessalonians 2:17 is to be separated by becoming an orphan.

17:12. “along with many of the Greek women of high standing.” The adjective “many” is pulled forward from the previous clause, which says many of the Jews believed, which is immediately followed by kai (“also,” “along with”), indicating many of them also. Then the text shows that men believed also, “not a few.”

This is one of the many verses that were altered by scribes and copyists because of the anti-feminine bias that entered the early Church from the culture around them. The original text read καὶ τῶν Ἑλληνίδων γυναικῶν τῶν εὐσχημόνων καὶ ἀνδρῶν οὐκ ὀλίγοι. (also many of the prominent Greek women, and of the men, not a few”). In codex Bezae, a fifth century manuscript, the text was altered to καὶ τῶν Ἑλλήνων καὶ τῶν εὐσχημόνων ἄνδρες καὶ γυναῖκες ἱκανοὶ ἐπίστευσαν (“and many of the Greeks and men and women of high standing believed;” See Metzger; Textual Commentary on the Greek NT). This shows us that by the 400’s AD it was offensive enough to some scribes that the woman were referred to as “prominent” and were placed before the men, that they would change the text so that the men and women were both of high standing and the men came before the women. The NT dramatically elevated the position of women in the family, the Church, and society. [For more about women’s position, see commentary on Acts 18:26; Rom. 16:7; 1 Cor. 7:2; 14:34; 1 Tim. 2:11, 12; 3:2; 5:14; and 1 Pet. 3:7. Also, see Appendix 12: “The Role of Women in the Church”].

17:15. “Athens.” Athens was the largest city in Greece, and controlled a region called Attica, which was very fertile and also had rich mineral deposits of silver, lead and marble. The most well-known building in Athens is the Parthenon on the Acropolis. Inside the Parthenon stood a huge statue of the city’s protector-goddess Athena, who was the goddess of wisdom, the arts, courage, inspiration, civilization, law and justice, mathematics, strength, strategy, and crafts. She was a warrior goddess, but for righteous warfare; the defense of home and society.

17:18. “foreign divinities.” The word for “divinities” is daimonion (#1140 δαίμονιον), which for the New Testament authors meant demons. However, here it must be understood from the viewpoint of the Athenians, who would not have used the term to refer to demonic forces but standard divinities (Lenski; cp. Barnes’ Notes). “This is the only place in the NT where daimonia has the neutral Greek sense ‘divine beings’ rather than the normal NT sense of ‘evil spirits’” (Oxford Bible Commentary). The Athenians were so lost in polytheism that they assumed Paul was just preaching about another set of gods.

“Jesus and the resurrection.” It is likely that the Athenians thought “the Resurrection” was a foreign god (IVP Bible Background Commentary; Lenski; Barnes’ Notes). The Greek word anastasis (#386 ἀνάστασις) was also a female name and the Greeks were accustomed to turning concepts, such as Fate, into female gods. They had no conception of the one true God, and believed that other lands each had their own peculiar divinities. This is why they used the plural, “foreign divinities;” they thought Paul was preaching two gods, Jesus and Anastasis.

17:22. “very religious.” The Greek is deisidaimonesteros (#1174 δείσιδαιμονέστερος; from deidō (δείδω) to fear, and daimōn (δαίμων) deity, or in the New Testament “demon” (although to the Greeks it just referred to a god)). It is used both in a good sense as “very devout” or “very religious”, and in a bad sense as “too superstitious.” Paul was trying to win the hearts of the people, so in this context it should be “very god-fearing,” “very devout,” “very religious,” etc. The Greeks would have already been suspicious of Paul, who was both a Jew and from out of town, so if he started his speech to them by insulting them, they would have ignored him completely. Instead, he pointed out to them that they were “very devout,” something they were proud of, and something which would have gotten their attention.

The Athenians were indeed “very god-fearing.” The Roman Petronius said that it was easier to find a god than a man in Athens, and Pausanias, a traveler and geographer from the second century, said there were more images in Athens than in the rest of Greece combined. Wiersbe correctly says, “He [Paul] began politely by saying, “I see that you are very religious” (not “too superstitious” as in KJV). He called attention to an altar dedicated “TO AN UNKNOWN GOD,” and he used this object to preach to them the True God about whom they were ignorant.” Paul would then continue to show these Athenians that he was worthy of their attention and thinking soundly by quoting one of their own poets.

17:24. “shrines.” This is the same Greek word usually translated “sanctuary,” naos (#3485 ναός). However, because the context deals with pagan worship, “shrine” is a better translation: the word “can be understood in the more restricted sense shrine, where the image of the goddess stood” (BDAG).

17:29. “Divine One.” The Greek word is a substantive, an adjective being used as a noun. See, F. F. Bruce, Acts.

17:31. “justly judge.” The phrasing in Greek is in the dative case; it is the preposition en and the word usually translated “righteousness,” dikaiosune (#1343 δικαιοσύνη). This usage is most likely a dative of manner, meaning, “God will judge the world in a manner that is righteousness, or righteously” (Wallace, Exegetical Syntax). The dative of manner is meant to answer the question, “how will God judge the world?” He will judge it justly. “out from among the dead.” See Romans 4:24. Wuest: “out from among those who are dead.”

Chapter 18

18:5. “wholly occupied.” The word is sunecho (#4912 συνέχο) and in this context means “to occupy someone’s attention intensely; to be occupied with or absorbed in” (BDAG). It can also mean to “impel to action; direct; or urge on.” Even though Paul was working with Aquila and Priscilla (18:3), he was nevertheless wholly absorbed with the message and preaching of the word. It seems a misunderstanding of this verb led to a textual corruption, reading “impelled by the spirit” (Cp. KJV) rather than “absorbed in the word” (Metzger, Textual Commentary).

18:6. “defaming words.” The Greek verb blasphēmeō (#987 βλασφηµέω) means showing disrespect to a person or deity, and/or harming his, her, or its reputation. [For more on blasphēmeō, see commentary on Matt. 9:3].

18:22. “And when he had landed at Caesarea, he went up to Jerusalem and greeted the congregation.” Verses such as this one require the reader to be familiar with the geography of the Mediterranean. Paul sailed from Ephesus, which at his time had its own harbor not far from the city, eastward to the major port city of Israel, which is Caesarea. From there “he went up and greeted the church.” Going east and uphill from the coast, Paul would have traveled to Jerusalem, the headquarters of the Christian Church, and where some of the apostles, especially James, were located. From Jerusalem, he traveled back “down” (not “south” as in our English, for he went north but downhill) to Antioch, where he had begun his second itinerary journey a couple years earlier. Robertson gets it correctly (Word Pictures in the New Testament): “He went up and saluted the church (anabas kai aspasamenos tên ekklêsian). The language could refer to the church in Caesarea where Paul had just landed, except for several things. The going up (anabas, second aorist active participle of anabainō) is the common way of speaking of going to Jerusalem which was up from every direction save from Hebron. It was the capital of Palestine as people in England today speaking of going up to London. Besides ‘he went down to Antioch’ (katebê eis Antiocheian, second aorist active indicative of katabainō) which language suits better leaving Jerusalem than Caesarea. Moreover, there was no special reason for this trip to Caesarea, but to Jerusalem it was different. Here Paul saluted the church in the fourth of his five visits after his conversion (9:26; 11:30; 15:4; 18:22; 21:17). The apostles may or may not have been in the city, but Paul had friends in Jerusalem now. Apparently he did not tarry long, but returned to Antioch to make a report of his second mission tour as he had done at the close of the first when he and Barnabas came back (14:26-28). He had started on this tour with Silas and had picked up Timothy and Luke, but came back alone. He had a great story to tell.”
18:26. “Priscilla and Aquila.” This is the reading of the earliest and best manuscripts, not “Aquila and Priscilla,” as some later texts and the KJV have. Metzger writes: “Apparently the Western reviser desired to reduce the prominence of Priscilla” (Metzger: Textual Commentary). As the Church developed, the attitude about women, that they were inferior to men, came back into the accepted doctrine of the Church, so it is not unusual that a later scribe would “adjust” the text so that the man came first in the list. That God put Priscilla first here is very important in understanding that in the New Testament, God elevated the status of women so that men and women were “one” in Christ (Gal. 3:28). Priscilla (this is the diminutive of her proper name, Prisca, which Paul used) and Aquila are always mentioned together, and four of the six times they are mentioned, her name precedes his. Although the Bible does not say why Priscilla is usually named first, the two most common explanations are that she was of higher rank in Roman society or she was more prominent in the Church than he was.

This verse is also important because it gives good evidence that women were not forbidden to instruct men, as is often taught in the Church today. The sentence in Acts not only shows Priscilla instructing Apollos, but can even mean she took a leading role in doing so: “But when Priscilla and Aquila heard him, they took him aside and expounded to him the way of God more accurately” (cp. commentary 1 Tim. 2:11, 12).

19:2. “receive holy spirit.” This refers to the holy spirit that is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”.]

19:3. “Then with what kind of baptism were you baptized?” This sentence is hard to translate without giving the wrong idea, and the words are packed with meaning. The sentence is more literally, “Into what, then, were you baptized,” but the Greek word eis, “into,” (#1519 εἰς; pronounced “ace”), is being used in the “static sense” and here means “in connection with” or “in relation to,” not “into” as if motion was being indicated (cp. R. C. H. Lenski, “The Interpretation of Acts;” also commentary on Romans 6:3]. That would make the literal translation the very awkward: “In connection with what, then, were you baptized?” Paul was not asking, “How were you baptized,” as many versions say, as if he was asking whether or not they were baptized in water. Actually, as Newman and Nida write: “he was asking them what was the meaning or significance of their baptism. And the answer that they give to the question is ‘the baptism of John,’ by which they indicate that the meaning of their baptism was the same as that which John the Baptist had proclaimed” (Newman and Nida, A Translator’s Handbook on the Acts of the Apostles). Lenski adds, “And ‘what’ (neuter gender) show that Paul had in mind, ‘in connection with what name?’ This explains why the disciples answered, literally, “In connection with (eis) John’s baptism,” giving the name of John. For ease of reading we just have, “With John’s baptism.” We might say more fully, “It had to do with John’s baptism.”

The Greek sentence is hard to translate in a way that gives us the correct meaning in English. That is due in part to the difficulty of the sentence construction and that the words are pregnant with meaning, but it is also due to our general misunderstanding of baptism. If we translate the sentence, “Into what then were you baptized,” the automatic answer we give is “water.” If we translate the phrase “How were you baptized,” again, we think “water.” Even if we are a little closer to the Greek meaning and translate, “What kind of baptism did you receive,” we still tend to think the answer to the question is “water.” But the disciples did not answer saying “water;” they understood the question and answered that they were baptized in connection with John’s baptism, which, while the element was water, the baptism was a “baptism of repentance” (Mark 1:4; Luke 3:3; Acts 13:24; 19:4).

John baptized with a “baptism of repentance,” which is a genitive of relation, meaning a baptism related to repentance, specifically a baptism that symbolized repentance. John’s baptism was a symbolic act that portrayed and symbolized in a visible way the invisible cleansing that had occurred in God’s sight when the person repented (cp. John Schoenhheit, Baptist the History and Significance of Christian Baptism). Thus, if we were to paraphrase and expand the meaning of Paul’s sentence, we might say something like: “In connection with what name were you baptized, and what did it mean?” The answer, “In connection with John’s baptism” was enough, because Paul knew that John’s baptism was a baptism that symbolized repentance.

Paul was genuinely shocked when the disciples said they had not heard about holy spirit, because as long before that as the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2:38), Peter had taught about the coming of holy spirit. But here at Ephesus were disciples who had not heard that the gift of holy spirit had been given. It is possible that they were some of John’s disciples who moved to Ephesus before Pentecost, or perhaps they had been evangelized by one of John’s disciples who left Judea before Pentecost (perhaps after John was killed) and had not heard of the coming of holy spirit (they had almost certainly heard John, or one of John’s disciples, tell that the holy spirit was going to come, after all, the prophets had been saying that for centuries, but they meant they had not heard that it had already come).

This verse shows that in the opening decades of the Christian Church, believing in Christ was associated with “being baptized in holy spirit,” otherwise known as receiving holy spirit. People who genuinely believed in Christ’s death and resurrection were baptized in holy spirit, and the proof of that was that they then manifested the gift of holy spirit, certainly most usually by speaking in tongues, but also by interpretation and prophecy. And that is exactly what we see here in Acts 19. The disciples had confessed their sins in association with being baptized in John’s baptism. But confessing sins does not get a person saved in the Grace Administration [for more information on the Grace Administration, see commentary on Ephesians 3:2]. What gets people “born again,” i.e., “baptized in holy spirit,” in the Grace Administration is believing Jesus is Lord and that God raised him from the dead (Rom. 10:9).

19:5. “baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus.” The word “into” is the word eis, and is being used in the static sense (see commentary on Acts 19:3). Literally, they were baptized “in connection with the name of Jesus Christ,” or “in association with the name of Jesus Christ,” and that baptism was the baptism in holy spirit.

19:6. “the holy spirit came on them.” This refers to the holy spirit that is the gift of God. [For more information on the uses of “holy spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”]

“spoke in tongues.” For more on speaking in tongues, see commentary on 1 Corinthians 12:10 and 14:5.
19:9. “the Way.” This was one of the earliest, if not the earliest, formal designations of the Christian Faith, and it is used in Acts 9:2, 19:9; 22:4; 24:14, 22. [For more information, see commentary on Acts 9:2].

“Tyrannus.” The Greek means “tyrant,” and Turannos (also sometimes spelled Turannios) was a common masculine name, although some scholars have mused that it may have been a designation given to him by the way he taught in his school. However, it may have also become the name of the school and not the personal name of the man who ran it at that time.

19:18. “Many also of those who had believed.” The verb tenses in the Greek text make it clear that the people had believed in the past, so they were already Christians. This event occurred during Paul’s third missionary journey, which started in Acts 18:23. However, he had been to Ephesus before, on his second missionary journey (Acts 18:19), and also Apollos had been teaching there, as well as Aquila and Priscilla (Acts 18:24-26). Thus it is no surprise that when Paul came to Ephesus on his third missionary journey, there were already disciples there (Acts 19:1). However, Ephesus was a center of the practice of magic. The statue of the goddess Artemis, in the Temple of Artemis in Ephesus, which was one of the seven wonders of the ancient world, had magical inscriptions on it that were reported to be very powerful (John Polhill, The New American Commentary: Acts). Just from the culture around them, these disciples had been steeped in magic and apparently did not give it up when they got born again. This is similar to Christians who get saved but continue to consult their horoscope; use “charms” to supposedly ward off evil; or dabble with séances, palm readers, or psychics. A person can be saved and still participate in evil. Under the teaching ministry of Paul, these Christians in Ephesus finally came forward and confessed their practices, and renounced them. The fact that this is recorded in Acts is clearly more than a historical notation. It is an example to follow. Christians everywhere should renounce astrology, witchcraft of all types, “psychic” involvement, charms and other “protective” superstitions and practices that supposedly bring “good luck,” and any other practice that relies on things other than God for help, information, blessings, and protection.

“were coming.” The Greek verb is in the imperfect tense, so “kept coming” (as the NASB) is better than just “came,” particularly in this context. Those who had believed kept coming forward, little by little, confessing their deeds. Some had the courage to come forth immediately, others did as they saw other believers go before them. This is the value of public confession and repentance: there are some who draw their courage to go forward from seeing others go forward first.

“divulging their practices.” The Greek word for “practices” is praxis (#4234 πρᾶξις). It is difficult to translate in this context because it has both a general definition and a technical definition, and both likely apply here. The general definition is an action or deed, which in this context would be an evil deed, and some versions, such as the NIV, even say “evil deeds.” However, ancient Greek sources reveal that praxis was also used in a technical sense for the practices of magic, including spells. Thus, F. F. Bruce translates the verse, “Many of those who believed also came and made confession, divulging their spells” (New International Commentary on the New Testament). Also, the New Jerusalem Bible has: “Some believers, too, came forward to admit in detail how they had used spells.” No doubt both the general and technical definitions apply. Some of the believers in Ephesus simply came forward and described the evil they had been involved with, while others came forward and specifically described the magic and witchcraft they had been involved with, including the casting of spells. We decided that, because the general definition of “evil deeds” included the specific definition of involvement with magic and witchcraft, that it would be best to put the general definition in the REV, and let the reader learn about the more specific meaning from the commentary.

19:19. “50,000 pieces of silver.” The piece of silver was the silver argurion (#694 ἀργύριον), which in Ephesus at that time was almost certainly the coin known as the Attic silver drachma (“Attic” referred to the fact that it came southern Greece, most principally, Athens). The silver drachma could buy one sheep at that time, so we could value the scrolls as 50,000 sheep, but sheep are more expensive today than they were then, so that valuation would give an inaccurate rendering. A more accurate way to value the coin was by realizing that it was a day’s wage for a laborer (or back then, a soldier). So if a laborer makes $8 per hour, or $64 in a work day, then $64 times 50,000 is over three million dollars. This shows the growth of the Christian population in the area at the time.

19:21. “resolved in the spirit.” This is one of the times when “spirit” (pneuma) refers to a person’s attitudes, thoughts and desires. The phrase is equivalent to “resolved in himself.” The NAB translates the phrase, “made up his mind” and the NIV translates the whole phrase simply by the word “decided.” Other verses that use “spirit” as a product of the mind include: “Blessed are the poor in spirit” (Matt 5:3); “The spirit is willing, but the body is weak” (Matt. 26:41 NIV); and, “…how happy Titus was, because his spirit has been refreshed by all of you” (2 Cor. 7:13 NIV). This cannot be the instrumental use of the Greek word “in” (en), making the phrase read, “resolved by the spirit” as if Paul was being guided by the Lord via the gift of holy spirit. The reason it cannot be that this verse is referring to Paul’s being guided by the Lord is that it says Paul resolved to go to Jerusalem. Yet it is clear from the scope of Scripture that the Lord did not want Paul to go to Jerusalem (20:22; 21:4, 10-12). The Lord cannot direct Paul to go to Jerusalem and also tell him not to go. It was Paul’s decision to go to Jerusalem, and the Lord tried very hard to dissuade him, but was not successful. Paul went, and spent the next several years of his life in jail because of it, first in Caesarea, then in Rome.

19:23. “the Way.” This was one of the earliest, if not the earliest, formal designations of the Christian Faith. [For more information, see commentary on Acts 9:2].

19:31. “Asiarchs.” The title “Asiarch” was the designation given to a man from the wealthy class who was a delegate from a city of Asia to a council of men that helped defray the cost of public games and events, and to regulate the worship of Rome and the emperor in the province. The evidence is that there were ten Asiarchs each year (cp. Lenski). Some of them may have been priests of various religions. Ordinarily they would not have been together in Ephesus, so it is likely that some game or festival was happening in Ephesus at the time. We have no information about how Paul became friends with some of these powerful men. We can see that, like true leaders, they acted quickly and decisively when it seemed as though Paul was going to go into the theater, and they sent to warn him not to.

19:37. “defamers.” The Greek verb blasphēmeō (#987 βλασφημέω) is transliterated (not translated) from the Greek into English as “blasphemy.” However, “blasphemy” in English has a different meaning than blasphēmeō does in Greek. In English, “blasphemy” is only used in reference to God. It is insulting God or a god, insulting something considered sacred (like defacing a cross or statue of Jesus), or claiming to be God or a god in some way. However, in Greek, blasphēmeō and blasphēmia (the noun) did not have to refer to God or a god, although they could, but were common words that were used of someone speaking against another. The primary meanings were showing disrespect to a person or deity, and/or harming his, her, or its reputation. [For more on blasphēmeō, see commentary on Matt. 9:3].

In this situation Demetrius the silversmith, who feared for his livelihood, and the Town-clerk, who no doubt feared the wrath of Rome if there were a riot, had different agendas. Demetrius was correct that even though Paul may not have been in the Temple of Artemis speaking directly against her, he was saying that man-made images were not gods, and in that sense he was indeed defaming, or hurting the reputation of Artemis and every other Roman “god.” Demetrius, who correctly was concerned about his income, saw clearly that if what Paul was preaching was accepted by the people, their livelihood would be in jeopardy. The town clerk, on the other hand, correctly assessed that there was a right way to get things done, and a riot would not go well with Rome.

19:40. “in danger of being charged with rioting.” The Roman emperor and senate highly valued peaceful conditions, and rewarded them. In this case, Ephesus was the capital of the Roman province of Asia (now western Turkey), and had given it quite a few privileges. Now, because of this riot, those privileges were in jeopardy, including its degree of self-government (there is no record of a Senatorial governor being present there). This case involving Demetrius the silversmith is a mini-vignette of how demons and demonized people promise one thing but actually deliver another. The whole episode started with Demetrius saying how the tradesmen were “in danger” of losing their wealth, and thus started the riot that ostensibly would have somehow maintained the greatness of Artemis and the city of Ephesus. In fact however, the riot put Ephesus “in danger” of losing its privileges.

Chapter 20

20:2. “Greece.” Particularly Corinth. Paul had founded the Church at Corinth (Acts 18), and it was from there that he penned the Epistle to the Romans. He was going to sail from Corinth to Syria (likely Antioch, his home base and where he had started his third missionary journey; Acts 18:23), but decided to take the land route through Macedonia, then across the Aegean Sea and stop briefly at a few cities, eventually sailing to Caesarea, the port of Jerusalem (Acts 21:8).

20:12. “not a little comforted.” This is the figure of speech tapeinosis, or demeaning. It is the deliberate demeaning, or lessening of something in order to elevate or increase it. It often comes in the form of an understatement. We are aware that sometimes the most powerful way to emphasize something is to understate it. “Not a little comforted?!?” The believers probably threw quite a party. The understatement in the text causes the reader to add emphasis that is greater than a plain statement of fact could provide. Thus versions such as the NIV and NASB, which just say, “were greatly comforted,” not only eliminate the beautiful figure tapeinosis, but eliminate the emotion that the reader adds to the biblical text.

20:22. “look.” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!).

20:23. “the Holy Spirit.” “The Holy Spirit” is the name for God that emphasizes His power in operation. God is called “the Holy Spirit” in a number of verses in the NT, including Matthew 1:20; 12:32; and Hebrews 9:8. [For more information on the uses of “Holy Spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”]

“warns.” The Greek is diamarturomai (#1263 διαμαρτύρομαι) and means to solemnly testify or earnestly charge, and can mean “warn” as it does here and in Luke 16:28. This is the first time the Book of Acts tells us that Paul was being directed not to go to Jerusalem. He should have let others carry the financial gift that had been collected for the believers there. Although this is the first mention that Paul was not to go that is written in Acts, the verse does tell us he had been being warned “in every city.” Paul had left Achaia (Corinth) with money for the poor believers in Jerusalem and traveled by land north back through Macedonia (he had come to Corinth by way of Macedonia), then sailed east toward Caesarea, the port city of Jerusalem. Thus he had passed through many cities before reaching where he was, Miletus, a port city of Ephesus (Acts 20:17). [For more on Paul’s travel to Jerusalem and its consequences, see commentary on Acts 21:12, 14.]

20:24. “life.” The Greek word is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoo-kay’), often translated “soul.” The Greek word has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person or animal; an individual person; or attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. Here psuchē refers to the physical life of the body, which is why most versions translate it “life,” which is accurate in this context. This is one of the many verses that shows that psuchē, soul, is not immortal and is not the reason people can live forever. Paul would never say that he did not count his everlasting life valuable, but he would say he did not count his earthly life valuable, because he knew he would be raised from the dead. [For a more complete explanation of psuchē, “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’”].

20:25. “listen.” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!). In this context, “listen” seemed more polite than “look.”

20:28. “the Holy Spirit.” “The Holy Spirit” is the name for God that emphasizes His power in operation. God is called “the Holy Spirit” in a number of verses in the NT, including Matthew 1:20; 12:32; and Hebrews 9:8. [For more information on the uses of “Holy Spirit”, see “ 6: Usages of ‘Spirit’”].

“the blood of his own” refers to the blood of his own son, Jesus. See Graeser, Lynn & Schoenheit, One God and One Lord.

20:32. “have been made holy.” The Greek is hagiazo (#37 ἁγιάζω), “to be sanctified,” but it is a perfect tense participle in the passive voice. The Christian is sanctified the moment he becomes born again, by the presence of the holy spirit. Most commentators do not understand it, and have “are” sanctified, but this verse refers to the one-time event in the life of the believer when he or she gets saved. Interestingly, Lenski realizes this is referring to a one-time event in the past, so he has it refer to the dead Christian being in heaven.

20:35. “the words of the Lord Jesus.” This quotation, “it is more blessed to give than to receive” is not recorded in the gospels. It is what is known as an agrapha (a—not, graphe—writing). It is clear that the Lord spoke much more than what is recorded in the gospels, for the totality of Jesus’ speech can be read aloud in just several hours. John was clear that not every thing about Jesus’ life is recorded in scripture (John 21:25). People would have remembered other things that he taught and preserved them as well.

The actual quotation itself is the figure of speech chreia, a quotation that gives the author’s name (cp. Bullinger, Figures of Speech).

Chapter 21

21:4. “not set foot in Jerusalem.” This is the second time the Word of God reveals that Paul was not to go to Jerusalem, and this is the clearest warning, because the disciples in Tyre told Paul “through the spirit” not to go to Jerusalem. This clearly reveals the will of God. These disciples were not speaking from emotion, they were speaking by revelation. Paul had made up his mind to take the financial offering of the Gentiles on to Jerusalem, and was so set in his mind about it that he did not listen to the voice of God concerning the situation. (See commentary on Acts 21:12, 14).

21:11. “the Holy Spirit says.” “The Holy Spirit” is the name for God that emphasizes His power in operation. God is called “the Holy Spirit” in a number of verses in the NT, including Matthew 1:20; 12:32; and Hebrews 9:8. [For more information on the uses of “Holy Spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”].

21:12. “not to go up to Jerusalem.” During Paul’s third missionary journey, Paul gathered an offering from the Gentiles to take to Jerusalem (Rom. 15:26; cp. 2 Cor. 8 and 9). When he was still in Ephesus and wrote 1 Corinthians, he wrote to the Church at Corinth to start taking collections of money that could then be taken as a gift to Jerusalem (1 Cor. 16:1-3). At that time he was unclear about whether he would take the money to Jerusalem himself or if someone else would take the money and bring along personal letters from him (1 Cor. 16:3, 4). By the time Paul traveled westward across the Aegean Sea and wrote 2 Corinthians from Macedonia (it is possible he wrote from either Philippi or Thessalonica, both towns with established churches) he had made up his mind to travel with the financial gift himself (2 Cor. 8:19). He confirmed this shortly thereafter in the Epistle to the Romans, which he wrote when he reached Corinth (Rom. 15:28; cp. 2 Cor. 8:20). At first he was going to sail from Corinth to Syria (Acts 20:3), but he decided to take the land route back to Macedonia, and then he sailed from there for Syria and Jerusalem, but he made a number of stops along the way. Although he touched land in Syria, he never returned to Antioch, his home base and the city from which he had started his missionary journey.

At some point on that journey from Corinth to Jerusalem with the money that had been collected for the believers at Jerusalem, God started telling Paul not to go to Jerusalem. The first account of this is Acts 20:23 when Paul was in Miletus, the port of Ephesus, speaking to the elders from the Church at Ephesus. By that time he reported that God warned him “in every city” about going to Jerusalem. Thus, it is possible that as early as when he left Corinth with the money, he was already getting revelation not to go to Jerusalem himself, but let others take the gift. When Paul landed at Tyre, the disciples there told Paul “through the spirit” that he was “not to set foot in Jerusalem” (Acts 21:4). This makes the will of God crystal clear, because the believers at Tyre did not speak on their own initiative, or from their emotion or love for Paul, but “through the spirit.” Then, in Caesarea, the daughters of Philip the Evangelist prophesied to Paul, and the context is that he should not go to Jerusalem (Acts 21:9). Then, Agabus, a recognized prophet in the Church, spoke to Paul about the consequences of going to Jerusalem, and all the disciples begged him not to go (Acts 21:10-12). Paul ignored the warnings from God, went to Jerusalem, and spent more than 4 years as a prisoner as a result. More than two years in Caesarea (Acts 24:27), months traveling to Rome (Acts 27:9; 28:11), and at least two years under arrest in Rome (Acts 28:30). Paul disobeyed the will of God and went to Jerusalem, and his ministry was severely curtailed as a result.

The Day of Pentecost was the summer of 28 AD. When Paul left Corinth and went through Macedonia, it was approximately the Feast of Passover in 57 AD (cp. Acts 20:5). He wanted to be in Jerusalem by Pentecost (June) (Acts 20:15). If he was in Jerusalem in June of 57, and arrested shortly after, he spent more than two years in jail in Caesarea (Acts 24:27). Then he traveled by boat to Rome, leaving in the late summer of 59 AD. This trip took at least 4 months, and perhaps 6. He sailed late in the year, and after “much time had been lost” (Acts 27:9), came to port on the island of Crete. The ship sailed from Crete after the Day of Atonement (Acts 27:9; late September to early October). After the shipwreck and wintering on the island of Malta, Paul sailed for Rome. It would now be late winter or early spring of 60 AD. When Paul got to Rome, he was “two whole years” under house arrest (Acts 28:30). This would have been from the spring of 60 to the spring/summer of 62. These dates are generally agreed upon by scholars, although sometimes they differ by a year or so earlier or later.

Understanding the chronology helps us put the magnitude of Paul’s imprisonment in perspective. Although he had met the Lord and become a believer years earlier, he did not start his powerful public ministry until he was called to Antioch, likely 45 AD (cp. Acts 11:26). If Paul was arrested in 57, he had only spent 12 or 13 years in public ministry, which also involved three missionary journeys. Then he was under arrest for almost 5 years. If his ministry had come under attack while he was free and working hard to teach and preach, and out among the people doing healings and miracles (cp. 1 Cor. 2:3-5), it was much more seriously attacked, and never really recovered from, the time he spent in as a prisoner. By the time he wrote 2 Timothy, he said, “all who are in Asia turned away from me” (2 Tim. 1:15). That is amazing, because the Roman province of Asia, which we today know as western Turkey, was where Paul spent more than two years (Acts 19:8-10) teaching the Word of God. If Paul got out of jail in Rome in 62, he was likely martyred by 66 or 67, a mere 4 or 5 years later, not enough time to rebuild the foundation of his church. This is especially true since the great fire of Rome was June of 64 AD, and after that the Emperor Nero engineered a much more severe persecution against Christianity than had existed before, and the free movement of the Word was more difficult.
Most Bible preachers take the one phrase, “The will of the Lord be done” (Acts 21:14), and say that Paul’s going to Jerusalem was the will of God. However, that idea is incorrect for many reasons. First and foremost, there is no verse anywhere that says Paul was going to Jerusalem by revelation or according to the will of God. While he was in Ephesus he was not even sure he would go (1 Cor. 16:3, 4). So at some point he decided to go, but there is no verse that says that decision of his was the will of God. Second, God does not contradict Himself. If the revelation from God in Acts 21:4 was not to go, and that flow continued uninterrupted from then to Acts 21:14, why would anyone decide the will of God was for him to go? On what basis? Thirdly, although sometimes people doing God’s will suffer hardship, often it is a consequence of disobedience. In this case, had Paul heeded God’s warning, he could have sent other people to Jerusalem with the money, and he himself left for Rome on his way to Spain, just as he had a longing to do (Rom. 15:22-24).

21:14. “The will of the Lord be done.” This verse does not mean that it was the will of God for Paul to go to Jerusalem, even though that is what almost every Bible teacher says it means. In this context it was a phrase used in surrender to the freewill of man, and the disciples used it, indicating their hope that perhaps God might be able to redeem a bad situation—in this case, Paul’s unwise decision to go to Jerusalem. Why would anyone think that these disciples in Caesarea thought that Paul’s going to Jerusalem was the will of God? They were doing their absolute best to talk Paul out of going. They “pleaded” with him not to go (Acts 21:12). Would they have really done that if they thought it was the will of God for him to go? Were these disciples so immature that they knew it was God’s will for Paul to go to Jerusalem, but let their emotions rule their actions until Paul stood firm and rebuked them saying “What are you doing, crying and breaking my heart” (21:13), at which point each of them sheepishly admitted that going to Jerusalem was the will of God after all? Certainly not. These were well established believers. Philip the Evangelist, in whose house they were staying (Acts 21:8), had been one of original seven men chosen to work with the Church in Jerusalem under the direction of the Peter, James, John, and the other apostles (Acts 6:5). These were not new converts, or neophytes who let their emotions rule. God had told Paul in city after city not to go to Jerusalem. However, Paul was so emotionally attached to the Jews, and so convinced that he could win them to Christ and also help strengthen relations between the Gentile Christians and Jewish Christians, that he was not hearing the voice of God. For more details on Paul disobeying God and going to Jerusalem see commentary on Acts 21:12.

There are some Bible teachers who know that it was God’s will not to go to Jerusalem, and using the KJV, get around the “problem” of this verse by changing the punctuation. The KJV reads: “And when he would not be persuaded, we ceased, saying, ‘The will of the Lord be done.’” Changing the commas makes it read, “And when he would not be persuaded, we ceased saying ‘The will of the Lord be done.’” This punctuation makes the verse say that the disciples stopped saying to Paul, “The will of the Lord be done,” but the Greek text does not allow the phrases and punctuation to be changed that way. When Paul would not listen to the revelation from God, the disciples, in giving up trying to persuade him, said, “The will of the Lord be done,” i.e., God, somehow work your will in this. God gave mankind freedom of will, and when someone does not do the will of God, the rest of us can only pray that somehow or other God can get His will done in the situation.
21:28. “Place.” The word “place” was a designation of the Temple, see commentary on topos in Matthew 24:15.
21:39. “no insignificant city.” Paul could have said that Tarsus was a “great” city, or an “important” city, but perhaps the Roman officer would have argued with him (national prejudices can run deep). This is the figure of speech, tapeinosis, or demeaning. It is the deliberate demeaning, or lessening of something in order to elevate or increase it. It often comes in the form of an understatement. We are aware that sometimes the most powerful way to emphasize something is to understate it. By understating the fact, and saying that Tarsus was “no insignificant city,” the Roman could hardly argue the point, and still got the message that Paul was therefore traveled and educated.

Chapter 22

22:4. “the Way.” This was one of the earliest, if not the earliest, formal designations of the Christian Faith, and it is used in Acts 9:2, 19:9, 23; 22:4; 24:14, 22. [For more information, see commentary on Acts 9:2].
22:9. “understand.” This is one of the meanings of the Greek word, which is akouo (#191 ἀκοοω). By comparing Acts 9:7 and 22:9, we learn that the men with Paul heard the sound of Jesus’ voice, but did not understand what he said. See commentary note on Acts 9:7.
22:12. “deeply religious.” The Greek is eulabes (#2126 εὐλαβής); see commentary on “godly man” in Acts 10:2.
22:22. “for he should not have even been allowed to live this long.” A Greek idiom for an obligation that has existed from the past and is still unfulfilled at the present. Cp. Robertson, Word Pictures in the New Testament; Lenski’s commentary. The Jews are so offended that they are saying that he should have already been executed for his beliefs and actions.

Chapter 23

23:12. “bound themselves under a curse.” The curse was that they would not eat or drink until they killed Paul. They had an out, of course. The Rabbis could dissolve the curse, and we can be sure that none of these men starved to death.
23:23. “third hour of the night.” This is about our 9 PM. Ordinarily the night was broken into watches, but sometimes a more accurate measurement was needed. [For the hours of the day and the watches of the night, see commentary on Mark 6:48].
23:31. “Antipatris.” A city about 40 miles (64 km) northwest of Jerusalem, and about 25 miles (40 km) from Caesarea. This is the only place this city is mentioned in the New Testament. It was built, or built up, by Herod the Great in 9 BC., and named after his father, Antipater. It had been the Old Testament site of Aphek (Josh. 12:1; 1 Sam. 4:1; 29:1; 1 Kings 20:26ff; 2 Kings 13:17; etc.).
Chapter 24

24:4. “clemency.” Greek is epieikeia (#1932), “consideration springing from a recognition of the danger that ever lurks upon the assertion of legal rights lest they be pushed to immoral limits. The virtue that rectifies and redresses the severity of a sentence” (Zodhiates, Word Study Dictionary). See commentary on “reasonable,” 1 Timothy 3:3. “Clemency” is a disposition to be merciful, and especially to moderate the harshness of judgment. It falls within the semantic range of epieikeia, and given the governmental context, is a good translation.

24:6b-8a. Most modern versions leave this out, recognizing from the textual evidence that is almost certainly a later addition (see Metzger, Textual Commentary; Lenski; Kistemaker). If left in, this addition changes “from whom” Felix would learn; it makes Felix learn about Paul by examining the Jews who accused him.

24:14. “as a follower of.” The Greek used the preposition, kata (#2596 κατά), which is often translated “according to,” or “in accord with,” but has many meanings (cp. BDAG Greek-English lexicon). A very clear rendering of the Greek kata in this context, while not being strictly literal, is “as a follower of” (cp. NIV84; NLT; New English Bible; The Source NT).

“the Way.” This was one of the earliest, if not the earliest, formal designations of the Christian Faith, and it is used in Acts 9:2, 19:9, 23; 22:4; 24:14, 22. [For more information, see commentary on Acts 9:2].

24:15. “a resurrection of both the righteous and unrighteous.” Although the resurrection of the righteous and the resurrection of the unrighteous are separated by 1,000 years (Cp. Revelation 20:4-13), this verse mentions them both without paying attention to the time separation. Until the Church Epistles stated that the Christian Church would be taken up to heaven from the earth in an event theologians refer to as “the Rapture,” (1 Thess. 4:16-18), the Bible had only revealed that there would be two resurrections. The first resurrection is called, “The first resurrection” (Rev. 20:5, 6); “the resurrection of life” (John 5:29); and “the resurrection of the righteous” (Luke 14:14; Acts 24:15). The first resurrection will occur at the beginning of the 1000 year Millennial Kingdom of the Messiah. It will occur soon after the Battle of Armageddon right at the start of the Millennial Kingdom, which is Christ’s kingdom on earth [see Appendix 3: “Christ’s Future Kingdom on Earth”]. The first resurrection will include all the righteous people from Genesis through the Battle of Armageddon, with the exception of the Christian Church, because Christians will have been Raptured into heaven before the Tribulation started [see commentary on 1 Thessalonians 4:17].

The second resurrection is called “the resurrection of judgment” (John 5:29), and “the resurrection of the unrighteous” (Acts 24:15), because most of the people who are raised at that time will be judged to be unjust. This second resurrection will occur after the 1000 year Millennial Kingdom is over (Rev. 20:4-13). Since all the righteous people who ever lived before the Millennial Kingdom had already been raised from the dead, it is a fair question to ask who in the “resurrection of the unrighteous” was left to be declared righteous and granted everlasting life? To answer that question we must remember that the Millennial Kingdom will last 1000 years, and the “natural people” in it will live and die in that time. Those natural people who lived righteous lives will be raised at the last resurrection, the resurrection of the unrighteous, but will be granted everlasting life.

The only two resurrections mentioned in the Old Testament and Gospels are the resurrection of the righteous and the resurrection of the unrighteous. The Rapture was not revealed until the Church Epistles were written. There are some verses in the Bible that refer to both of these resurrections in the same verse or context, and these include: Daniel 12:2; John 5:29; Acts 24:15; and Revelation 20:4-13.

That there would be a resurrection from the dead should have been well known from the Old Testament. Job said that even though his flesh was destroyed in the grave, in his flesh he would see God (Job 19:25-27). Isaiah 26:19 says the earth will give birth to the dead. Ezekiel 37:12-14 is very clear about the resurrection. Daniel 12:2 and 13 both speak of the resurrection, as does Hosea 13:14.

The end times events will occur in the following order: The Christian Church will be Raptured into heaven and there will be seven years of Tribulation on earth. The Tribulation will end when Christ comes down from heaven and fights the Battle of Armageddon and conquers the earth (Rev. 19:11ff). Then the Devil and his demons will be imprisoned (Rev. 20:1-3). Then, close together, Christ will judge those people on earth who survived the Tribulation and Armageddon; this judgment is called the Sheep and Goat Judgment (Matt. 25:31-46), and also the first resurrection will occur (Rev. 20:4-6). Then there will be the 1000 year Millennial Kingdom of Christ [see Appendix 3: “Christ’s Future Kingdom on Earth”]. Then the Devil and his demons will be loosed and there will be another war (Rev. 20:7-10). Then there will be the second resurrection, the Resurrection of the Unrighteous (Rev. 20:11-15). Then God will establish a new heaven and earth (Rev. 21 and 22).

24:22. “the Way.” This was one of the earliest, if not the earliest, formal designations of the Christian Faith, and it is used in Acts 9:2, 19:9, 23; 22:4; 24:14, 22. [For more information, see commentary on Acts 9:2].

25:6. “judgment seat.” The Greek word is bēma (#968 βήμα; pronounced bay’-ma), and it was a term that originally meant the space which a foot covers (a foot-length) or a place for the foot. Then it came to mean a raised place mounted by steps, and thus often a platform or the official seat of a judge or ruler, and thus the place from which awards and rewards were given and punishment meted out.

25:13. “Agrippa the King.” This is Herod Agrippa II. He was the great grandson of Herod the Great through his favorite wife, Miriamne, He was living in and incestuous relationship with his sister, Bernice. The territory ruled by Agrippa II was quite large. Claudius gave him then more, t then Nero expanded the territory over which he ruled.

Chapter 26
26:11. “I tried to force them.” The Greek word is anagkazō (#315 ἀναγκάζω), to force or compel, and in this verse it is a conative imperfect active (Robertson; Word Pictures in the New Testament), expressing what Paul tried to get the Christians to do. Sometimes he would have been successful, sometimes not.

“defame.” The Greek verb blasphēmeō (#987 βλασφημέω) means showing disrespect to a person or deity, and/or harming his, her, or its reputation. [For more on blasphēmeō, see commentary on Matt. 9:3].

26:18. “the Adversary.” The Greek word for Adversary is Satanas (#4567 Σατανᾶς), which has been transliterated into “Satan” in most versions. This causes the meaning of the word, which is important, to be lost. For more information on it, see the note on Mark 1:13. For information on the names of the Devil, see Appendix 14: “Names of the Slanderer”.

26:23. “first.” There is some controversy as to whether the word “first” goes with rising from the dead (REV, ESV, NIV, etc.) or proclaiming the light (NASB). The natural word order in the Greek tends to make first go with resurrection from the dead, which is certainly the case: Jesus was the first person and only person who was raised from the dead and never died again. The verse becomes somewhat more ambiguous if “first” goes with “proclaim.” Being raised is not a prerequisite for proclaiming truth, and there were others before him who proclaimed truth.

“the People.” A term the Jews used of themselves. In the Jewish mindset, there were “the people” (the Jews) and everyone else, “the Gentiles.”

---

Chapter 27

27:1. “we.” This verse starts the third and last “we” section of Acts, when Luke joins Paul on his travels. The three “we” sections are: Acts 16:10-17; 20:5-21:18; and 27:1-28:16.

27:2. “embarking in a ship.” There were many things about traveling by ship that were challenging. First, there were no passenger ships until modern times. With the exception of ships that specifically carried imperial persons, every ship was a working vessel or a military ship. Anyone wanting to travel by ship had to first find a ship going in the direction they wanted, then haggle for lodging space, which was most often just a small place on the deck.

There were no food or provisions for passengers; any passenger had to bring his own food and wine, though some ships provided water. Especially the larger ships had the equivalent of a galley where meals could be cooked, and although the crew would always have first dibs, passengers would be allowed to cook meals during off times. Travelers also had to bring anything comfortable they wanted to sleep on, and their own covering for warmth and in case of rain. They were usually allowed to pitch a little tent-like covering at night and take it down during the day.

Also, ships had no set sailing schedule. They had to wait for the right tide, the right wind, and for the omens to be right as well. As bad omen would cancel sailing.
Furthermore, there were days that were considered bad to start a trip (like our Friday the 13th). No skipper would leave port on days such as August 24th, October 5th, November 8th, etc.

Almost always the ships would travel in sight of land. Instruments like the sextant had not been invented, and it was easy to get way off course in the open ocean, so skirting the land was usually the best course of action for ships. The exception was usually some of the large grain ships that plied the ocean and ran, for example, the trip from Alexandria Egypt to Rome.

27:10. “lives.” The Greek word is psuchē, often translated “soul.” Paul was in no way saying that people’s everlasting souls were in danger from the storm. He was using “soul” of the natural life of the body. See commentary on Acts 20:24.

27:14. “northeaster.” The Greek is eurakulon (Εὐρακύλων), which is a hybrid sailor’s word from the Greek euros, east wind, and the Latin aquilo, north wind. Gales from the NE are not uncommon in the Mediterranean.

27:24. “see!” The Greek word is idou (#2400 ἰδού), and it is used to get our attention. See commentary on Matthew 1:20 (“Look!”).

27:27. “drifting across.” The Greek, diapherō (#1308 διαφέρω), in this case refers to drifting across, although we know from the record in Acts that the wind was actually blowing them steadily. There is no reason to translate the text as “to and fro,” “up and down,” etc. The wind was in a steady direction. They were being blown across, (or “through,” cp. Lenski) the sea. Cp. BDAG Greek-English lexicon; F. F. Bruce, The New International Commentary on the New Testament: Acts.

“Adriatic.” This could well be confusing to the modern reader. In Roman times the Adriatic Sea extended to the middle of what we know as the Mediterranean Sea, but today geographers limit it to the sea between Italy and Greece. The ship Paul was on was in the middle of the Mediterranean Sea, between Crete and Malta. It was not in the modern Adriatic Sea.

27:38. “grain.” The Greek word is sitos (#4621 σίτος), which means “wheat,” or “grain” in general. Here is most likely means grain in general. It is not likely that the only grain on board was wheat, even though wheat was the most desirable grain. At that time of year, all of the grain harvests were over.

Chapter 28

28:4. “Justice herself.” Cp. NET translation, “Justice herself has not allowed him to live!” Justice comes from the Greek dikē (#1349 δίκη, pronounced dee-kay’), which BDAG defines in this verse as “Justice personified as a deity.” The pagans conceived of Justice as a female deity who ensured that proper punishment was given to criminals: “A goddess who personifies justice in seeking out and punishing the guilty—‘the goddess Justice.’ … Although a number of modern English translations have rendered dikē (δίκη) “justice,” preferring to use an abstraction, in the original setting it is almost certainly a reference to a pagan deity” (NET Translation Note, Acts 28:4). Kistemaker writes: “The natives conclude that their goddess Justice is meting out divine punishment on an evildoer” (New Testament Commentary: Acts). Thus we have added “herself” in italics to make clear that a personified deity was intended.

28:25. “the Holy Spirit rightly spoke.” “The Holy Spirit” is the name for God that emphasizes His power in operation. Here it refers to a prophetic word inferred to Isaiah in roughly 700 BC. God is called “the Holy Spirit” in a number of verses in the NT, including Matthew 1:20; 12:32; and Hebrews 9:8. [For more information on the uses of “Holy Spirit”, see Appendix 6: “Usages of ‘Spirit’”].

28:26, 27. Quoted from Isaiah 6:9, 10.

28:27. “grown dull.” The Greek is pachunō (#3975 παχύνω), and means “to make thick, to make fat, to fatten,” and it is used metaphorically for making someone stupid or dull.

28:28. “this salvation of God has been sent to the Gentiles.” The theology known as “ultradispensationalism” starts a new administration with this verse [For information on the Administration of Grace, see commentary on Ephesians 3:2]. E. W. Bullinger, in his book, The Foundations of Dispensational Truth, tries to explain why. The essence of Bullinger’s argument is that up until this point the parousia, the personal coming of Christ, was presented to Israel if they would repent, but after this the parousia is not mentioned again. Thus it is at this point a new administration starts which is primarily to the Gentiles, and is set forth in the later epistles such as Ephesians, Colossians, and Philippians.

We do not agree that a new administration should start with this verse. For one thing, there is no genuinely clear evidence for the change of dispensation in Acts 28. There is nothing like the expulsion from Eden, the giving of the Law, or the pouring out of the gift of holy spirit on the Day Pentecost. Furthermore, there are not major doctrinal changes, which are always a huge part of any change in administration (a point we will expand upon shortly). Furthermore, the fact that Paul said that the Gospel would be sent to the Gentiles was not new. In fact, carefully reading Acts 28:28 shows it does not ever say that it was new, just that the Good News would go to Gentiles who would listen rather than Jews who would not. This qualifies as a genuine prophecy, but not the start of a new administration.

If the inclusion of the Gentiles were going to start a new administration, then it seems that Acts 10, where the Gentiles were clearly included in the Church, would qualify better than Acts 28. The Acts 10 record would then have been further confirmed by Acts 11:26, when many Gentiles were added to the Church and believers were first called “Christians,” a term including both Jews and Gentiles. The inclusion of the Gentiles would have been even further confirmed by the Jerusalem Council in Acts 15 (likely 49 AD). Then, highlighting that the Gentiles were now the major converts to the Church would have been Romans 11:28, written less than a decade after the Counsel (likely 57 AD) which says that the Jews were enemies of the Gospel. Although Paul was still actively trying to win Jews through his three itinerary journeys, it is clear that his greatest successes were among the Gentiles, something that can be easily seen by reading Acts.

As to the ultradispensational position that the offer of the parousia has somehow been withdrawn because the Jews rejected Jesus, we find it untenable (cp. Bullinger, Foundations, p. 179, 180). Although the word “parousia” is not used in the later epistles of Ephesians-Colossians, the concept of the parousia certainly is. Furthermore, it is in 1 John 2:28, which we would argue is later than Acts 28. The parousia relates to the coming and presence of Christ, which is in all the Epistles, and is the heart of the book of Revelation. The parousia was not withdrawn simply because the Jews rejected it. They just will not get to enjoy Christ’s return.

A primary motivation that ultra-dispensationalists have for making a new administration starting in Acts 28 is that it gets rid of the manifestations of holy spirit such as speaking in tongues, prophecy, and healing. Most ultradispensationalists do agree that God still heals, but not as a manifestation of holy spirit like Peter, Paul, and others operated, but rather just as something that God occasionally does by fiat for His own glory. But the manifestations of holy spirit cannot be done away with without getting rid of holy spirit. By definition, if you have holy spirit, you have manifestations. That lesson goes back to Numbers 11 when the 70 who got the spirit immediately began the manifestation of prophecy. But Ephesians and the later epistles clearly mention the holy spirit. Ephesians explains the whole process of receiving holy spirit: we hear, then we believe, then we are sealed with holy spirit (Eph. 1:13, 14). But for ultradispensationalism to work, Christians must have the gift of holy spirit but not have the manifestations of holy spirit. That is not possible. The manifestations are inherent with the gift of holy spirit. Ephesians, for example, mentions prophets in the Church, but prophecies are a manifestation of the gift of holy spirit. Also, the manifestations of the spirit are clearly in the book of Revelation, because prophecy is mentioned a few different times. It makes no sense that the manifestations of holy spirit would be given to the early church and to the people in the book of Revelation, but not given to the Church today.

Considering the evidence, there is just no valid reason for starting a new administration in Acts 28.

28:29. Verse omitted in REV. The textual evidence shows that this verse is a late addition to the Western text, and from there it was copied into some Byzantine texts (from which it came into the KJV). The addition was possibly made because of the abrupt transition in the language from what is now verse 28 to verse 30. Other versions omit this verse, including the NIV, ESV, and RSV.
1:1. "servant." The Greek is doulos (#1401 δοῦλος), and it means "servant" or "slave." Doulos is a word that has been misunderstood by Christians. Many Christians compare doulos to the "bondservant" of the Old Testament (cp. Exod. 21:5 and 6), but the two are totally different. The Old Testament commanded that slaves who were fellow Israelites be released every seven years (Deut. 15:12). If a slave did not want to be freed, he became a bondservant, a slave serving willingly. This was unique to Israel, and the rest of the world treated slaves differently. In all countries but Israel, a slave was a slave for life unless freed by the master.

In the Greek language, doulos was the standard word for "slave," but it was also used of servants, whereas technically, the position of "servant" was also described by some other Greek words. When it comes to slaves, many of them suffered miserably and had no recourse for humane treatment. However, many slaves were loved by their owners and treated so well they were more like servants than what we think of as slaves. Also there were many slaves, particularly in the realm of public works, that had authority over non-slaves. For example, it is estimated that an emperor of Rome might have some 20,000 slaves (Jerome Carcopino, Daily Life in Ancient Rome, p. 70), and his slaves oversaw much of the daily running of the empire, especially public works projects such as buildings and sewers. These slaves bossed around the workers, many of whom would have been free citizens--some even of rank in the Empire (who complained about it bitterly).

When it comes to the "servants," the Roman Empire was full of servants, who, while technically "freemen," were in debt and treated like slaves, blurring the distinction between "servant" and "slave." Given the social situation in the Greco-Romans empire, it is easy to see how the word doulos was used to refer to both slaves and servants, but this makes it very hard to translate the New Testament. Each use of doulos has to be examined individually to see if "slave" or "servant" is a better fit, and sometimes there is not enough context to make a good decision. Whether a person was a servant or slave is very important to us today, because in our culture there is a huge difference between the two positions. However, that was not a big problem when the Greek NT was written, because as was stated above, when the word doulos was used, the people had a more instinctive grip on the situation of the one being called a doulos and the technicalities of the position were not nearly as important.

"called." The Greek is klētos (#2822 κλητός), an adjective, not a verb. In the Gospels, "called" referred to an invitation; such as in the man called people to a banquet. In the Epistles, the word klētos has a different meaning. In the Epistles, "called," or "the called," refers to those who have accepted the invitation. This makes it awkward to translate accurately for the beginning student. Translating it just "called" leaves a steep learning curve for the beginning reader, while translating it "one who has accepted the call" seems far to lengthy and awkward. Romans 1:1 is saying that Paul is "one who accepted God’s call and is an apostle."
In that light, Romans 1:7 does not mean, “To all who are loved by God in Rome, invited to be holy ones,” it means, “To all who are loved by God in Rome who have accepted God’s call and are now holy ones.” Similarly, Romans 8:28 does not mean, “Now we know that in all things God works for the good of those who love him, even to those who are invited, in accordance with his purpose.” It means, “Now we know that in all things God works for the good of those who love him, even to those who have accepted God’s call, in accordance with his purpose.

Every human is “called,” invited, to salvation (as the word is used in the Gospels), but not every person accepts the call. In the Epistles, everyone who is “called” has accepted the call and is saved. Every Christian has accepted the call, and every Christian has a ministry, a service, in the Body of Christ. God sets the members in the Body as it pleases Him (1 Cor. 12:18), and each member has a different job to do (Rom. 12:4-6). Paul accepted God’s call and was placed in the Body as an apostle, thus he is “a called apostle.”

Although some translations say, “called to be an apostle,” that is not quite correct. It is not as if God called Paul “to be” an apostle. God called Paul to be saved, but the way “called” is used in the Epistles, the word klētos is saying that Paul accepted God’s call and was appointed as an apostle. Similarly, saying Paul was “called as an apostle” is not quite correct either; that could mean he was an apostle when he was called. Although Paul certainly had the potential to be an apostle when he was invited to be saved, he did not have the ministry of an apostle until the Lord had sent him. [For more on “called,” see commentary on Romans 8:28].

“appointed.” This is from the Greek word aphorizo (#873 ἀφορίζω), which has two basic meanings, (1) “to remove one party from other parties so as to discourage or eliminate contact, separate, take away” and (2) “to select one person out of a group for a purpose, set apart, appoint” (BDAG). The meaning in this context is (2); definition (1) obviously does not apply—Paul was certainly not separated away from other parties and discouraged to make contact when he was set apart for the Gospel. For this reason we have avoided the translation “separated” (cp. KJV; ASV), and chosen “appointed” to communicate the meaning of the Greek word. Paul was appointed; he was selected for a purpose, namely, to bring about the obedience of faith among the nations (v. 5).

“Good News.” The Greek word euaggelion (#2098 εὐαγγέλιον; pronounced eu-an-ge-lee-on, the double g is pronounced as an “ng”), from the prefix “eu,” which means “good” (and is used in such words as “euphemism: good speech; eulogy: “a good word;” and euthanasia: “a good death”), and from aggelos (pronounced “an-ge-loss”), which means “message,” and from which we get “angel,” or messenger. It is the good message, or more colloquially, the Good News.

Many versions have “the Gospel of God.” The phrase “Gospel (or Good News) of God” occurs 8 times in the NT. As “the Good News of God,” care must be taken to read the context to determine what the “Good News” is, which Good News is being referred to in the context. In Mark 1:14, it is clear “the Gospel of the Kingdom,” is the “Good News” being referred to. The other 7 uses of the phrase “Good News of God” appear in the writings to the Christian Church. In this case in Romans, the Good News is a general statement about Jesus Christ. There is no definite article in the Greek text, so it is not “THE good news of God” but rather “a good message from God,” which He promised before through His prophets...concerning His Son Jesus Christ. This does not refer to the Good News of the Grace of God, because that was not promised beforehand, but was a secret hidden in God (Eph. 3:2-10). There are cases, such as in 1 Thessalonians 2:2, 8, and 9, where the Good News of God that Paul is referring to is the message he taught and preached, which was the Good News about the Grace of God (“the Good News of the Grace of God,” Acts 20:24).

1:3. “in respect to the flesh.” In the sense that it is used here, the flesh declared, if you will, or revealed, that Jesus was the Son of David. Both his mother, Mary, and his adopted father, Joseph, were from the line of David (Matt. 1 and Luke 3, respectively). There is a parallel between verse 3 and verse 4 in that the flesh revealed that he was the Son of David, and God revealed that he was the Messiah, something He declared when He raised him from among the dead.

1:4. “the Son of God in power” Jesus was declared to be “the Son of God with power” by the resurrection. He had been the Son of God since his conception, and even demonstrated some power in his life on earth. However, his resurrection showed beyond a shadow of a doubt that he was indeed, “the Son of God with power.” The phrase “with power” could be conflated to add clarity to “the Son of God invested with power.”

“in respect to the spirit of holiness.” The “Spirit of Holiness” is God. Jesus was declared to be the Son of God with power when he was raised, and this was “according to” God. God had placed in His Word some references to the death and resurrection of His Son (Ps. 16:10, Acts 2:31; Ps. 2:7, Acts 13:33; Isa. 53:11, 12). We have to remember that through all ages there have been false Messiahs. How are we to know who is the real Messiah? God had said in his Word that He would raise the Messiah from the dead. So when Jesus got up from the dead, he was, by that fact, declared to be the Son of God, and this was according to God (the Spirit of Holiness), i.e., according to what God had said. We use the same general expression today when we say, “According to so and so,...” when we mean, according to what the person had said. There are commentators who believe that the spirit of holiness is Christ’s new spiritual body or spiritual nature. Lenski does a good job of discussing that and showing that it really does not fit in this instance. For one thing, the phrase “the Spirit of Holiness” would not be something that most people would assume would be Jesus’ new body, while on the other hand, the unusual word for “holiness” here, hagiosune (ἁγιωσύνη), occurs 4 times in the Septuagint, all of them referring to an attribute of God. By referring to God as the Spirit of Holiness there is an emphasis on His unique holiness, which is then juxtaposed with the unique power he has invested in His Son.

1:5. “through whom.” The translation “through whom” is the proper way to translate the Greek preposition dia (#1223 διά; pronounced dee-ah'). This emphasizes the role of Jesus as the mediator between God and mankind. We have to remember how natural it was for people in Paul’s time to see Jesus as the mediator between God and mankind, and that to get to God, a person had to go through Jesus. In the biblical world it was customary that people did not get to see an important person without going through some kind of mediator. So, for example, when some Greeks wanted to see Jesus, they went to Phillip, one of the apostles (John 12:21). The centurion who wanted his servant healed sent a delegation of Jews to Jesus, rather than come himself (Luke 7:3-5). R. C. H. Lenski (The Interpretation of St. Paul’s Epistle to the Romans) writes:

Back of these acts concerning Jesus was God, and so God is equally back of this our reception of grace and apostleship ‘through’ Jesus Christ, our Lord. Dia is exactly right, for by making Jesus the medium it leaves the connection with God as the ultimate agent.

“we.” This is a literary plural, also known as the plural of majesty. Paul means only himself (cp. Kistemaker; John Murray, “Epistle to the Romans,” New International Commentary on the New Testament). This is the same use of the plural in Genesis 1:26: “let us make man in our image.” For another example of the literary plural, see Ezra 4:18.

“obedience of trust.” This is the genitive of production: Paul is speaking of the obedience produced by faith. Lenski, who calls this a subjective genitive, explains the phrase, “faith renders obedience.” He also provides a good list of other possibilities that he rules out: Attributive genitive: obedience marked by faith; objective genitive: obedience to the faith; appositional genitive: obedience which is faith. [For more on the genitive of production, see Daniel Wallace, Greek Grammar Beyond the Basics, p. 104ff].

“all for the sake of his name.” Lenski has shown that this phrase refers to the whole verse, including the receiving of the grace of apostleship and the great commission. By adding the word “all,” we see that the phrase refers to more than the bringing of obedience that is done for his name’s sake.

1:6. “Jesus Christ’s called ones.” The Greek has “Jesus Christ” in the genitive case, the called ones “of Jesus Christ,” but the genitive is possessive, so “Jesus Christ’s called ones” makes the sentence read easy. For more on “called,” see commentary on Romans 1:1.

1:7. “called ones, holy ones.” This phrase has been understood many different ways, which can be seen by reading different versions. This is in part due to the fact that there are three adjectives in a short phrase, and in Greek an adjective can be used in many ways, including a predicate nominative when a verb is not actually present but supplied, which is where we get the common reading, “called to be saints.” In this verse “beloved,” “called,” and “holy” are all dative masculine plural adjectives modifying the same subject: “All” [who are in Rome]. The rendering “called to be saints” (NIV, KJV, ESV) takes the Greek adjective “called” (kletos, #2822 κλητός) as if it were a verb, and then takes the Greek adjective hagios (#40 ἅγιος) and translates it as a predicate nominative modifying “called.” However, this seems incorrect. The straightforward reading of the Greek seems to treat all the adjectives in the verse attributively. (See: Dana and Mantey p. 118). Lenski agrees that “called to be saints” is not correct (as does Meyer). However, he says that “called” is used as an adjective modifying “holy,” which is using “holy” as a noun (holy ones), not an adjective, so he notes the phrase is saying “saints because called.”

The NASB reads, “called as holy,” which seems better than “called to be holy,” but the problem is that it still makes “called” a verb in the sentence, which seems incorrect. One of the problems we have in English is that “called” seems automatically to be a verb, which it is not in the Greek. The book of Romans emphasizes salvation by faith and who we are in Christ as God’s saved Church. Thus it seems appropriate that God would open the epistle by stating and thus emphasizing what each Christian is: “beloved,” “called ones,” and “holy ones,” and the Greek can easily and naturally be read that way.
When it comes to the word “called” (klētos), in the Gospels it referred to an invitation, but in the Epistles it refers to those who have accepted the invitation and are saved [For more on “called,” see commentary on Romans 1:1 and Romans 8:28].

Although the scope of Scripture shows us the dominant meaning of this verse is that we are “called ones” (those who have accepted God’s call), and “holy ones” (those who are holy in God’s sight), it is an undertone in the verse that we have been “called to be holy.” There is no question that God has called us to live a holy life, and Christians are commanded to “be holy” (Eph. 1:4; 1 Pet. 1:15, 16). Thus there are undertones of the figure of speech amphibologia (double entendre) in this verse, with God both telling us what we are and also how we should live. Fittingly, God can say that we are holy, and we are to be holy, in one phrase. However, for the translation, it seems the dominant meaning in Romans (and 1 Cor. 1:2) is that God has made us holy.

1:9. “in my spirit.” This phrase has been interpreted many different ways. In the Bible, the word “spirit” can refer to a large number of different things. These include, God (the “Spirit” in John 3:8); Jesus, who is referred to as “the Spirit” after his resurrection (2 Cor. 3:17); the gift of God known as holy spirit (Acts 2:38; 8:15; 10:44; 19:2); angels, who are “ministering spirits” (Heb. 1:14); demons (Matt. 8:16; Luke 9:39); “breath” or “life,” as when the girl’s pneuma, breath or life, returned when Jesus raised her from the dead (Luke 8:55); wind (John 3:8); and attitude or thoughts, as when Christ said, “The spirit [attitude] is willing, but the body is weak” (Matt. 26:41b).

In this case, the fact that Paul refers to this as “my spirit” makes it clear that this verse is referring to the gift of God that he received when he was born again [For an understanding of the “gift of holy spirit” in contrast to “the Holy Spirit,” see, The Gift of Holy Spirit: The Power to Be Like Christ, by Graeser, Lynn, Schoenheit]. Many commentators think that the use of “in my spirit” is roughly equivalent to “with my whole heart.” However that is because Trinitarian commentators are not used to thinking in terms of “spirit” as a reference to the gift of holy spirit that a person receives when he is born again. They are used to thinking that “spirit” refers to “the Holy Spirit,” the third person of the Trinity. However that cannot be the case in this verse because Paul speaks of “my spirit,” in the sense of his personal ownership. While personal ownership certainly does not apply to God in any way, it is true of the gift of holy spirit that God gives when a Christian gets born again. The gift of holy spirit that a Christian receives when he is born again is very much “his” spirit. Paul does more than just serve God with his whole heart, something he makes clear through the entire Epistle, he serves God “in” his spirit, i.e., in connection with, and in relation to, his spirit (cp. note on “in,” Eph. 1:3).

To really serve God, the Christian must not only serve God with his whole heart, soul, mind, and strength, in the flesh, but he must walk by the spirit of God and thus by revelation and divine guidance. That is what Paul is emphasizing here.

1:10. “succeed.” The Greek verb is euodonō (#2137 εὐοδῶ), which is a compound word from the noun hodos, “road,” and the prefix eu, “good.” Often translated “to prosper,” this word literally means to “have a good road,” i.e., have an easy, successful path ahead of you. Although it can apply to financial prosperity (1 Cor. 16:2), it is not restricted to such; the term is much broader than that. It is used in Romans 1:10 in the context of things working out well, so the Apostle Paul could visit the Romans. See commentary on “go well with you” in 3 John 1:2.
1:12. “in other words.” The Greek pronoun touto, like most pronouns, has a wide range of meanings, depending on the context. As the BDAG lexicon points out, in this case it naturally means, “that is,” or “that means.” It seems very unclear to translate touto as “that is,” because it makes what Paul is saying in this verse equal to what he said in verse 11. Paul is explaining and expanding in verse 12 what he had said in the previous verses, which the phrase “in other words,” captures very well. Other versions that use the phrase “in other words” include The New Testament in the Language of the People by Charles Williams and God’s New Covenant by Heinz Cassirer.

1:14. “non-Greeks.” The Greek word is barbaros (#915 βάρβαρος). To the Greeks, any foreigner who did not speak Greek sounded as though all he could say was “bar, bar, bar,” so a non-Greek was referred to as a barbaros. From this word we get the English “barbarian,” which most translations employ in this verse. But the English word barbarian is perhaps too harsh; for it carries either the connotation of evil, harsh people or that of warriors wearing animal skins and bearing large swords. Neither is intended by the Apostle Paul. Rather the sense of the word as he uses it refers simply to people the Romans considered foreigners, both in the language aspect (non-Greek speakers) and culture aspect (non-Hellenists). By using the phrase “Greeks and non-Greeks” the Apostle means, essentially, everyone. “In Rom. 1:14-15 Paul is describing the universality of his apostolic commitment (cf. 1:5) he is to preach to barbarians as well as Hellenes… [he] describes the whole non-Jewish world by the formula” (TDNT).

1:18. “is being revealed.” The Greek verb is apokaluptō (#601 ἀποκαλύπτω) and it means to be revealed, disclosed, or brought to light. The noun form of the word, apokalupsis (#602 ἀποκάλυψις), is translated “revelation,” and is the name of the last book of the Bible, Revelation, which reveals the end times and Jesus Christ. Romans 1:17 and 18 use the same word, apokaluptō, in the same form: present tense and active voice. Thus it means, “is being revealed,” i.e., it is being revealed at this present time, and the phrase “is being revealed” is clearer in English than just “is revealed.” Verse 17 refers to God’s righteousness that is currently being revealed, and verse 18 refers to God’s wrath that is being revealed.

Although it is certainly true that God’s wrath will be revealed in a very clear and powerful way in the future, and completely so on the Day of Judgment, His wrath is also being revealed now, in different ways. For example, He resists the proud but gives grace to the humble (James 4:6). There are people who openly defy God, and God does stand against those people in certain ways to protect and bless His people. A good example of this is Acts 13:10 when Elymas the sorcerer was stricken with blindness. However, there are much more subtle ways God’s wrath is revealed, from simply not helping people and giving them over to the often terrible consequences of their evil acts (cp. Rom. 1:24), to not, or not being able to, intervene to protect them from direct attacks of the Adversary. That is one reason that evil people get worse and worse in their behavior (cp. 2 Tim. 2:16; 3:13). What makes all this hard for us to fully understand is that although some evil people obviously seem to have terrible things happen to them, other evil people seem to do quite well. We do not see all the invisible workings of God, and so often what we do see seems confusing.

“hinder.” The Greek word is katecho (# 2722 κατέχω), and it means to hold back, hinder, prevent, restrain, suppress. In the war between truth and error, the Devil is constantly working to suppress, hinder, or stop if possible, the work of God. He often succeeds. Sadly, sometimes it is because of too little effort on the part of God’s people. For example, we are told to pray without ceasing, and one of the things we are to pray for is that “the word of the Lord may continue to run swiftly and be glorified” (2 Thess. 3:1). If Christians do not pray for the spread of the Gospel, it will not spread as efficaciously as it could have. In many cases, however, the Devil marshals his demons and those people who oppose God, and directly hinders God’s purposes. For example, Paul wanted to go to Thessalonica and support the believers there, “but Satan prevented us” (1 Thess. 2:18). This verse is very solid evidence that not everything that happens is the will of God, for surely it is not ever God’s will that truth be hindered. Scholars who think that “God is in control” or that everything that happens is God’s will take the word “hinder” in a conative sense, the sense of “trying to prevent.” In general, they argue that God’s truth always prevails, so all man can do is “try” to suppress it. While it is true that God’s truth cannot ever be completely stopped because God Himself is behind it, it is also true that Satan’s forces and evil people can indeed actually hinder, and sometimes, in some situations for a period of time, stop God’s truth.

It is often the case that the people who hinder God’s truth are in positions of authority in government. They pass laws forbidding prayer in public schools, or demanding evolution be taught in school while forbidding the teaching of creation, or forbidding evangelism. Such things are good reasons for godly people to seek positions of earthly authority. God wants righteousness to prevail on earth (1 Tim. 2:2), and He is in favor of supporting earthly governments (Rom. 13; Titus 3:1; 1 Pet. 2:13, 14), but it does not seem logical that He would expect righteous laws to be enacted and enforced by unbelievers. The things of God are foolishness to those who are unsaved (1 Cor. 2:14). One of the ministries God calls people to is leadership and administration (Rom. 12:8), and not all of the people with those ministries are called to serve in the Church. Some should lead in the government. Then they will be in a good position to enact and enforce laws that support truth and do not hinder it.

One thing that Romans 1:18 makes clear is that God is not “in control” of everything that happens and that His will is not always done. If everything that happens is God’s will, then by definition there is no such thing as hindering the truth. Anything we would think of as hindering would actually be part of God’s plan. However, there is no reason to think this verse is not clear and literal. There are people who “hinder” the truth, and that is precisely because not everything that happens is God’s will. It is the responsibility of people who believe God to stop people who do not. Although there is a measure of God’s wrath that is coming from heaven now, as this verse says, it is not enough to stop evil. If evil people are going to be stopped from hindering the truth, it is the godly people who must stop them and control society such that the truth can be freely proclaimed.

In the spiritual battle for the minds and lives of people, lies and confusion are some of the Devil’s main weapons. Anyone who has studied history or theology knows there are at least two sides to every story and two interpretations to every verse. In part this comes from ignorance—often we do not know the truth, and although we are honestly trying to attain it, we have differences of opinion. However, when it comes to the confusion that exists in Christianity, we dare not dismiss the fact that life is a spiritual battle and the Devil uses his people to introduce confusion into theology and Christianity.
in general. In the Old Testament, the false prophets confused people about the truth that the true prophets were speaking. A good example is Jeremiah versus the false prophet Hananiah (Jer. 28). Jeremiah was saying the Judeans would be captive to Babylon for 70 years (Jer. 25:11). Hananiah said two years (Jer. 28:3). Another example of evil people causing confusion and suppressing the truth occurred just after the resurrection of Jesus Christ. The soldiers told the truth about the resurrection of Jesus to the religious leaders, but they were so blinded by their hate for Jesus and their love of power and position that they denied it and perverted it for their own goals. They bribed the guards to say the disciples came and stole the body of Christ (Matt. 28:11-15). There is not much argument about what happened to Jesus’ body today, but there was in the early years of the Church, and many Jews denied the resurrection because they believed what they had heard about Jesus’ body. Matthew 28:15 says that many Jews still believed the invented story at the time Matthew was written, which was likely written in the 50’s to early 60’s AD, 20 to 30 years after Jesus died. Today there are many things that confuse people about Christianity, and it is the responsibility of each one of us to study the written Word of God and find the truth God is revealing through it. Modern “orthodox” Christianity is a blend of many things. There is some truth, such as the resurrection of Jesus Christ. However, there are some beliefs that are the result of pagan practices that have survived in Christianity. One example of this is the supposed date of Christ's birth on December 25. Another example is the belief that when a person dies, his “soul” lives on after the body dies (cp. Is There Death After Life by Spirit & Truth Fellowship International). Some of the Jews believed that during the time of Christ, but had gotten it from the Greeks after Alexander the Great conquered Israel (332 BC), and later, when many Greeks were being converted to Christianity, they too brought the belief of life after death into Christianity.

There are some beliefs in some denominations of Christianity that came much later than the early Christians. For example, the belief of some denominations that Christian ministers should not marry was inculcated into the Christian Faith in the fourth century AD, but the motivation behind the celibacy was a pagan dualism that separated flesh from spirit in a non-biblical way. We must also keep in mind that denominations differ about the truth of something based on their own perspective. For example, a group that does not allow women in ministry might say that the Cult of Isis that was prevalent in the Roman Empire introduced women to ministry but the Church Fathers caught the error and dismissed them. In contrast to that, we would say that the early Church obeyed the revelation of God and brought women into ministry, but the Church Fathers stifled the work of God, a stifling that is still in large part occurring today.

Truth is still being suppressed in many ways today, and each Christian has the personal responsibility to discover the truth and then live it. Doing nothing for the Lord because “No one can seem to agree about it” is falling right into the Devil’s trap and why he caused the confusion in the first place, while saying, “I believe this because my pastor does” is not valid now any more than it would have been to say, “I do not believe that Jesus is the Christ because my synagogue leaders say he is not.”

1:19. “plain to them.” The phrase occurs twice in the verse. The Greek uses the preposition en (#1722 ἐν), “in,” which can be treated as a dative “to,” or it can mean “plain within them” (cp. NASB), or “plain among them” (HCSB). The clearest English is “plain to them,” but the en can also refer pluralistically to the group of those who reject
God and suppress the truth, because through the collective knowledge of mankind much of what can be known about God is very evident. The knowledge of God is plain to them and plain among them.

1:20. “his invisible attributes…are clearly seen.” At first glance this is an oxymoron, and it is designed to grab our attention, but it is explained by the fact that his invisible attributes are seen by looking at what He has made.

“divine nature.” The Greek word is theiotes (#2305 θειότης pronounced thay-ah'-tais), and it means “the quality or characteristic(s) pert. to deity, divinity, divine nature, divineness” (BDAG lexicon). It only occurs here in the Greek NT, and is a rare word. Our only secular documentation occurs after the 4th century. As BDAG says, it pertains to the quality or characteristics pertaining to God, so when we see what God has made, we learn about His character. Of course, this is to be taken in the scope of the whole Bible, because there are certainly things about creation that are due to the Devil and the Fall, not to God.

The KJV translates the word theiotes as “Godhead,” but no modern version does. It must be remembered that in 1611 the Greek manuscripts that allow us to properly understand the word had not been discovered. “Godhead” is an inaccurate translation. Besides the fact that God is not a Trinity, there is nothing in nature that points to any such thing. Nothing in nature is three separate things and one thing at the same time, especially nothing that could have been known as such thousands of years before Christ.

“through the things he has made.” This includes all the things God has made. Psalm 19:1 tells us the heavens declare the glory (which in the Greek also connotes power) of God. Nature and the world around us declare the power and “divine nature” of God. Since the power and divine nature of God could easily be seen “from the creation of the world,” no one needed a microscope or telescope to see it. Even looking at mankind itself shows God’s power. Humans are definitely “remarkably and wonderfully made” (Ps. 139:14 HCSB). Despite the fact that God’s power and divine nature can be seen with the naked eye in the world around us, in the last couple decades our advanced science is revealing quite conclusively that the complex nature of life could not have originated by chance and via a purely “mechanistic” model (cp. Signature in the Cell by Stephen Meyer). Thus, at every level God’s power and handiwork is being demonstrated.

“so that they are without excuse.” One of the mental faculties of mankind is the basic ability to discern good from bad and truth from error. God made this clear in Genesis 3:22, when God said, “The man has now become like one of us, knowing good and evil.” When we combine that with God’s promise that if we seek we will find, we realize that God will lead anyone who really wants to know the truth into a basic knowledge of it. The great scientists of the past, including Copernicus, Kepler, Fay, Linnaeus, Curvier, Agassiz, Boyle, Newton, Kelvin, Faraday, Rutherford, etc., all recognized that the design they saw in the world around them was the work of a Higher Power, and Johannes Kepler said that scientists have the job of “thinking God’s thoughts after Him.” Despite their best efforts, scientists cannot explain how life came from non-life, and how “chance” and mutations produced the life in the world around us.

1:26. “females.” The Greek word is not “women” (γυνῆ; #1135 pronounced goonay) but “female” (θηλυς; #2338 θηλυς), which in this context is more degrading. See commentary on 1:27, “males… females… males with males.”
1:27. “males… females… males with males.” In this context of unnatural sexual behavior, Paul does not use the usual terms “man” and “woman,” but rather “male” and “female.” This serves two purposes. First, because the subject at hand is the proper correspondence between the sexes, using the words for “male,” arren (#730 ἄρρην), and “female,” thelus (#2338 θήλυς), draws appropriate attention to the issue of biology and what is natural. Second, as Lenski has pointed out, in this context such language is somewhat degrading, portraying the people as “nothing but creatures of sex.”

“burned with intense desire” The Greek phrase is ekkaiomai en te orexei (ἐκκαίομαι ἐν τῇ ὀρέξει), and the lexicon by Louw-Nida points out that this phrase is “an idiom, literally ‘to burn with intense desire’; ‘to have a strong, intense desire for something’; ‘to be inflamed with passion, to have a strong lust for, to be inflamed with lust.’ In some languages the equivalent idiom is ‘to boil with desire,’ ‘to feel hot in the genitals,’….” Both the word “burn” and the word “desire” are used only here in the New Testament.

1:28. “they did not approve.” This is very difficult to translate. The verb here is dokimazō (#1381 δοκιμάζω), which is used of the testing of metals or coins, which were tested then approved (or disapproved) based on the results of the test. See Commentary on Romans 12:2, “test and approve” the will of God. In this case, these immoral people “tested, then disapproved (or saw no value in) holding God in a way that fully recognized Him” (see commentary on 2:18, which also uses dokimazō.)

“fully acknowledging.” The Greek is epignosis (#1922 ἐπίγνωσις), a full and accurate knowledge or acknowledgment. This is really important, but not well represented in most translations. Cp. the following translations:

ESV: “And since they did not see fit to acknowledge God,…”
KJV: “And even as they did not like to retain God in their knowledge,…”
NIV: “Furthermore, since they did not think it worthwhile to retain the knowledge of God,…”

In contrast to those above versions, Williams gets the sense correctly: “…as they did not approve of fully recognizing God…” The phrase, “fully recognizing” cannot be underestimated. Many people who do not obey God recognize Him to some degree, and obey Him to some degree. God wants people to fully obey Him, not just to believe and act on the things about God that they want to.

1:29. “mean-spiritedness.” This comes from the Greek word kakoetheia (#2550 κακοήθεια). BDAG’s definition is very insightful: a basic defect in character that leads one to be hurtful to others, thus, mean-spiritedness, malice, malignity, craftiness. The translation “malignity” (e.g., KJV) does not express the sense of the word as well as “mean-spiritedness.

1:31. “family affection.” See commentary on Romans 12:10 and John 21:15. The Greek word is astorgos (#794 ἀστόργος), which is made up of the prefix –a, “not, no,” and storgē, which is familial love. The term however can be used in extension beyond just familial love, to be applied to others in a general sense. Louw-Nida explains the word as “pertaining to a lack of love or affection for close associates or family—‘without normal human affection, without love for others.’”

Chapter 2
2:1. “Therefore.” The Greek conjunction διό (Luke 1352 διό) means “therefore, wherefore, on account of.” At first seems confusing, because a surface reading seems to be saying that because of the vices of the evil people who have been given over to shameful acts and evil behavior, “therefore,” everyone else is without excuse if they judge anyone. Hendrickson writes: “Many are puzzled by the word ‘Therefore.’ It must be admitted that the meaning is not immediately clear.” Lenski is correct when he states that the “Therefore” connects, not just the closing verses with chapter 2, but the entire previous section, 1:18-32. Also, Paul is not writing a blanket condemnation of judging. We must judge others, and judge on a daily basis, in order to obey the commands of God. Jesus said, “Do not judge by appearances, but judge with right judgment” (John 7:24). Paul warned us to “…watch out for those who cause divisions and put obstacles in your way that are contrary to the teaching you have learned. Keep away from them” (Rom. 16:17), and we cannot keep that command unless we make judgments about people. Paul also wrote many instructions to Timothy, including who to avoid and who to select for leadership based on behavior and qualifications, which is impossible to do without making a judgment about people. To fully understand the “therefore,” we must realize it refers back to the whole previous section of Romans, and points forward to those who judge but “practice the same things” (2:1).

“in those things in which.” The point is not, in that you judge, which would simply deride the act of judging. The Greek is more specific. Paul speaks of in that which you judge—in other words, the very act that you judge, this act you are doing. Paul is not deriding being judgmental in this case, but hypocrisy.

2:4. “kindness.” The Greek word is χρηστότης (Strong’s #5544 χρηστότης), and most modern English versions read “kindness.” Kindness is a fruit of the spirit and an essential ingredient to being godly. The Devil is continuing in what has been a very successful campaign to elevate the importance of people “being authentic” and “expressing how I really feel,” and downplaying kindness. Thankfully, God is kind and tolerant toward people, and it is His kindness that finally works in them and opens their eyes to the truth and leads them to repentance. If we are going to be like God, we have to learn to be kind to others even when we do not feel like being kind. (See commentary on Galatians 5:22, “kindness”).

“Forbearance.” The Greek word is ἀνοχή (a noun: Strong’s #463 ἀνοχή), and most Greek lexicons define it as forbearance, tolerance, clemency, and patience. It refers to enduring, being patient, and holding oneself back. Richard Trench writes that it “signifies, for the most part, a truce or suspension of arms” (Trench’s Synonyms of the New Testament). The noun ἀνοχή is related to the verb ἀνεχό, “to endure, put up with, bear with.” Jesus said, “You unbelieving generation! …How long must I put up with [anēchō] you?” (Mark 9:19 HCSB).

Studying the English words “tolerate” and “forbear” shows us why the English translations differ as to how they translate ἀνοχή. To “tolerate” usually refers to what you allow; what you do not forbid. In contrast, “forbear” usually places the emphasis on self-restraint and what you hold yourself back from. The Greek word ἀνοχή contains both meanings, but in Christian circles “tolerate” usually has a bad connotation, so most versions avoid it. Sadly, most of the time we use the word “tolerate,” we use it as something we do even though we are “really bothered” by the situation and are actually just waiting for the chance to do something about it. That is the world’s way of tolerating, but it is not God’s way.

God’s way of forbearing or tolerating is the way He tolerates us: He knows He has given us free will, and so even when we are ignorant or in sin, He loves us, is kind to us, and “declares a truce” with us until we wake up to our error. If God and Christ can do that with us and others, and allow us all to live our own lives in spite of our error or sin, then we can do that too. We do not have to “tolerate” people while seething in anger, pouting, or “just waiting for the chance to straighten them out.” If we want to bring people to repentance the way God does, we have to learn to be forbearing and tolerant in a kind and loving way. It is unfortunate that the word “tolerate” has gotten such a bad reputation in Christian circles, because godly tolerance is a very important part of winning people to Christ.

Tolerance is the neutral zone between grace and truth. We are forbearing or tolerant in those times when we are with people who do not want to change their disobedient ways. Most of the time we are with such people we do not teach, reprove, or correct them with truth, nor do we act like what they are doing is fine with God. Forbearance or tolerance is not “grace.” Grace is “undeserved,” but everyone deserves kindness and tolerance. Grace is that special undeserved favor that helps people walk with God, while tolerance is the “truce” that we have with people who have not yet decided to walk with God. If we confuse tolerance for grace, then we never have genuine grace.

“longsuffering.” The Greek word is makrothumia (Strong’s #3115 μακροθυμία), and it refers to being longsuffering with people. It is a compound word from makros, long, and thumos, wrath or anger, and it refers to putting up with people for a long time before taking any action. Thayer’s Greek-English lexicon says it is “slowness in avenging wrongs.” Generally the older versions of the English Bible such as the King James, Young’s Literal Translation, Darby, and Rotherham’s Emphasized Bible, use the word “longsuffering,” while most modern versions avoid it because it is not a common English word and is considered archaic, and use “patience” instead. That actually creates a problem because “patience” is the best way to translate the word hupomonē (#5281 ὑπομονή) which refers to the quality that does not surrender to circumstances or succumb under trial. Although today we speak of being patient with things and with people, the fact that the Greek has a word that specifically refers to holding back one’s response to other people is important, and it seems clear that “longsuffering” communicates a concept that should remain clearly distinguished in Christian vocabulary and in the Bible. [For more on longsuffering, see commentary on Galatians 5:22, “longsuffering”].

“is intended to lead you to repentance.” Williams’ translation has the note: “implied in the genitive present.” What is implied is the idea that this grace is meant to lead you to repentance, which is how many versions read (e.g., ESV; NRSV; HCSB).

2:5. “But corresponding to your stubbornness and your unrepentant heart…” The teaching of this verse and verse 6 is that God’s judgment is just, and that a sinner’s punishment is in proportion to the crime committed. The amount of wrath a person stores up for himself corresponds to the amount he hardens his heart. This is similar to the truth taught in Matthew 7:2, “With the judgment you pronounce you will be judged, and with the measure you use it will be measured to you” (ESV); and Matthew 6:14-15, “For if you forgive others their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you, but if you do not forgive others their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses.”

“corresponding to your stubbornness.” The word “corresponding” comes from κατά (#2596 κατά), which in this context serves as a “marker of norm of similarity or homogeneity, according to, in accordance with, in conformity with, according to” (BDAG, def. 5). This is the same meaning as in Romans 2:2: God’s judgment is “according to truth,” i.e., God’s judgment corresponds to what is truly deserved. The translation “because,” (as many English versions have), does not capture the sense of the Greek at all. This misses the symmetry being promised by the word κατά; it makes the hardening simply the cause for future wrath without noting how the cause proportionally affects the amount of wrath being stored up. The verse is not asking, “Why will the person receive wrath?” This question would be answered with “because of the hardness of his heart.” The question being asked in the verse is “How much wrath will a person receive?” The answer is, as much as he deserves. In other words, the wrath that any person receives is “in accordance with” (in proportion to) his own hardness, and the unrepentance of his own heart. This is hard to understand by some orthodox Christians who think that all the unsaved burn forever (thus equal punishment) and all the saved are in the presence of Christ forever (thus equal reward).

The truth is that the unsaved are thrown into Gehenna and are burned up, but the time they spend being punished before they are consumed is different from person to person. This can be seen in examples such as when Jesus spoke of the people of Capernaum, where he had set up his ministry after leaving Nazareth. Jesus said that on the Day of Judgment it would be “more tolerable” for Sodom than for Capernaum. Yet the people of Sodom were not righteous in the sight of God, and the destruction of Sodom is a picture of the future destruction of the wicked in the fire (2 Pet. 2:6). Therefore, Jesus’ statement that it would be “more tolerable” for Sodom than Capernaum is a very strong reproach indeed (Matt. 11:20), and reflects that the people of Capernaum will be punished more severely than even the people of Sodom before they are annihilated.

The wages of sin is death (Rom. 6:23), but we must be careful not to take that one verse out from the context of the whole Bible. Romans 6:23 never says that the wages of sin is immediate death. Before people die in Gehenna, the lake of fire, they are punished in proportion to their sin. The Bible says in many different places that people will be repaid for what they have done on earth (cp. Job 34:11; Psalm 62:12; Prov. 24:12; Jer. 17:10; 32:19; Ezek. 33:20; Matt. 16:27; Rom. 2:6; 1 Cor. 3:8). This is one reason the Bible says that for the wicked there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth (Matt. 8:12; 22:13; 24:51; 25:30).

As encouragement for Christians, just as punishments differ for the wicked, so the rewards Christians will receive in the future kingdom are different from person to person and are based on the works each one has done. (Cp. John Schoenheit, The Christian’s Hope: The Anchor of the Soul).

“hardness.” The Greek is σκληρότης (#4643 σκληρότης), and it is a noun, meaning “hardness, stubbornness.” It is from σκληρός, which means “dried,” “stiff,” “rough,” or “hard.” It is the picture of a branch that has dried out and is hardened and stiff. It is a noun, standing on its own, not an adjective describing heart. Too many people are “hard” in their lives, being stiff, rough, unchanging, unyielding, and unrepentant towards God.
“unrepentant.” The Greek is ametanoetos (#279 ἀμετανόητος), and refers to not being repentant (the Greek verb “repent” is metanoeo.) Thus it is unrepentant, not turning to God, refusing to turn to God. Louw-Nida’s lexicon states, “In a number of languages it is difficult to speak of ‘a hard and unrepentant heart.’ A more satisfactory equivalent of this expression in Romans 2:5 may be ‘but you are stubborn and refuse to repent’ or ‘refuse to turn to God.’” Some versions read “impenitent” instead of “unrepentant,” but that does not seem as accurate here because impenitent means, “not penitent, without shame, regret, or remorse.” While it is true that those who do not repent usually have no shame, regret, or remorse, the primary meaning here is that the people have hearts that refuse to repent, i.e., they will not change their ways and turn to God.

“treasuring up.” The Greek verb is thesaurizo (#2343 θησαυρίζω), and it means to gather and store up, to heap up, to treasure up (Liddell and Scott), to accumulate riches. The noun form of the verb is thesaurus (#2344 θησαυρός) and is a treasury or storehouse, or the treasure that is put there (Cp. Matt. 6:19, 20 “treasure”). This phrase makes the verse contain the figure of speech irony, for who would store, as a treasure for themselves, wrath? Yet this is the picture being presented them. As a greedy man stores up wealth for himself, these hard and unrepentant people store up more and more wrath for themselves, which they will receive at the Day of Judgment.

“The Day of Wrath, when…righteous judgment.” The day of wrath and the righteous judgment are not two separate events. The day of wrath is the day “when” the righteous judgment of God is revealed. The Greek kai (usually “and”) can be understood as a “when” occasionally when it connects an expression of time with something that occurs in that time (BDAG; cp. Matt. 26:45; Mark 15:25). In this verse, the wrath of God and the “righteous” judgment of God are intertwined. The wrath of God is not unrighteous. It is not “a necessary evil.” Rather, it is part of the righteous nature of God to honor mankind’s freewill and give people the judgment that they have asked for via their words and behavior. The genitives (“of wrath;” “of the righteous judgment;” “of God”) without the definite articles emphasize the quality of the noun (Cp. Lenski; Meyer), but we put them in our version for clarity.

2:7. “life in the Age to come.” This is the everlasting life that begins with the new Messianic Age, the Millennial Kingdom. [See commentary on this phrase in Appendix 2: “Life in the Age to Come”].

2:8. “selfishly ambitious.” The Greek is eritheia (#2052 ἐριθεία). Spicq (Theological Lexicon) says, “…eritheia is used seven times in NT, including twice in the sin lists (2 Cor. 12:20, Gal. 5:20), along with eris [strife], which indicates that the former does not have the same meaning as the latter and is not derived from it. …it was formed from eritheuomai, “work for hire.” The erithos is a day laborer; the term is used especially for weavers and spinners. As a result, the term eritheia (paid work) originally had a positive sense, but it came to mean that which is done solely for interested motives (“What’s in it for me?”). Hence the meaning: contrive to gain a position…not in order to serve the state, but to gain honor and wealth. From that developed two other meanings: 1) dispute or intrigue to gain advantages; or 2) personal ambition, the exclusive pursuit of one’s own interest. These connotations of intrigue, disputations, and chicanery appear in all the NT texts.” Aristotle used the word of those who seek political office by unfair means, and Philo wrote, “The only stable government is one in which there is no strife and no intrigue [eritheia]” (Spicq, Vol. II, p. 70). “The idea is “base self-seeking,” the “baseness” that cannot shift its gaze to higher things” (TDNT). It is a complex word that takes on different meanings in different contexts, so attention to the context is important. Meanings include selfishness, selfish ambition, rivalry, base self-seeking, and the use of dishonest means to get personal gain (particularly in political circles).

2:9. “soul.” The Greek word often translated “soul” is psuchē (#5590 ψυχή; pronounced psoo-kay’), and it has a large number of meanings, including the physical life of a person or animal; an individual person; or attitudes, emotions, feelings, and thoughts. Here it is used more broadly of the individual himself while including his thoughts and emotions. Thus, while the verse could read something such as, “tribulation and anguish on every person” (cp. HCSB; ESV; NIT; NIV), the inclusion of the word “soul” points us to the fact that the thoughts, feelings, and emotions are important. The evil we do is certainly related to our thoughts and emotions, and we are responsible before God to control our thoughts and emotions (2 Cor. 10:5). [This use of “soul” is similar to the one in 2 Peter 2:14. For a more complete explanation of “soul,” see Appendix 7: “Usages of ‘Soul’”].

2:14. “are the law to themselves.” After the Day of Pentecost, there are only two categories of people: those who are born again of God’s gift of holy spirit, and those who are not. The New Birth comes through making Christ “Lord” (Rom. 10:9; Eph. 1:13, 14). People who are not born again did not believe in Jesus, so they either rejected him when they heard about him, or they never heard enough about him to believe. The Jews who heard about Jesus but rejected him are like those who persecuted Paul, they are “enemies” of God (Rom. 11:28).

As for people who did not hear enough about Jesus to believe, whether Jew or Gentile, they are judged on whether or not they did, by their nature, the works of the Law (Rom. 2:13-15). If there really was a Jew who tried to keep the Law but did not hear enough about Jesus to believe, then he or she could be judged righteous at the White Throne Judgment after the Second Resurrection (Rev. 20:11-15).

2:15. “also bearing witness.” The Greek is summartureo (#4828 συμμαρτυρέω), and means to bear joint witness. Their works demonstrate what is in their hearts, and their conscience bears a joint witness to that as well.

“reasonings.” The Greek is logismos (#3053 λογισμός) and is a “reasoning,” not just a “thought.”

“one another.” Most translations treat this as if it is the person’s thoughts that vary back and forth between accusing and excusing, and this could be the case, but the Greek is not clear. Meyer argues that it does not refer to that, but refers to the people excusing and accusing one another. Lenski admits that the Greek can be read either way. There seems to be more evidence in the context that the people act individually according to their heart and conscience, and that action then either excuses or accuses others. It is of course the case that people can be double minded, but that does not seem to be the emphasis here, although it can apply. It is best to translate the verse in a way that allows for both possibilities. A more literal reading of the Greek phrase would be, “and their reasonings accusing or else excusing between one another.”

2:16. “through Jesus Christ.” Jesus Christ stands at the right hand of God and in true oriental fashion is the agent through whom God acts. Just as Pharaoh ruled Egypt through Joseph (“Then Pharaoh said to Joseph, ‘I am Pharaoh, but without your word no one will lift hand or foot in all Egypt’” Gen. 41:44) so God rules and judges through Jesus Christ.
Jesus knew this was going to be the case even before his death and resurrection, so he said, “...the Father judges no one, but has entrusted all judgment to the Son” (John 5:22).

“will judge.” The Greek verb, though translated as future (“will”), is actually in the present tense. This is known as the futuristic present (cp. Wallace, Exegetical Syntax, pp. 535-37), which is the figure of speech heterosis, a switching of tenses for effect. Most versions, as we do, simply translate the verb according to its future tense meaning rather than its present tense form.

“what people have kept secret.” The Greek is more literally, “the secret things of people” since “secret” is an adjective. The genitive is a genitive of possession, i.e., the secret things held by people. It is prideful and futile to have secrets, a “secret life,” or to do things “behind closed doors.” God sees all and will judge all—this is promised. For the righteous, God’s exposure of evil is a great hope, because so much that happens in life must surely be the result of deliberate deception and threats and back room deals done by evil people. For the evil person, the idea that God will expose and punish evil should shake them to the core of their being, but they will not come to the light and be reformed. They await their punishment.

“just as my Good News declares.” The Greek is more literally translated “according to [or in accord with] my Good News.” However, that construction can be misunderstood to mean that Paul’s “Good News” is the standard by which God judges, which is not the case. Lenski notes the possible confusion and writes: “This is not saying that the gospel or “my gospel” will be the norm (κατά) of the final judgment; the norm is God’s own righteousness.” God judges by His righteous standard, which is what Paul’s Good News states and consists of. The NIV translation has picked up on the problem and made a translation that avoids it. “This will take place on the day when God will judge men’s secrets through Jesus Christ, as my gospel declares.” This verse is a good example of when the usual way of translating κατά into English, which is “according to” or “in accord with,” can cause confusion and an alternate translation that expresses the meaning of the Greek should be sought.

2:18 “determine the things that are best.” In the Greek, the word for determine is dokimazō (#1381 δοκιμάζω). It means to put something to the test with the hope of recognizing it as genuine, or worthy; to prove something in order to approve of it (Trench; Thayer). It was used by the Greeks in the context of metallurgy (Thayer). Here it is applied to ta diapheronta, literally, “the things that differ,” from diapherō (#1308 διαφέρω). The differing things are that which are good and evil, which carry (phero) in different directions. The sense of the Greek is that you examine the difference between good and evil, approving of the good things that pass the test. In English, “determine” shows that you examine and arrive at a judgment, while “things that are best” captures the sense of difference and approval (see dokimazō in Rom. 1:28).

2:20 “the unlearned.” The Greek is nēpios (#3516 νηπίος; pronounced nay’-pee-os), and it literally means an infant, a little child, but it was used metaphorically for those who were unlearned or immature. In the older versions, such as the King James, it was traditionally rendered “babes,” but today “babes” is used figuratively of beautiful women and we refer to infants as “babies.” In this verse it refers to people who are unlearned or immature.

“formulation.” Cp. NAB translation. The Greek word is morphosis (#3446 μορφώσις), used only here and in 2 Timothy 3:5. This word refers to “the state of being... formally structured” (BDAG). Hence, the law was the formulation of knowledge and truth, structured and brought together in one work. In this sense, it could alternately be translated the “embodiment” of knowledge and truth (cp. ESV; NIV; NASB).

2:22. “do you rob temples?” What does this question mean in relation to abhorring idols? It is not simply a remark against stealing, for the apostle already addressed this in verse 21 with the question, “do you steal?” Rather, this phrase is meant to call out hypocrisy and compromise. Rome, along with the entire Roman Empire, was crowded with temples, which were filled with idolatrous images and artifacts. Such artifacts were often very costly, made of gold and silver. Also, some temples were used as banks, in which people’s money was kept. In fact, our English word “money” comes from “Moneta,” the name of a goddess who had a temple in Rome in which money was both minted and stored. Since ancient Temples did not have particularly good security, temple robbery was somewhat common in ancient times. Paul raises the question, “You say you hate idols, but do you get dishonest gain by robbing temples?” Paul thus brings up the commands of Deuteronomy 7:25: “The images of their gods you are to burn in the fire. Do not covet the silver and gold on them, and do not take it for yourselves, or you will be ensnared by it, for it is detestable to the LORD your God” (NIV). As Lenski writes, “It is the violation of the first principle of Judaism itself, its abhorrence of all idols. To snatch some jewel, gold, or silver, or other valuable from an idol temple, to buy it from another, to work it up into something else, to sell it yea, even to touch it and in any way to possess it, really destroyed a Jew’s Judaism.”

2:23. “You who boast in the law, you dishonor God by your transgression of the law.” This verse is a statement and not a question. Compare the ESV and NET translations. It is a verdict paralleling vs. 17, as Lenski says, “What, then, is the verdict? ‘Thou art dishonoring God!’” If this verse was meant as a question, it would hardly be worth asking, because of course one dishonors God by transgressing the law!

2:24. “For just as it is written.” The reference is taken from the Septuagint versions of Isaiah 52:5, which differs somewhat from the Hebrew text. “defamed.” The Greek verb blasphēmeō (#987 βλασφηµέω) means showing disrespect to a person or deity, and/or harming his, her, or its reputation. [For more on blasphēmeō, see commentary on Matt. 9:3].

2:25. “to be sure… but.” Cp. NAB. This is a common Greek construction where two sides of a matter are presented. It is often translated as “on the one… on the other hand.” The translation “to be sure” is from the Greek word men (#3303 μέν), which here is “introducing a concessive clause… to be sure” (BDAG). This word works in conjunction with the word de (#1161 δὲ), which gives the other fuller side of the matter. The apostle Paul concedes that (“on the one hand”) circumcision is indeed profitable if you keep the law, but what he gives with one hand he takes away with the other, for he immediately adds that (“on the other hand”) if you break the law your circumcision is useless. This is important because the apostle will affirm in the next chapter that all have sinned and fallen short of the glory of God (Rom 3:23), and so circumcision of the flesh is not profitable for justification, for no one can keep the whole law.

2:27. “in spite of.” The Greek dia refers to things passing through, which may be favorable or hostile. Here it is hostile, and has the sense of “in spite of.” (See Lenski).

2:29. “On the contrary.” The Greek is the strong “but,” alla (#235 αλλά), which means “but, nevertheless, notwithstanding, etc.,” and sets in contrast that which comes before from the new thought being introduced. Especially after a negation (“not” and “nor” in verse 28), “on the contrary” is a good and clear translation (Cp. Holman Christian Standard Bible; Lenski).

“inwardly.” The Greek is kruptos (#2927 κρυπτός), meaning “hidden” or “secret.” Paul says a true Jew is one who is a Jew in the secret, hidden parts of the soul. In this sense, the translation “inwardly” is good.

“in spirit.” The Greek is “in spirit,” en pneuma (#4151 πνεῦμα). It refers to being “in spirit” or perhaps more understandably, “in union with the spirit of God,” which means in relation to God via the spirit of God which a Christian receives when he is born again. The Greek en is always in the dative case, and can be instrumental, so many Trinitarian translators understand this phrase to mean, “by the Spirit,” meaning that it is the Person of the Holy Spirit who circumcises a person’s heart at the time he believes, but that is not what this verse is referring to. Neither does this use of the word “spirit” refer to our “attitude.” If that were the case, the verse would read something such as: “true circumcision is of the heart, in the attitude, not by the written code…” Although there are verses where “spirit” does refer to an activity of the mind and can mean “attitude,” that is not its meaning here. Even if a person was a Jew who had a wonderful attitude about obeying God’s laws, he could not be righteous in God’s sight except through Christ. The Christian, whether Jew or Greek in background, was part of the “true circumcision” only by virtue of being born again of the spirit of God. Thus, true circumcision is always “in union with,” or “in connection with,” the spirit [For more on “in” as “in connection with,” see commentary on Eph. 1:3].

3:2. “First of all…” This short verse reveals the feelings of the Jews (and rightfully so) toward the Law. Christians have been influenced by the writings to the Christian Church (Acts-Jude) to see the Law as a yoke of bondage, a burden, and weak through the flesh. Thus it seems that all we can say about it is that we are glad we did not live under the Law. The Jew, on the other hand, considered the Law one of God’s greatest gifts to them as a nation. The Law (meaning the Tanakh, the entire Old Testament), was God’s guidance that showed them how to live, how to run a just society, and how to be holy before God. Indeed, Jewish life would not be Jewish life were it not for the Law.

It also helps us to see the wonderful attitude the Jews had toward the Law when we recognize that other nations did not have anything like it. It is truly a gift of God’s grace that He gave the Law and in doing so revealed Himself, His love, His righteousness, what He expected from mankind, and how to live prosperous and blessed lives. The gods of other nations gave no such gift. There is no “Word of God” in the pagan religions. Poets and authors such as Homer wrote about the gods, but what did they reveal? First, the stories themselves were contradictory in many ways. And the gods they revealed were often worse than any good human would be. They were jealous, vengeful, capricious, and often delighted in causing trouble. Furthermore, unlike the Law of Moses, which told people exactly what God wanted, pagans never quite knew how to please their gods, or if they were angry (something the people assessed by bad fortune such as sickness, losing a war, a famine, pestilence, etc.), they did not know exactly how to appease them. No wonder the Jews loved the Law and considered it a gift. Compared to our freedom in Christ, it was very restrictive, but how many of the commands of God to the Church are in the Law in one form or another? Many! Romans 7:12 will tell us that the Law is holy, just, and good. The Law, and the Christ, and the New Testament, are a true and unique witness of the love that our true God has for mankind. He not only wants a relationship with us, He wants to make sure that we know how to live such that life is a blessing and joy.

“words.” The Greek word is logion (#3051 λόγιον; pronounced log’-ee-on), and it is the diminutive of logos, “word” or “message.” Literally, it is “little words.” See commentary on Acts 7:38.

3:3. “some were without trust.” This is the figure of speech, tapeinosis, or understatement. “Some?!” Oh if that were only the case, that “some” did not believe, but “most” did. Sadly, for most of Israel’s history, only “some” believed, while the majority lived in unbelief. Yet those who believed had such a huge impact that it could surely seem like only some did not trust God.

3:5. “when he is inflicting.” The Greek verb is epipherō (#2018 ἐπιφέρω), and it means to bring upon, inflict, impose. In this verse the verb is in the present tense, indicating that God’s wrath can be a present thing, not only reserved for the future. Thus this verse confirms 1:18, that the wrath of God “is being revealed from heaven” against people for their sin. It is sometimes taught that God will only act in wrath against humans in the Tribulation period, when the seven seals are broken, the seven trumpets blow, etc., and there are mighty plagues on the earth. In fact, God has often acted in wrath, especially to protect His people. Examples include: the Flood of Noah; the Tower of Babel; the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah; the plagues on Egypt; the death of Korah and his fellow rebels (Num. 16:1-33); and the hailstones on the Canaanites (Josh. 10:11). An example of God’s wrath in the New Testament is the blindness of Elymas the sorcerer (Acts 13:11).

“wrath.” The Greek word for “wrath” is orgē (#3709 ὀργή pronounced, or-gay’), and it refers to wrath or anger. In this verse it is “the wrath,” referring to “the” wrath that is promised when people disobey God or rebel against Him. However, since in Christian jargon, “the wrath” generally refers to the wrath of God that will be poured out in the Book of Revelation, we thought it best to just say “wrath” here, rather than give the wrong impression.

“I am speaking from a human standpoint.” The verse starts out by saying that “our unrighteousness serves to show the righteousness of God,” and if that is the case, then by some twisted human logic our unrighteousness should be a good thing, because it more clearly shows the righteousness of God. So why would God inflict us with his wrath if what we are doing is a good thing? That is the “human standpoint,” and the failure of human logic. God does not need us to be unrighteous to show off His righteousness, even though our unrighteousness makes His righteousness very clear. Furthermore, He does not inflict people with wrath to show off His righteousness. It does that, of course, but it does so many other things as well: it serves as an example and warning to others so they will not take God lightly and live in sin; in serving as a warning to sinners, it helps assure that society will be godly and peaceful for mankind; it proves that God will keep His promises to punish evil; and it righteously recompenses people for what they have done in life, and thus repays them for their thoughts and deeds.

3:8. “slanderously.” The Greek verb blasphēmeō (#987 βλασφημέω) means showing disrespect to a person or deity, and/or harming his, her, or its reputation. This is a good example of the word blasphēmeō being used of a person, not God or a god. [For more on blasphēmeō, see commentary on Matt. 9:3].

“righteous judgment.” The Greek word is the adjective endikos (#1738 ἔνδικος), meaning “according to right, according to what is right, righteous,” from dīke (right). The people who says, “Let us do evil so that good may come” will receive a righteous judgment—they will be condemned.

3:19. “the law.” This use of “law” is the general use of the word that refers to the whole Old Testament, not just the Torah, or Mosaic Law (Genesis-Deuteronomy). We know this because not one of the quotations in the earlier verses is from the Torah, they are all from the Psalms, writings, and prophetic books.

“the whole world.” It is fair to ask how, since “the law” was given to Israel, the “whole world” becomes guilty because of what “the law” says. Although the law was spoken in general to Israel, and there are certainly things in it that refer only to Israel, there is much of the “Old Testament” that applies to, or even was written to, the Gentiles. Considering that “the law” in the verse refers to the entire Old Testament, and not just the Torah, we can see that what is said in the verses quoted it true of both Jews and Gentiles.

3:20. “declared righteous.” R. C. H. Lenski (St. Paul’s Epistle to the Romans) correctly notes:

“The word [dikaioo, #1344 δικαιώ] is not ethical (middle in force): ‘becomes righteous,’ but everywhere forensic (a straight passive): ‘declared righteous.’

The difference between, “becomes righteous” (or “is made righteous”) and “is declared righteous” is subtle but important. The Christian is declared righteous by God based upon the cleansing sacrifice of Christ. God declares that we are righteous while we are still in our flesh and still sinners and sinning. It is not as if we are “made righteous,” as if we were now no longer sinners. Romans 7:14-25 shows that is not the case. In a judicial decision, God declares us righteous due to the effect of the work of Christ in spite of the sin that lives in us. If a thief is arrested and goes to court, but makes such an impassioned plea to the judge that he will live an honest life from then on, the judge may decide to “declare him righteous.” He is still a thief, but in the eyes of the law he is “righteous,” and without guilt. Similarly, we are sinners, but in the eyes of the law of God, because we accepted Christ’s payment for our sin, we are “declared righteous,” and no longer will suffer God’s penalty of death.

We have an obligation to try to live sinless lives, but as Paul discovered, no amount of human effort will attain that goal. We are wretched sinners, but thank God that He simply declared us to be righteous (see commentary on 3:22, “righteous”).

“comes only the full knowledge of sin.” The context says that no flesh will be declared righteous in God’s sight by the works of the Law. Then it says why: “for through the law comes the knowledge of sin.” The context implies that making people know sin is all the Law does, it cannot make one righteous in God’s sight. Thus adding the implied word “only” clarifies the argument. A number of versions translate the concept into the verse: “all that the Law does is to tell us what is sinful” (NJB); “The law simply shows us how sinful we are” (NLT); “For all the law can do is to make men conscious of sin” (Williams).

“full knowledge.” The Greek is epignōsis (#1922 ἐπίγνωσις) and does not just refer to “knowledge,” but rather a full or complete knowledge or realization. When the Law came, “sin increased” (Rom. 5:20). People did not just know about sin, they fully knew sin because they experienced it, and its dreadful consequences, for themselves.

3:21. “righteousness from God.” This is the genitive of origin (cp. NIV). “Although the law and the prophets are bearing witness to it” is similar to RSV and ESV. “Witness” is a present participle. Even now they bear witness to the principle (law) of faith.

3:22. “righteousness.” Righteousness is such a vital topic in Romans (indeed, in the New Testament!) that we must take some time to try to understand it. The book of Romans clearly establishes that a Christian becomes righteous, or “in right standing,” before God by faith in Jesus Christ (Rom. 3:22, 26, 28; 4:5, 13; 5:1; 9:30; 10:6).

Complicating our understanding of “righteousness,” however, is that almost every English version of the New Testament uses both “righteousness” (“righteous,” etc.), and “justification” (“justify,” etc.). Understandably, most people think these two different English words are translated from two different Greek words, but that is not the case. The same Greek root word underlies both the translation “righteousness” and the translation “justification.” That is the major reason why, when we compare different English versions of the New Testament, they do not agree as to when to use “righteousness” and when to use “justification.”

The reason both “righteousness” and “justification” are used even though the Greek is the same is that, in general, scholars have agreed to translate the attributes of God as “righteous,” while translating what God has done for men as “justification.” D. W. Diehl writes:

“Even though there is no distinction between righteousness and justice in the biblical vocabulary [the Greek words], theologians often use the former to refer to the attribute of God in himself and the latter to refer to the actions of God with respect to his creation.” (Walter Elwell, editor, Evangelical Dictionary of Theology, p. 953, “Righteousness.”)

We believe that translating the same Greek words both as “righteousness” and “justification” causes more problems than it solves. First and most obvious, the English words “righteousness” and “justification,” while related in meaning, do not mean the same thing. In English, “righteousness” means “to act in accord with divine or moral law,” while “justification” relates to a judicial pronouncement that the person has been found innocent or absolved from guilt, ostensibly on the basis of the facts of the case. That scholars cannot decide on exactly when the Greek words have those separate meanings is clear from the fact that, as we have said above, different English versions differ as to when they use “righteous,” and when they use “just.”

A second major problem with translating the same Greek words both as “righteousness” and “justification” is that the internal consistency of the Church Epistles, especially in Romans and Galatians, is lost. If “righteous,” “righteousness,” etc., appear all the way through the New Testament, then the reader can see the consistent message that God is giving us in His Word. However, if in versions such as the NIV and ESV, we see “righteousness...through faith” in Romans 3:22, but “justified by faith” in Romans 5:1, although we may get the general meaning of the verses, we lose the consistency of what God is saying.

A third problem with translating the same Greek words both as “righteousness” and “justification,” is that the flow of the pattern of salvation is not clearly maintained from the Old Testament to the New Testament. The idea of salvation, which is quite often communicated by the word “saved” (Greek: σώζω) in the New Testament, was generally communicated by the word “righteousness” in the Old Testament. (In spite of that, it would be wrong to say that in the Old Testament, “righteous” equaled “saved.” It would be better to understand the Old Testament concept that a person was righteous by his faith and fidelity to the covenant, and that God honored that and gave everlasting life to those faith-full individuals). If we read in the Old Testament that the “righteous” will live forever, and then we read in the New Testament that we have “righteousness” with God because of our faith, we can easily make the connection. But if we read, “righteousness” in the Old Testament and “justified” in the New Testament, we can easily miss the connection.

We can clearly see that in the Old Testament, “righteous,” “righteousness,” etc., often had the connotation of salvation by reading the verses that use those words and substituting “saved” or “salvation.” The list of verses relating righteousness to being acceptable to God and having everlasting life is far too large and too varied to include here, but here is a small sampling. The Israelites would be “righteous” if they were careful to obey the Law (Deut. 6:25). The righteous will stand (i.e., do well) in the Day of Judgment, but the wicked will not (Ps. 1:3-6). The righteous are the ones who will dwell on the earth forever (Ps. 37:29). The righteous will not be moved (i.e., taken from the earth; Ps. 55:22; 112:6), and Proverbs 10:30 and 12:3 expand that to say although the righteous will not be moved, the wicked will not dwell in the land. The righteous have a reward, referring to an everlasting reward (Ps. 58:11). The righteous are enrolled in the book of life (Ps. 69:28). The righteous flourish and are planted in the house of Yahweh (Ps. 92:12, 13). Righteousness delivers from death, meaning everlasting death (Prov. 10:2). The righteous person who does not sin will live forever (Ezek. 3:21). At the Day of Judgment people will see the difference between the righteous and the wicked, and the wicked will be burned up while the righteous will be healed (Malachi 3:17-4:2).

Righteousness has always been by faith. This was clear at the time of Abraham, continued during the administration of the Law, and is still true today, in the Church Age. However, when the Christian Church started on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2), God made a change. On the Day of Pentecost God started the Administration of Grace (Eph. 3:2; see commentary there). Up until Pentecost in Acts 2, people were saved by faith, which was exhibited in their righteous acts, and their faith had to be maintained. That is why Ezekiel 33:12-20 is very clear that if a “righteous” person becomes unrighteous he will “die” (i.e., “die” on the Day of Judgment), while if a wicked person repents and becomes righteous he will “live,” (i.e., live forever). It is why Habakkuk says that righteous will live by their faithfulness (Hab. 2:4).

In the Administration of Grace, people are saved by their faith in Christ quite apart from their faith being demonstrated by the works of the Law, or their “righteous” actions. The thing that singularly made the difference between salvation in the Old Testament, which involved continued faith, and salvation in the New Testament, which is based on one-time faith, is that in the Administration of Grace (Eph. 3:2), salvation involves “birth.” From the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2) onward, a saved person is one who is “born again,” and his or her salvation is guaranteed. Thus, unlike the Old Testament when a righteous person could start being wicked and then be told he would “die,” i.e., die forever, in the Administration of Grace, when a person is born again, his or her salvation is assured and the person will absolutely have everlasting life (see commentary on 1 Pet. 1:23). The New Birth, like any birth, is permanent, which is why words such as “guarantee” or “nothing can separate us” are used in the Church Epistles. Christian salvation is not attained by good works, and it cannot be lost by not doing good works or by doing evil works.

The Greek words in the New Testament that relate to righteousness, and are all from the root δική, “right,” are: δικαιος (adjective); δικαιοσύνη (substantive: adjective used as a noun); δικαίον (verb); δικαίος (adverb); and δικαιοσύνη (noun). We will now take the time to define these, but to do that we have to combine concepts found in Greek lexicons, such as BDAG and Thayer’s Greek-English lexicons, with Hebrew concepts of righteousness. It is absolutely vital that we remember that the New Testament concept of righteousness is anchored in the Old Testament concept of righteousness. We must keep in mind that in the Gospels when Jesus spoke of righteousness (cp. Matt. 5:6, 20), he was speaking in Hebrew and Aramaic, the language of the Old Testament. By using those languages, he brought the Hebrew meaning of “righteousness” into what he said. This important fact is obscured by the fact that the four Gospels are written in Greek as if Jesus spoke Greek words with purely Greek meanings. He did not.

What Jesus said and did was intimately connected with the Old Testament, and he used the language and concepts of the Old Testament when he taught. This would be much easier to see if the page in the Bible that is traditionally placed between Malachi and Matthew, and says in huge letters, “The New Testament,” was placed between the Gospel of John and the book of Acts. When we think about it, “the New Covenant” (“New Testament”) was inaugurated in Christ’s blood, with his death (Matt. 26:28), which is at the end of the Gospels, not at the beginning. Until the time of Jesus’ death, people were still living under the Old Covenant, and in the Gospels Jesus spoke the language of the Old Covenant, which were Hebrew and Aramaic. If the page that says, “The New Testament” was placed between the Gospel of John and the book of Acts, we would be able to better understand two things: first, that Jesus spoke and taught as an Old Testament prophet, fulfilling the Law, and second, that the New Covenant was inaugurated at the end of his life. Historically, the reason the page “The New Testament” is placed between Malachi and Matthew has nothing to do with the subject matter of the Bible at all. It was placed where it is because the books before it were in Hebrew, and the books after it were in Greek. That, however, is a terrible, and very misleading, reason to put the page where it is, because the average Christian just assumes that “the New Covenant” somehow started with the Gospels, when it did not.

Paul and the other apostles continued using “righteousness” in a way that certainly had overtones of the Hebrew meaning. The righteousness that Jesus spoke about, and the righteousness that Paul and the other apostles spoke about, did not change just because it was talked about in different languages. Perhaps this illustration will be clear: the righteousness that Paul spoke about when he used his native language and spoke to Jews, and the righteousness he spoke about when he spoke in Greek in cities like Thessalonica or Corinth, was the same righteousness. In fact, it is specifically because the concept of righteousness in the Epistles is the same as it is in the Old Testament that the Church Epistles can legitimately spend so much time referring to people such as Abraham and David, and that they were righteous by faith.

In summary, the overtones of “righteousness” that are part of the Old Testament and clearly part of the meaning of the Hebrew word, are also brought into the Greek words used in the writings of Paul, and we must be aware of those overtones if we are going to understand the Epistles and the message of the New Testament. We would expect this anyway, because Paul is not inventing a new Gospel, or a new salvation, or a new way of right-standing in the sight of God.

The meaning of the Hebrew adjective tsaddiq, “righteous” (#6662 צַדִּיק), the noun tsedeq, “righteousness” (#6664 צֶדֶק), and the related Hebrew words for aspects of righteousness all relate to the same basic concepts. Of course “righteousness” in Hebrew and Greek has a range of definitions, just as it has in English, but a central meaning is “conformity to a norm.” When we are speaking of God’s righteousness, then, we are speaking of God’s keeping the norms that He Himself has established; for example, His covenant and His promises. We can see this in verses such as 2 Chronicles 12:6, where the people said, “Yahweh is righteous.” In that context, God had just told the people through a prophet that they had abandoned Him, so He was going to abandon them. They responded “Yahweh is righteous,” because they understood that God’s actions were in conformity with His norm, after all, God had said in the Law that if they forsook Him, He would forsake them. It is common that we use “righteous” as being conformity to a norm, and when we speak of people being “righteous,” or performing “righteous acts,” we are generally thinking in terms of those people’s actions being “right” in accordance with some external standard. In other words, one aspect of “righteousness” is integrally related to our actions in relation to a norm.

There is another, quite different meaning to “righteous,” however. Integrally part of the meaning of the Hebrew words for “righteous” is the concept of being vindicated in a court of law. It is vitally important to understand this part of “righteousness,” because being “declared righteous” in a court of law is very different from being “made righteous,” or “acting in a righteous manner.”

N. T. Wright expresses this well when he says, “‘Righteousness’ within the lawcourt setting...denotes the status that someone has when the court has found in their favor” (Justification, p. 90, special emphasis added). “Righteousness” in the law court does not mean that the person is actually morally upright and “right” in God’s eyes by virtue of his wonderful moral behavior. Nor does it mean the person acts in a righteous way. It means the person’s status as far as the court is concerned is “righteous.” Because Jesus died for us, we can be “declared righteous” in the heavenly court even though we are not upstanding Christian citizens. Thank God for that! We also need to know that, in declaring us to be righteous in His eyes, God does not “make us righteous.” Because we are declared righteous, we get to have everlasting life. However, there is a “but” we need to be aware of.

Our salvation, or everlasting life, is by grace, and since we are declared righteous, we get to live forever. But there is the matter of rewards. Rewards are not by grace, they are by works [For more on rewards, see commentary on 2 Cor. 5:10]. The Christian is
